

The Bookman

VOLUME XLIII.

OCTOBER, 1912 — MARCH, 1913.

London:

HODDER AND STOUGHTON

WARWICK SQUARE, E.C.

CONTENTS.

Accon. No.....Date.....
OCTOBER, 1912—MARCH, 1913.

	PAGE
Afinam's Orchard. (Sarah Grand) ..	228
Adventures of War with Cross and Crescent. (Philip Gibbs and Bernard Grant.) By Perceval Gibbon ..	276
Adventures in Southern Seas. (Richard Stead.) By J. E. Patterson ..	122
Among my Books. (F. Harrison.) By William E. A. Axon ..	165
Another Device. (Stephen Paget.) By D. S. Meldrum ..	176
Apology for Rebecca, An. By Kate Douglas Wiggin ..	9
Armchair at the Inn, The. (F. H. Smith.) By E. Wright ..	277
Art. (Auguste Rodin.) By Holbrook Jackson ..	168
Aspirations of Jean Servien, The. (A. France.) By R. Curle ..	232
Awakening of England, The. (F. E. Green.) By M. H. H. Macartney ..	56
Bachelor's Buttons. (Edward Burke.) By Edward Wright ..	277
Balfour, Arthur James, as Philosopher and Thinker. (Wilfrid M. Short.) By Dr. James Moffatt ..	186
Balkan War Drama, The. (A Special Correspondent.) By Perceval Gibbon ..	317
Battle of Life, The. (T. E. Kebbel.) By D. S. Meldrum ..	61
Bird of Time, The. (Sarojini Naidu.) By E. T. ..	171
Book of Wonder, The. (Lord Dunsany.) ..	121
BOOKMAN Gallery, The—
Norman Angell. By Robert Birkmyre ..	12
Maurice Baring. By Robert Birkmyre ..	249
John Buchan. By R. B. ..	140
Mrs. Henry Dudeney ..	294
Ian Hay. By X. ..	10
Mrs. Stepmay Rawson ..	294
Bookman's Table, The—
American Diary of a Japanese Girl. Y. Noguchi ..	240
Borgia, Caesar. John Leslie Garner ..	82
Bow-Wow Book, The. Coulson Kernahan ..	84
Cameos of Indian Crime. B. H. Hervey ..	80
Cross Views. Wilfrid S. Jackson ..	336
Cumberland Letters, The. Clementina Black ..	130
Dickens, Charles. W. H. Helm ..	82
Far off Fields. Joseph Whittaker ..	195
Godoy, the Queen's Favourite. Edmund B. d'Auvergne ..	82
Green Fields, The. Kenneth Hare ..	284
Hearn, Lafcadio. Edward Thomas ..	194
Hindle Wakes. Stanley Houghton ..	80
In Patria. John S. Carroll ..	194
Inner Life of George Eliot, The. Charles Gardner ..	195
Interpretation in Song. Harry Plunket Greene ..	195
Japan as I Saw it. A. H. Exner ..	132
John Jonathan and Company. James Milne ..	130
Love-Seeker, The. Maud Churton Braby ..	103
Lords of the Devil's Paradise, The. Sidney Paternoster ..	338
Manet, Edouard. Louis Hourticq ..	284
Memorials of Old Nottinghamshire. E. L. Guilford ..	82
'Neath Oak and Olive. Harold Sanford ..	240
Old Irish World, The. Alice Stopford Green ..	239
Poems of Catullus, The. Charles Stuttaford ..	240
Rambles in Ireland. Robert Lynd ..	239
River Rhyme, The. J. Ashby-Sterry ..	336
Rough Roads. Dyke Wilkinson ..	130
Royal Visit to India, The. Hon. John Fortescue ..	195
Shadow Show, The. J. H. Curle ..	132
Short History of Germany, A. A. W. Holland ..	284
Six Great Princesses. Count de Soissons ..	336
Tannhäuser and the Master Singers of Nuremberg. A. L. Cleather and Basil Crump ..	82
Tennyson. Aaron Watson ..	240
Tramp's Sketches, A. Stephen Graham ..	194
Trial of Jeanne d'Arc, The. Edward Garnett ..	240
Unseen Friends. Mrs. William O'Brien ..	284
Verbes and Reverses. Wilfrid Meynell ..	283
Books, Notes on New ..	84, 132, 196, 242, 286, 338
Booksellers' Diary, The ..	14, 92, 201, 251, 296
Borrow, George. (E. Thomas.) By Walter Jerrold ..	70
Bottle in the Smoke, A. (Mrs. Milne Rae.) By B. B. B. Burney, Fanny, at the Court of Queen Charlotte. (Constance Hill.) By Lewis Melville ..	123
By-paths of Scottish History, In. (L. Barbé.) By F. W. Byron. (Ethel C. Mayne.) By Sir George Douglas, Bart ..	220
Campbell, Lady Victoria: a Memoir. (Lady Frances Balfour.) By Dr. James Moffatt ..	272
Carriages and Coaches. (Ralph Straus.) ..	170
Caviare. (Grant Richards.) By B. B. B. ..	125
Century of Great Actors, A. (Cecil F. Armstrong.) ..	170
Chaucer, Geoffrey. (E. Legouis.) By William Henry Hudson ..	271
Christmas Bookshelf, The. By A. (33 books) ..	147
Christmas Garland (M. Beerbohm.) By G. S. Layard ..	182
Christmas Supplement (216 pages), THE BOOKMAN for December, 1912 ..
Cité des Lampes, La. (C. Silve.) By T. Seccombe ..	160
City of the World, The. (Edwin Pugh.) By A. ..	59
Clara. (A. Neil Lyona.) By Edwin Pugh ..	119
Collected Verse of Rudyard Kipling, The. By Dixon Scott ..	143
Collected Works of William Morris, The. (May Morris.) By Edward Thomas ..	172
Competitions, THE BOOKMAN Prize ..	34, 107, 153, 210, 260, 309
Complete "Mystery of Edwin Drood." (J. C. Walters.) ..	225
Confessions of a Fool, The. (August Strindberg) ..	66
Correspondence of Jonathan Swift (F. E. Ball.) By Y. Y. ..	47
Correspondence of Sarah Spencer, Lady Lytton ..
Mrs. Hugh Wyndham.) By Clare Jerrold ..	118
Creed in Human Life, The. (Maurice Clare.) By Dr. James Moffatt ..
Crock of Gold, The. (James Stephens.) By H. A. H. ..	12
Deborah. (Lascelles Abercrombie.) By Edward Thomas ..	12
Decline of Aristocracy. (Ponsonby.) By George Sampson ..	12
Devoted Sparkes. (W. Pett Ridge.) By Edwin Pugh ..	12
Diaries of William Charles Macready, The. (William Toynbee.) By F. G. Bettany ..	187
Dickens, Charles, Social Reformer. (Crotch.) By B. W. Matz ..	342
Dieux ont Soif, Les. (A. France.) By T. Seccombe ..	160
Dream of Daffodils. (H. D. Lowry.) By E. Thomas ..	210
Early Naturalists, The. (L. C. Miall.) By Richard Curle ..	62
Egypt and other Poems. (F. Coultas.) By E. Thomas ..	210
Elf, The. (James Guthrie.) By Edward Thomas ..	210
Enchantments. (John Gurdon.) By Edward Thomas ..	210
English Literature, 1880-1905. (Kennedy.) By G. H. Mair ..	210
English Prose Rhythm. (Prof. Saintsbury.) By D. S. ..	126
English Scene in the Eighteenth Century (Roscoe.) ..	226
Episodes of Vathek, The. (William Beckford.) ..	68
Epochs of Chinese and Japanese Art. (Ernest F. Fenollosa.) By G. S. Layard ..
Evasion, L'. (M. I. Alméras.) By Thomas Seccombe ..	16
Exodus. (Martin D. Armstrong.) By Edward Thomas ..	210
Experiments in Industrial Organisation. (E. Cadbury.) ..	220
Far Quests. (Cale Young Rice.) ..	280
Fascination of Books, The. (Joseph Shaylor.) ..	185
Fifteen Thousand Miles in a Ketch. (Captain Raymond Rallier du Baty.) By J. E. Patterson ..	121
Fighting Spirit of Japan, The. (E. J. Harrison.) By Clive Holland ..	327
Fires, Vols. II. and III. (Wilfrid W. Gibson.) By F. B. ..	54
Five Centuries of English Poetry. (Rev. G. O'Neill.) By K. T. H. ..	275
Five of Spades, The. (Mrs. P. C. de Crespigny.) By B. B. B. ..	125
Fleet Street in Seven Centuries. (Walter G. Bell.) By A. ..	59
Flowing Road, The. (C. Whitney.) By Richard Curle ..	279
Forty Years in the Wilderness. (Sir Henry W. Lucy.) By W. A. F. ..	210
Fountains in the Sand. (N. Douglas.) By Richard Curle ..	165
France from Within. (Claire de Pratz.) By A. W. Evans ..	192
Friendly Enemy, The. (T. P. Cameron Wilson.) By Edward Wright ..	277
From a Pedagogue's Sketch Book. (F. R. G. Duckworth.) By A. St. John Adcock ..	66
General Mallock's Shadow. (W. B. Maxwell.) By B. B. B. ..	125
Georgian Poetry, 1911-1912. By Edward Thomas ..	330
German Emperor and the Peace of the World, The. (Alfred H. Fried.) By J. M. ..	53
Gissing, George. (F. Swinnerton.) By Edwin Pugh ..	172
Gitanjali. (Rabindra Nath Tagore.) By Richard Curle ..	227
Glimpses of the Past. (Elizabeth Wordsworth.) By J. M. ..	276
Golden Bough, The: Part V. "Spirits of the Corn and of the Wild." (J. G. Frazer.) By Robert Lynd ..	51
Gordon, Adam Lindsay, and his Friends. (Edith Humphris and Douglas Sladen.) ..	124
Great Solution, The. (August Schwan.) By J. M. ..	53
Greuze and his Models. (John Rivers.) By F. M. ..	275
Hardy, Thomas. (L. Abercrombie.) By Darrell Figgis ..	177
Highways and Byways in Somerset. (Ernest Hutton.) ..	278
History of English Literature: From "Beowulf" to Swinburne. (Andrew Lang.) By F. G. Bettany ..	46
History of Russia. (Kluchevsky.) By George Sampson ..	280
History of the British Nation, A. (A. D. Innes.) By Thomas Seccombe ..	234
Hocken and Hunken. ("Q.") By E. W. ..	185
Home University Library of Modern Knowledge, The. By William Henry Hudson ..	18
Ibsen, Henrik. (R. E. Roberts.) By Darrell Figgis ..	18
Illusions of Mr. and Mrs. Bressingham, The. (Gerard Bendall.) By B. B. B. ..	18
Immanence. (Evelyn Underhill.) By Edward Thomas ..	53
In Mantle Blue. (F. Gwynne Evans.) ..	60
Inn of Tranquillity, The. (John Galsworthy.) By M. H. H. Macartney ..	183
Italian Travel Sketches. (James Sully.) ..	58
Italy's War for a Desert. (Francis McCullagh.) By F. M. A. ..	58
Interpretation of Rudolf Eucken's Philosophy, An. (W. Tudor Jones.) By T. E. Page ..	27
Jocasta and the Famished Cat. (Anatole France.) By Richard Curle ..	27
King Fialar. (J. L. Raneberg.) By Edward Thomas ..	27
Knave of Diamonds, The. (E. M. Dell.) By E. Wright ..	27
Lamorna. (Mrs. Alfred Sidgwick.) By B. B. B. ..	27
Larkmeadow. (Marmaduke Pickthall.) By B. B. B. ..	27
Leaves of Prose. (A. Matheson.) By A. St. J. Adcock ..	60
Letter-Bag of Lady Elizabeth Spencer Stanhope, The. (A. M. W. Stirling.) By Lewis Melville ..	160
Letters of a Post-Impressionist. (V. Van Gogh.) By A. H. J. ..	160
Letters of George Meredith. By Dr. William Barry ..	160
Letters of Thomas Gray, The. (D. C. Tovey.) By Professor George Saintsbury ..	160
Life and Letters of the Rev. James Macgregor. (Lady Frances Balfour.) By C. W. Boyd ..	160
Life and Letters of William Cobbett, The. (Lewis Melville.) By F. E. Green ..	160

	PAGE		PAGE
Life of a Spider, The. (J. H. Fabre.)	231	Novel Notes (continued)—	3
Life of Benjamin Disraeli, Earl of Beaconsfield, The. (William Flavel Monypenny.) By Walter Sichel	213	Sally. Dorothea Conyers	74
Life of Henry Hailey Fowler, The. (E. H. Fowler.)	115	Second City, The. W. J. Eccott.	190
Life in the Indian Police. (C. E. Gouldsbury.) By S. N. S.	116	Sins of the Father, The. Thomas Dixon	72
Loeb Classical Library, vols. I.—X. (T. E. Page and W. H. D. Rouse.) By J. P. Postgate	163	Siri Ram: Revolutionist	283
Loeb Classical Library (further vols.). By T. W. Allen	328	St. Quin. Dion Clayton Calthrop	282
Lost Language of Symbolism, The. (Harold Bayley.) By A. E. Waite	322	Story of Joan Greencroft, The. Arthur N. Bax	76
Maitland of Lethington. (E. Russell.) By D. Hay Fleming	260	Story of Stephen Compton, The. J. E. Patterson	281
Manning, Cardinal, and other Essays. (J. E. C. Bodley.) By Monsignor R. H. Benson	209	Street of the Flute-Player, The. H. de Vere Stacpoole	192
Marriage. (H. G. Wells.) By Richard Curle	44	Swift Nick of the North Road. George Edgar	332
Mary, the Mother of Jesus. (Alice Meynell.)	176	Tamsie. Rosamond Napier	127
Memories of James McNeill Whistler, the Artist. (T. R. Way.) By G. S. Layard	30	Things that Pass. Alice E. Robbins	235
Men, Women, and Mixxes. (Mrs. Andrew Lang.)	120	Those Other Days. E. Phillips Oppenheim	74
Minority of Henry III. (K. Norgate.) By T. Seccombe	234	To-day. Percy White	72
Modern History of the English. (R. H. Gretton.) By Thomas Seccombe	234	Under the Yoke. Ivan Vazoff	237
Molyneux of Mayfair. (Duncan Schwann.) By B. B. B.	125	Unknown Quantity, The. Charles Inge	76
Moritur. (Hermann Sudermann.) By Richard Curle	116	Valserine. Marguerite Audoux	72
Mrs. Ames. (E. F. Benson.)	68	Varick's Legacy. G. B. Burgin	191
My Life. (August Bebel.) By J. C.	223	Veiled Women. Marmaduke Pickthall	332
Napoleon's Last Campaign in Germany. (F. Lotaine Petre.) By Walford D. Green	322	Virgin Fortress, The. Max Pemberton	128
Nature and Other Poems. (Alfred Williams.) By Edward Thomas	218	Weaving of the Shuttle, The. C. Holmes Cautley	192
News Notes	1, 85, 134, 197, 243, 289	Windfrint Virgin. Wilkinson Sherren	191
Note-Books of Samuel Butler, The. (Henry Festing Jones.) By A. St. John Adcock	326	Windridge. W. Riley	80
Notes on New Books	84, 132, 196, 242, 286, 338	Yonder. E. H. Young	72
Novel Notes—		Novels of Sir Walter Scott, The. By S. J.	181
Adventures of Napoleon Price, The. May Edgington	78	Old Houses and Village Buildings in East Anglia. (Basil Oliver.)	233
American Girl at the Durbar, An. Shelland Bradley	74	Old Paris. (Henry C. Shelley.)	54
At What Sacrifice? Annie O. Tilbitts	282	On Nature's Trail. (F. St. Mars.) By Coulson Kernahan	60
Back Home. Irvin S. Cobb	237	One Hundred and Five Sonnets. (Isidore G. Ascher.)	65
Bandbox, The. Louis Joseph Vance	191	Papers Critical and Reminiscent. (William Sharp.)	3
Bride's Breviary, The	74	People of the Wild. (F. St. Mars)	237
Bunch Grass. Horace Annesley Vachell	190	People's Books, The. By William Henry Hudson	184
Cease Firing. Mary Johnston	238	Peradventure. (A. T. Strong.) By A. St. John Adcock	66
Celestial Critic, The. Vincent Brown	190	Personality of Napoleon, The. (J. Holland Rose.) By Walford D. Green	322
Charles the Great. Mrs. H. H. Penrose	192	Pictures of the Panama Canal. (Joseph Pennell.)	181
Cheer for a Stake. Harold Vallings	282	Poem Book of the Gael, The. (E. Hall.) By E. Thomas	218
Come Rack! Come Rope! Robert Hugh Benson	193	Poems. (Lucy Masterman.) By Edward Thomas	330
Commoner's Rights. Constance Smedley	190	Poems New and Old. (Henry Newbolt.)	270
Daughter of the Morning, A. Hugh de Selincourt	191	Poems of Adam Lindsay Gordon. (D. Sladen.) By S. J.	57
Delit, The. William Westrup	127	Poems of Love and Earth. (John Drinkwater.) By Francis Bickley	65
Delit Account, The. Oliver Onions	331	Poems of Rosamund Marriott Watson. By K. Tynan	124
Distant Lamp, The. Harold Begbie	236	Poetical Works of George Meredith, The. (G. M. Trevelyan.) By Alice Meynell	158
Dr. Tuppy. Stephen Townsend	128	Poetical Works of Robert Bridges. By E. Thomas	330
Elizabeth, Betsy, and Bess. Lily Schofield	127	Poet's Chantry, The. (K. Brégy.) By A. St. J. Adcock	66
Fool in Christ, The. Gerhart Hauptmann	283	Portraits and Sketches. (E. Gosse.) By F. Bickley	178
Fortitude. Hugh Walpole	332	Portraits and Speculations. (A. Ransome.) By R. Curle	320
Foundling, The. Paul Trent	331	Porzia. (Cale Young Rice.)	280
Gate of To-morrow, The. Norman McKeown	334	Private Life of Henry Maitland, The. (Morley Roberts.) By Frank Swinnerton	173
Girl From the East, The. David Whitelaw	78	Private Papers of Henry Rycroft, The. (George Gissing.) By Edwin Pugh	173
Gods of the Dead, The. Winifred Graham	237	Prior Park, At. (Austin Dobson.) By Francis Bickley	178
Golden Venture, The. J. S. Fletcher	78	Problem of Edwin Drood, The. (Sir W. Robertson Nicoll.) By Thomas Seccombe	113
Goody Fellowship, The. Rachel Capen Scheffauer	192	Promised Land, The. (Mary Antin.) By George Sampson	106
Guinea Gold. Beatrice Grimshaw	236	Reader, The—
Happy Family, The. Frank Swinnerton	126	Christmas Bookshelf, The. By A. (33 books)	147
Harry the Cockney. Edwin Pugh	281	Conan Doyle, Sir Arthur. By A. St. John Adcock	95
Hero of the Herat, The. Maud Diver	193	Disraeli Continued. By Walter Sichel	213
Heroine in Bronze, The. James Lane Allen	235	Gaskell's Birthplace, Mrs. By Mrs. Ellis H. Chadwick	160
Hilary's Career. Parry Truscott	332	Gray's Letters. By Professor George Saintsbury	313
Honey, My Honey. Katharine Tynan	191	James, Henry. By Dixon Scott	299
Honours Easy. Mrs. J. O. Arnold	72	Kipling, Rudyard. By Dixon Scott	143
House of Fortune, The. Max Pemberton	76	Macgregor, Dr. By C. W. Boyd	306
Irresistible Mrs. Ferrers, The. Arabella Kenealy	78	Maitland of Lethington. By D. Hay Fleming, LL.D.	260
John Scarlett. Donald Maclean	334	Majority of The Bookman, The. By Sir W. Robertson Nicoll, LL.D.	42
Joyous Adventures of Aristide Pujol. W. J. Locke	237	Manning, Cardinal, and other Essays. By Monsignor R. H. Benson	209
Keynote, The. Alphonse de Chateaubriant	80	Morley, Lord, as a Man of Letters. By Alexander Mackintosh	203
King Errant. Mrs. F. A. Steel	236	Mystery of "Edwin Drood." By T. Seccombe	113
King's Master. O. Lethbridge and J. de Stourton	282	Poetry of George Meredith, The. By Alice Meynell	158
Letters to a Prison. Mrs. Fred Reynolds	128	Reade, Charles. By Lewis Melville	253
Little Thank You. Mrs. T. P. O'Connor	235	Revelation of George Meredith. By Dr. W. Barry	156
London Lavender. E. V. Lucas	128	Rousseau, Jean Jacques. By T. E. Page	111
Lovers, The. Eden Philpotts	127	Saintsbury, George. By Thomas Seccombe	266
Makeshift Marriage, The. Mrs. Baillie Reynolds	192	Triumph of Whistler, The. By Joseph Pennell	19
Man at Lone Lake, The. Virna Sheard	78	Whistler. By G. S. Layard	30
Man Who Would Not Be King, The. Sidney Dark	332	Recent Events and Present Policies in China. (J. O. P. Bland.) By Philip W. Sergeant	327
Marriage of Kettle, The. C. J. Cutcliffe Hync	80	Recollections of Guy de Maupassant. (His Valet François)	67
Mrs. Lancelot. Maurice Hewlett	127	Red Hand of Ulster, The. (George A. Birmingham.) By Shan F. Bullock	52
Mystery of 35, New Inn. R. Austin Freeman	190	Reef, The. (Edith Wharton.) By M. P. Willcocks	224
Officer 666. Barton W. Currie and Augustin McHugh	230	Roses. (Hermann Sudermann.) By Richard Curle	116
Olivia Mary. E. Maria Albanesi	76	Rousseau, Jean Jacques. (Gerhard Gran.) By T. E. Page	111
One Crowning Hour. Sydney C. Grier	192	Scotland and the French Revolution. (Henry W. Meikle.) By Thomas Seccombe	254
One of Marlborough's Captains. Morico Gerard	78	Scottish Life and Poetry. (Watt.) By Dr. James Moffatt	229
Our Alty. M. E. Francis	238	Sensations of Paris. (Rowland Strong)	54
Pearl Stringer, The. Peggy Webbling	334	Shadows out of the Crowd. (R. Curle.) By E. Thomas	57
Plain Woman's Portrait, A. Sophie Cole	76	Sharp, William. (Mrs. William Sharp.) By F. Bickley	222
Private Smith. Captain Oswald Dallas	236	Shepherd Songs of Elizabethan England. By E. Thomas	218
Rat-Trap, The. Daniel Woodroffe	74	Slice of Life, A. (Robert Halfax.) By Edwin Pugh	119
Recipe for Rubber, The. Ralph Stock	236	Social Frame at the Time of Philip Augustus. (Achille Luchaire.) By A. W. Evans	182
Red Harvest. Newman Flower	283
Reluctant Lover, The. Stephen McKenna	238
Rock of the Ravens, The. John A. Stuart	190
Rusted Hinges. St. Clair Harnett	128

	PAGE		PAGE
Song in September. (Norman Gale.)	60	Trysfield. (G. and M. Hayling.) By M. P. Willcocks	122
Songs of the Open Air. (G. A. Greene.)	60	Turnstile, The. (A. E. W. Mason)	68
Sonnets and Ballade of Guido Cavalcanti. (Ezra Pound.)	60	Twelve Great Passions. (Brendon.) By Lewis Melville	228
South Pole, The. (Roald Amundsen.) By J. E. Patterson	221	Twist Land and Sea. (Joseph Conrad.) By E. W.	187
Sporting Instinct, The. (Martin Swayne.)	117	Tyranny of the Country Side, The. (R. E. Green.)	274
Streets. (Douglas Goldring.) By Edward Thomas	330	Undine. (F. de la Motte Fouqué.) By George Sampson	226
Study in Ideals. A. (M. C. Mallik.) By S. N. S.	180	Useful Knowledge Series, The. By William Henry Hudson	184
Susan and the Duke. (Kate Horn.) By Edward Wright	277	Venturers, The. (V. Locke Ellis.) By Edward Thomas	330
Swanston Stevenson, The. By Neil Munro	114, 217	Vistas. (William Sharp.) By Francis Bickley	222
Swinburne. (Edward Thomas.) By John Freeman	231	Vital Lies. (Vernon Lee.) By M. P. Willcocks	218
Syngé, J. M. (P. P. Howe.) By Darrell Figgis	58	Wanderer in Florence, A. (E. V. Lucas.) By W. H.	186
Technique of Bernard Shaw's Plays, The. (Augustin Hamon.) By George Sampson	292	Wards of the State. (Tighe Hopkins.) By J. C.	319
Three Plays. (J. Galsworthy.) By Wilfrid W. Gibson	216	What the Judge Saw. (Judge Parry.) By Walter Jerrold	224
Through Holland in the Vivette . (E. Keble Chatterton.) By J. E. Patterson	123	When I was a Child. (Y. Markino.) By Henry Baerlein	160
Through the Cloudy Porch. (Edge.) By G. S. Layard	273	Willard, Frances: Her Life and Work. (Ray Strachey.)	228
Things I can Tell. (Lord Rossmore.) By D. S. Meldrum	61	Wind among the Barley, The. (M. P. Willcocks.)	125
Tim and the Squire. (Lilian Street.) By Edward Wright	277	Windham Papers, The. By Walter Sichel	315
Titanic, The. (R. C. Macfie.) By W. A. Mackenzie	51	With the Conquered Turk. (L. James.) By P. Gibbon	317
Tripoli the Mysterious. (Mabel Loomis Todd.) By F. M. A.	56	With the Victorious Bulgarians. (Lieutenant Wagner.) By Percival Gibbon	317

PRINCIPAL ILLUSTRATIONS.

Allen, Daphne, drawings by	7	Lytleton, Sarah, Lady, in 1850	118
Amundsen, Roald	221	MacLean, Donald	226
Angell, Norman	13	Macnamara, Rachel Swete	293
Ayscough, John	138	Macready, William Charles	179
Baile, Maurice	249	Malvery, Olive Christian (Mrs. Mackurdy)	245
Beach, Rex	91	Mason, A. E. W.	69
Bebel, August	223	Mathews, Elkin, old and new premises of	140
Benson, E. F.	68	McKenna, Stephen	139
Benton, Miss C. A.	245	McKeown, Norman	334
Birmingham, George A.	53	Meynell, Mrs. Alice	135
Bland, J. O. P.	138	Montespan, de, Madame	336
BOOKMAN, THE, facsimile of cover of No. 1	43	Morley, Lord: Plate Portrait; Etc.	203-213
Boldrewood, Rolf	80	Murray, Charles	136
"Borrow, George," illustration from	70	Naidu, Mrs. Sarojini	135
Boucicault, Dion	257	Napier, Rosamond	88
Braby, Mrs. Maud Churton	193	Nicoll, Sir W. Robertson	42
"Brenda"	201	O'Connor, Mrs. T. P.	235
Buchan, John	141	O'Mahoney, Charles	90
Byron, 1813-14	189	Openhaw, Mary	244
Calthrop, Dion Clayton	139	Parcq, du, Herbert	2
Cameron, Mrs. Charlotte	4	Pennell, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph	8
Campbell, Lady Victoria (in 1895)	272	Penrose, Mrs. H. H.	89
Carlyle (by Whistler), 39; sketch for his bookplate	293	Pitman, Sir Isaac	198
Caven, Stewart	91	Poetry Bookshop, The	247
Chadwick, Mrs. Ellis H.	291	Praed, Mrs. Campbell	290
Christmas Supplement, (216 pages), THE BOOKMAN, Dec. 1912		Pugh, Edwin	3
"City of the World, The," illustration from	59	Rawson, Mrs. Stepney	294
Cobbett, William, 323; scenes connected with his life	324, 325	Reade, Charles: Plate Portrait; Etc.	243-264
"Complete Edwin Drood, The," illustration from	225	Reynolds, Mrs. Fred	15
Crotch, W. W.	292	Riley, W.	88
Cumberland, Richard Denison (aged 21)	130	Rossmore, Lord	61
Dehan, Richard (Clo Graves)	3, 87	Rousseau, Jean Jacques	111
Disraeli, Benjamin, in 1840	215	Saintsbury, Professor George	267
Doyle, Sir Arthur Conan. Plate Portrait; Etc.	85-110	Scheffauer, Mrs. Ethel Talbot	291
Drake, Maurice	248	Schofield, Mrs. Lily	86
Durham, M. Edith	137	Schumann	338
Duval, Madame G. R.	8	Searcy, Alfred	5
Dudeney, Mrs. Henry	295	Shaylor, Joseph	186
Edge, K. M. (Mrs. Caulfield)	246	Shelley: a little known portrait	6
Eucken, Rudolf	271	Silve, Claude (Mlle. de Lévis-Mirepoix)	169
Flower, Newman	199	Spencer-Stanhope, Lady Elizabeth	167
Fox, Charles James	315	Stephens, James	172
Galsworthy, John	216	Sterry, J. Ashby	290
Gaskell, Mrs., 162; birth certificate, 161; birthplace	160, 161	Stevenson, Robert Louis	217, 248
George, W. L.	136	St. Leger, Evelyn	88
Gordon, Adam Lindsay (aged 30), 57; monument to	125	Street, Lilian	199
Graham, Winifred (Mrs. Theodore Cory)	139	Taylor, Tom	257
Grant, Lady Sybil	86	Tibbits, Annie O.	282
Graves, Clo (Richard Dehan)	3, 87	Tomlinson, H. M.	136
Green, F. E.	244	Trent, Paul	331
Halifax, Robert	87	Truscott, Mrs. Parry	293
Hardy, Thomas	134	Turquan, Joseph	190
Harnett, St. Clair	128	Vanessa's House at Celbridge	51
Hay, Ian (Ian Hay Beith)	11	Wallace, Helen	292
Holland, A. W.	284	Walpole, Hugh	291
"Homes and Haunts of Ruskin," illustration from	156	Walters, J. Cuming	246
Hopkins, Tighe	319	Warner, Aaron	290
Hutchinson, A. S. M.	137	Watson, Anne	242
Irving, Sir Henry, as Philip II. (by Whistler)	26	Westrup, Margaret (Mrs. Margaret Stacey)	135
Jackson, Mr. and Mrs. W. S.	200	Whittaker, Joseph	90
James, Henry: Plate Portrait; Etc.	298-312	Whistler: Plate Portrait; Etc.	19-63
Kenealy, Annesley	247	Wiggin, Kate Douglas (Mrs. Riggs)	9
Kipling, Rudyard: Frontispiece portrait, December No.	143	Wilkinson, Dyke	8
Lancaster, Captain Percival	5	Willard, Frances E.	227
"Life and Letters of William Cobbett," illustration from	323	Wordsworth, Susanna	276
Lowth, Alys	245	Wright, Seppings	244
Lucy, Sir Henry W., caricature of	219	Zola, Emile	286

PRINCIPAL CONTRIBUTORS.

A. ST. JOHN ASCOCK.	RICHARD CURLE.	HOLBROOK JACKSON	LEWIS MELVILLE.	PROFESSOR GEORGE SAINTSBURY.
T. W. ALLEN.	SIR GEORGE DOUGLAS, BART.	CLARE JERROLD.	ALICE MEYNELL.	GEORGE SAMSON.
WILLIAM E. A. ARON.	A. W. RYANS.	WALTER JERROLD.	REV. J. MOFFATT, D.D., D.Litt.	EDWIN SCOTT.
HENRY BAELEIN.	D. HAY FLEMING, I.L.D.	COULSON KERNANAN.	NEIL MUNRO.	THOMAS BROOMER.
DR. WILLIAM BARRY.	DARRELL FIGGIS.	GEORGE SONES LAYARD.	SIR W. ROBERTSON NICOLL.	PHILIP W. SERGEANT.
MONSIEUR R. H. BENSON.	JOHN FREEMAN.	C. E. LAWRENCE.	L.L.D.	WALTER SICHTEL.
F. G. BETTANY.	PERCEVAL GIBSON.	ROBERT LYND.	T. E. PAGE.	L. TILDEN SMITH.
FRANCIS BICKLEY.	WILFRID WILSON GIBSON.	M. H. H. MACARTNEY.	J. K. PATTERSON.	FRANK SWINERTON.
C. W. BOYD.	F. E. GREEN.	W. A. MACKENZIE.	JOSEPH PENNELL.	EDWARD THOMAS.
SEAN P. BULLOCK.	WALFORD D. GREEN.	ALEXANDER MACKINTOSH.	PROFESSOR J. P. POSTGATE.	KATHARINE TYMAN.
MRS. ELLIS H. CHADWICK.	H. A. HINKSON.	G. H. MAIR.	EDWIN PUGH.	A. E. WILSON.
JOSEPH CLAYTON.	CLIVE HOLLAND.	B. W. MAIR.	E. PURCELL.	KATE DOUGLAS WIGGIN.
J. H. COLLINS.	WILLIAM HENRY HUDSON.	D. S. MELDRUM.	LILLIAN QUILLER CODRAN.	M. P. WILLCOCKS.

The Bookman

VOLUME XLIV.

APRIL—SEPTEMBER, 1913.

London:

HODDER AND STOUGHTON

• WARWICK SQUARE, E.C.

CONTENTS.

APRIL—SEPTEMBER, 1913.

	PAGE		PAGE
Advent. (August Strindberg.) By Richard Curle ..	258	Elliot, George (Viola Meynell.) By R. Brimley Johnson ..	25
Adventures among Birds. (W. H. Hudson.) By R. C. ..	220	Eliza's Son. (Barry Pain.) By David Hodge ..	134
Adventures Beyond the Zambesi. (Mrs. Fred Maturin.)		Elizabeth Cooper. (George Moore.) By Robb Lawson ..	298
By Stanley Portal Hyatt ..	131	Emancipation, The. (Leonard Inkster) & By Robb Lawson ..	268
Adventures of a Newspaper Man, The. (Frank Dillnot)		Empire of India, The. (Sir Bampfylde Fuller) ..	54
By Keighley Snowden ..	173	England under the Old Religion. (Abbot F. A. Gasquet.)
Africanderisms. (Rev. C. Pettman.) By S. P. Hyatt ..	267	By William Barry ..	45
Agnus Dei. (Nancy Campbell.) By Katharine Tynan ..	95	Essays in Biography. (C. Whibley.) By Walter Sichel ..	60
Along the Road. (A. C. Benson.) ..	41	Eve of Catholic Emancipation, The, Vol. III. (Montague
Ambassador, The. (William Wriothlesley.) By Frank		Ward.) By William Barry ..	43
Swinnerton ..	127	Evolution of Modern Germany, The. (H. Lichtenberger.)
Austen, Jane. (Percy Fitzgerald.) By W. H. Helm ..	40	By Thomas Seecombe ..	272
Austen, Jane, Her Life and Letters. (W. and R. A. Austen-		Fairless, Michael. (W. Scott Palmer and A. M. Haggard.)
Leigh) By W. H. Helm ..	177	By A. ..	125
Baconian Heresy, The. (J. M. Robertson.) By A. St. John		Father Ralph. (G. O'Donovan) By Frank Swinnerton ..	127
Adcock ..	49	Fatuous Fables and Other Verses. (Denis Turner.) By
Bag and Baggage. (Bernard Capes.) By H. A. H. ..	38	Edward Thomas ..	213
Black Honey. (C. Ranger Gull.) By Wilkinson Sherran ..	263	Fifteen Years of a Dancer's Life. (Lois Fuller.) By
Bohn's Popular Library (20 vols.) ..	84	George Sampson ..	41
BOOKMAN Gallery, The—		First Poems. (Max Plowman.) By Katharine Tynan ..	129
R. Austin Freeman. By John Adams ..	6	Foundations of a National Drama, The. (Henry Arthur
Austin Philips. By Edward Wright ..	60	Jones.) By Robb Lawson ..	91
David Whitelaw. By A. St. John Adcock ..	108	From Studio to Stage. (Weldon Grooms-Smith.)
Bookman's Table, The—		Further Reminiscences. (H. M. Hyndman.) By Joseph
British Borderland, A. Captain H. A. Wilson ..	143	Clayton ..	88
Caravanning and Camping Out. J. Harris Stone ..	226	Gallant Way, The. (Frank Taylor.) By Edward Thomas ..	47
Chapters at the English Lakes. Rev. H. D. Ravensley ..	278	Gay Adventure, The. (Richard Bird.) By Edwin Pugh ..	172
Dante and Aquinas. Philip H. Wicksteed ..	225	Genesis of Parliamentary Reform, The. (G. S. Veitch.)
Digby, Sir Kenelm, and George Digby, Earl of Bristol.		By Thomas Seecombe ..	271
H. M. Digby ..	99	Gloomy Fanny. (Morley Roberts.) By D. F. R. ..	93
English Fireplace, The. L. A. Shuttrey ..	226	Gods Are Athirst, The. (A. Franco.) By Richard Curle ..	168
Erolus. Evangeline Ryves ..	184	Goldsmith, Oliver. (Padraic Colum.) By H. A. Hinkson ..	176
Garden of Ignorance, The. Mrs. George Cran ..	186	Great Adventure, The. (Arnold Bennett.) By Harold
In Praise of Winchester. A. Audrey Locke ..	278	Massingham ..	83
Irish Gentleman, An. Colonel Maurice George Moore ..	278	Half-Lengths (Rt. Hon. G. W. E. Russell.) By I. P. N. ..	86
Kingham, Old and Now. W. Warde Fowler ..	184	Halfpenny Alley. (Marjory Hardcastle.) By D. F. R. ..	93
Lacordaire. Count d'Haussonville ..	99	Hand in the Dark, The, and Other Poems. (Ada Cam-
L'Estrange, Sir Roger. George Kitchen ..	54	bridge.) By Edward Thomas ..	46
Little Book of Courage, A. Annie Matheson ..	98	Happy-go-Lucky. (Ian Hay) By Wilkinson Sherran ..	263
Loeb Classical Library. T. E. Page and W. H. D.		Heart of the Hills, The. (John Fox.) By Edwin Pugh ..	172
Rouse ..	98	Helen Redeemed and Other Poems. (Maurice Hewlett.)
Lure of Proserpine. Maurice Hewlett ..	143	By Edward Thomas ..	46
My Friend's Book. Anatole France ..	54	Holena Biot's Career. (Desmond Coke.) By H. A. H. ..	38
New Forsters, The. William Caine ..	278	Henley, W. R. (L. Cope Cornford.) ..	133
Odd Corners in English Lakeland. William T. Palmer ..	278	Herbaceous Garden, The. (Mrs. Philip Martineau.)
Our Village Homes. Hugh Aronson ..	54	Historical Catalogue of the Printed Editions of Holy Scrip-
Peace Theories and the Balkan War. Norman Angell ..	142	ture in the Library of the British and Foreign Bible
Peepholes of the Stage. Cranstoun Metcalfe ..	144	Society. (T. H. Darlow and H. F. Meule.) By James
Prince Charlie's Pilot. Evan Macleod Barron ..	184	Moffatt ..	32
Red Horizon, The. Evangeline Ryves ..	184	History and Historians in the Nineteenth Century. (G. P.
Sanctuary. Laurence Morton ..	186	Gooch) By Thomas Seecombe ..	271
Saint Alban the Martyr. Rt. Hon. G. W. E. Russell ..	143	History of English Patriotism. (Esmé Wingfield-Stratford.)
Siam. Pierre Loti ..	225	By Thomas Seecombe ..	271
Steps to Parnassus. J. C. Squire ..	143	History of Europe, A. (A. J. Grant.) ..	134
Unruly Daughters. H. Noel Williams ..	143	History of Oratory in Parliament, A. (Robert Craig.) By
Woman Movement, The. Ellen Key ..	99	Thomas Seecombe ..	271
Bookellers' Diary, The ..	8, 63, 105, 149, 192, 235	Human Slaughter-House, The. (William Iamszus.) By
Boy's Will, A. (Robert Frost) By Katharine Tynan ..	129	J. E. Patterson ..	179
Burnt House, The. (Christopher Stone) By H. A. H. ..	38	Icknield Way, The. (Edward Thomas.) ..	126
Busy Time in Mexico, A. (H. B. C. Pollard) By Henry		Impressions and Opinions. (George Moore.) By G. S.
Baerlein ..	174	Layard ..	31
By the Open Sea. (A. Strindberg) By Richard Curle ..	248	In Midsummer Days. (A. Strindberg.) By Richard Curle ..	135
Call of the Siren, The. (Harold Spender) By H. A. H. ..	38	In Old Madras. (Mrs. B. M. Coker.) By Edwin Pugh ..	172
Cambridge Manuals of Science and Literature (10 vols.) By		India and the Indians. (Edwin F. Elwin.) By W. C. S. ..	128
John Adams ..	92	Influence of Baudelaire in France and England, The.
Campion, Thomas, and the Art of English Poetry. (Thomas		(G. Turquet-Milnes.) By Holbrook Jackson ..	34
MacDonagh.) By Edward Thomas ..	47	Iolau. (G. W. Mackereth.) By Katharine Tynan ..	129
Chance the Piper. (A. and E. Castle.) By Frank Swinnerton ..	127	Isle of Thorns, The. (Sheila Kaye-Smith.) By Frank Swin-
Collected Poems. (Austin Dobson.) By Francis Bickle ..	65	ner-ton ..	127
Combined Maze, The. (May Sinclair.) By Katharine		Jesus of Nazareth—a Poetical Drama. (Alexandra von
Tynan ..	30	Hertler.) By Edward Thomas ..	47
Competitions, THE BOOKMAN Prize ..	23, 72, 116, 158, 204,	John in Prison and Other Poems. (E. J. Thompson.) By
253; also special Supplement (10 pages) to August No.		Edward Thomas ..	213
Confessions of a Tenderfoot. (Ralph Stock.) By Stanley		Joyous Gard. (A. C. Benson.) By W. A. F. ..	261
Portal Hyatt ..	131	Judgment House, The. (Gilbert Parker.) By S. H. W. ..	270
Courtin' Christina. (J. J. Bell.) By David Hodge ..	134	Keeper of Royal Secrets, A. (Jean Harmand.) By
Croquet Alphabet, A. (H. F. Crowther Smith.) By		A. W. Evans ..	30
G. S. Layard ..	178	Knockingsgreen Days. (J. C. Clark.) By Wilkinson Sherran ..	263
Crowds. (Gerald Stanley Lee.) By R. C. ..	265	Last Century in Europe, The. (C. E. M. Hawkesworth.)
Cubism. (Albert Gleizes and Jean Metzinger) By G. S.		By Thomas Seecombe ..	271
Layard ..	218	Last Frontier, The. (E. Alexander Powell.) By William
Dante and the Mystics. (Edmund G. Gardner.) By Dr.		Charles Scully ..	228
William Barry ..	20	Latin America. (F. Garcia-Calderon.) ..	137
Dauber. (John Masefield.) By John Drinkwater ..	124	Lectures on the American Civil War. James Ford
Dickens, Charles. (Algernon Charles Swinburne.) ..	86	Rhodes.) By Thomas Seecombe ..	271
Drift of Romanticism, The. (Paul Elmer More.) By Dr.		Letters from the Near East. (Maurice Baring.) By
William Barry ..	256	Perceval Gibbon ..	50
Drummer of the Dawn, The. (Raymond Paton.) By		Levia Pondera. (John Ayooquah.) By R. Brimley
Edwin Pugh ..	172	Johnson ..	262
Early Correspondence of Lord John Russell. (Rollo		Life and Writings of Philip, Duke of Wharton, The. (Lewis
Russell.) By Walter Sichel ..	162	Melville.) By Richard Curle ..	210
Early Life of George Eliot, The. (Mary H. Deakin.) By		Life of John Bright, The. (George Macanlay Trevelyan.)
R. Brimley Johnson ..	33	By Richard Whiteing ..	155
Early Life of Mark Rutherford, The. By A. ..	263	Life of Octavia Hill. (C. Edmund Maurice.) By Joseph
Easter, and Stories. (A. Strindberg.) By Richard Curle	258	Clayton ..	121

CONTENTS.

iii

	PAGE
Little Jeannette and Fighting Dick Talbot. (Philip W. Sergeant.) By W. F. R.	48
Little World. (Arnold Gaskworthy.) By D. F. R.	93
London Notes. (Evelyn Howard.) By D. F. R.	93
London's London. As (Wilfred Whitten.) By Edwin Pugh	89
Lost in the Arctic. (Einar Mikkelson.) By J. E. Patterson	42
Love Poems and Others. (D. H. Lawrence.) By Edward Thomas	46
Luc of the Ranges. (Eleanor Mordaunt.) By Edwin Pugh	172
Making of Modern England, The. (Gilbert Slater.) By Thomas Secombe	271
Malayan Monochromes. (Sir Hugh Clifford.) By E. W.	219
Memoirs of William Hickey. (Alfred Spencer.) By Walter Jerrold	217
Memories. (Hon. Stephen Coleridge.) By David Hodge	44
Men Around the Kaiser. (F. W. Wile.)	270
Mexico, the Land of Unrest. (Henry Baerlein.) By Percival Gibbon	212
Mitford, Mary Russell. (W. J. Roberts.) By William E. R. R.	170
Mixed Grill. (W. Pett Ridge.) By D. F. R.	93
Modern Grub Street and Other Essays. (A. St. John Adcock.) By E. W.	133
Modern History of the English People, A. (R. H. Grolton.) By Thomas Secombe	271
Morris, William. (A. Compton Rickett.) By Francis Bickley	169
Moth Wings. (F. W. Bourdillon.) By Edward Thomas	213
Mozambique. (R. N. Lyne.) By Stanley Portal Hyatt	131
Mr. Flight. (F. M. Hueffer.) By Frank Swinnerton	127
Mr. Whybrew's Princess. (H. C. Rowe.) By Wilkinson Sherren	263
Mulberry Tree, The. (Winifred James.) By Harold Massingham	176
Muse in Exile, The. (William Watson.) By A. St. John Adcock	83
Mystic Trees. (Michael Field.) By Edward Thomas	213
Mystic Way, The. (Evelyn Underhill.) By Darrell Figgis	158
Nash and Others. (C. S. Evans.) By E. W.	219
New Irish Comedies. (Lady Gregory.) By R. L.	128
News Notes	1, 55, 101, 145, 187, 227
Nogi. (Stanley Washburn.) By Stanley Portal Hyatt	87
Novel Notes—
Affair of State, An. J. C. Snaith	53
Amateur Gentleman, The. Jeffery Farnol	49
April Panhasard. Muriel Hine	223
Arnold Lip, The. C. E. Lawrence	97
Aunt Olive in Bohemia. Leslie Moore	53
Balkan Prince, A. Charles G. D. Roberts	140
Barry and a Sinner. John Barnett	182
Candlelight Days. Adelino M. Teskey	141
Carnacki the Ghost-Finder. William Hope Hodgson	142
Catfish, The. Charles Marriott	53
Chain of Ol, The. St. Clair Harnett	50
Common Chord, The. Phyllis Bottome	182
Curse of the Nile, The. Douglas Sladen	141
Daisy Darley. W. P. Ryan	51
Dancing Child, The. B. Girvin and M. Casens	139
Discovery. Harold Williams	274
Distant Drum, The. Dudley Sturrock	223
Divine Folly, The. Ella MacMahon	223
Doctor Whitty. G. A. Birmingham	50
"Eighth Year, The." Philip Gibbs	273
Finger of Mr. Hoc, The. Peter Blundell	51
Fringe of the Desert, The. Rachel Swete Macnamara	140
Golden Woman, The. Ridgwell Cullum	276
Growing Pains. Ivy Low	96
Harpovians, The. Arnold Lunn	276
Hippodrome, The. Rachel Hayward	50
Honey-Star, The. Tickner Edwardes	141
House of Spies, The. Warwick Deeping	139
Hunt the Slipper. Oliver Madox Hueffer	276
Ils and Ans. H. B. Marriott Watson	140
Ineffectual Fires. E. M. Smith-Dampier	140
Inn upon the Road, An. Janet Dodge	139
Inside of the Cup, The. Winston Churchill	224
Israel Kalisch. W. L. George	52
James Hurd. R. O. Prowse	223
Lady of the Canaries, The. St. John Lucas	52
Lady of the Night. Benjamin Swift	98
Law Bringers, The. G. B. Lancaster	183
Lawsons, The. R. K. Weekes	224
Life Mask, The. Author of "He Who Passed"	141
Little Grey Shoe. Percy James Brebner	52
Lot Barrow. Viola Meynell	51
Man from Nowhere, The. Victor Bridges	224
Marriage of Inconvenience, A. Thomas Cobb	52
Minna. Karl Gjellerup	140
Monte Carlo. Mrs. De Vere Stacpoole	50
Mr. Lawworthy's Adventures. E. Phillips Oppenheim	182
Mrs. Pratt of Paradise Farm. Katharine Tynan	50
My Father's Son. John Harvey	182
Mystery of Dr. Fu-Manchu, The. Sax Rohmer	224
Napoleon Bonaparte. Herbert M. Mallett	142
Necessity of Life, A. Betty van der Goes	98
Nevertheless. Isabel Smith	96
Outlaw, The. David Kennessey	141
Pelle the Conqueror. Anderson Nexö	225

Novel Notes (continued)—

	PAGE
Petticoat Commando, The. Johanna Brandt	183
Phyllida Flouts Me. Mary L. Pendered	52
Pollyanna. Eleanor H. Porter	274
Prisoner in Fairyland, A. Algernon Blackwood	181
Right Honourable Gentleman, The. W. E. Norris	53
Rising Dawn. Harold Begbie	138
Roadknight. R. Murray Gilchrist	142
Rosalind in Arden. H. B. Marriott Watson	274
Sandy's Love Affair. S. R. Crockett	274
Sanna of the Island Town. Mary E. Waller	98
Second Chance, The. Paul Trent	225
Second-Sighter's Daughter, The. G. B. Burgin	50
Secret Cargo, The. J. S. Fletcher	276
Silence of Mev, The. H. F. Prevost Battersby	140
Sin of Eve, The. May Edginton	274
Strength of the Hills, The. Hallwell Sutcliffe	225
Strictly Trained Mother, The. F. F. Montr'or	274
Strolling Saint, The. Rafael Sabatini	18
Temptation of Tavernake, The. E. P. Oppenheim	97
Tromendax. Necrede Malo	96
V. V.'s Eyes. Henry Sydnor Harrison	182
While the Music Lasts. Julia Macdonald	182
White Motley. Max Pemberton	54
Wilderness Lovers, The. E. R. Punshon	183
Willie in the Isle of Man. Arthur Hetherless	96
Wooings of Jezebel Pettyfer, The. Haldane Macfall	278
Notes on New Books	100, 144, 186, 226, 280
Oeuvres Complètes de Victor Hugo. By George Samps	202
Open Window, The. (E. Temple Thurston.) By E. W.	219
Opera and Drama. (R. Wagner.) By George Sampson	84
Pages Assembled. (Frederick Welmore.) By D. H.	48
Pages on Art. (Charles Ricketts.) By D. S. Meldrum	262
Patchwork Comedy. (Humfrey Jordan.) By Frank Swinnerton	127
Pathos of Distance, The. (James Huneker.) By Holbrook Jackson	269
Pax Britannica. (H. S. Morris.) By J. E. Patterson	180
Peacock Pie. (Walter de la Mare.) By Edward Thomas	260
Pelshie. (R. G. Beltrons.) By Frank Swinnerton	127
Peer Gynt. (Henrik Ibsen.) By Robert Lynd	30
Perfidious Marriage, The. (Leonard Henslowe.) By Robb Lawson	268
People's Books, The. By Arthur Burrell	216
Plays. (August Strindberg.) By Richard Curle	258
Plays of Old Japan: The "No." (Marie C. Stopes.) By Edward Thomas	213
Poems. (John Alford.) By Edward Thomas	213
Poems. (A. Hugh Fisher.) By Katharine Tynan	129
Poems. (Alice Meynell.) By Katharine Tynan	167
Polly Peachum and the Beggar's Opera. (Charles E. Pearce.)	217
Porcelain Lady, The. (Frederick Niven.) By H. A. H.	38
Positive Evolution of Religion, The. (Frederic Harrison.)	137
By James Moffatt	137
Pot of Basil, The. (Bernard Capes.) By Wilkinson Sherren	263
Power Behind, The. (M. P. Willcocks.) By B. P.	265
Prison Songs and Poems. (J. Robert Clarke.) By Edward Thomas	47
Public Schools and the Empire, The. (Dr. H. B. Grav.)	266
By M. H. H. Macartney	266
Punch and Judy. (Edwin Pugh.) By D. F. R.	93
Queen Tara. (Darrell Figgis.) By Katharine Tynan	129
Rahel Varnhagen. (Ellen Key.)	173
Ralph Raymond. (E. Mansfield.) By Frank Swinnerton	127
Reader, The—
"Best of All Good Little Boys, The." By Walter Sichel	162
Bright, John. By Richard Whiteing	150
Dickens in America. By W. Roberts	119
Dobson, Austin. By Francis Bickley	65
Dowden, Edward. By Thomas Secombe	121
Good Company. By Walter Sichel	80
Gosse, Edmund C. B. By Thomas Secombe	109
Hugo, Victor. By George Sampson	202
Masters of Dante, The. By Dr. William Barry	20
Mrs. Meynell's Collected Poems. By Katharine Tynan	167
Orczy, Baroness. By Arthur Rutland	193
Shaw, Bernard. By Dixon Scott	239
Sterne, Laurence, 1713-1768. By Professor George Saintsbury	151
Swinburne. By Professor George Saintsbury	113
Thompson, Francis, the Master of Vision. By Katharine Tynan	208
Thomson, Hugh, The Art of. By J. P. Collins	77
Watts, George Frederick, R. A. By M. H. Spielmann	11
Watts, G. F., at Compton. By Charles T. Bateman	18
What Was the Romantic Movement? By Dr. William Barry	256
Wollstonecraft, Mary: a Letter and Some Notes. By Roger Ingpen	164
Real South Africa, The. (Ambrose Pratt.) By Stanley Portal Hyatt	267
Red Mirage, The. (I. A. R. Wylie.) By Wilkinson Sherren	203
Reminiscences of a South African Pioneer. (W. C. Scully.)	131
By Stanley Portal Hyatt	131
Renaissance and its Makers, The. (J. D. Symon and S. L. Bensusan.) By Haldane Macfall	211

	PAGE		PAGE
Révolution, La. (Louis Madelin.) By Thomas Seccombe	271	Swinburne. (John Drinkwater.) By Professor George Saintsbury	113
Ring of the Nibelung, The. (Randle Hynes.) By Edward Thomas	213	Sword, The. (C. A. Benton.) By H. A. H.	38
Roads of Destiny. (O. Henry.) By E. W.	219	Symphony, A. (Arthur E. G. Legge.) By Edward Thomas	213
Romance of the Rothschilds, The. (Ignatius Balla.) By J. Middleton Murray	130	Tales of the Mermaid Tavern. (Alfred Noyes.)	180
Romantic Ballads. (G. Borrow.) By Thomas Seccombe	215	Taylor Papers, The. (Lieut.-Gen. Sir Herbert Taylor.) By Lewis Melville	126
Rue and Roses. (Angela Langer.) By Wilfrid Whitten	175	Thane Brandon. (F. Bancroft.) By Wilkinson Sherron	263
Russian Ballet, The. (Ellen Terry.) By George Sampson	41	This Generation. (S. M. Fox.) By Harold Massingham	84
Schumann, Clara: an Artist's Life. (Berthold Litzmann.) By George Sampson	135	Thompson. (St. John Hankin and George Calderon.) By Robb Lawson	268
Seine from Havre to Paris. (Sir Edward Thorpe.) By P. C. Selections from Ancient Irish Poetry. (Kuno Meyer.) By Edward Thomas	213	Thoughts and After-Thoughts. (H. Beerbohm Tree.) By G. S. Through the Window. (Mary E. Mann.) By E. W.	219
Sentence of Silence, The. (Reginald Ralph Kauffman.) By Wilkinson Sherron	263	Tragedy of Education, The. (Edmond Holmes.) By M. H. H. Macartney	266
Shakespeare and the Theatre. (William Poel.) By Darrell Figgins	266	Truth About Woman, The. (C. Gasquoine Hartley.) By M. P. Willcocks	178
Short History of English Liberalism, A. (W. Lyon Bleas.) By Thomas Seccombe	271	Two Irish Nations, The. (W. F. Monypenny.) By H. A. Hinkson	271
Sleeping Waters. (John Trevena.) By Keighley Snowden	46	Two Years Under the Crescent. (H. C. Seppings Wright.) By S. P. H.	136
Smith, Goldwin, Correspondence of. (Arnold Haultain.) By A. Mackintosh	169	Unpath'd Waters. (Frank Harris)	174
Smoke Bellew. (Jack London.) By E. W.	219	Valdimar. (R. C. Macfie.) By Edward Thomas	47
Son of a Servant, The. (August Strindberg.) By Richard Curle	135	Walpole's World, Horace. (Alice D. Greenwood.) By F. G. Bettany	214
Sons and Lovers. (D. H. Lawrence.) By P. G.	213	War Photographer in Thrace, A. (Herbert E. Baldwin.) By Perceval Gibbon	90
Songs of the Dead End. (Patrick MacGill.) By John H. Ingram	35	Watts, George Frederick. (M. S. Watts.) By M. H. Spielmann	11
Songs from Leinster. (W. M. Letts.) By Edward Thomas	213	Ways of Eve, The. (Roy Meldrum.) By H. A. H.	38
Spring Supplement (72 pages.) April No.		Weaker Vessel, The. (E. F. Benson)	34
Stane Street. (Hilaire Belloc.) By F. E. Green	181	White Witch. (Meriel Buchanan.) By Frank Swinnerton	127
Stella Maris. (William J. Locke.) By F. G. Bettany	95	Widcombe Fair. (Eden Philpotts.) By Keighley Snowden	46
Stevenson Originals, The. (E. B. Simpson.) By F. M. A.	87	With the Bulgarian Staff. (Noel Buxton, M.P.) By S. P. H.	136
Story of Louie. (Oliver Onions.) By W. A. L. B.	221	With the Turks in Thrace. (Ellis Ashmead-Bartlett.) By Perceval Gibbon	90
St John's Wood. (Alan Montgomery Eyre)	129	Works of Francis Thompson, The. By Katharine Tynan	208
Strindberg, August. (L. Lind-af-Hageby.) By Richard Curle	135	World Soul, The. (H. Fielding Hall.)	204
Studies in Love and Terror. (Mrs. Belloc Lowndes.)	44	Youth of Goethe, The. (P. Hume Brown.) By Walter Sichel	218
Succession. (Ethel Sidgwick.) By Frank Swinnerton	127
Sunna and Other Stories. (Maud Diver.) By E. W.	218
Survey of English Literature, A, 1780-1830. (Pier Oliver Elton.) By Thomas Seccombe	27

ILLUSTRATIONS.

Barea, de la, Madame Calderon	190	"Herbaceous Garden, The," illustration from	221	Ridge, W. Pett	57
Barlow, A. S.	217	Hill, Rowland	174	Robertson, J. M., M.P.	49
Barlow, Montagu	195	"Icknield Way, The," illustration from	176	Rodin, Auguste	240
Barlow, John Percy	200	James, Wainford	177	Rohmer, Sax	224
Bell, Hilaire	249	Jordan, Humfrey	137	Russell, Lord John	163
Benson, A. C.	3	Kaye Smith, Sheila	103	Russell, Miss Lindsay	59
Buchanan, Meriel	104	Key, Mrs. Ellen	3	Rutherford, Mark, aged 24	263
Buckridge, E. G.	240	Krynes, Helen Mary	229	Ryves, Evangeline	147
Burr, Miss A. I.	240	"Kingham Old and New," illustration from	184	Scully, William Charles	132
"Buss-Tune of Mexico, A," illustration from	175	Laurel, Angela	47	"Seine from Havre to Paris," illustration from	269
Caine, Hall	189	Larsch, Countess Marie	59	Shaw, George Bernard, Plate Portrait, September No. 227, 239-247, 249, 250, 252, 255, 256, 258; illustrations to his plays	234, 251
Capper, George M.	231	Lawrence, C. E.	97	Sinclair, May	2
"Caravanning and Camping Out," illustration from Carlyle, 1877	28	Lawrence, D. H.	213	Skinner, Constance Lindsay	239
Competitions, THE BOOKMAN Prize, winning competitors' portraits, 230, 231; drawings, 62, 63; photograph	8, 9	Let, Gerald Stanley	265	Smith, Isabel	96
Cosens, Monica	139	Leeds, Mr. Lewis	4	Soutar, Andrew	229
Crabbe, George, facsimile of hitherto unpublished verses by	190	Lind-af-Hageby, Miss	102	Spring Supplement (72 pages), April No.	181
Cran, Mrs. George	146	"London's London, A," illustration from	89	"Stane Street," illustration from	181
Digby, Sir Kenneth	99	Loti, Pierre	191	Sterne, Lawrence, Plate Portrait, July No. 131	144
Dobson, Austin, Plate Portrait, May No. 65-67, 71, 74; house and garden 66, 67; illustrations to his works 68, 70, 72, 73, 75, 76, 83, 85	232	Lunn, Arnold	276	161; house, etc., connected with, 132, 141	144
"Douglas, Thos." (Mrs. H. D. Everett)	56, 121	Macdonald, Julia	182	157-159; illustrations to his works, 153, 154, 160	160
Dutton, Annie V.	4	Macfall, Haldane	228	Sterne, Mrs. Lawrence	152
"Empire of India, The, illustration from Everett, Mrs. H. D. ("Thos. Douglas")	217	Marrion, Charles	53	Stockley, Cynthia	211
Fenton, Lavinda ("Polly Peachum")	217	Martin, E. J.	231	Stratton, Mrs. Arthur	162
Ford, Miss S. Gertrude	191	Maselli, John	39	Strindberg, August, 1908	106
Fowler, P. A.	231	McCarthy, Lillah, costumes for in "Audoucks and the Lion,"	214	Swinburne	29
Freeman, R. Austin	7	Melville, Adam S.	58	Tadema, Sir Laurence Alma, posing for his silhouette	129
Frost, Robert	191	Meredith, George	28	Tennyson, 1870	27
Frowde, Henry	3	Meynell, Mrs.	107	Teskey, Addeline M.	4
Gallahan, Mrs. Walter (C. Gasquoine Hartley)	57	Meynell, Viola	51	Thompson, Francis	209
Gibbs, Philip	228	"Mexico, The Land of Unrest," illustration from	212	Thomson, Hugh 77; drawings by 68, 69, 75, 76, 78 81	81
Girvin, Brenda	149	Milford, Humphrey	3	Tree, Sir Herbert Beerbohm	188
Goes, van der, Madame Betty	147	Milford, Miss, 1 of cottage	171	Trevilian, G. M.	146
Gosworthy, Arnold	56	Moore, Colonel Maurice George, C. B.	280	"Unruly Daughters," illustration from	143
Gosse, Edmund, Plate Portrait, June No. 100, 112, 114, 115-117, 119, 120	113	Moore, Miss Leslie	228	Vanhagen, Rahel, in 1796	173
Gosse, Mrs. Edmund	113	Moroso, J. A.	149	Watson, Mr. and Mrs. William	3
Gosse, Philip Henry	110	Mumby, Frank A.	5	Watts, G. F., Plate Portrait, April No. 1, 11, 13, 26, 45; houses, etc., connected with, 12, 13; paintings, etc., by, 1, 11, 14 17, 19 25, 27-29, 31, 33, 35, 37, 39, 40, 43, 44	44
Gray, Thomas	215	Napier, Rosamund	58	Webb, Sidney	244
Gregory, Lady	102	Oppenheim, E. Phillips	56	Westell, Percival	101
Harris, Frank	148, 171	Orzy, Baroness, Plate Portrait, August No. 193-196, 207; houses, etc., connected with, 195-197; illustrations to her works, 198, 199, 201, 204; paintings by	202, 205	Wharton, Philip, Duke of	211
Harrison, Henry Sydney	147	Patterson, J. E.	5	Whitlaw, David	107
Hartley, C. Gasquoine (Mrs. Walter Gallahan)	57	Paul, Stanley	58	Whitten, Wilfred	5
Henley, W. E.	133	"Peachum, Polly" (Lavina Fenton)	217	Willcocks, Miss M. P.	103
		Pennrose, Mrs. H. H.	220	Wollstancraft, Mary 164, 165; lacunae of hand writing, 166, tombstone of	163
		Petrie, E. S.	59
		Philips, Austin	67
		Reich, A. Compton	169

PRINCIPAL CONTRIBUTORS.

PROFESSOR JOHN ADAMS.	RICHARD CURLE.	HOLBROOK JACKSON.	LEWIS MELVILLE.	WILKINSON SHERRON.
A. ST. JOHN ADLOCK.	JOHN DRINKWATER.	WALTER JERNOLD.	JAC. MOFFATT, D.D., D. LIT.	WALTER SICHEL.
WILLIAM E. A. AXOM.	A. W. EVANS.	R. DIMITRY JOHNSON.	J. MIDDLETON MURRAY.	L. TILDEN SMITH.
HENRY BARFLEIN.	DARRELL FIGGIS.	C. E. LAWRENCE.	J. E. PATTERSON.	KEIGHLEY SNOWDEN.
DR. WILLIAM HARRY.	PERCEVAL GIBBON.	ROBB LAWSON.	EDWIN PUGH.	M. H. SPIELMANN.
F. G. BETTANY.	F. E. GREEN.	GEORGE SOMES LAYARD.	LILIAN QUILTER COUCH.	FRANK SWINNERTON.
FRANCIS DICKLEY.	W. H. HELEN.	ROBERT LYND.	W. ROBERTS.	EDWARD THOMAS.
LAUDBROOK BLACK.	H. A. HINKSON.	M. H. H. MACARTNEY.	PROFESSOR GEORGE SAINTSBURY.	KATHARINE TYNAN.
ARTHUR BURRIEL.	DAVID HONG.	HAI BANK MACGILL.	GEORGE SAMPSON.	WILFRED WHITTEN.
JOSEPH CLAYTON.	STANLEY PORTER HAYAT.	A. MACKINTOSH.	DIXON SCOTT.	M. P. WILLCOCKS.
J. P. COLLINS.	ROGER INGRAM.	HAROLD MASSINGHAM.	WILLIAM CHARLES SCUTLEY.	EDWARD WRIGHT.
	JOHN H. INGRAM.	D. S. MELDRUM.	THOMAS SECCOMBE.

for 1913

No More Old Maids?

Not so very long ago, women "swooned" in difficult situations. Macaulay once amused himself by counting the "swoons" in the well-known novels of his time. To-day "swooning" is neither popular nor general. Wherefore the change?

In a number of sparkling papers on "The Unmarried Woman," Agnes Repplier, J. B. Atkins, and William Norton Fullerton reveal the startling fact that the Old Maid, as a species, is extinct! They tell, too, what has become of her, in England, in America, and in France. In her extinction they all see progress!

Jacob A. Riis

in a delightful sketch of New York newsboys, tells how well the Children's Aid Societies have succeeded in caring for the homeless street waifs, so familiar a few years ago. "The Training of Japanese Children," by Frances Little, is another of the many articles of special appeal to women to appear in

The Century for 1913

ILLUSTRATIONS

"The Century" is doing more than any other single medium to promote the type of Art that bears the stamp of significance and progress.

Joseph Pennell, whose lithographs of the Panama Canal recently attracted such wide attention, will contribute four new groups—Philadelphia, the Yosemite, San Francisco, and the Grand Cañon. Timothy Cole, foremost of the world's wood-engravers, is completing for The Century a number of exquisite reproductions of old masters. Impressions from his blocks will be as eagerly sought in a few years as are the rare prints of other generations to-day.

Particularly notable among the colour pages will be Guérin's superb pictures of Dalmatia, Greece, and Constantinople. The best work of such artists as Castagne, Rackham, Du Mond, Violet Oakley, Keller, Blangwyn, Bernard de Monvel, Berger, Birch will appear in

The Century for 1913

MODDER AND STOUGHTON, ST. PAUL'S HOUSE, WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.
THE CENTURY COMPANY, NEW YORK.

A. C. Benson

Author of "From a College Window"

Mr. A. C. Benson makes an illuminating comment on "British Uncommunicativeness." Others of his papers treat of "The Price and Worth of Fame" and "The Shadow of Philanthropy."

G. K. Chesterton

Gilbert K. Chesterton, perhaps the most brilliant of contemporary British essayists, discusses a new development in Socialism abroad, and considers, from a novel point of view, "The Set-Back to Socialism in England."

M. Pierre Loti

The charming French writer and Member of the French Academy, gives the readers of The Century most entertaining impressions of his recent visit to America in

The Century for 1913

The End of the Canal Job

By Farnham Bishop

was written at Panama, and includes interviews with the quiet giant who dug the great ditch—Colonel Goethals—and with one of his prominent assistants. It contains a noteworthy survey of the future of the Canal, and admirably reflects its significance.

Short Stories

Sixty short stories or more, from the pens of such writers as Maurice Hewlett, Owen Johnson, Ruth McEnery Stuart, John Corbin, Grace MacGowan Cooke, Charles D. Stewart, Eden Phillpotts, Lucy Furman, and Ellis Parker Butler, will give a delightfully entertaining flavour to

The Century for 1913

Subscription Terms: 16/- post free per annum; single numbers, 1/4

A Charming Volume of Sketches of Canadian Rural Life. 5/-

WHERE THE SUGAR MAPLE GROWS.

By ADELINE TESKEY

Author of "The Yellow Pearl," etc.

Miss Teskey has produced in these idylls of a Canadian Village something unique in the way of character studies, equal in all respects to the quaint types of "Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush." Her work will prove a revelation to those who claim that Canada has no Literature.

THE MUSSON BOOK COMPANY, LIMITED,

Mansion House Chambers, 11, Queen Victoria Street, London, E.C. Head Office Toronto, Canada.

The Complete Edition in One Handsome Volume of the Poetical Works of E. PAULINE JOHNSON, the Great Canadian Poetess.

"FLINT AND LEATHER" is the first volume of the complete poetical works of E. PAULINE JOHNSON, the famous Mohawk poetess, and the daughter of the late Chief Johnson of the Six Indian nations fame. The reader of "The Bookman" has only to look upon the face of the portrait here reproduced, to conclude that the poems of Indian life and love which make up this delightful edition, are the work of a most accomplished writer. The volume has just been issued in a handsome binding, and will make an ideal present for friends both home and abroad.

FLINT AND FEATHER

Being the Complete Poems of

E. PAULINE JOHNSON
("Tekahionwake.")

With a brief biographical sketch of the author. With portrait frontispiece. Cloth, 6/- net.

This collection of verse I have named FLINT AND LEATHER because of the association of ideas. Flint suggests the warrior's weapons of war; Feather the eagle plume that rests the head of a warrior chief; so both "flint and feather" have been half made of my Mohawk blood.
E. PAULINE JOHNSON

THE MUSSON BOOK COMPANY, LIMITED,

Mansion House Chambers, 11, Queen Victoria Street, London, E.C. Head Office—Toronto, Canada.

Songs of the Day.—Songs of the Night.

3/6 net.

CANADIAN CANTICLES.

A Companion Volume to those two beautiful anthologies "The Garden of Love" and "Fragrance of Flowers." A most tasteful production, and will prove a very acceptable present for Christmas or any other time. The compiler has divided the selection into two parts, viz., "SONGS OF THE DAY" and "SONGS OF THE NIGHT," the aim has been well carried out and with good judgment.

The following is but a short selection of the varied contents of this attractive volume:

The God of Colour - The Call of the River - The Irish Immigrant - The Spirit of the Ocean - The Heart of the Woods - The Gold God - The Death of Yesterday - Life and Death - The Soul - The Mead of Love - The Song of the North - The City of the Sea - Desperate Blessings - The Ghost of the North - My First Love - For Eternity - The Spirits of Music - Hope's Golden Sun - My Love's Song - Repentance - Since I Know You Love Me - In My Love - The Spirits of the Night - Ghosts' Hours - Love and Death's Birds - The City of Silence - I Miss You - Her Bridalroom - Expectation - Immortal Love - My Bird of Hope - The Fountain of Tears - The Soul of the Murderer - Little Love - The Palace of Tears.

THE MUSSON BOOK COMPANY, LIMITED,

Mansion House Chambers 11, Queen Victoria Street, London, E.C. Head Office—Toronto, Canada.

THE FIRST NEW NOVELS OF 1913

MESSRS. JOHN LONG will, commencing the 1st January, 1913, publish the following Novels from their New List. These Novels (many of them by the foremost writers of the day) have been selected with the greatest care, and they should appeal to the tastes of all readers. It is a well-known fact that there is always something new and striking in a JOHN LONG Novel, and this important characteristic is not absent from the present Novels.

SIX SHILLINGS EACH

STEPHEN ORMOND . . . . .	F. Dickberry, Author of "The Storm of London."
THE ONLY PRISON . . . . .	Ellen Ada Smith
CATCHING A CORONET . . . . .	Edmund Bosanquet
THE HOUSE of the OTHER WORLD . . . . .	Violet Tweedale
THE TERRIBLE CHOICE . . . . .	Stephen Foreman
A MASQUERADE & A MONASTERY . . . . .	Anne Weaver
A GIRL OF NO IMPORTANCE . . . . .	Olivia Ramsey
THE IMPENITENT PRAYER . . . . .	Amy J. Baker
LOVE'S SENTINEL . . . . .	Florence Warden
INCOMPARABLE JOAN . . . . .	Alice M. Diehl
SEEKERS EVERY ONE . . . . .	Beatrice Kelston
THE BARTENSTEIN CASE . . . . .	J. S. Fletcher
THE DECOY DUCK . . . . .	By a Peer
A TARTAR'S LOVE . . . . .	G. Ystridde-Orshanski
THE TURN OF THE TIDE . . . . .	R. Penley
NATHALIA . . . . .	Fred Whishaw
A SPARK OF STEEL . . . . .	E. Scott Gillies
THE LURE OF CROONING WATER . . . . .	Marion Hill
UNQUENCHED FIRE . . . . .	Alice Gerstenberg
LOVE ON SMOKY RIVER . . . . .	Theodore G. Roberts
A SOUL IN SHADOW . . . . .	Elsé Carrier
A PAGE IN A MAN'S HISTORY . . . . .	Penelope Ford
THE MAN IN THE CAR . . . . .	Alan Raleigh
FRESH AIR . . . . .	Harry Temple
THE LITTLE MAISTER . . . . .	R. H. Forster
HOBSON'S CHOICE . . . . .	G. G. Chatterton

An interesting descriptive List of all forthcoming Novels will be sent post free to any address.

Messrs. John Long will publish immediately the following important New Works :

COMPOSERS, IN LOVE AND MARRIAGE

By J. CUTHBERT HADDEN, author of "The Operas of Richard Wagner," "Chopin," etc. With Photo-gravure and numerous Portraits and Illustrations. Demy 8vo 12s. 6d. net. (Prospectus, post free)

KING RENÉ D'ANJOU AND HIS SEVEN QUEENS

By EDGCUMBE STALEY. With coloured Frontispiece and numerous Portraits. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

JOHN LONG, LIMITED, 12, 13, 14, Norris Street, HAYMARKET, LONDON.

Macmillan's List

George Frederic Watts. Vols. I. and II.: The Annals of an Artist's Life. By M. S. WATTS. Vol. III.: The Writings of G. F. Watts. With 39 Photogravure Plates. 3 vols. 8vo. 31s. 6d. net.

The Standard—"These three volumes are an impressive tribute to a great painter who was also a man of commanding personality, high integrity, and beautiful outlook. . . . Altogether Mrs. Watts is to be congratulated on having built a monument at once so chaste and noble to the man who she not merely loved, but worshipped."

Francis Paget, Bishop of Oxford.

By STEPHEN PAGET and J. M. C. CRUM. With an Introduction by His Grace THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY. With Photogravure Portrait. 8vo. 15s. net.

Further Reminiscences of H. M. Hyndman. 8vo. 15s. net.

HIGHWAYS AND BYWAYS SERIES. NEW VOL.

Highways & Byways in Somerset.

By EDWARD HUTTON. Illustrated by NIELLY ERICHSEN. Extra crown 8vo. 5s. net.

SECOND IMPRESSION.

Foundations. A Statement of Christian Belief in Terms of Modern Thought. By SEVEN OXFORD MEN: B. H. Streeter, R. Brook, W. H. Moberly, R. G. Parsons, A. E. J. Rawlinson, N. S. Talbot, W. Temple. 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

The Athenaeum—"On the whole, the book is interesting, very readable, and in some parts of it, as we have said, a great deal more. Many, we hope, will profit by Mr. Talbot's picture of present-day conditions, and more will discuss the debatable topics raised by Mr. Streeter, Mr. Temple, and Mr. Rawlinson."

The Reef. By EDITH WHARTON, Author of "The House of Mirth," &c. 6s.

Punch—"The whole book is delightful, illuminating, fragrant, sympathetic. It is the author of 'The House of Mirth' at her best, and that best has long ago placed her in the small rank of contemporary novelists."

Folk Tales of Breffny. By Miss B HUNT. 3s. 6d. net.

The Globe—"We have never come across a collection of folk-lore which can have lost so little in transcription as these deliciously-told stories of Breffny."

The Heroine in Bronze, or a Portrait of a Girl. A Pastoral of the City. By JAMES LANE ALLEN. 6s.

The Globe—"There is a charm and delicacy about the story that will win for it many admirers, and a literary grace which cannot be too highly praised."

Works by John Morley

COLLECTED EDITION OF THE WORKS. In 14 vols. Globe 8vo. 4s. net each [Eversley Series]

Voltaire. 1 vol.

Burke. 1 vol.

Rousseau. 2 vols.

Studies in Literature.

Diderot and the Encyclopædists. 2 vols.

1 vol.

On Compromise. 1 vol.

Oliver Cromwell. 1 vol.

Miscellanies. 3 vols.

The Life of Richard Cobden. 2 vols.

LIFE OF WILLIAM EWART GLADSTONE. 3 vols. 8vo. 42s. net. Popular Edition. 2 vols. 8vo. 5s. net each. In 3 vols. Globe 8vo. 18s. net each.

LIFE OF BURKE. Crown 8vo. Library Edition, 2s. net. Popular Edition, 1s. 6d. Sewed, 1s. 8vo. Pocket Edition, 1s. net.

[English Men of Letters.]

LIFE OF WALPOLE. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.

[Twelve English Statesmen.]

OLIVER CROMWELL. 8vo. 10s. net. Illustrated Edition. Extra crown 8vo. 14s. net.

MISCELLANIES: FOURTH SERIES. 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

INDIAN SPEECHES, 1907-1909. 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

NEW WORKS IN GENERAL LITERATURE PUBLISHED BY HODDER AND STOUGHTON.

RUDYARD KIPLING.

COLLECTED VERSE OF RUDYARD KIPLING. Editions de Luxe all Sold. FOURTH LARGE EDITION. 20s. net.

"As sumptuous a form as any book of modern times can show. We venture, after hunting for the truly English book of the season, to decide that we have it here, and in the most inviting and durable form we could desire."—Pall Mall Gazette. "There is one book which stands out above all the others in Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton's list. It is the 'Collected Verse of Rudyard Kipling.' . . . Its binding, its paper, and its printing would have satisfied the soul of William Morris."—JAMES DOUGLAS in the Star.

STEPHEN PAGET.

ANOTHER DEVICE. By STEPHEN PAGET, Author of "Confessio Medici." 5s. net.

"A comely volume, . . . full of mellow wisdom and mature reflection. Mr. Paget has, indeed, an unique touch among modern essayists. He is a scientist of full knowledge, . . . he has the light touch to perfection; but, perhaps, the prevailing impression of his book is that of a wise and gentle reasonableness, a mild toleration—in itself the sign of a well balanced mind—and a kindly sympathy for any creed which may help to make easier the long, rough pilgrimage of man."—Daily Telegraph.

"THE INSECT'S HOMER."

THE LIFE OF THE SPIDER. By J. H. FABRIE ("The Insect's Homer"). With an Introduction by MAURICE MAETERLINCK. 6s. net.

"From the study of spiders he brings 'the most extraordinary of tragic fairy plays that it is possible for the human imagination, not to create or conceive, but to admit and to acclimatise within itself.' The words are Maeterlinck's, but they are more than justified by the pages that follow."—Daily Express.

ARTHUR C. BENSON.

THE BEAUTY OF LIFE. From the Writings of ARTHUR CHRISTOPHER BENSON. Compiled by CAROLINE ABBOTT DERBY. 6s. net.

"Miss Derby has conferred a favour on those who love good thinking and good writing by bringing together a selection of Benson's most beautiful and suggestive soliloquies. . . . The book is one that should have a wide circulation amongst people who aspire to 'see life steadily, and see it whole,' from the point of view of a latter-day recluse."—Scotsman.

ARNOLD BENNETT.

HOW TO LIVE ON 24 HOURS A DAY—MENTAL EFFICIENCY—LITERARY TASTE—THE HUMAN MACHINE—THE FEAST OF ST. FRIEND. A Collected Edition of ARNOLD BENNETT'S famous "Pocket Philosophies." 1s. net. each.

SECOND EDITIONS.

"The five titles describe his gospel admirably. . . . They form, spiritually speaking, one book—a book on the art of living to-day. . . . His five teachings, like his five towns, pulse with the sane, vivid and generous communications. The young man who reads them will have life more abundantly. He will conceive what it is to be 'Lord over the Noddle.'"—Pall Mall Gazette.

A. AUSTIN FOSTER.

THE MESSAGE OF ROBERT BROWNING. By A. AUSTIN FOSTER, M.A. 5s. net.

"A very instructive and suggestive commentary on the poet's mind and art."—Glasgow Herald. "The treatment is broad, intelligent, and cultured, and students who are working out for themselves the meaning and significance of Browning's verse will find stimulus and guidance in Mr. Foster's careful and well-informed analysis."—Scotsman.

HODDER & STOUGHTON, PUBLISHERS, LONDON, E.C.

The Bookman.

"I am a Bookman."—James Russell Lowell.

No. 256. Vol. XLIII.
Subscription rate 11s. per annum post free.

JANUARY, 1913.

PRICE SIXPENCE.
Published Monthly.

CONTENTS.

NEWS NOTES .. ..	197
THE BOOKSELLERS' DIARY	201
THE READER—
Lord Morley as a Man of Letters. By ALEXANDER
MACKINTOSH .. ..	203
Cardinal Manning. By MGG.
R. H. BENSON .. ..	209
PRIZE COMPETITIONS ..	210
Disraeli Continued. By WAL-
TER SICHEL .. ..	213
NEW BOOKS—
Mr. Galsworthy's Plays By
W. W. GIBSON .. ..	216
Stevenson Again. By NEIL
MUNRO .. ..	217
Poetry. By EDWARD THOMAS	218
Toby's Second Innings .. ..	219
Scottish History .. ..	220
The Model Employer .. ..	220
The World's End By J. E.
PATTERSON .. ..	221
William Sharp. By FRANCIS
BICKLEY .. ..	222

A Veteran Socialist .. ..	223
"The Pearl." By WALLER
JERKOLD .. ..	224
A Tragedy of Four. By M. P.
WILLCOCKS .. ..	224
The Complete Mystery .. ..	225
An Old Romance. By GEORGE
SAMPSON .. ..	225
Provincial Nerve Centres ..	226
Gitanjali. By RICHARD CURL	227
Frances Willard .. ..	228
Only a Prologue .. ..	228
Possion and Fiction By
LEWIS MITVILLE .. ..	228
Scottish Life and Poetry By
DR. JAMES MOFFATT .. ..	229
The New Molère. By GEORGE
SAMPSON .. ..	229
Swinburne. By JOHN FRIEMAN	230
Science, Nature and Romance	231
Anatole France By R.
CURIE .. ..	232
The Letters of a Post Impressionist .. ..	232

East Anglian Houses .. ..	233
Recent British History .. ..	234
NOVEL NOTES—
The Heroine in Bronze -
Things that Pass—Little Thank You The Recipe
for Rubbet Guinea Gold Private Smith - King Errant -The Distant Lamp—
Under the Yoke—Back Home
The Gods of the Dead -
The Joyous Adventures of Austide Pujol Our Alty
Cease Firing The Reluctant
Love.—Officer 666 .. ..	235 239
THE BOOKMAN'S TABLE—
The Old Irish World Rambles in Ireland - The Poems of Catullus The American Diary of a Japanese Girl—
'Neath Oak and Olive -The Trial of Jeanne D'Arc -
Tennyson .. ..	239 241
NOTES ON NEW BOOKS ..	242

NOTICES.

All communications intended for the Editor must be addressed to the Editor of THE BOOKMAN, ST. PAUL'S HOUSE, WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

A preliminary letter of inquiry should be sent to the Editor before any manuscript is submitted for his consideration.

News Notes.

We had intended printing some of the letters we have received from all parts of the British Isles complimenting and congratulating us on the BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS NUMBER, but these are so numerous and so unanimously eulogistic—one reader declares it is honestly worth a guinea; another would sooner have gone without all the other Christmas Numbers he has seen this year than have missed the Christmas BOOKMAN; and so in various terms the same high praise is given—that we have decided to thank all such readers collectively and assure them we very greatly appreciate all the kind things they have written of us.

Mr. Heinemann has published a new edition of Mr. Zangwill's striking play, "The New Religion," for which the author has written a preface.

Under the title of "Pages Assembled," Mr. Elkin Mathews is publishing this month a volume of selections from the books (some hitherto only privately printed) of Sir Frederick Wedmore.

Mr. George Edgar, whose story of the Prize Ring, "The Blue Bird's-Eye," was one of the most successful books of last year, has just completed his second novel, "Swift Nick of the York Road." It is a highwayman romance, and will be published this spring by Messrs. Mills & Boon.

We mentioned last month that "Tide Marks," the new novel by Margaret Westrup (Mrs. Margaret Stacey), was to be published immediately. Its publication has, we understand, been now fixed for next autumn.

This month brings us to the Centenary of Sir Isaac Pitman, who was born at Trowbridge on January 4th, 1813, and arrangements have been made for what can be literally described as a world-wide celebration of the event. When the project was mooted a few months ago it was taken up with enthusiasm, and a large and influential Committee was soon formed, with Sir Thomas Crosby (himself for many years a writer of the Pitman system) as President. There are to be important gatherings in London, Bath and New York, and a large number of other meetings in honour of Sir Isaac are to take place in various parts of Great Britain, the United States, Australia, India and Ceylon. Eminent Continental stenographers have intimated their intention to be present at the principal British celebrations. To say nothing of the Continent, "Pitman's Shorthand" is known and used wherever the English language is spoken, and its writers are to be found in all classes of society. Dr. Woodrow Wilson, the new President of the United States, is proud of the fact that he is one of them. There are many eminent medical men, who for years past have kept all their records in the Pitman shorthand, and equally eminent K.C.'s who make extensive use of the same accomplishment for professional purposes. What journalism owes to it everybody knows. It has been adapted into twenty different languages, including French, German, Italian, Spanish, Dutch, Welsh, Latin, Chinese, Japanese and Hindustani.

"Sir Isaac Pitman was trained with a view to his becoming a schoolmaster," says Mr. Edward A. Cope, the energetic Hon. Secretary of the Pitman Centenary Celebration, "and was entered at the Borough Road Training College of the British and Foreign School Society. An old system of shorthand that came under his notice fascinated him; realising its possibilities as a means of saving time, he adapted it with the idea of teaching it to others, submitted it to a publishing firm, was recommended to invent a new system, took the advice, and ultimately produced his own shorthand in 1837. It was based on the principle of disregarding entirely the conventional spelling and employing symbols to represent sounds. For that reason he styled it "Stenographic Shorthand," a title abandoned later in favour of "Phonography." It was a crude method at first, but it underwent much revision in subsequent years and developed into the practical system now so well known. It was propagated in its early days by a remarkable crusade, undertaken by its inventor, several of his brothers, and a few ardent disciples whom he had infected with his own enthusiasm. Large meetings were held throughout the kingdom; lectures were given, and classes started. The movement was mixed up with a Spelling Reform agitation and provoked a good deal of opposition. But the shorthand spread and got into use. Its inventor lived to see it recognised as the English stenography. His admirers presented him with his bust by Brock in 1887, when the Jubilee of the system was celebrated. On the recommendation of Lord Rosebery he was knighted in 1894. Three years later he died. A Memorial Portrait, the cost of which was defrayed by writers of the system, was presented to the National Portrait Gallery; a Memorial Window was set up in the church at Bath which he had habitually attended; and a Tablet has been placed by the Corporation of Bath on the house in Royal Crescent in which he lived for many years." It is enough to say in his praise that all the honours bestowed upon him were well earned. Any one wishing for further information concerning the Centenary Celebrations should communicate at once with the Hon. Secretary, Mr.

Edward A. Cope, Avoca, Selsdon Road, South Croydon, Surrey.

Sir Isaac Pitman.

From the memorial portrait by A. S. Cope, R.A., in the National Portrait Gallery.

Mr. and Mrs. Laurence Irving (Miss Mabel Hackney) have arranged to dramatize Mrs. T. P. O'Connor's charming novel, "Little Thank You." Mrs. O'Connor modelled "Jimps," the dog of her story, upon "Mop," the wonderful fox-terrier who has already appeared on the stage, acting a "star" part specially written for him by his master, Mr. Laurence Irving.

"Red Harvest" is the title Mr. Newman Flower has given to his first novel, which is to be issued this month by Messrs. Cassell. It is a romance based upon the events that led up to the assassination of King Alexander and Queen Draga of Servia nine years ago, and its scenes are laid in London, Paris and Belgrade. Mr. Flower has an interesting story of how his novel came to be written. Not long since he met a man in Paris who had been associated with the assassination, and he told a remarkable story, which Mr. Flower resolved to re-tell in the form of fiction, and "Red Harvest" is the result. Mr. Flower is well known among the Society of Dorsetmen as a keen student of Thomas Hardy, and better known to the rest of us as editor of those popular monthlies—The Story-Teller and

Photo by Eug. Peron, Paris.

Joseph Turquan,
whose new book, "A Great Coquette: Madame Recamier and Her Salon," Mr. Herbert Jenkins is publishing this Spring.

Cassell's Magazine of Fiction. "I remember very gratefully," he says, "the first advice given to me by a former Cassell editor, Mr. Max Pemberton, who told me the only sound recipe for writing a story was: 'First have your story to tell—then tell it.'" He adds that in his capacity of editor he has always based on this maxim his judgment of stories submitted to him. With what success he has applied it to the writing of his own first novel we shall know when we come to read it.

Mr. Irwin S. Cobb, whose "Back Home" has been published by Mr. Heinemann, is described by an American critic as a blend of Mark Twain, O. Henry and Edgar Allan Poe at their best. He was born in Kentucky in 1876, and has been a hard-working journalist since he was in his teens. At the age of nineteen he was "the youngest managing editor of a daily paper in the United States," and went from editing the Paducah Daily News to join the New York Evening Sun, then to the Evening World. But one time and another he seems to have done work for half the principal papers of New York. His first

Miss Lillian Street, whose new book, "Jim and the Squire," is published by Messrs. Putnam.

short story, "The Escape of Mr. Trim," appeared in the Saturday Evening Post. It is a story of the delightfully irresponsibly humorous kind, for humour is Mr. Cobb's predominating quality, but like all true humorists he has a fine sense of the grim, the gruesome and the terrible, and for sheer grimness and uncanny horror it would be difficult to equal outside the pages of Poe such of his stories as "Fish-head," "The Belled Buzzard" and "An Occurrence up a Side Street." In the course of a lecture at Columbia College, Mr. Gelett Burgess spoke of Mr. Cobb as "one of the ten great American humorists"; but the American writer, Mr. Robert H. Davis, says with reference to this that "Cobb ought to demand a recount—there are not ten humorists in the world, but Cobb is one of them." It is Mr. Davis who also says, "the extraordinary thing about Cobb is that he can turn a burst of laughter into a funeral oration, who has translated two of the latest volumes in Mr. John Lane's collected edition of Anatole France a snicker into a shudder, and a smile into a crime. He writes in octaves, striking all the chords of humour, tragedy, pathos and romance with either hand. Observe this man in his thirty-sixth year, possessing gifts the limitations of which even he himself has not yet recognised." Ten of his strongest and most characteristic stories are included in "Back Home."

Mrs. W. S. Jackson,

Mr. Wilfrid Jackson, whose book of essays, "Cross Views" was published the other day by Mr. John Lane, is a barrister and was called at Lincoln's Inn in 1894. He is, moreover, a nephew of Mr. Alfred Austin's. He is the author, as most of us will remember, of three delightfully humorous novels, "Nine Points of the Law," "Helen of Troy, N.Y." and "Trial by Marriage," which were also published by Mr. Lane; he has written on Caricature and French and English Draughtsmen in the Nineteenth Century, and is an occasional contributor of verse and prose to the Bystander, the Taller, and other papers. Mr. Jackson's wife, too, has done good work in literature, and recently translated "At the Sign of the Reine Pedanque," and "Jerome Coignard," for Mr. Lane's collected edition of Anatole France's works.

It is now an open secret that the successful novel, "The Odd Man" by Arnold Holcombe, published some two years ago by Mr. John Lane, was the work of Mr. Arnold Golsworthy (The "Jingle" of the Bystander). Readers who enjoyed that hilarious story of village life will be pleased to hear that Mr. Golsworthy has completed a new novel, "The Little World," which will be published this month by Messrs. George Allen & Co. He has chosen a theme that lends itself well to his keenly satirical, genially philosophical outlook on life. It is a dramatic story that develops out of the lives of typical residents in a London suburb to whom a few obscure streets with high-sounding names form a little world of their own.

In his admirable series of character sketches, "Prophets, Priests and Kings" (Alston Rivers), Mr. A. G. Gardiner included a brilliant study of Lord Morley, in which he describes him as "the only 'double first' of his time. He is perhaps the only double first since Burke. Other men have won distinction in more than one field. Canning wrote verse. Disraeli wrote novels. Macaulay was an orator as well as an historian. Gladstone discussed Homer as vehemently as he discussed Home

Mr. W. S. Jackson,

From a drawing by himself.

Rule. . . . But of none of these can it be said that he was in the front rank alike of literature and of statesmanship. It may with reserve be said of Lord Morley." Passing to a subtle analysis of Lord Morley's character, Mr. Gardiner says: "In the deep-set, contemplative eye and indeterminate chin of Lord Morley you see the man who inspires others to lofty purpose rather than the man of action. In his study, alone with the past or the present, he hitches his wagon to a star and rides away into the serene. In a set speech, face to face with a great issue, he sounds a note of moral greatness, clear and pure, that is heard from no other lips. . . . He has often been on the losing side; sometimes perhaps on the wrong side: never on the side of wrong. . . . There is about him a sense of the splendid austerity of truth—cold but exhilarating. It is not merely that he does not lie. There are some other politicians of whom that may be said. It is that he does not trifle with truth. . . . He brings to the consideration of politics that historic sense which is the most rare and valuable element in contemporary criticism. He seems aloof from the dust and heat of the conflict, watching the unfolding of a new chapter in the eternal drama of things, and making his comments, not in the spirit of one of the actors, but with the cold detachment of the Greek chorus. The alarms and excursions of politics, its subtleties and stratagems, do not appeal to him. . . . His true place is with Burke on the back benches, applying the test of eternal principle to the momentary task, rather than with Walpole on the Treasury bench, seeking to make principles bend to the necessities of occasion." Our photograph of Lord Morley on page 203 is one of the portraits that illustrate Mr. Gardiner's book.

The Booksellers' Diary.

LIST OF FORTHCOMING BOOKS.

January 1st to February 1st, 1913.

Messrs. A. & C. Black.

- BURNETT, JAMES, M.A., M.D., M.R.C.P. (Edin.)—Handbook of Medical Treatment 3s. 6d. net.
 BURNETT, JAMES, M.A., M.D., M.R.C.P. (Edin.)—The Pocket Clinical Guide. 1s. 6d. net.
 BURNETT, JAMES, M.A., M.D., M.R.C.P. (Edin.)—The Pocket Prescriber. Third Edition. 1s. net.
 CHARLES, REV. R. H.—A Critical History of the Doctrine of a Future Life in Israel, in Judaism, and in Christianity, or, Hebrew, Jewish, and Christian Eschatology from pre-Prophetic Times till the Close of the New Testament Canon (The Jowett Lectures for 1898-99). New Edition. 10s. 6d. net.
 HEADLAM, CECIL—France (Making of the Nations). Containing 32 full-page Illustrations from Photographs. 7s. 6d. net.
 ROBERTSON, W. G., AITCHISON, M.D., D.Sc., F.R.S.P., F.R.S.E.—Manual of Medical Jurisprudence, Toxicology, and Public Health. Second Edition. With 19 Illustrations. 6s. net.

Messrs. William Blackwood & Sons.

- HARBOUR, G. F., D.Phil.—The Ethical Approach to Therms. 1s. net.
 CUSTANCE, ADMIRAL SIR REGINALD N., K.C.B., K.C.M.G., C.V.O.—The Ship of the Line in Battle. With Diagrams.
 MEKZEL, THEODORE, Ph.D., D.C.L., LL.D.—A History of European Thought in the Nineteenth Century. Vol. III. 15s. net.
 PAGE, ARTHUR (Barrister at Law)—Conservative Principles and Modern Problems. 5s. net.
 THEOBALD, F. V., M.A. (Cam.)—A Text Book of Agricultural Zoology. New Edition. 8s. 6d.

Messrs. Cassell & Co., Ltd.

- ARNOLD FORSLER, RT. HON. H. O.—History of England. New Edition. 5s.
 ARNOLD FORSLER, RT. HON. H. O.—Civil Service Guide. New Edition. 1s. net and 1s. 6d. net.
 BRIGHTMORE, PROFESSOR A. W., D.Sc., M.I.C.E.—Structural Engineering. 10s. 6d. net.
 CHESTERTON, G. K.—Father Brown. 1s. net.
 FLOWER, NEWMAN—Red Harvest. 6s.
 HAGGARD, H. RIDGER—Child of Storm. 6s.
 HAGGARD, H. RIDGER—The Yellow God. 1s. net.
 MARSH, RICHARD—A Master of Deceit. 6s.

Messrs. Chapman & Hall, Ltd.

- BENTON, C. A.—The Sword. 6s.
 CHURCH, COLONEL (late)—Aborigines of South America. 10s. 6d. net.
 COKE, DESMOND—Helena Brett's Career. 6s.
 CROUCH, W. WALTER—Charles Dickens and Social Reform. 4s. net.
 CULLUM, RUDGWELL—The Golden Woman. 6s.
 EYRE, A. MONTGOMERY—History of St. John's Wood. 12s. 6d. net.
 HAMMOND, FRANCES—Let them Say! 6s.
 JAMES, WINIFRED—The Mulberry Tree. 7s. 6d. net.
 JONES, HENRY ARTHUR—Principles of the Modern Drama. 7s. 6d. net.
 REYNOLDS, MRS. FRED—The Granite Cross. 6s.
 RIDLEY, LADY—Margery Trytton. 6s.
 SELBIE, PRINCIPAL—The Theology of Shellenbach. 7s. 6d. net.
 SIMPSON, VIOLET A.—The Beacon Watchers. 6s.

Messrs. Chatto & Windus.

- BENNETT, ARNOLD.—Sacred and Profane Love. Popular Edition. 6d.
 "OUIDA."—Princess Napraxine. Popular Edition. 6d.

Messrs. W. B. Clive & Sons.

- BARILLI, F. C., M.A.—Logic Exercises. 2s. 6d.
 CHAYTOR, H. J., M.A., and HARTOG, W. G., M.A.—Metric French Essays. 1s. 6d.
 COLLINS, A. J., M.A.—Burke's American Speeches. 2s. 6d.
 HARTOG, W. G., M.A.—Classified French Unseen. 2s.
 HARTOG, W. G., M.A.—Classified Passages for Translation into French. 1s. 6d.
 ROBERTS, G. A., M.A.—New Junior French Course. 2s. 6d.
 SHIFFERD, J. W., B.Sc.—Qualitative Determination of Organic Compounds. 6s. 6d.
 YOUNG, A. W., M.A., and PLAISLOWE, F. C., M.A.—Virgil: Georgics II. 1s. 6d.

Messrs. Constable & Co., Ltd.

- "ANON."—Letters of an Englishman (Second Series). 1s. 6d. net.
 CAFFE, BERNARD—Bag and Baggage. 6s.
 DORLING, F. F., F.S.A.—Leopards of England. 7s. 6d. net.
 ELLIOTT, S. B.—Important Timber Trees of the United States. About 10s. 6d. net.
 GEORGE, W. L.—Israel Kalsch. 6s.
 GRUBB, EUGENE H.—The Potato. Illustrated. 8s. 6d. net.
 JARRETT, COLONEL—The Book of Songs. Translation from Heine's "Buch der Lieder." 5s. net.
 LOCKIE, A. AUDREY—In Praise of Winchester (Constable's Anthologies Series). 5s. net.
 LOWELL, AMY.—A Dome of Many-Coloured Glass. About 4s. 6d. net.
 MITCHELL, EDMUND—Lales of Destiny. 6s.
 NICHOLSON, MILDRED—The Provincial American. About 4s. 6d. net.
 PEASE, HOWARD—Lord Wardens of the Marches. Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net.
 PERRY, BLISS—The American Mind. About 1s. 6d. net.
 SLATER, GILBERT—The Making of Modern England. About 10s. 6d. net.
 SOLLY, J. RAYMOND—Selected Thoughts from the French. 5s. net.
 STIGAND, CAIT C. H.—The Land of Zing. 15s. net.
 THURLEIGH, J. G.—The Influence of Baudelaire in France and England. 7s. 6d. net.
 VITCH, H. G.—The Causes of Parliamentary Reform. Introduction by Romay Murr. About 1s. 6d. net.
 WATSON, STACY—The Great Meghal. Illustrated. 6s.

Mr. Wm. Heinemann.

- DUFFIN, MRS. HENRY—A Runaway Ring. 6s.
 DICKIN, ALFRED—The Prince Imperial. 15s. net.
 HARRISON, JEREMY—The Positive Evolution of Religion. 8s. 6d. net.
 HAYWARD, RACIOT—The Hippodrome. 6s.
 HIND, A. M.—Fragrant Great Engravings. 2s. 6d. net.
 HIND, A. M.—Heath Great Engravings. 2s. 6d. net.
 MARGUERITE, VICTOR—Tentacles of the Heart. 6s.
 PATTERSON, J. F.—Stephen Compton. 6s.
 ROBINS, LILLIAN—Where are you going to? 6s.
 WALISZEWSKI, K.—Paul I of Russia. 15s. net.

Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton.

- AMBY, W. LACEY—The Blue Wolf.
 BRIGHT, HAROLD—Light of India. 1s.
 BRAME, CHARLOTTE—Lady Weyburn's Ring. 6d.
 BRENNER, PIERCE—The Little Grey Shoe.
 CROCKETT, S. R.—Jew of Then Youth. 6d.
 DIN, MARIE BEULAI—The Fighting Blade.
 DOKE, J. J.—The Secret City.
 DODGLAS, O.—Olivia in India.
 FREEMAN, AUSTIN—The Red Thumb Mark. 6d.
 GERARD, MORICE—The King's Signet. 6d.
 PARKER, SIR GILBERT—The Land That Had No Turning. 7d.
 PASTURE, MRS. H. DE LA—Adam Grison. 1s.
 PUNSHON, F. R.—The Wilderness Lovers.
 REYNOLDS, MRS. BAILLIE—To Set Her Free. 6d.
 STEUART, J. A.—Red Reaper. 1s.
 SWAN, ANNIE S.—The Inheritance. 6d.
 TIREHUK, W. E.—Miss Grace of All Souls. 7d.
 WILLIAMSON, MRS.—The Vanity Box. 6d.

"Brenda."

Whose patriotic romance, "Mary Pillenger," was recently published by Messrs. Putnam.

Messrs. Jarrold & Sons.

BARKER, HENRY JAMES, M.A.—Little humorists at School. 1s net.
BORROW, GEORGE. Romantic Ballad. Translated from the Danish, and Miscellaneous Pieces. 10s. 6d. net.
GAZE, W. CULLING.—On and Along the Thames. James I. 1603-1625. With 8 Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net.
STEVENS, FRANCIS SEYMOUR.—A History of Montenegro. 2s. 6d. net.
STUART, ESMÉ.—Harum Scarum's Fortune. 1s. net.
TRENHART, DR. DAVID.—Healing via Redemption. 1s. 6d. net.

Mr. T. Werner Laurie.

CROSS, VICTORIA.—The Night of Temptation. 6s.
DYLLINGTON, ANTHONY.—The Stranger in the House. 6s.
GAUNT, MARY.—Every Man's Desire. 6s.
GULL, RANGER.—Murder, I did. 6s.
PAIN, HARRY.—The New Gulliver. 6s.
PUGH, EDWIN.—Harry the Cockney. 6s.
ROBERTS, THEODORE GOODRIDGE.—The Toll of the Tides. 6s.
SMITH, HOPKINSON.—The Armchair at the Inn. 6s.
TRUSCOTT, PARRY.—Hilary's Career. 6s.

Messrs. Longmans, Green & Co.

ABNEY, SIR WILLIAM DE WIVELISLE.—Researches in Colour Vision and the Trichromatic Theory. 4 Coloured Plates and other Illus. 21s. net.
BRETT, REV. JESSE.—Help from the Sanctuary. With Frontispiece. 1s. 6d. net.
DRAKE, REV. F. W.—The Wondrous Passion. 2s. 6d. net.
GRANT, ARTHUR J.—A History of Europe. With Maps and Coloured Chart. 7s. 6d. net.
KELLY, HERBERT.—The Church and Religious Unity. 4s. 6d. net.
KNOX, RICHARD F. A. D.D.—A Message of Christ to an Age of Unrest. Paper covers, 6d. net; cloth, 1s. net.
MARTIN, HAROLD MEDWAY.—The Design and Construction of Steam Turbines. With 523 Illustrations and 21 Folding Plates. 25s. net.
MARTINDALE, C. C., S. J.—In God's Nursery. 6s.
NESHILT, M.—Our Lady in the Church, and other Essays. With a Frontispiece. 1s. 6d. net.
NEWBOLT, REV. W. C. I.—The Ministry of the Word. 2s. 6d. net.
ROBINSON, REV. FORBES.—The Sympathy of God. 2s. 6d. net.
RUSSELL, REV. EDWARD I.—I and We Grow Hard. Short Addresses, Meditations, and Papers on Spiritual Subjects. 2s. 6d. net.
SHARPE, RICHARD H.—Catholicism and Life.

Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston & Co.

BERGER, HON. FRANCISCO, R.A.M.—Reminiscences, Impressions and Anecdotes. 10s. 6d. net.
LEWIS, C. I. COURTNEY (compiled and Edited by).—The Baxter Print Hand Book, 1912-13. (For pocket.) Cloth, 6s. net. (Subscribers to the other books, 3s. 6d. net.)

Messrs. Lynwood & Co.

ANDREWS, M. HENNIKER.—An Indian Mystery. A Romance of India. 6s.
COOPER, MARIOR.—Athena. A Novel. 6s.
DUNNING, MAYNARD.—Nephera. A Romance. 6s.
HALES, ADA M. M. Leslie. A Novel. 6s.
HOPKINS, R. THURSTON.—Oscar Wilde. A Study. 2s. 6d. net.
KING, RACHEL.—The Common Problem. A Novel. 6s.
MICHELI, CLARA.—The Ethiopian Voyagers, and Other Poems. 1s. 6d. net.
ROWE, JOSEPHINE V.—Poems. 2s. 6d. net.
VOLLAND, E.—The Struggle for the Crown. A Romance. 6s.

Messrs. Mills & Boon.

APPLIN, ARTHUR.—The Girl Who Saved His Honour. 1s. net.
CHANNON, E. M.—Cato's Daughter. 6s.
COBB, THOMAS.—A Marriage of Inconvenience. 6s.
COLE, SOPHIE.—In Search of Each Other. 6s.
GREW.—Rambles in Holland. 6s.
NEWITT, HORACE W. C.—The Square Mile. Cheap Edition. 1s. net.
REV. NOLDS, A. RUTHVEN.—My Russian Year. 10s. 6d. net.
SIDGWICK, MRS. ALFRED.—Mr. Sheringham and Others. 6s.
SPENDER, HAROLD.—The Call of the Green. 6s.
WILSON CAMERON.—The Friendly Enemy. 6s.
WRENCH MRS. STANLEY.—The Court of the Gentiles. 6s.

Mr. John Murray.

ANSON, CAPTAIN W. A. R.N.—Life of John Jervis, Earl St. Vincent. Admiral of the Fleet. With Maps and Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net.
ELMENDORF, DWIGHT I.—A Camera Crusade through the Holy Land. 6s.
ELWIN, REV. E. F.—India and the Indians. With Illustrations. 6s.
FOX, SELINA FITZGERALD M.D., B.S.—A Chain of Prayer Across the Ages. Forty Centuries of Prayer. 8c. 2000-1912. 5s. net.
HARTOG, PROFESSOR MARCUS.—Problems of Life and Reproduction. (Progressive Science Series.) 6s. net.
HOWORTH, SIR H. H., K.C.L.E.—Saint Augustine of Canterbury. With Illustrations and Maps. 6s.
KINGSLEY, J. S.—Comparative Anatomy of Vertebrates. With Illus. 12s. net.
LOMBARDINI, MOLLI.—Rival French Courts. A Waiting Woman's Court. Chronicles in the Eighteenth Century. With Illustrations. 6s.
MURRAY, MARGARET A.—Ancient Egyptian Legends (Wisdom of the East Series.) 6s.
STEELE, J. H.—The World. A Record of the Services of a Russian Cruiser in the Actions off Port Arthur, of her Escape Northwards and Destruction by the Japanese in La Perouse Straits. Translated by L.A.H. 6s.

Mr. Eveleigh Nash.

CRAWFORD, M. MACDONALD.—A Hero of the High Seas. Being the Exploits and Life of Admiral Paul Jones. 15s. net.
FLETCHER, J. S.—I'd Venture All for Thee. (Fiction.) 6s.
HARMAND, JEAN.—A Keeper of Royal Secrets. Being the Private and Political Life of Mme de Genli. 16s. net.
PICKTHALL, MARMADUKE.—Vivian Women. (Fiction.) 6s.
STREATHFIELD, F. N.—Sporting Recollections of an Old 'Un. 7s. 6d. net.
SWIFT, BENJAMIN.—The Lady of the Night. (Fiction.) 6s.

Messrs. T. Nelson & Sons.

BLACKMORE, R. D.—Lorna Doone. Vol. 1. 6d. net.
HOPE, ANTHONY.—The Great Miss Driver. 7d. net.
MERRIMAN, H. S.—The Vultures. 7d. net.
TREVILYAN, SIR GEORGE O.—Life and Letters of Lord Macaulay. Vol. I. 1s. net.

Messrs. John Ouseley, Ltd.

"A BACHELOR"—A collection of Poems. 3s. 6d. net.
BIRD, K. H.—Practical Physics for Beginners. 1s. 6d. net.
BROADBENT, D. R.—Practical Compendium. 6s. net.
GIBBS, L. A.—The Nom de Plume. 6s.
"HINT."—The Others and She. 6s.
JEANS, ALICE.—Mingled Seed. 6s.
"ROY, D. KIMBORNT."—Linked Lines. 6s.
"LUSK, LEWIS."—Sussex Iron. 6s.
"MAYES, HIFLEN."—Love in the Laps. 6s.
MONCKTON, G. F.—Lop Lard Dick. 6s.
NASH, P. L.—Rolling on a Mossless Stone (Reminiscences). 5s. net.
OPENSHAW, MARY.—Little Grey Girl. 6s.
PLUMMER, REV. ALFRED, D.D.—The Humanity of Christ. 4s. 6d. net.

Mr. Frank Palmer.

BARTLETT, FREDERICK ORIN.—Prodigal Pro Tem. 6s.
BOLAM, GEORGE.—Wild Life in Wales. 40 Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net.
DELAGE, YVES and GOLDSMITH, MARIE.—Theories of Evolution (Translated from the French). 7s. 6d. net.

HUGHES, RUPERT.—Excuse Me (Humorous Novel). 6s.
MCINTYRE, JOHN T.—Ashton-Kirk, Investigator (Detective Story). 6s.
STRINDBERG, AUGUST.—Married (Novel). 6s.

Messrs. Stanley Paul & Co.

ANDERSON, A. J.—The Artistic Side of Photography. 5s. net.
ANDOM, R.—Cheerful Craft. 6s.
BAZIN, RENÉ.—The Releaser. 6s.
DRUMMOND, HAMILTON.—Sir Galahad of the Army. 6s.
FORMONT, MAXIME.—The She-Wolf. 6s.
FORREST, A. S.—A Tour through South America. 10s. 6d. net.
HAGGARD, LIEUT. COL. ANDREW C.P.—Louis XI. and Charles the Bold. 16s. net.
HUNT, VIOLET.—The Celebrity's Daughter. 6s.
KENEDY, ANNESLY.—The Good Woman. 6s.
LIND AL HAGEBY, L.—August Strindberg. 6s. net.
SABATINI, RAFAEL.—A Strolling Saint. 6s.
SANDARS, MARY F.—The Life and Times of Mary II. 16s. net.
SLADEN, DOUGLAS.—The White Prisoners of Omdurman. 6s.
WILLIS, W. S.—Western Men With Eastern Morals. 5s. net.
WYNNE, MAY.—The Destiny of Claude. 6s.

Sir Isaac Pitman & Sons.

BAGSHAW, J. E. G., and HANNAFORD, C. F.—Practical Banking. 5s. net.
BAKER, ALFRED.—Life of Sir Isaac Pitman (Centenary Edition) about 50 Illustrations. 2s. 6d. net.
BALDENSFERGER, PHILIP, and LEES, FREDERIC.—The Immovable. With 22 Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net.
BROWN, F. H.—City Modelling for Infants. With 78 Illustrations. 2s. 6d. net.
CHAMBERS, F. W.—Pitman's Junior Commercial Reader. With about 70 Illustrations. 1s. 6d. net.
CHAPMAN, ARTHUR, M.A., LL.D. (Camb.)—Student's Guide to Railways. 2s. 6d. net.
COLES, ARTHUR, A.C.S.—Company Accounts. 5s. net.
COLLINS, ARTHUR H., M.A.—Symbolism of Animals and Birds in English Church Architecture. With 120 Illustrations. 5s. net.
FULLER, SIR DAMPIERRE, K.C.S.I., C.L.E.—The Empire of India. (Pitman's All Red Series.) With 26 full page plate Illustrations and Map. 7s. 6d. net.
JENNIS, J. W., B.C.A., and CAMPBELL, T. OLIN, F.C.I.—Colliery Office Organisation and Accounts. 5s. net.
JOHNSON, G., F.C.I.S.—Manufacturing Book Keeping and Costs. 3s. 6d. net.
PHILLIPS, W. B., A.C.A. (Hons.)—The Accounts of Executors, Administrators and Trustees. 3s. 6d. net.
PORRITT, H. W., and NICKLIN, W.—Full Course in Book Keeping. 3s. 6d. net.
PORTERS, R. J.—Dictionary of Book Keeping. (Complete Volume.) 5s. net.
RILEY, JOSEPHINE, A.I.S.A.—Notes of Lessons on Pattern Drafting. With 35 Plates. 2s. 6d. net.
SLATFORD, J. A. (Edited by).—Pitman's Commercial Encyclopedia. Vol. 1. 10s. 6d. net, leather. 7s. 6d. net, cloth.
TOVIS, PHILIP (Edited by). Assisted by over 30 Specialist Contributors.—Pitman's Dictionary of Secretarial Law and Practice. 25s. net.
WILSON, F. H., M.A. and M.B.—Coal (Common Commodities of Commerce Series.) With Coloured Frontispiece and many Illustrations. 1s. 6d. net.

Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons.

DOCK, LAVINIA L., R.N., and NUTTING, ADRIAN.—A History of Nursing. Vols. III and IV. 25s. net.
GREGORY, LADY.—New Comedies. 5s. net.
KEY, LILLEN.—The Woman Movement. 6s. net.
LIVERMORE, WILLIAM ROSCOE.—The Story of the Civil War. Vol. 3. Parts 1 and 2.
MORITZ, JULIUS.—The Peace Movement. 12s. 6d. net.

Messrs. G. Routledge & Sons.

CHAMBERLAIN, TH. MISSIS.—Common Objects of the Riviera.
HALFORD, FRED M.—The Dry Fly Man's Handbook. 40 Photographic Plates and many Textual Cuts and Diagrams. 21s. net. Ed. de Luxe to Subscribers only. 24s. net.
KITHIN, GEORGE, M.A., B.Litt.—Sir Roger L'Estrange. A Contribution to the History of the Press in Seventeenth Century. 11 full page Plates. 10s. 6d. net.
MASKELYNE, PROFESSOR T. N.—The Fraud of theosophy Exposed.
MIGHEO, F. W. H.—Languages of West Africa. Vol. II. 12s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Alston Rivers, Ltd.

WILSON, DAVID ALEC.—The Truth about Carlyle. 1s. 6d. net.

Mr. Martin Secker.

CANNAN, GILBERT.—Round the Corner. 6s.
MELNILL, VIOLA.—Lot Barrow. 6s.
NIVEN, FREDERICK.—The Porcelain Lady. 6s.
ONTONS, OLIVER.—The Debt Account. 6s.
STONE, CHRISTOPHER.—The Burnt House. 6s.
WALPOLE, HUGH.—Fortitude. 6s.

Messrs. Skeffington & Son.

BALL, REV. C. R., M.A.—Preliminary Studies on the Book of the New Testament. 2s. 6d. net.
CHESBIRE, REV. R. S. P., M.A.—Old Testament Types. 1s. 6d. net.
MORTIMER, REV. A. G., D.D.—The Last Discourses of our Lord. New Edition. 2s. 6d. net.
ROOSE, HAZEL W.—Death. Life's Birthday. New Edition. 2s. 6d. net.
SAINTE, REV. WM. J.—Pearls of Peace. 2s. 6d. net.
SINKER, REV. JOHN.—Into the Church's Service. 1s. 6d. net.

Messrs. T. Fisher Unwin.

CAIFERON, F. GARCIA.—Latin America. Its Rise and Progress. 10s. 6d. net.
CERVESALLO, ARNALDO.—The Roman Campagna. 15s. net.
DELL, ETHEL M.—The Knave of Diamonds. 6s.
GREEN, F. E.—The Tyranny of the Countryside. 5s. net.
HANNAN, IAN C.—The Berwick and Lothian Coasts. 6s. net.
SHEEHAN, F. P.—The Prophet. 6s.

Messrs. Ward, Lock & Co.

ASKI, W. A. and C.—Souls Adrift. 6d.
BINDLOSS, HAROLD.—The Protector. 2s. net.
BINDLOSS, HAROLD.—A Damaged Reputation. 7d. net.
BOOTHBY, GUY.—The Marriage of Ptolemy. 7d. net.
FORMAN, JUSTUS M.—The Harvest Moon. 6s.
HOCKING, JOSEPH.—Roger Trewinon. 6d.
LIGHTON, MARIE C.—Her Constant Husband. 6s.
MORTIMER, HERBERT.—The Heath Flower Mystery. 6d.
MOORE, J. G.—Diana. 6d.
OPPENHEIM, E. PHILLIPS.—Jeanne of the Marshes. 6d.
OPPENHEIM, E. PHILLIPS.—Mr. Marx's Secret. 1s. net.
SNAITH, J. C.—Lady Barbarity. 7d. net.
WALLACE, EDGAR.—Grey Timothy. 6s.
WARDEN, FLORENCE.—Lord Petworth's Daughter. 6s.
WHITE, FRED M.—The Golden Rose. 6s.

Messrs. Wells Gardner, Darton & Co.

ADDERLEY, REV. THE HON. JAMES.—The Creed and Real Life. 2s. 6d.
DEEDS, REV. CANON.—Charles Edward Brooke: A Memoir. With Introduction by Lord Halifax. 5s. net.
HEAZELL, REV. F. N., and MRS. MARGOLIOUTH.—Kurds and Christians. 3s. 6d. net.
NEWBOLT, CANON.—The Holy Trinity and Daily Life. 1s. 6d.

THE READER.

LORD MORLEY AS A MAN OF LETTERS.

BY ALEXANDER MACKINTOSH.

IT cannot be truly said of Lord Morley that he is known only as a man of letters among politicians, and as a mere politician among men of letters. He has pure art and fame in each sphere. No statesman has great rank in the realm of literature; no writer austere except Disraeli, has risen higher in the service to literature. Voltaire "is supposed to have hinted to Marshal Fleury that to have written epic and drama should disqualify a man for serving his king and country on the busy fields of affairs," and according to Lord Morley, indeed, Burke like some other men in our history "showed that books are a better preparation for statesmanship than early training in the subordinate posts and among the permanent officials of a public department." On the other hand he has said in his essay on Vanvenargues that "for sober, healthy and robust judgment on human nature and life, active and sympathetic contact with men in the transaction of the many affairs of their daily life is a better preparation than any amount of wholly meditative seclusion." In his own case, while winning in each domain an independent success, the one career has made him fitter for the other; we have seen the author of a score of volumes acting with distinction as Secretary of State for India, and carrying the Parliament Act through the House of Lords, and we have seen the practical politician embodying his personal experience of statecraft in his books, and especially in the "Life of Gladstone."

Sir Algernon West has quoted Lord Morley as saying, many years ago, "I wonder if I should not have been happier writing obscure philosophical works, which nobody would read, on the Hog's Back, than leading a political life." This, we may be sure, was not an abiding feeling on his part. He has observed that a French philosopher rated literature, "as it ought to be rated," below action, and he has personally shown a high ambition in the political world and a noble pride in the position of ruler and leader. "Most literature, nearly all literature," he writes apropos of Turgot, "is distinctly subordinate and secondary; it only serves to pass the time of the learned or cultured class, without making any definite mark either on the mental habits of men and women, or on the institutions under which they live. Compared with such literature as this, the work of an administrator who makes life materially easier and more helpful to the half-million of persons living in the Generality of Limoges or elsewhere must be pronounced emphatically the worthier and more justly satisfactory." In the case of almost every literary man who enters Parliament, regret is expressed at his giving up to party what was meant for mankind, but regret, as a rule, comes from opponents of the party to which he has devoted his talents. There is no reason to believe that the man of letters who, as Secretary of State, was responsible for the enlargement of the liberties of the Indian people, regrets the fact that for thirty years of his life politics and Parties have occupied a very large portion of his time. On account of these occupations, it is true, we have been deprived of the book which he intended to write on Chatham. How much else has been lost to literature we know not. We must judge Lord Morley by what is and not by what might have been.

Born at Blackburn on Christmas Eve, 1838, the son of a surgeon, John Morley passed the early years of his

Photo by Haynes.

Uttarpara Jai-Vishna Public Library, Lord Morley.
Accn. No. 28600 Date 19/10/2011

Lord Morley's House at Wimbledon.

life in his native town. He was still very young when he went up from Cheltenham College to Lincoln College, Oxford, where he graduated in 1859. In his Oxford days, as he has recorded, "the star of Newman had set and the sun of Mill had risen in its stead." "Two men have made me"—he said late in life—"John Stuart Mill and Mr. Gladstone." The influence of the Liberal leader concerned the second stage of his career. His early debt to the philosopher was acknowledged fully by the grateful "pupil," who held in affectionate remembrance Mill's "wisdom and goodness, his rare union of moral ardour with a calm and settled mind." Burke and Wordsworth, Goethe and Emerson, were among the teachers who influenced him through the printed word; for a time he felt the spell also of Carlyle, and he owed much in his walk through life to the companionship of George Meredith. On leaving Oxford he had a considerable struggle to secure his footing as a man of letters. He combined tutorial work with journalism, taking a mastership at a school at Charlton in Kent. His literary apprenticeship was served under the Rev. Frederick Arnold on the Literary Gazette, the title of which was subsequently altered to the Parthenon, and he himself became its editor before he was twenty-five. One of his Oxford friends, Mr. Cotter Morison, had married a daughter of Mr. Virtue, the publisher, who was the proprietor of the Gazette.

Early in the 'sixties, middle articles in the Saturday Review contributed by the young writer who became a Viscount in 1908, were attracting attention, and a selection of these formed his first volume, published without his name, under the title "Modern Characteristics," in 1865. Some of his sayings may be quoted to illustrate his suggestiveness. In an essay on "False Steps," the young man remarks that "probably about the most fatal blunder that anybody can perpetrate is a bad marriage; and, moreover, of all blunders this is the commonest." Again, in "Clever Men's Wives," he declares: "No wife is perfect who cannot be a severe critic upon occasion." Discussing "Minor Tribulations," he says: "If a man tells you that he likes the flavour of Gladstone claret as well as that of Lafitte, or Cape as well as Port, or a bad dinner as well as a good one, you know at once that he is talking only for the sake of some imaginary effect; and you not only scout his execrable philosophy but entirely disbelieve in his sincerity." On "Philosophers and Politicians," he gives a hint of his own ambition by saying: "Some men would rather have been the author of 'Hamlet' or the Principia, than have held the highest authority in the State, but they are very often just the men of the smallest intellectual calibre and least likely to erect one of these intellectual monuments more lasting than brass." Perhaps he was thinking of himself when he saw "no good reason why the hopes of a political career should stand in the way of what might be an extremely useful literary career."

Photo by Haines.

Lord Morley's Library at Wimbledon.

It was due largely to the influence of Mr. Cotter Morison, who was one of the founders of the Fortnightly Review, that Lord Morley succeeded Lewes as its editor in 1867. For a short time he edited also the expiring Morning Star, a Radical paper which enjoyed the assistance and patronage of Mr. John Bright. Lord Morley's literary and political power really dates from the time when he assumed the control of the Fortnightly. Believing in an open mind as the true secret of wisdom, he made his review the organ and instrument of all that tended to progress and freedom. A certain dissent from received theologies, as the editor noted, was found in company with new ideas of social and political reform. Mr. Harrison wrote in its pages his powerful defence of Trades Unions; it contained Mr. Huxley's memorable paper on the Physical Basis of Life; and Mr. Chamberlain, the rising Radical leader, contributed to it the most pungent articles he ever penned. In a single number we find a criticism by Mr. Chamberlain on the Liberal programme, a review by Mr. Leslie Stephen of Disraeli's novels, an article by the editor on a recent work on supernatural religion and chapters of "Beauchamp's Career." The contributors included Bagehot and Freeman, Stuart Mill and Herbert Spencer, Swinburne, William Morris and the Rossettis.

The contents of several of Lord Morley's books appeared first in the Fortnightly and there were, of course, from his pen contributions of a more polemical character. One volume of the Review includes not only his articles on Mr. Pater's essays and the death of Mr. Mill, but another entitled "The Five Gas Stokers." This, which appeared in January, 1873, was a vigorous protest against a heavy sentence on men for conspiring to break the Masters and Servants Act, and the writer scornfully remarks that "the public, whose gross fury may be supposed to have made the judge bold, has retired with sullen half-ashamed satisfaction to the enjoyment of the luxuries with which it commemorates the birth of the divine communist." Lord Morley, who had been an unsuccessful candidate at Blackburn in 1869, was as biting as Mr. Chamberlain in his criticism of the Liberal authors of the Education Act of 1870, which caused so much disappointment to dissenters. The system of signed articles introduced by Mr. Lewes was maintained, although not inflexibly, by his successor, and in the valedictory article which he wrote in 1882, reviewing his fifteen or sixteen years editorship, he held that it had on the whole been justified. He claimed, too, that reviews, of which his own was the first English type, had brought abstract discussion from the library down to the parlour, and from the serious student down to the first man in the street.

Many volumes, the result of close research and sustained thought, came from Lord Morley in the years of his editorship of the Fortnightly. His "Modern Characteristics" was followed in 1867 by his first book on Edmund Burke, and in quick succession by his biographies of Voltaire (1872), and Rousseau (1873), by his volume "On Compromise" (1874), by "Miscellanies" (1871-77), by his "Burke" (1878), in the English Men of Letters series, which he edited, by "Diderot and the Encyclopædists" (1878), and by "The Life of Richard Cobden" (1881), which brings us to within a year or two of his election to the House of Commons. "On Compromise" was described by Mr. George McLean Harper, in a recent number of the Atlantic Monthly as the moral portrait of the author. It is, to quote Lord Morley's own words, a vindication of the simple right of living one's life honestly. With a fine, persuasive temper he develops the doctrine that a man is answerable at his own peril for having found or lost the truth. He pours irony on creatures of the conventions of the hour, and on such, for instance, as those who, while not believing in hell, think hell a useful fiction for the lower classes. The "possible utility of error" is discussed by him tearlessly and yet considerably. It may be supposed that high political position proved embarrassing to one whose sense of responsibility was so keen as that of the author who, in the book "On Compromise," wrote scornfully of "the education of chiefs by followers, and of followers by chiefs, into the abandonment in a month of the traditions of centuries or the principles of a lifetime," but whether his opinion of the House of Commons view of human life was modified or not we may be sure he maintained, as far as possible, his own intellectual integrity.

Photo by Elliott & Fry.

Lord Morley in 1886.

A splendid service was done by Lord Morley in his series of studies of the intellectual precursors of the French Revolution. To him the ordinary English reader is indebted for much of what he knows concerning Voltaire, "the very eye of eighteenth century illumination," concerning Rousseau in whom, "polite Europe first hearkened to strange voices, and faint reverberation from out of the vague and cavernous shadow in which the common people move," and concerning Diderot and the Encyclopaedists who sowed the seed of all the great improvements bestowed on France by the Revolution. Not only does the author assist us to understand the teaching of those illustrious thinkers, but he gives us an interest in the men themselves. His portrait of Rousseau, that "master example of sensibility," has a sustained attraction even to the simplest student, and it contains many of those suggestive obiter dicta which contribute to the charm of Lord Morley's style. For instance he notes: "There are men, famous or obscure, whose lives might be divided into a number of epochs, each defined and presided over by the influence of a woman." He refers to "that intractable emptiness of pocket which is the iron key to many a deed of ingenuous looking self-denial and Spartan virtue." And he points out that, "one side of character is obviously tested by the way in which a man bears himself in his relations with those of greater social consideration." To his volumes on Voltaire, Rousseau and Diderot, Lord Morley adds a series of essays on Vauvenargues, the moralist and composer of aphorisms; Turgot, "perhaps the one sane Frenchman of the first eminence in the eighteenth century"; Condorcet, whose creed embraced a passionate belief in the infinite perfectibility of human nature; and Joseph de Maistre, the champion of revived Catholicism.

Photo by Elliott &amp; Fry

Lord Morley in 1890.

His studies of English statesmen, Burke, Cobden, Walpole, Cromwell and Gladstone—to give them in the order of publication—cover types which are widely diverse and yet each of which, in part at least, appealed to his sympathy. The first of his books on Burke, in 1867, was a historical study, almost entirely critical; his second, eleven years later, in the English Men of Letters series, was rather biographical, and has proved one of the most enjoyable and successful of his volumes. There are no men whom Lord Morley more frequently mentions than Turgot and Burke. The Frenchman appeals to him as "one of those to whom good government is a religion," and he shares Burke's passion for an ordered liberty. More than once he has quoted the great Whig's declaration: "I flatter myself that I love a manly, moral, regulated liberty." "The liberty, the only liberty I mean, is a liberty connected with order."

He showed during his Indian Secretaryship, how he accepted this doctrine, and although Burke was not, in his opinion, always on the right side, it is possible, as he holds, to be in the wrong with humanity and breadth, and he would very gladly have been in Burke's company at almost all times, whether talking with Samuel Johnson, in the literary circle or acting with Rockingham. In Richard Cobden also he found a congenial champion of wise, just and sedate government, and the two volumes published in 1881, give a graphic, faithful, instructive record of the man who played so great a part in the Free Trade movement, and who had been much misunderstood.

Sedateness was aimed at by Lord Morley in journalism no less than in government. "No dithyrambs, s'il vous plaît," he would say to his colleague Mr. Stead, when editing the Pall Mall Gazette. His own articles in that journal, which he conducted from May, 1880, until August, 1883, were characterised by a distinction and refinement which commended them to readers who cared much for good literature and not at all for Liberal politics. In 1883, Lord Morley at last found a seat in the House of Commons. Rejected at his native place in 1869, and at Westminster in 1880, he was now elected for Newcastle-on-Tyne. From 1883 until 1885 he edited Macmillan's Magazine, but thenceforward the responsibilities of a leading position in the Liberal party limited his freedom as a publicist. The Irish Secretaryship, to which he was appointed at the beginning of 1886, drew him to the thickest part of the political battle, and there he remained so long as Mr Gladstone lived, whether in or out of office. Fortunately, however, the author was never extinguished in the politician.

Photo by Haines.

Lord Morley and his two favourite dogs.

He was once an Editor.

As St. Patrick of Ireland.

In the midst of discussions on coercion in 1888, Lord Morley produced his book on Walpole as one of the Twelve English Statesmen series. This gave us a vivid, homely, friendly picture of the Whig under whom Parliamentary government was rendered firm and a long stride made towards Cabinet solidarity, and it gave us also finely drawn sketches of George the Second and Queen Caroline and Bolingbroke, and other figures of the time. Nowhere, indeed, was Lord Morley's touch surer than in this work. His careful, painstaking presentment of Oliver Cromwell followed in 1900, and the crown was set on his literary labour by his "Life of Gladstone" in 1903. The merits of this discreet, dignified, masterly biography are recognised as fully by one Party as by another. It could not have been written by a politician who was not a man of letters, nor by a man of letters who had not been engaged in politics.

As an Indian Charmer.

But he is always Honest John.

Four sketches of Lord Morley by Sir F. Carruthers Gould.
Reproduced from "Picture Politics" by kind permission of the artist

By no means a complete record has yet been given in these notes of all Lord Morley's literary achievements. He edited the Works of R. W. Emerson (1883), and Wordsworth's Complete Poetical Works (1888), and besides those already mentioned he issued several volumes of essays and addresses, including "Studies in Literature" in 1891, and new "Miscellanies" in 1886 and 1908. Lord Morley told Matthew Arnold that "whenever I travel I carry a volume of your writings with me. Before making a speech I read it for inspiration, and afterwards I read it again for consolation." There are politicians and journalists who frequently turn for stimulus and also for solace to his own essays, finding therein a store of suggestive ideas expressed in a style which is both easy and dignified. Take, at random, that literary gem, the sketch of W. R. Greg. The personal touches are graphic, as when we read that "he liked pleasant gardens; set a high value on leisure and even vacuity; did not disdain novels, and had the sense to prefer good wine to bad." One thinks several times of the writer himself when reading what he says of Greg. For instance, "the vice of small talk and the sin of posing he was equally free from; and if he did not happen to be interested he had a great gift of silence."

Character is impressed on everything that Lord Morley has written. The same individuality, serene, sedate, self-respecting, self-collected, is visible from his earliest volume to his latest. His modes of thought and expression sometimes recall George Eliot. We read in his "Walpole," that "a good name in those days was not incompatible with a jovial temper and much steady drinking." This sentence might have appeared in "The Mill on the Floss." To a French prosateur he was more indebted. In one branch of literature he was, he said, "reared on George Sand." French influence has been seen in his lucidity. There is charm in his harmony of language, in a certain archness that relieves his gravity, in his aphorisms, allusions and precepts, and in his happy choice of words from a limitless vocabulary. He is not afraid of repeating his favourite quotations. Lords and Commons have heard him quaintly exclaiming that "things are what they are and their consequences will be what they will be," and often he has declared with a smile that "the sons of Zeruiah are too hard for us." He is fond of recalling the maxims of Vauvenargues that "great thoughts come from the heart," and that "magnanimity owes no account to prudence of its motives," and Helvetius's saying that "in order to love mankind we must not expect too much from them." Repeatedly in print and speech he has quoted Wordsworth's description of a mind "voyaging through strange seas of thought alone," and Goethe's noble, majestic psalm, Das Göttliche:—"Let man be noble, helpful and good, for that alone distinguishes him from all beings that we know." Not only literature but Parliamentary debate, so stilted and stunted in its language, has been enriched by his apt, animated, precise and penetrating phrases as well as by that integrity of mind and that insistence on the high moralities of life which have distinguished his whole career. Chercher en gémissant is advice which he has accepted from Pascal, and it may be said of himself, as he said of Burke, that he possesses the sacred gift of inspiring men to use a grave diligence in caring for high things.

Lord Morley in 1894.

CARDINAL MANNING AND OTHER ESSAYS.*

BY MONSIGNOR R. H. BENSON.

MR. BODLEY has two great qualifications for writing such a book as this. The first is that he is essentially a spectator, identifying himself with none of his visions ; and the second is that his mind is as shrewd and keen as that of a Frenchman. And it is precisely in the possession of those two characteristics that he finds, too, his limitations.

His two essays on French affairs are admirable ; the former of the two, that on the Decay of Idealism in France, is keen and philosophical ; he dissects, correlates and visualizes with wonderful skill : he shows— even by little illustrations from contemporary crime—how, while the Saxon toils at the superficies of things, the Gaul fastens upon an Idea—at least, how the Gaul used to do so. And he finds in the famous Dreyfus case the last national explosion of Idealism, centreing round the idea, rather than the person, of the Jew. Further, he distinguishes the old frame of Idealism from the more recent, and predicts that Catholicism, however great its revival may be, will no longer serve. Idealism may recover ; but it will not be that which evolved Chartres and Beauvais, or even the basilica of Montmartre.

His essay on the Institute of France is more historical and narrative. It is crammed with information ; it deals with the history of his subject through the periods of the Revolution and Napoleon Bonaparte, and reveals a reality and camaraderie in the affairs of French literature and art such as are practically unthinkable for England.

But his essay on Manning is, of course, the centre of gravity in his book. He unites the three in one volume, simply because they happened to have been formed from three lectures delivered in 1911.

And Mr. Bodley, as spectator, had very great facilities for knowing the Cardinal. He, although a young man, was continually welcomed at Archbishop's House, and, in a way, to an intimacy that must have been very nearly unique. He sat with him night after night ; they gossiped pleasantly together of Oxford and London society and a thousand interests. It was almost certainly the Cardinal's wish that Mr. Bodley should have written his biography. And, to these unique opportunities, Mr. Bodley brought an unique power of observation and discernment. As a fine and delicate sketch the essay is superb. The old Cardinal lives and moves in the dark austere room with the malachite crucifix, and the "faded red skull-cap cocked over one eye-brow" : he utters his sharp little comments, he renews his Oxford days, he reads a line or two from a book he takes down from a shelf. Neither are the greater matters wanting. Mr. Bodley indicates the old man's passionate fight for great causes, his official dignity, his private quietness and simplicity, his boundless ambitions for the interests with which he identified himself. He was essentially a public man ; he was acting outwards, always—moulding, guiding, encouraging : he lived really in action ; in his privacy he was but reviewing his past, and meditating on his future. He was at home in the world of life ; his own rooms were but ante-chambers to life. All this is beautifully depicted in Mr. Bodley's pages, with wonderful art and balance. It is a thousand times more competent as a biography— if the object of a biography is to reveal a personality—than the official "Life." The old man really lives ; one would know how he would wish to be treated if he were to return to earth, and what comments he would make on the present affairs of England.

Yet it is exactly Mr. Bodley's extremely keen insight into a temperament with which he was at least intellectually in sympathy— a temperament, that is to say, that is patient of the kind of analysis in which Mr. Bodley excels— it is probably this very insight that is incapable of focusing itself upon other temperaments that have little in common with the Cardinal's ; and it is one, therefore, that probably missed certain characteristics in the very person he describes so admirably. All this is brought out very vividly in Mr. Bodley's treatment of Newman. He says, very justly, that "there was fundamental antagonism between Newman's temperament and Manning's." "If they had been both born Catholics," he continues, "both sent to a Roman seminary at an early age, or submitted to the same discipline for the priesthood— even then they would have fought had they crossed one another's paths in the course of their pious ministry." All this is entirely just, a reader of the two published biographies—the one so bitterly unfair, the other so luminously tender— would endorse every word. It is the more astonishing, then, that one so balanced and shrewd as is Mr. Bodley can continue to condemn so fiercely the temperament of Newman, and fail to see that just because he understood the one so well it would be at least probable that he would not understand the other, and that he should not have made allowances for this. "For Newman's subjective mind," he says, "the whole scheme of Christian economy, and perhaps even the whole scheme of the universe, had been organised for the saving of the soul of John Henry Newman. Manning's objective vision, on the contrary, put his own personality in the background." This is an amazing judgment to pass. It would be just as unfair, but no more, for a fanatical Newmanite to say, "Manning's self-love and self-confidence showed itself in his boundless ambitions and activities : Newman, on the other hand, showed his modesty and self-distrust chiefly by his retirement from the world." And again, Mr. Bodley compares, with scarcely disguised contempt, Newman's gentle upbringing at home, his love of Oriel Common-Room, and his quiet life at Birmingham, with Manning's captaincy of the Harrow Eleven, his strenuous Union speeches at Oxford, and his fierce fights at Westminster—implying that the former lived only for himself, and Manning for others. Of course the temperaments were different ; the whole world knows that, and the two protagonists, perhaps, best of all. Newman certainly found fault with Manning ; and Manning, as these pages show, found a delicate and gently spiteful pleasure in finding "ten distinct heresies . . . in the most widely-read works of Dr. Newman." But the pity is that men like Mr. Bodley who, on their own showing, are critics and observers rather than contestants, who stand (or ought to stand) above the dust of the fray, do not seem to understand their own partisanship, and should not be able to do justice to one character without injustice to the other. Both characters had a centre from which each worked, both had a circumference of activity; their methods were not the same, nor their ideals, but both served a common faith with whole-hearted loyalty. Mr. Bodley fails to do justice to this, and in his enthusiasm for one type is unable to understand the other.

* "Cardinal Manning, and other Essays." By J. E. C. Bodley 9s. (Longmans.)

For, after all, when all is said, when Newman's sensitiveness has been emphasized to the full, it remains that he was patient and obedient. Until the close of his life he remained in a certain obscurity, while Manning triumphed all along the line: the one received blow after blow, the other honour after honour. The one asked, at the worst, to be let alone, the other, at the worst, to be given his own way. It would have been more just, as well as more gracious, if Mr. Bodley had confessed his lack of sympathy with the more sensitive of the two natures and had said no more.

But, apart from those limitations, the essay is magnificent as a sketch and an analysis of a particular type of character— and the character of one, too, who has helped to mould the history of our own generation. There is but one more limitation—and that an inevitable one—the fact that the essayist was not a Catholic. Had he been so he might not only have understood the greatness of the author of the "Apologia," but have perceived, too, more of the secret motives of the great Cardinal whom he delights to honour. But, as he tells us, Manning never attempted, even, to press the Catholic religion upon his acceptance.

"THE BOOKMAN" PRIZE COMPETITIONS.

JANUARY, 1913.

Answers to these competitions (each on a separate sheet bearing the name and address of the sender) should be forwarded not later than the 15th of the month to

"The Prize Page," THE BOOKMAN, Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton, Warwick Square, E.C.

The date fixed above for sending in answers does not apply to Competitors resident abroad, except in the case of competition No. 3; answers from Foreign or Colonial readers for competitions 1, 2 and 4 (the subjects of these being the same each month) will be admissible to the first competitions that are adjudicated upon after the date of their receipt.

Each competitor may send in any number of attempts, provided each attempt is written on a separate sheet of paper.

- I.—A PRIZE OF ONE GUINEA is offered for the best original Lyric.
- II.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best quotation from English verse applicable to any review or the name of any author or book appearing in this number of THE BOOKMAN. Preference will be given to quotation of a humorous nature.
- III.—A PRIZE OF THREE NEW BOOKS is offered for the best original continuation of any Nursery Rhyme (in not more than twelve lines)—telling, for instance, what happened to Miss Muffet after the spider frightened her away.
- IV.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best review in not more than one hundred words of any recently published book. Competitors should give the names of authors and publishers at head of their reviews.
- V.—A COPY OF THE BOOKMAN will be sent post free for twelve months to the sender of the best suggestion for THE BOOKMAN Competitions. The Editor reserves the right to use any suggestion submitted.

RESULTS OF COMPETITIONS FOR DECEMBER.

- I.—The PRIZE OF ONE GUINEA for the best original Lyric is divided, and HALF A GUINEA is awarded to Miss Anita Lee, of 16, Mulgrave Street, Liverpool, and HALF A GUINEA to E. G. Buckeridge, of 5, Holly Village, Highgate, N., for the following:

"TO KEEP LOVE HOLY"

For me it is not in your eyes to gaze,
To take your hand, lead you by love lit ways,
I may not sully with a temporal touch
The lips so pure, the form I crave so much,
Throw wide the gate of longing—draw you in—
Have done with earth and cry "Ah, heaven begin!"
To wear your favour here or win you fame,
To die for you—this crown I cannot claim.

I may not even look into your face
And tell my love, but only pray for grace
That I must stand without, afar, apart,
And still the echoes of my lonely heart
To think of, dream of, live and feel for you
To love you, that is all that I may do,
Like distant gentle star to see you shine,
And while I wait, Oh God, thus may be mine—
"To keep love holy."

ANITA LEE.

LONDON IN FOG.

Fog on the streets— and romance at the heart of it,
Every street adventure, every house a mystery,
Windows lit like stars,
And the dim electric cars
Swaying down the fairway like lighted ships at sea

Fog on the streets— and London strange and beautiful
All her secret colour glowing fold on fold, Street lamps aflame
Like jewels in the haze,
All her open doorways shimmering with gold.

Fog on the streets— and London decked for carnival, Masking in the spirit as the soul of her would be,
London as she gleams
In the splendour of her dreams,
Venice of the water-ways, Athens of the sea.

E. G. BUCKERIDGE.

We select for printing :

• • • FORGIVE !

Forgive, dear love, the nameless little sins,
The sins which Love alone perceives as such :
The hand withdrawn, the unresponsive touch,
The little trifling things which mean so much,
Which lose their nothingness when Love begins,
And make or mar the guerdon which Love wins.

Forgive the hasty, unconsidered speech,
Spoken half in jest, but giving sudden pain :
The word unspoken which would have made things plain,
The eyes averted, which if turned again
To speak to thine in language Love doth teach,
Would have restored to harmony each with each.

For thy dear Love's sake, love, forgive all this,
And seal thy love's forgiveness with a kiss

Ah ! happy they who thus may plead for grace,
And even while pleading, know they are forgiven.
When Love with Pride successfully has striven,
And self-abasement to the soul has given
A blessed peace. Then lovers shall efface
All sense of wrong in one long deep embrace.

But Oh ! what anguish can more poignant be
Than of the heart which vainly longs to plead Forgiveness from the dead ? Shall the dead heed ?
We know not—but we trust they may indeed,
Being with Thee, Lord, see as Thou dost see,
And even like Thyself, most merciful be

We trust so—but alas we still know this ;
They cannot seal forgiveness with a kiss !

(G. E. Reece, Rose Cottage, Peterston-s-Ely, near Cardiff.)

A SONG OF ARCADIE.

In Arcadie, in Arcadie,
The blossom hangs on every tree,
A land of heather-haunted hills
And open moor and laughing rills,
Where all day long no sound is heard,
Save swish of grass and song of bird,
And drone of honey-heavy bee,
In Arcadie, in Arcadie

The gates of Arcadie are high,
Above a sentence meets the eye
Deep writ into the massive stone,
"No man may enter here alone"

For many moons I strove in vain
Yet never could an entrance gain,
'Tis only Cupid holds the key To Arcadie, to Arcadie.

Sweetheart, before it grows too late
Shall we not seek the Golden Gate,
And with the God of Love for guide
Explore the glowing country-side ?
Ah ! leave this world of everyday,
Where no one cares to laugh and play,
And wander hand in hand with me
In Arcadie, in Arcadie

(Dorothy Tweeddale, 8, Weld Road, Birkdale, Lanes.)

MADAM.

"Madam," say they, "died at noon ;
Hair just tinged with early snow,
And her forehead marked too soon
By the finger of life's woe "
I know better ; far away
In my youth's a burial stone
In its shadow, I to day
Linger silent and alone
And the date is plain to see—
"Marion May day '63 "

"Madam," say they, "keeps her pride,
Though she be but pallid clay "
Could I, stealing to her side,
Look upon her face to-day,—
There'd be little left to tell
My old tender sweetheart by Twenty years too late the knell
Tolls for parting agony
On her coffin lid should be—
"Marion May day '63 "

(Elsie Kendall, The Brush, Askrigg R.S.O., Yorkshire.)

The LYRIC Competition has again been rather disappointing in quality, though the number of entries has been perhaps larger than ever before. We specially commend the LYRICS sent in by Edmund Howard (Putney), Miss MacDonald (Bridge of Allan), R. N. Watson (Southport), F. M. L. (Cottingham), Miss A. E. Richardson (London, S.E.), Gertrude Pitt (Hampstead), M. C. Foulis (Chilton), Guilhemus G. Jackson (Northampton), Phyllis Tweeddale (Birkdale), Irene Wintle (Liverpool), Alice W. Linford (S. Tottenham) Mornice Mackenzie, M.A.

From a pen-and-ink sketch.

Lord Morley in his Library.

Lord Morley enters the House of Lords.

Drawn by G. R. Halkett and published in the Fall Ball Gazette.
Reproduced by kind permission of the Artist.

J. H. Langlois (Leeds), E. F. Seymour (Kilburn), T. Maynard (London, W.), G. B. Hardwick (Ealing), Bertram J. Saunders (Pontypridd), E. Summers (Dukinfield), Ethel Goodwin (Clapham), Collin Brooks (Southport), Constance Goodwin (Clapham), J. Berkely (Andover), Guern F. Newnham (Gillingham), E. Swanson (E. Finchley), H. R. Smith (Newcastle-on-Tyne), R. W. King (Catford), Francis Cocks (Uxbridge), G. M. Smith (Bristol), Doris Dean (Burnley), C. W. Turner (Brierfield), E. Irene Seaton (Dresden), G. J. Holme (Gl. Malvern), Ruth Ranken (Barnet), Agnes E. M. Baker (W. Hampstead), A. W. Jay (Devonport), Florence Bagster (Kendal), Miss B. T. Buggs (Edinburgh), Ivan Adair (Dublin), Alice Wise (Leicester), A. S. Bhandakar (Bombay), A. Lee, Junr (Southport), W. Hazard (Castlewellan), Alex. C. Welsh (Victoria, Australia), Miss G. M. Northcott (West Kirby), Rev. E. C. Lansdown (S. Woodford), Emily Kington (Blairgowrie), C. A. Renshaw (Sheffield), Eric P. Freeman (Bexley Heath), M. A. Newman (Framlingham), H. Bertram Howlett (Putney), S. Edwards (Sheffield), Sybil H. Graves (Bournemouth), Wilfred J. Grout (Folkestone), E. Gleave (St Helens), A. S. Barnard (Walsall), D. C. Yarrow (Glasgow), M. W. Nettleton (Huddersfield).

II.—The PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best quotation is awarded to Mr Charles Powell, of 290, Oxford Road, Manchester, for the following:

THE HABIT OF LETTERS (REVIEW BY FRANCIS BICKLEY)
"Here's yet a postscript"
SHAKESPEARE.—Twelfth Night.

We also select for printing:

THE VOICE FROM THE NIGHT BY CHARLES ERNEST STERRY. (George Allen & Co.)

"—Vocal are the noses
Of peasant and of king"

CHARLES STUART CALVERLEY.—Verses and Translations.

(F. Squires Cook, Drumholiston, Carrick Road, Ayr.)

THE SOUL OF GOLF BY P. A. VAILE

"And see there"

E'en the Parson's beginning to swear!"

R. H. BARHAM.—Ingoldsby Legends (Blondie Jack).

(Jessie Miller, Shaidarran House, Co. Londonderry.)

THE BIG FISH. BY H. B. MARRIOTT WATSON.
(Methuen & Co.)

"And still the wonder grew."

GOLDSMITH.—Deserted Village.

(Florence K. Robinson, Gibraltar Crescent, Parnell, Auckland, New Zealand.)

III.—This Competition was not particularly popular, but it was very close, and the winner only just managed to secure her prize intact. We award THREE NEW BOOKS to Miss Ethel R. Williams, of 6, Tyndall's Park Road, Clifton, Bristol, for the following New Year's Greeting to Mr. E. V. Lucas:

Serenest quiet, flame embroidered gloom,
The flash, on ordered shelves, of red and gold,
The after-flavour of a tale well told,
A dog or two asleep about the room;
The picture of the Dutchman's little maid,
Her underlip aguiver in a smile,
Lucas, be yours, for company the while
The gentlest essayist's beloved shade

We also specially commend the work sent in by Rev Edwin C. Lansdown (South Woodford, N.E.), G. F. A. Salmon (Penzance), Ellen L. Clutterbuck (Bromley, Kent), Isabel Lewis (Edinburgh), Leonard Harling (Skipton), Anne M. Wilcock (Scarborough), G. E. Wakerley (West Bridgford, Notts), J. Richard Ellaway (Basingstoke), A. S. Barnard (Walsall), Rev. F. Hern (Rowland's Castle, Hants), R. H. Kipling (Devonport), M. C. Jobson (Middleton-one-Row, Co. Durham), E. F. Seymour (Kilburn, N.W.), A. Clarke (High Wycombe), Albert Fuller (Cardiff), Horace W. Walker (Beeston), Ethel Goodwin (Clapham, S.W.), Ivan Adair (Dublin), Mrs. A. E. Wise (Leicester), Miss E. M. Northcott (West Kirby, Birkenhead), Emily Kington (Blairgowrie), James Edwin Ruddle (Trowbridge, Wilts), M. A. Newman (Framlingham), Miss I. J. Bryant (Ilminster), and Eveline Swanson (East Finchley, N.).

IV.—The PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best Review in not more than a hundred words is awarded to Miss Sybil Waller, of "Oriel Lodge," Wollstonecraft Road, Boscombe, Hants, for the following:

THE DAY BEFORE YESTERDAY. BY RICHARD MIDDLETON
(Unwin)

This book consists of slight studies of childhood, written with so rare a charm and such a real sympathy and understanding.

The Gladstone Biography Company (Unlimited)

Drawn by G. R. Halkett. Reproduced from Punch by kind permission of the Proprietors and of the Artist.

of a child's mind, that no child-lover should miss reading it. Not since "The Golden Age" of Mr. Kenneth Grahame have we come across anything which can approach it in its line. Mr. Middleton's writing is full of poetry, yet as entirely free from unhealthy sentimentality, as it is from the exaggerated coarseness by which in their desire for robustness and realism so many modern writers seem to think the normal schoolboy must necessarily be depicted.

We also select for printing :

THE COLLECTED VERSE OF RUDYARD KIPLING.
(Hodder & Stoughton.)

In this generous volume are gathered all those stirring poems of Kipling's that have blown like a bracing breeze into our national literature, and pioneered that new school of poetry which calls a spade a spade. Kipling does not wrap his verse in ultra-beautiful language, but shows us life's beauty, horror, and humour in clear-cut word-pictures that bite into the brain. We read the "Barrack Room Ballads" as though we had slipped into Tommy Atkins' skin; and all the poems have the same thrill of realism that makes them vital and unforgettable, a legacy for all time.

(Alan C. Fraser, Highlands, Dodington, Bridgwater.)

HELEN OF LANCASTER GATE. BY PHILIP GIBBS.
(Herbert and Daniel.)

Round a charming type of womanhood Mr Gibbs has written an eminently readable story. All the characters are delightfully human, and if we have not met them in real life, we can well believe that the author has done so. Helen's engagement to the Under Secretary for War is ended by her inability to fulfil it as well as by the financial disgrace of her father. Her marriage, her life with her husband, the charm of her little son; the loyal comradeship of "the other man", the return of her prodigal father—all are told with verve and sympathy.

(Mary Gillott, 45, Nottingham Road, Eastwood, Notts.)

THE PRIVATE LIFE OF HENRY MATTLAND. BY MORLEY ROBERTS. (Evelough Nash.)

Throughout this interesting, if not fascinating, book, the reader's mind is torn with the problem. Should it have been written, and if so, why in this particular manner? We see no reason why Gissing's tragic story should not be told, especially if it be the opinion that he "was sent to Hell for the purpose of saving souls", but we do object to the manner of the telling. The fictitious names are surely unnecessary, and leave one bewildered as to how much is truth and fiction, yet from Mr Roberts' standpoint he has written a moving story.

(G. E. Wakealey, 10, Chaworth Road, West Bridgford, Notts.)

Good reviews were also sent in by Miss M. C. Barnard (London, S.W.), N. Raghunathan (Madras, India), F. S. Fiv (Norwich), Miss B. O. Anderson (Scarborough),

Photo by London Stc

Lord Morley.

Mary Kingdom (Harlow, Essex), Leo Delcati (Cotnam, Bristol), J. Drummond C. Monfrie (Putney, S.W.), Gertrude Pitt (Hampstead, N.W.), D. Pratt (Chatteris), A. Gordon Fletcher (Erdington, Birmingham), Bertram J. Saunders (Pontypriid), Agnes Macaulay (Great Malvern), E. Chadwick (Derby), M. Fergusson (Chester), Miss Van der Pant (Highgate, N.), Lottie Hoskins (Moseley, Birmingham), Miss G. M. Northcott (West Kirby, Birkenhead), Emily Kingston (Blairgowrie), M. A. Newman (Badingham), and A. A. Chadwick (Derby).

V. -The PRIZE OF ONE YEAR'S SUBSCRIPTION TO "THE BOOKMAN" is awarded to the Rev. F. Horn, Rowland's Castle, Hants.

DISRAELI CONTINUED.<sup>1</sup>

BY WALTER SICHEL

IT is indeed pathetic to read the sentence in the preface which tells us that this volume "was delayed by reasons of health." Hardly had it appeared than the author's untimely end added a sense of catastrophe. Not only has the pen dropped from his hand, not only is the work broken off, but that hand can write no more and the work itself is unfinished. Whoever may be privileged to pursue it will have to tone down somewhat of individuality if the style is to remain impersonal. And if its best qualities are to be prolonged, a certain tenseness and terseness must be shown also. But surely other qualities there are in accord with a theme so vibrating. Nor is it ungracious to note that some lack of them causes defects which are actual obstacles—imperfections, not only of sympathy but of understanding, and of atmosphere even where colour might bewilder.

* "The Life of Benjamin Disraeli, Earl of Beaconsfield" By William Flavel Monypenny. Vol. II., 1837-1846, 1912. 12s. net. (London, John Murray.)

For the initiated (always few) this second volume displays more of these than the first. In the first there were at least the inner clues of the "mutilated diary" to guide us, nor were we yet confronted by that crowded period of action which so readily lends itself to maps rather than pictures—to description, even of temperaments. In this very regard an excerpt from an autobiography in a recent catalogue would have shed some light (though an alert perceptiveness might have forestalled it) on the passio of the Representative, and perhaps on the meaning of "Vivian Grey"†. In the second, gaps at times and misconceptions tend to block out the true back-scenes. Nor is there enough width and completeness of view; the book almost seems to grow as it goes. And often too there is that sort of solemn head-shaking, that "candid friendship," that "point-a-moral" manner which make neither for depth nor vividness. We miss that centrality of outlook in which Disraeli delighted, the sole centralisation, indeed, that as political thinker he ever favoured. Moreover, there is overmuch of the didactic. When Disraeli seems to trip, much that would modify assumptions is allowed to pass; and, involuntarily, he is turned into an "awful example," black by the side of the lily-white Peel. He is absolved, it is true (and Peel absolves him), from the worn count of vindictiveness, but he is charged (as Peel never charged him)—and without exhaustive scrutiny—with "falsehood." His intrinsic bigness of soul, his dæmonic force and impelling motives are too little regarded. Granted that great men sometimes stoop, how seldom they stoop for trifles. Greatness, of course, must not be thrust on us, but no yard-measures of Lilliput will take the due stature of genius.

† Cf. a most interesting letter of retrospect (in Mr. Daniell's recent catalogue) from Lord Beaconsfield to Mr. J. Hanney, dated December 17th, 1862. "I caught hold of the secret—anything political and which concerned Mr. Canning interested me. I rather, I dare say very intrusively, pushed myself into their affairs; but boys are pardoned and often encouraged. I saw some opening to public life and some connection with an eminent leader with whom I sympathised. It is not now very easy to get into Parliament, in those days it was still more difficult."

The nine years of this period were critical for Disraeli himself as for the country. The storm and stress of his youth were over, he had lived through many romances, out of which he had always created new worlds of his own, and his marriage to the widow of his colleague was to prove one of mutual devotion, as deep as it was delicate. She, as he recorded in the desolation of her death, was the most cheerful and the most courageous of women, while not many years earlier she assured a friend that through his tenderness her life had been one long scene of happiness. These pages reveal not only his love-letters (hers have perished) and their attendant, his Byronic tragedy of "Alarcos," but also the characteristic missive, or rather the strange proclamation, that he addressed to her on a misunderstanding which was soon ended. He fancied that she had reproached him with interested motives. He was perfectly frank with her:

"I avow when I made my advances to you I was influenced by no romantic feelings. . . . I was not blind to worldly advantages . . . but I had already proved that my heart was not to be purchased. I found you in sorrow and that heart was touched. I found you, as I thought, amiable, tender, and yet elate and gifted with no ordinary mind. . . . Now for your fortune; I write the sheer truth. . . . It could not benefit me in the slightest degree. . . . To eat and sleep in that house, and nominally to call it mine—these could only be objects for a penniless adventurer. Was this an inducement for me to sacrifice my sweet liberty? . . . No, when, months ago, I told you one day that there was only one link between us, I felt that my heart was inextricably engaged to you. . . . From that moment I devoted to you all the passion of my being. By heavens, as far as worldly interests are concerned, your alliance could not benefit me. All that society can offer is at my command. I can live, as I live, without disgrace till the inevitable progress of events [mark, here, the Man of Destiny] gives me that independence which is all I require. I have entered into these ungracious details because you reproached me with my interested views. . . . Not all the gold of Ophir should ever lead me to the altar. Far different are the qualities which I require in the sweet participator of my existence. My nature demands that my life should be perpetual love. . . . Triumph—I seek not to conceal my state. It is not sorrow, it is not wretchedness, it is anguish, it is the endurance of that pang which is the passing characteristic of agony. . . . My heart outraged, my pride wounded, my honour nearly tainted. . . .

Farewell. . . . For a few years you may flutter in some frivolous circle, but the time will come when you will sigh for any heart that could be fond. . . . then you will recall . . . the passionate heart that you have forfeited and the genius you have betrayed."

It shows a self-centred sensitiveness worthy of "Count Alarcos." Her answer was immediate:

"For God's sake come to me. I am ill and almost distracted. I will answer all you wish. I never desired you to leave the house, or implied or thought a word about money. I received a most distressing letter, and you left me at the moment, not knowing. . . . I have not been a widow a year. . . . I am devoted to you."

Could the Infanta Solisa have done more? Mrs. Wyndham Lewis did—she made a précis of contrasts between their respective characters which is not the least remarkable piece of new matter in the book. Suffice it here to say that she finds him with "no self-love," "no vanity," but "conceited"; never "irritable," yet "bad-humoured"; "very calm," with "manners grave and almost sad"; "very patient, very studious, very generous"; "often says what he does not think"; "it is impossible to find out who he likes and dislikes from his manner. He does not show his feelings; "seldom amused"; to be depended on to a certain degree (while she is "not to be depended on"); "his whole soul . . . devoted to politics and ambition;" "a genius." Nor should it be omitted that Mrs. Disraeli was deeply attached to the blind old father and the gifted sister at Bradenham. These are the gentler voices.

"Genius" includes those creative and intuitive powers and that commanding will which this decade developed both in life and literature. It brought him into relation with repeated crises those social and intellectual upheavals which had so long simmered under the smooth film of stock shibboleths. What distinguishes his attitude towards them is his vision and prevision, his absolute disregard of unessentials, an imagination that not only read but made the future, and the natural derivation of outlook and faculty from a temperament steeped in the atmosphere of history and inheritance. We watch the dramatic moment of his maiden speech, so well given here—one of those half-failures on which he founded his triumphs; and four years later, when a great occasion arose which was grudgingly denied to him, we again watch him sighing to his wife of the isolation forced on all but the oligarchs by Peel's political absolutism. This, however, was ere the group of "Young England" had gravitated to enthusiasm Disraeli and his convictions on the "Condition of England" question in town and country. And as we watch him the "man of destiny" rises always before us, rehearsing the dreams of his boyhood in tones of soliloquy, and translating them into deeds, after long brooding, by a certain spring of spirit suddenly set in motion. "Alroy," that early romance, which with "Contarini," (and much later "Tancred"), holds the core of his being, contains a characteristic passage in this connection:

"A great career, though baulked of its end, is still a landmark of human energy. Failure, when sublime, is not without its purpose. Great deeds are great legacies, and work with wondrous usury. By what man has done we learn what man can do, and gauge the power and prospects of our race."

This, published in 1833, finds its echo in that inspiring speech of 1844 which he delivered to the "trustees of posterity" at the Manchester Athenæum, and which, oddly enough, escapes the pages under review :

" . . . They (the youth of Cottonopolis) will be called upon to perform duties—great duties. I, for one, wish . . . that they may be performed greatly. I give to them that counsel which I have ever given to youth, and which I believe to be the wisest and best. I tell them to aspire. I believe that the man who does not look up will look down ; and that the spirit that does not dare to soar is destined perhaps to grovel."

The time came when they had to hear him, and not only at St. Stephen's, as one who, though a clear-sighted leader and scathing satirist, was at root a dreamer and a seer—one of whom the brilliant George Smythe addressed the homage—as we here first learn—of "Thank God, I have a faith at last!" It was after "Coningsby": "I never read anything, thought of anything, felt anything, believed in anything before."

There was much warm blood in Disraeli's romantic irony, and Mr. Monypenny has granted his "remarkable power of entering into the lives and feelings of the poor." There is no doubt now as to Disraeli's zeal for the betterment of toil—ever through social sympathy (noblesse oblige) rather than by the rigid constraint of "State" patterns. His love of the people was never socialistic, and ever he wished to plant the cutting of democracy on the soil, to nationalise and naturalise it, instead of assimilating it to the detached democracy of the Continent. Indeed, he always viewed everything from the standpoint of national character expressing itself in infinitely expansive institutions, and he detested the class legislation of demagogues. He dared Peel's displeasure by twice avowing a sympathy with the Chartists, though never with Chartism, and in the mid-'forties, too, he deprecated the Government's harshness. These ideas he was to pursue persistently in the 'fifties, though even now they found expression in relation alike to social reform and to the Corn Laws.

Both for him were problems not so much economical as national and social. He had opposed the new Poor Laws so early as 1832 and had even then been warned to hold his peace if he wished to succeed.

Now, again, both on this matter and on factory legislation he displeased Peel by voting in the tiny minority. So with Ireland, which he understood by an historical and temperamental intuition ; and it could have been wished that a passage from the greatest of his Irish speeches had been cited which explains his retort to Gladstone's ironical praise of it some twenty-four years afterwards. Gladstone was now his "right honourable friend," a trusted prop of Peel, who had so much private principle and so little public pity—the pink of mercantile prestige, the man of ledgers out of gear with the man of letters, whose "element of wayward fantasy in character" Mr. Monypenny seems to have regarded as almost a moral weakness.

Disraeli created a new genre, not only the political but (as is readily forgotten) the social novel. Everyone will remember the countless passages in "Sybil" and "Coningsby" that at once embodied and inspired the attitude of "Young England"—for an attitude it was and not a system. While the Whig magnates with their tail of Manchester utilitarians and radical capitalists upheld laissez faire, "Young England" raised a desired protest that has borne fruit :

"There is no subject," he said, in a speech at Shrewsbury, in 1844, which Mr. Monypenny has done well to rescue, "There is no subject in which I have taken a deeper interest than in the condition of the working classes. Long before what is called the 'Condition of the people question' was discussed in the House of Commons I had employed my pen on the subject. I had long been aware that there was something rotten in the core of our social system, that . . . while wealth was increasing to a superabundance . . . the working classes, the creators of wealth, were steeped in the most abject poverty and gradually sinking into the deepest degradation."

There is no space to detail or even sketch the steps of what may be called the duel between him and Peel. It was not till after 1843, when he clearly discerned the symptoms of a preparation (as of vore) for a change of front, that he ceased to support one who had convinced himself of his monopoly in a revolution against which he had been sent to power. And then, as he was to be reminded, Disraeli began by giving a silent vote. In the February of 1844, Peel had actually complimented Disraeli on his Irish speech, and his sister wrote to Disraeli's wife that she wished :

"The next time Mr Disraeli sees my brother he would put out his hand to him. They are both reserved men and one must make the first advance ; the other would accept it most gladly."

Mr. Monypenny has hinted a doubt. I agree. The conflict was inevitable. It was one of temperaments, outlooks, destinies, circumstances, ambitions. One by one those dashing sluppies followed, at once brilliant and solid, that convulsed the country, and, though the Bill was carried, annihilated the dead Conservatism for which Peel stood. Disraeli foresaw, as the author well shows and illustrates, the dangers of over-competition and the probable results of a transfer of power. Every word has proved prophetic. He always maintained that to withdraw protection without alleviating burdens would dislocate labour and make for Government-centralisation. He has been proved right. Disraeli did not belittle Peel's true and great powers, but he denied that one so unimaginative could ever grapple with the future, and he called him the "unconscious parent" of agitation. His long tribute and classical analysis of Peel, in his "Life of Lord George Bentinck," well said that the great Minister had felt at the age of sixty "that the star of Manchester seemed to rise, as it were, from the sunset of Oxford."

Much of all the episodes, and especially as to Disraeli's social outlook, is admirably rendered, but parts of the novels seem to me to have been misunderstood and misinterpreted. I have no space for the world of wit and the wit of the world encountered in these pages, which portray the brilliant circle within which Disraeli always moved, nor for the two interesting meetings with Louis Philippe and the memorandum for the best means towards an entente cordiale which Disraeli drew up, and his letter to Palmerston in pursuance. Nor can more than a few lines be allowed for the "Peel Letter" episode, glanced at in passing, and handled at length elsewhere. Suffice it here to say, of the exaggerated charge in this book, that Disraeli's "falsehood in the House of Commons stands," that in the first place it has been reserved for this generation to make it, and in the second that Disraeli's cry of wounded pride in the letter to Peel, which is assumed to "solicit office," is, at the best, only partially answered by another letter which Mr. Monypenny regarded as its direct reply. This letter mainly addresses itself to circumstances of an unauthorised intermediary, and it was precisely this story that Disraeli adduced in the House of Commons in 1846 when—at Peel's taunt on his own night of triumph—he urged that the transaction never originated with him. Only thus much can here be condensed of an incident which needs further elucidation.

Benjamin Disraeli, 1840.

From a picture by A. E. Chalon, R.A., at Hughenden.
From "The Life of Lord Beaconsfield" (John Murray).

Disraeli's faults were never those of insincerity, though a mind less literal than his cannot be conceived. Rather they were those of an over-rigidity of ideas. And I may be pardoned for quoting a short summary in the miniature "Life" which accompanied a longer undertaking:

"All his faults were faults of intensity. Haunted by ideal pictures of life and destiny which he projected by an enormous will-power into action, he sometimes tended to a certain stiffness of ideas, though never to one of mere opinions. He was almost devoid of prejudice."

New Books.

MR. GALSWORTHY'S PLAYS.*

To the anxious watcher of Mr. Galsworthy's dramatic progress, it is something of a relief to learn from a note in his new volume that the three plays which it contains were not written in the order of their theatrical productions. Mr. Galsworthy's most ardent admirers must have felt considerable concern when it seemed as though the powers of the author of "Justice" had declined upon such immature stuff as "The Little Dream." Even now, we are far from feeling altogether reassured. We should have more faith in Mr. Galsworthy's artistic discretion, if we could learn that "The Little Dream" was the earliest of his dramatic adventures; written, say, at the age of nineteen; and that its recovery from the proper obscurity of its pigeon-hole was due to a momentary aberration of judgment on the part of its author. Its publication, and re-publication, however, would seem to indicate that Mr. Galsworthy still regards this, the feeblest of his offspring, with something of the indiscriminating regard of paternal tenderness. It is not because "The Little Dream" is different in kind from "Strife" and "Justice" that we feel such distaste for it. We have no wish to confine any artist within the limits of our theory of his field of activity. We should rejoice to think that Mr. Galsworthy had broken bounds, and discovered fresh woods and pastures new.

But "The Little Dream" is not even good in its own kind. On reading Mr. Galsworthy's "Poems," we realised that he had been denied the faculty of expressing himself in verse; and the lyrics in "The Little Dream" only confirm us in our judgment; while the play, as a whole, convinces us that Mr. Galsworthy has no genius for fantasy. "Strife" and "Justice" are the works of an articulate imagination. "Poems" and "The Little Dream" are the works of an articulate fancy. Mr. Galsworthy, dowered with the greater gift, has been denied the lesser; but it is curious that the possession of the one has not discovered the absence of the other to Mr. Galsworthy himself. It is strange to think that the possessor of such a keen and incisive insight into the characters and personalities of his fellows should have so little power of self-criticism. "The Eldest Son," too, though its theme would seem to bring it well within Mr. Galsworthy's recognised province, falls far short of his best work. It is a well-made play; and has, at least, all the negative virtues; but we expect something more than good construction and an absence of theatricality from Mr. Galsworthy. The distinction of his best work lies in the intensity of his realisation of character. In "The Eldest Son," the "characters" are shadowy and sketchy to a degree. It would seem as though their author had not completely realised them, before he allowed them to set foot on the stage. "The Eldest Son" is merely honest, workmanlike, undistinguished stuff. As the effort of a younger man, we should, doubtless, have hailed it as a work of considerable promise: though, perhaps after all there is more "promise" in a work that possesses positive virtues, than in one that is compact of merely negative virtues!

Photo by Hoppé

John Galsworthy

With "Justice" we are lifted at once on to a higher plane of achievement. The construction of the play may be faulty; and the significance of its dramatic crises may be too dependent on the operation of temporary circumstances, such as unjust laws; but, however time may "date" it, nothing can ever destroy the vitality of its characterisation: and though the passing of one or two legislative reforms may make an appendix of elucidatory notes a necessity in future editions, we confidently back Cabeson against the assault of time! It should be quite impossible to bury him under foot-notes. When he would seem to be almost snowed under, his kindly voice will be raised in its pathetic appeal to us to "all be jolly together." But our admiration for the creative genius of Mr. Galsworthy must not blind us to the danger his work runs in being so entirely concerned with the accidents of contemporary circumstance. Can a work of art, whose effectiveness is liable to be blunted by the passing of a mere Act of Parliament, justify its existence as a work of Art?

*Three Plays. By John Galsworthy. 5s. net. (Duckworth)

In "Justice" there is no clash of character. Falder is a man fighting a machine: and when the machine falls to pieces the conflict will need a deal of technical explanation. It is not always easy for us to re-construct imaginatively the comparatively primitive machinery against which men have had to fight in the past, but we think it would be well-nigh impossible for any one in the future to re-construct the elaborate and incredible machinery of our present day legislation.

However, it is scarcely our business to speculate on the perspicuity of posterity; and it is more to the purpose to record our profound appreciation of this intensely moving drama. We have read "Justice," again and again, and each time with a keener zest. Our only regret is that we have never had the good fortune to see it on the stage. That is a great experience in store for us. But there is one even greater which we await with equal confidence—the production of a play by Mr. Galsworthy in which the dramatic crisis is lifted high above the clash of contemporary circumstance.

WILFRID WILSON GIBSON.

STEVENSON AGAIN.*

The publication of the Swanston Edition of R. L. Stevenson's Works is now completed by the issue of a final batch of five volumes, and those two thousand happy subscribers who doubtless regard with complacency that red-coat rank now finally mustered on the bookshelf are to be congratulated on the possession of the most comprehensive edition of Stevenson yet published. His collected work has been, and may yet again be, excelled in respect of luxurious externalities, but so far as the matter is concerned, it is inconceivable that Stevenson will ever get a more complete and satisfactory presentation. Possibly some day there may be an augmentation of his Letters, whereof a considerable body is understood to be extant that has not yet, for one reason or another, been published, but the roll of all his literary achievements is now complete, though Mr. Francis Watt, in a recent book on Edinburgh, hints at an early novel called "Maggie Arnot," concerned with the Edinburgh underworld of Stevenson's youth. It is said to have been destroyed on the advice of pious friends, and doubtless wisely. Nothing is more remarkable in the relations of the novelist and the band of literary friends and correspondents who wet-nursed his genius than the unerring judgment with which they pounced upon his failures and ruthlessly condemned them.

* "The Swanston Stevenson," Vol. XXI.: "The Story of a Lie"—"The Merry Men"—"Olalla"—"Heathercat"—"The Great North Road"—"The Young Chevalier"—"Fables." Vol. XXII.: "Juvenilia," and "Other Papers."—"The Davos Press." Vols. XXIII.-XXV.: "The Complete Series of Letters," edited with Notes, by Sir Sidney Colvin.—Index of Titles. 6s. net each. (Chatto & Windus.)

Two out of the five concluding volumes which now appear, enshrine the "Juvenilia" of Stevenson, a number of examples of those prankish paper-games with which he boyishly indulged himself all his days, and three truncated portions of stories for which the initial inspiration failed after a few chapters had been written. Nobody will regret now that the first juvenile essays of Stevenson have been published, though he was, himself, very apprehensive about the first suggestion to include them in the Edinburgh edition. "I see with alarm," he wrote, "the proposal to print 'Juvenilia.' Does it not seem to you taking myself a little too much as Grandfather William?" There, again, the judgment of his friends over-ruled him; the best of the "Juvenilia" was published without regard for his diffidence, even "The Pentland Rising," long previously withdrawn from circulation at his father's cost. "I abominate and reject the idea of reprinting 'The Pentland Rising,'" he wrote. "For God's sake let me get buried first!" But indeed there was no reason for his sensitiveness with regard to this particular piece; "The Pentland Rising" is quite a creditable effort for a youth of sixteen. Already the touch of style was in his pen: "Poor old man!" he wrote of Andrew Murray, "he had outlived all joy. Had he lived longer he would have seen increasing torment and increasing woe; he would have seen the clouds, then but gathering in mist, cast a more than midnight darkness over his native hills, and have fallen a victim to those bloody persecutions which, later, sent their red memorials to the sea by many a burn."

"The Story of a Lie," is in some respects the least distinguished of his "contes"; it lacks his crispness and a score of his other individual qualities; it might have been done by anybody. That it was done at all is the surprising thing. He wrote it in the steerage of an Anchor liner on his way to California as amateur emigrant, weak in body and distressed in mind, having severed for the time the difficult paternal and filial relations which suggested the keynote of the story, and embarked upon what was unquestionably the most hazardous and solemn adventure of his life. In much better spirit, and in happier circumstances was "The Merry Men" written two or three years later at Pitlochry, the first of his tales with Scotland for the venue. No one else seems to have been much impressed with "The Merry Men" at the time of its first appearance, but the author intuitively realised that he had rediscovered Scotland and hit upon a district and an atmosphere pregnant with possibilities. "I like it much above all my other attempts at story-writing," he wrote to Sidney Colvin. "If ever I shall make a hit, I have the line now, as I believe." It remains the most striking evidence of Stevenson's skill to start a story with nothing more than a vague atmosphere to be expressed, and finish it clothed upon with the appropriate character and incident.

R.L.S. spearing fish in the bow of the schooner "Equator."

From "The Works of Stevenson," Swanston Edition (Chatto & Windus).

"Heathercat," "The Great North Road," and "The Young Chevalier," never got finished, nor even thoroughly under way, for various reasons. We lost nothing, it may be guessed, from the "petering out" of "The Great North Road" after six or seven chapters had been done; at the best it could never have been more than an indifferent piece of skeltery. "Heathercat"—suggested by some passages in "Fountainhall's Decisions" which was to have been a romance of the Cameronian days and the Darian adventure, was started in 1892, a year in which his working powers were not up to their usual mark and occasional signs of inward depression began to appear in his correspondence. It looks as if he were now paying the penalty for his Samoan Abbotsford and flurried attacks upon too many schemes at once. He had half a dozen stories on the stocks. Power lies in concentration. At all events "Heathercat" remains a torso, also "The Young Chevalier"; those fragments we could have cheerfully done without to secure a completed "Weir of Hermiston."

For the first time in any completed edition, the Vailima Letters and the Letters of Stevenson to his family and friends are brought together in their proper chronological sequence. Of the peculiar and abiding charm of them—the philosophy, the humour, the self-revelation of them—every reader of Stevenson is gratefully aware. They enormously aid in the conception of his character and aims as a man of letters, and so are an essential and appropriate culmination to the Swanston Edition.

NEIL MUNRO.

POETRY.*

One of the most interesting books before me is the one bearing the name of Tennyson. Not that Mr. Tennyson achieves a great deal; for when he is most perfect he is usually least original, as, for example, in "Aspirations":

"For that Thou pointest further still
Than that dumb hand upon the hour,
Nor givest the boon to sap the will,
I thank Thee, wise and tender power.

* "A Legend of Old Persia and other Poems." By A. B. S. Tennyson. 5s. net. (Heinemann)

"The Elf." A Magazine of Drawing and Writing. By James Guthrie, of Flansham, near Bognor. 21s. net.

"Nature and other Poems." By Alfred Williams. 2s. 6d. net. (Erskine Macdonald)

"Enchantments." By John Gurdon. 2s. 6d. net. (Erskine Macdonald.)

"Exodus, and other Poems." By Martin D. Armstrong. 1s. 6d. net. (Lynwood)

"Egypt and other Poems." By Francis Coult. 3s. 6d. net. (Lanc.)

"A Dream of Daffodils." By H. D. Lowry. Arranged for Press by G. F. Matheson and C. A. Dawson Scott. 2s. 6d. (Glaisher)

"King Fialar." By Johan Ludvig Runeberg. Translated by Eirikz Magnusson. 5s. net. (Dent)

"The Poem Book of the Gael." Selected and Edited by Eleanor Hull. 6s. net. (Chatto & Windus)

"Shepherd Songs of Elizabethan England: A Pastoral Garland." By Adelaide L. J. Gosset. 5s. net. (Constable.)

"For that Thou givest my soul some pride,
Not grudging sorrow for a mate,
For this my wild and lovely bride
I thank Thee, just, compassionate.

"For that Thou givest my soul some strength
Of that high strength which rules the stars,
To brave the time and wait the length,
I bless Thy name and kiss my scars."

In his more characteristic poems, which are in the main narrative, his touch is more uncertain and the final impression less definite. In fact it is impossible without a multitude of quotations to say what it is that at once disappoints and promises in this book. But one thing is certain, that Mr. Tennyson has a natural bent which only poetry can satisfy. He has character and original colour. He has also a gift of words and rhythms, which almost always saves him both from commonplace and from artificiality. A few harsh inversions only mar a style of unusually easy vocabulary and construction. The difficulty is that it too seldom culminates unless with the help of a tale, often a moral tale. When his temperamental lightness—at present often taking the form of flightiness—really gets free expression Mr. Tennyson may be expected to do remarkable things.

Another poet who often emerges from his words as if peering out at us between them is Mr. James Guthrie, who has just published a new instalment of "The Elf." This is a book of prose and verse and drawing by himself, which he has issued in parts for several years. The pictures instantly announce a distinct individuality, a distinct and rare beauty, which has now reached a masterly expression. The poems are more shy but reveal again and again in moments of delicious accent the same individuality and beauty.

Neither Mr. Guthrie nor Mr. Tennyson quite represents himself in words. Mr. Alfred Williams does still less: he uses them only as counters which are clearly only a nominal equivalent of the ecstasy and aspiration behind them, of that experience of life on the downs, in a Wiltshire village, and by a Swindon forge, which enables him to say:

"I have drawn a strange breath, I have smelt life with my nostrils,
I have imbibed secrets, I have drunk at the well of mystery;
I have seen Beauty playing with her sisters under the trees in the meadows,
And naked Love, purer than a lily, bathing in the sunlight . . ."

His work at its best has the passionate, throbbing purity of the later Richard Jefferies; but with a quieter sensuousness and a metrical resemblance to Whitman and the Blake of the Prophetic Books. His "winter," one of the completest of his poems, is like a mediæval Celtic poem of description and reflection. One verse of one poem, "After the Rain," shows at once what he feels and what he can express:

"After the rain,
The hills show brighter, their green slopes,
Washed with the essence, purer, clearer,
Are lovelier, sweeter, plainer, nearer,
Life stirs within us, and our hopes
Kindling in the heart and brain,
Forthwith a rosier colouring assume,
Earth is studded o'er with bloom,
Young we grow, we know not how,
Banished every toil and pain,
As we see the red sun dipping,
O'er the meadows tripping, tripping,
After the rain."

As he says himself, nobody will go to him for "tricks of fancy and unnatural thought," but for natural desires and satisfactions or rather, an inadequate, but not deceptive, equivalent of them in verse.

Mr. Gurdon has a much more assured style, but though professedly a poet of passion he is less individual. Mr. Gurdon has already written a tragedy on the lines of "Atalanta in Calydon" and includes in this volume a "prologue written for the commemorative performance at the Lyceum Theatre of 'Atalanta in Calydon,' April 4th, 1911." As might therefore be expected words are for him.

a lordly decoration of thought and feeling. He seeks not to communicate something but to create certain profound simple impressions, as of farewell, of despair, of satiety, etc. He attains a level of excellence, but not many days after reading:

"Close nestle my lips in the curve of your throat
Where sweet fragrances dwell as of amber, or seem
As the scent of the moon-coloured lilies that float
On the waters of dream . . ."

it will be difficult to distinguish it in memory from other work of this class.

Mr. Armstrong has similar aims but a more diffuse manner and fewer cries of agony and despair. He aims at a legitimate but not quite relevant or necessary grandeur, and for the present succeeds best in this sonnet on "The Temples at Paestum":

"Stranded like wind-calmed galleons on the plain
They lie between the mountains and the sea,
Where pilgrim years bring gifts of sun and rain
To Peace, twin-sister of Eternity

"There among fields of deathly asphodels
They stand serene: the ignoble and the vain
Passed with their makers: still within them dwells
Mankind's divinity that shall remain.

"Civilization, kingdoms, centuries,
Life, death and love, ambition and despair,
Passing, as empty barges down a stream,
Leave them august, like sleeping deities.
Nature herself, the ageless, ever fair,
Has aged and sunk into a broken dream"

It is as difficult to be original as it is to be quite sincere in this strain, but there is a genuine enthusiasm in Mr. Armstrong for the sea, for antiquity, for the wind, for revolt, for J. S. Bach, which makes it a pleasure to meet his book.

Mr. Coutts also is of this class and has already achieved things which he cannot hope to surpass without a rebirth. He never pretends to regard words as mere counters. The word "incomparable," e.g., is a good thing in itself to him, or he would not say:

"In that incomparable day,
The time of strong impetuous youth"

The three epithets convey only Mr. Coutts' admiration of youth and do not distinguish him from the multitude who agree with him. His new book is an admirable series of similar grand draperies cast over thoughts and fancies of no extraordinary kind.

H. D. Lowry's fame does not gain by the publication of these "last poems," but the many admirers of "The Hundred Windows," will be glad to have the portrait and Mr. Edgar A. Preston's memoir of the author.

Runeberg's poem is a long simple narrative in ballad style and with a ballad subject. Mr. Magnusson's translation reveals the heroic skeleton of it, but being in verse, and that not masterly, it cannot do much more. A prose rendering must have proved far more valuable. At the same time the poem is powerful enough to penetrate any disguise and it can be read through at a sitting with pleasure.

Miss Eleanor Hull, the editor of "The Cuichullin Sign," etc., has drawn upon great and abundant treasures for this new anthology of Irish Gaelic poetry. The verse translations are by a number of distinguished men, living and dead, but I could wish they had all been in plain prose, which is always capable of revealing the native sweetness and strength of Irish lyric, as Messrs. Kuno Meyer and Douglas Hyde have testified. But there is no anthology half as welcome as this is, and none so necessary.

The same cannot be said of "Shepherd Songs." It was not a necessary thing to do, but by bringing together "workaday," "holiday" and "passionate" shepherds it may further in some degree the true understanding of the pastoral convention. It includes a number of beautiful things in a form suitable for presentation.

EDWARD THOMAS.

TOBY'S SECOND INNINGS.*

"Toby M.P.'s" second instalment of reminiscences will attract a wide circle of readers who remember the flavour of the first instalment. Those who have their doubts as to the capacity of the genial showman for collecting a troupe equal to his first one may be at once reassured. It is true there are some dull shows among the many engrossing "turns." There are even some repetitions. We hear twice over how much Mr. W. H. Smith would have given to be able to resign the Leadership of the House, and the circumstances of Lord Randolph Churchill's resignation are hammered into us relentlessly. There is, too, some little lack of the sense of proportion. We experience scarcely a flutter of interest in the discussion whether Mr. Gladstone did right to resign, when he was beaten in the elections after the first Home Rule Bill. And, speaking

Sir Toby, M.P.

By E. T. Reed.
Reproduced from Punch by permission of the Proprietors.
From "Forty Years in the Wilderness," by Sir H. W. Lucy. (Smith, Elder.)

generally, it may be said that the political side of the reminiscences is the least interesting.

Yet even here there are not wanting those suggestions and half revelations which are so genuinely and appetisingly tantalizing. Those who are not in the secret would give much to know who the distinguished lady was, who, meeting Lord Randolph in St. James' Street, when he thought the Cabinet would be driven to ask him to withdraw his resignation for want of a successor, put the very pertinent question: "What about Goschen?" Who again was it who "wore the cornflower of a chequered life?" In a lesser degree our curiosity is piqued as to the identity of the young lady who sang before Queen Victoria and reduced her to tears with a rendering of "The Wearin' of the Green." This anecdote perhaps exhibits the remembrancer at his best, for here he is in a position to correct a popular version of a story.

* "Forty Years in the Wilderness. More Passages by the Way." By Sir Henry W. Lucy 10s. 6d. net. (Smith, Elder.)

Although Lord Charles Beresford is now a parliamentarian, he "was not ever thus." The main current of his life has given St. Stephens a wide berth. There is no inconsistency then in asserting that a volume which is weakest on its parliamentary side is strongest in its stories of the breezy Admiral. We seem to be back in "Tom Cringle's Log" when we read of the jolly midshipman, as he was then, lassoing the legs of the conductor in a Peruvian opera house, as the said legs depended through the ceiling into the room below. Very characteristic, too, of the Admiral is his message from Gibraltar in reference to the passing of Rodjestvensky's fleet after the Dogger Bank outrage: "Most awkward mistake: awfully sorry. Have blown up the Russian Fleet: thought they were trawlers." But the hero of these stories is exhibited in his most delightful mood by the narrative of his dealings with the rogue "Tom Fat." That narrative deserves a place in all collections of tales for the inspiration of youth.

A somewhat unusual aspect is placed upon the acquisition of the Suez Canal shares, and if this version is correct, which we have no reason to doubt, Mr. Greenwood will be compelled to share the honour usually bestowed upon him with a certain banker. Exception may perhaps be taken to the tone of one or two references to Queen Victoria, and no good purpose is served by revising public house gossip to the detriment of Lady Beaconsfield. It must be allowed, however, that Sir Henry Lucy by no means confines his criticisms to those persons who are not of his way of thinking. Mr. Labouchere's reputation, for example, will certainly not be enhanced by these reminiscences. A professional plotter and mischief-maker, as the author represents him, may be possessed of all kinds of personal virtues, but those who have the best interests of their country at heart will be slow to award him a niche in the National Valhalla. But as we implied before, it is something of a relief to get away from the close atmosphere of the House of Commons, and to feel ourselves transported to the windy wastes of Kurdistan, there to behold Mr. Palgrave, the explorer, furtively stealing out of his tent at night to eat the sacred onions. Even a particularly gruesome and unusual ghost story seems to have more reality and kinship to life than these intrigues at St. Stephens.

W. A. F.

SCOTTISH HISTORY.*

The author of this attractive volume came to Scotland many years ago as ignorant of the history as he was of the countryside. In the spirit of inquiry he has wandered down many by-ways of romance, plucking here and there such flowers as took his fancy.

In "By-paths of Scottish History" Mr. Barbé has chosen a somewhat unfortunate title, since, out of twenty papers, six are devoted to that most unhappy of queens, Mary Stuart, and her four Marys, and another to her son, James VI. The contents of the book otherwise are sidelights on the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and when writing on such subjects as "The Isle of May," "The Invasion of Ailsa Craig" and "The Old Scottish Army," Mr. Barbé is entertaining, while in "Master Randolphe's Fantaisie" and "The Song of Mary Stuart" he is more than a pleasant companion. From the point of view of historical importance the last paper is the most valuable in the book and deserving of our attention. That "The Song of Mary Stuart" was not the work of the Queen has long been suspected for a variety of reasons, but that Brantôme should have composed it, and hidden his identity, may be claimed as original.

The sketch devoted to Queen Mary and her great beauty will appeal to every sympathiser with that most romantic of women. The author has examined several hundred engravings of the Queen and expresses disappointment with all. But that problem must ever remain a mystery, and certainly the Morton portrait at the beginning of the book only deepens our perplexity; for who would have the courage to say that the Queen who broke so many hearts was not beautiful?

* "In By-paths of Scottish History." By Louis Barbé. ros. 6d. net. (Blackie.)

Here is a brief and touching paragraph of her last hour. "According to one account the Queen of Scots wore black, according to another auburn ringlets, on the morning of her execution. Both, however, agree in this, that when the false covering fell she appeared as grey as if she had been sixty and ten years old."

She was also "of a full figure, and became actually stout in later life"; so stout, that she had "a double chin."

One would prefer to pass on and retain the fairer, timeless picture of her buoyant youth, like a flower in the grey scil of Scotland, and remember her great spirit and how she wept (she often wept) that she could not lie out on the bare ground like the men.

In the sketches of her four companions, the famous Marys (two of whom, Mary Carmichael and Mary Hamilton, should be rightly called Mary Fleming and Mary Livingstone), Mr. Barbé has treated each character separately, and has taken us beyond history into the solitude of their future, when the Queen had gone to England and when clouds gathered, only too soon, about their happiness. Old age brought as little peace to some of the Marys as to their fair mistress.

Of the remaining papers, such as "Riotous Glasgow," "Edinburgh and Her Patron Saint" and "Loretto," there is little to be said. They are slight sketches on obscure subjects, mere fleeting footnotes to local history, more suited for a periodical than the greater dignity of such a large and elegant volume as this.

The last article, "The Story of the Long Tail Myth," must feel considerably lost in its present company. Despite Mr. Barbé's sturdy defence of its presence, we are convinced that by no conceivable by-path, no matter how secret, could it be traced to Scotland. However, we do not wish to cross swords with the author over that, as — with the exception of "The Song of Mary Stuart" — it is perhaps the most absorbing and enticing of his wares.

In short, this is certainly a book to read. In the making of such books as this only such writers as Andrew Lang know the qualities that are indispensable, but one would imagine that a combination of expert research and a glowing pen go a long way.

And Mr. Barbé has the sympathetic mind. Were he to retrace his footsteps (we speak only in metaphor), and follow the Scot in France, who knows what might not come to light? He is peculiarly suited for such a study, where his nationality and his knowledge of Scottish History should prove an invaluable alliance.

F. W.

THE MODEL EMPLOYER.*

Professor Ashley says rightly that the experiments described in this book are "full of valuable suggestion" — to the business man, and no less to those who look to the State, or to the great union or Syndicate as the future ruler of industry. Bournville, for it is of Bournville Mr. Edward Cadbury writes, is one of our present day models of industrial organization an example of what may be done when the aim of the employer is "a combination of business efficiency together with an all-round development of the workers as individuals and citizens." The success on the business side is easily proved. In 1880 the number of employees was 303, at the end of 1911 it was 6,182. That "the loyalty of the worker to his own class and its organizations" has not been lessened in the Bournville "atmosphere and spirit of co-operation and good-will," we take for granted since trade unions are encouraged by the firm. Mr. Edward

* Experiments in Industrial Organization. By Edward Cadbury. With a preface by W. J. Ashley, Ph.D. 5s. net. (Longmans.)

Cadbury, indeed, notes that there is a distinct "improvement" in trade-unionism:

"The better education of the employees is beginning to have its effect. There are now in the works strong branches of various unions, and the membership is increasing steadily. This sign of awakening industrial consciousness is found also amongst the girls, and a branch of the National Federation of Women Workers has been established."

• We have not space here to describe all that is told in this book. People who really want to know what can be done in these days of keen foreign competition and "social unrest" by an enlightened captain of industry must read "Experiments in Industrial Organization" for themselves. They will not be disappointed. For whether it is the selection or the education of employees, the discipline of the works, the methods of remuneration and organization, the provisions for health and safety, or the industrial conditions that are explained, it is all of interest, informing and illuminative.

THE WORLD'S END.*

From Pole to Pole—so long a household phrase with us—will, apparently, soon be Mr Amundsen's designation. Even in these days of wonderful transit it seems to be almost unbelievable that one man should go so far, should compass the whole, wide world. "Intrepid Explorer" has lost the grip, the sense of its old meaning. We want a new term, a stronger phrase for these Amundsens, Shackletons, Scotts, Pearys and their kind. For what can now be expected from the latest Pole-discoverer but that he will reach the most northerly point of this planet just as he and his companions have gained the most southerly, although, decidedly, not with the same comparative ease and certainty, because the varying conditions make that impossible. We must remember that it was Roald Amundsen who, five years ago, in the Gjoa, a 47-ton cutter, issued from a successful attempt at the North-west Passage, after centuries of failure by other and none the less determined and capable men in far larger and better equipped vessels. And—just a human point in passing—as the Gjoa was making for Herring Straits, her labours done, her triumph achieved, she met the Duchess of Bedford, under the command of Ejnar Mikkelsen, going into the Arctic on a similar errand, never to come out again. Not one scrap to belittle his rare ability, his keen foresight and preparation for possible difficulties he has enjoyed enviable good fortune in his ventures—"the best of luck" he calls it; and it is for these several reasons that we think he is so likely to be successful in the north.

* "The South Pole: An Account of the Norwegian Antarctic Expedition in the Fram, 1910-12." By Roald Amundsen. Translated from the Norwegian by A. G. Chater. With Maps and numerous Illustrations. In Two Volumes. £2 2s. net. (John Murray.)

For the present, however, we have to consider him as the discoverer of the South Pole, and this record of how he and his four companions travelled over the ice and the mountain chains from the Great Barrier to the Pole and back, makes vigorous, inspiring reading. Yet whatever a man's action may be, daring and great or little and cowardly, we always like to know what he is behind them, apart from them, in addition to them; and here is a sidelight on the man whom all the world of explorers and adventurous spirits generally will ever somewhat envy for his two history-making exploits:

"Here I am, sitting in the shade of palms, surrounded by the most wonderful vegetation, enjoying the most magnificent fruits, and writing—the history of the South Pole. What an infinite distance seems to separate that region from these surroundings! And yet it is only four months since my gallant comrades and I reached the coveted spot. I write the history of the South Pole! If anyone had hinted a word of anything of the sort four or five years ago, I should have looked upon him as incurably mad. And yet the madman would have been right."

From "The South Pole

Roald Amundsen.

R. Amundsen (John Murray.)

across the Arctic, with a great effort to reach the Pole in the course of it, he just ran down south, packed his sledges, put on his skis, hurried out to the Pole and came home again. So that if they do not now fit out his expedition as such a one was never before fitted out—well, if they don't, Roald Amundsen ought to change his flag.

As to the hardships, the terrors and the well-nigh overwhelming desolation of such a venture. Does any sane person need to be told about them here? Even if the least adequate justice could be done to them in a review, where the purpose is to give an idea of the whole, rather than to single out a feature that is, after all, only a portion. One is thrilled—no other word will fit—by the dash and go over the mountain passes, 11,000 feet high, ice-bound and often smothered in blinding snow, or sleety hail; just as one feels the party's pleasure and comparative ease of mind to be away again on the farther plateau, heading for the Pole, with now happily, but unknown to the voyagers, no more great ascents to scale laboriously. Then the triumph of that last observation, taken and checked again and again for accuracy's sake, 90° south! The Pole! Yet all up to this so plainly set down—no flow of words, no picture making, no deviating from the subject; and still the record is not a barren one. Simple and matter-of-fact, as ever are the man-of-action's records of his own share in deeds that thrill the world of humanity, the story is told with that oneness of view which has made the best in all our literature of things done. Then there was the good-bye to "Polheim," the Pole camp:

"It was a solemn moment when we bared our heads and said farewell to our home (the tent) and our flag."

So to the joy of the homeward run to "Framheim" (the "home" built of a shed and ice-chambers, containing the "Crystal Palace," on the Barrier, near the Fram's anchorage); when the ski-runners of the party became so hungry that they "would have swallowed pebbles without winking." Then amongst the mountains again, and we are permitted to see some of the glories of the scene, as the leader of the party stands at the opening of his tent, at one o'clock in the morning; when the sun, away over the Pole nearly, makes the snow-clad peaks glisten as if they were polished, while the lower portions throw dark shadows that make a powerful contrast, and over all there is the wonderful, awesome silence, of treeless, frozen solitudes—all the more wonderful because it has the strange power to draw men back to it and its terrors.

Next came the descent to the lower plateau, the far edge of which was the Barrier, and there "Framheim." Says the leader:

"The going was precisely the same—loose, fairly deep snow. We went quite easily over it, however, and it was all downhill. On the ridge where the descent to the glacier began we halted to make our preparations. Brakes were put under the sledges, and our two ski-sticks were fastened together to make one strong one; we should have to be able to stop instantly if surprised by a crevasse in going. We ski-runners went in front. The going was ideal here on the steep slope, just enough loose snow to give one good steering on ski. We went whizzing down, and it was not many minutes before we were on the Lieberg Glacier."

Another descent, and they were on the Barrier plateau, in 85° 5' south, with eleven dogs left—out of about fifty—to draw the three sledges containing provisions for thirty-five days, "the dogs looking just as well as when we left Framheim"; and down came a blizzard, with a great crevasse straight across their path somewhere ahead.

"The snow was very deep and loose, and the going very heavy. Fortunately we were warned in time of our approach to the expected cracks by the appearance of some bare ice ridges. These told us clearly enough that disturbances had taken place here, and that even greater ones might be expected, probably near at hand. At that moment the thick curtain of cloud was torn asunder, and the sun pierced the whirling mass of snow. Instantly Haussen shouted: 'Stop, Bjaaland!' He was just on the edge of the yawning crevasse."

Such, not omitting the delightful "Day at Framheim," were some of the items in the discovery of the South Pole. And Mr. John Murray has done fine justice to his share of letting the world know, and having a lasting record, of how it was all done.

J. E. PATTERSON.

WILLIAM SHARP.*

Mrs. William Sharp, in her edition of her husband's writings, has certainly kept the best until the last. These "Vistas" contain the most notable work, in creative literature at any rate, which he produced under his own name. It was almost inevitable that these dramatic studies should have been compared with the earlier plays of Maeterlinck. The two men were trying to produce similar effects by similar methods. But, as it happened, Sharp had no knowledge of the Belgian poet's work when he wrote some of them, and they are all quite personal and characteristic. The best of them are masterpieces of suggestion. They display Sharp's feeling for the supernatural and the mysterious at its most effective, and the economy which the form imposes curbs that fluency which was the defect of his undoubted command of language. The finest of them is "A Northern Night," in which the unseen presence of death is really powerfully indicated. Others, such as "The Passion of Père Hilarion," are spoilt by too much insistence. This was Sharp's great fault. The Pre-Raphaelite influence, working on a natural facility, produced a love of detail and description which is in the result too often wearisome. It has this effect in the majority of the stories and studies which complete the present volume, though "The Gypsy Christ" is not without power and fascination.

* "Vistas." By William Sharp. 5s. net. "William Sharp: A Memoir." By Mrs. William Sharp. 2 Vols. 10s. net. (Heinemann.)

This readiness of pen had, of course, its advantages. Not only did it enable Sharp to live on what, if it was largely journalism, was at any rate connected, and quite worthily connected, with the literature which he loved; it also saved him from the necessity of deliberately writing below himself. Many men, working slowly at some cherished work of art, have the torture and mortification of at the same time turning out much bad stuff because they cannot write both well and fast. Sharp, with his fluency, could always keep up to, or near, his own average. He neither made his fortune nor produced a masterpiece, but he managed to succeed at once in the ideal and the commercial walks of letters in a way which is only too rare. How he did it is the subject of his wife's "Memoir," which was published last year and is now reissued in two volumes uniform with the collected works.

It is a book of considerable value to the student of later nineteenth century literature. Sharp knew everyone and corresponded with everyone. Nevertheless, the best reading will be found in the earlier pages, before he had settled to the literary career and made his name. To this period belong some good stories. His own description of his first day at school is delightful.

"On the very day of my arrival a rebellion had broken out, and by natural instinct I was, like the Irishman the moment he arrived in America, 'agin the Government.' I remember the rapture with which I evaded a master's pursuing grip, and was hauled in at a window by exultant rebels. In that temporary haven the same afternoon I insulted a big boy, whose peculiar physiognomy had amazed me to delighted but impolite laughter, and forthwith experienced my first school thrashing. Later in the day I had the satisfaction of coming out victor in an unequal combat with the heir of an Indian big-wig, whom, with too ready familiarity, I had addressed as 'Curry.' As I was a rather delicate and sensitive child, this was not a bad beginning."

It seems to be the orthodox thing for artists to be sensitive and delicate in childhood. Possibly, in the retrospect, Sharp, after many days spent among poets and poetry, was inclined to exaggerate those qualities in his own case. In spite of visions and communings with the Infinite, it can scarcely be doubted that the hero of these escapades had a fair share of health and hardihood. He ran away from school four times, and later lived for two or three months in a gipsy encampment, acquiring strange lore which he afterwards put to good use. He was a nomad by temperament, and contrived to see a good deal of the world in the course of his life: on one occasion the wanderlust compelled him to throw up profitable appointments in London, and to leave England.

After a voyage to Australia for the sake of his health, and various efforts to school himself to the sober ways of clerkship, young Sharp came to the conclusion that his destiny was to be a writer and (as the phrase then went) a Bohemian. He accordingly went through considerable hardships, at one time living on roasted chestnuts, but ultimately his talents brought him recognition. These were aided by the invaluable asset of self-assurance. His first interview with Rossetti was more admirable for this quality than for taste; and on one occasion he painted a book, not a word of which had yet been written, in colours so glowing that he left the publisher's office the richer by a cheque for £100. He had an extraordinary knack of getting to know people, and he soon numbered most literary men of any standing among his acquaintances. It is, however, rather a limitation that he confined his friendship so exclusively to men and women of his own or kindred professions. One feels that a stockbroker or two would have been good for him.

There are a great many letters, both written by and written to Sharp in these volumes. The latter are, on the whole, the more interesting. Some of the best letter-writers of the day were among his correspondents. Stevenson writes a note of characteristic whimsicality, enclosing two sonnets, of which I personally can make neither head nor tail. Sharp, however, likes them, and proposes to include them in an anthology which he is making; against which R.L.S. launches an amused protest. John Addington Symonds discusses verse-structure in a way which has become curiously old-fashioned. We are more interested in the matter than the manner of poetry nowadays, and it is notable that whereas when Sharp was editing volumes of "Canterbury Poets," anthologies were made on the basis of form, they are at present made on a basis of subject or mood. There is a very interesting letter from Henley, protesting against Sharp's review of his "In Hospital" and objecting especially to his use of the adjective "crude." "My method is, I know, the exact reverse of your own," he writes; and defends his own method with spirit. Pater's letters are disappointing, but there are some characteristic notes from Meredith. Part of one must be quoted: it is such ideal fare for the comic spirit.

"I have read your book on Shelley, and prefer it, matched with the bulky. Putting out of view Matthew Arnold's very lofty lift of superterrestrial nose over the Godwin nest, one inclines to agree with him about our mortal business of Shelley."

Was the great man pulling his own leg when he allowed himself to write like this? or was his sense of humour sound asleep? Wilde is as Wildian as Meredith is Meredithian. He sends Sharp that really fine sonnet "On the Sale by Auction of Keats's Love Letters," and adds:

"I wish I could grave my sonnets on an ivory tablet—Quill-pens and note paper are only good enough for bills of lading. A sonnet should always look well. Don't you think so?"

But if Wilde too much himself may be mocked as superfine, Meredith too much himself is ludicrous.

Sharp's dual personality, and the evolution of "Fiona Macleod," is, of course, the principal motive of the "Memoir." Though by no means lacking masculine qualities, he always had a peculiar sympathy with women and a power of seeing things from their point of view. It was the growth of this, coupled with other causes, — among them the desire to express his mystical imaginings in a literature which should not be associated with his less intimate work as William Sharp—which gradually evoked the idea of the mysterious poetess who so long baffled the critics. It is remarkable how, in a gossiping world, Sharp, who also loved mystification for its own sake, contrived to keep his secret. He told it to a few friends; but when suspicions were aroused in a wider circle, he denied his identity without scruple. He even, when in considerable financial straits, let slip the opportunity of a Civil List pension because, to obtain it, a complete statement of his claim would have had to be placed on the table of the House of Commons. Before his death, he wrote notes for various friends, begging forgiveness for the deceit. Some day, perhaps, some acute critic will make an elaborate psychological study of all the available data. The result would be very valuable, for though neither William Sharp nor Fiona Macleod were writers of the highest importance, their joint tenancy of one body was an unique event.

FRANCIS BICKLEY.

A VETERAN SOCIALIST.*

Herr Bebel is now seventy-two, and he is still the honoured leader of the old guard of Social democracy in Germany. This first volume of autobiography tells of his boyhood and early manhood, of the controversies with the followers of Lassalle, the founding and early successes of the Social democratic party; and leaves us at the era of coercion, with Bismarck in power, in 1878. In all modesty and sincerity Herr Bebel has written of the part he has played in the building up of his party, and if the English reader gets too much of the doings of the Lassalleans and wearies of the intrigues and misdeeds of their dictator—Jean Baptist von Schweitzer—there is ample compensation in the pages that deal with the author's more personal reminiscences. In especial are the years of apprenticeship, the life as a journeyman carpenter, and the political imprisonments of interest.

In the Fortress of Hubertusburg, where Bebel—then a member of the Reichstag—had been sentenced to remain for two years for High Treason, in 1872, Liebknecht was already installed:

"There were five or six of us altogether, and when one left the court would provide a fresh recruit. Further, there was always some student sent to the fortress for some duelling affair."

Arbitrary as the sentence seems to us, for the "high treason" was the crime of democratic propaganda on strictly constitutional lines and frank criticism of Bismarck's policy, the prisoners were recognized as political offenders and treated with every consideration. Indeed the doctor who assured Frau Bebel: "If your husband

* "My Life." By August Bebel. 7s 6d. net. (Fisher Unwin.)

From "My Life," by A. Bebel (Fisher Unwin).

A. Bebel.

gets a year in prison you may rejoice, for he needs a rest ! " was probably right, so strenuously was Herr Bebel working for " the cause " at the time of his arrest. Bebel himself writes that :

" The absolute rest and fresh air (at Hubertusburg) soon put me on my feet again. . . . It was even discovered, when subsequently undergoing a medical examination, that my left lung, in which tuberculosis had eaten a large hole, had healed during my internment."

The daily routine of prison life is well described :

" We had to be ready dressed by seven o'clock, when the cells were opened for cleaning. (This was done by a so-called ' calefactor,' and prisoners had to pay for this and for the rent of their cells some 15s. monthly). In the meantime we had breakfast in the large corridor. Our friend Hirsch used to take this opportunity to play chess with another civilian prisoner, with whom he used to be continually quarrelling over the game. From eight to ten we were locked in our cells; then we took our regulation walks in the garden. From twelve to three in winter and four in summer we were once more locked up, and then took our second walk, to be locked up at five or six according to the season, until the cells were unlocked next morning. We had the right to burn a light until 10 p.m., and these hours I devoted to study."

Besides learning English and French under Liebknecht's tuition Herr Bebel during this imprisonment read largely in history, political economy, and natural science.

Not always, however, were the prison conditions so favourable as at Hubertusburg. In the end, as all Europe knows, Bismarck's policy of coercion failed utterly, and Herr Bebel in his old age has seen the party of Social democracy become the largest in Germany. J. C.

"THE PEARK."*

His Honour Judge Parry is so versatile a man that we may turn from delighting in his children's books, to a consideration of him dispensing justice from his " peark," only to recall that he is a playwright as well as an earnest advocate for certain legal reforms, and besides all these he has his enduring niche as editor of the fascinating letters of charming Dorothy Osborne. Then, too, he gave us not long ago a pleasant volume of miscellaneous essays, and now he claims (and succeeds in holding) our attention with a most engaging volume of reminiscences. The title of this book suggests that it is only concerned with the writer's experiences in Manchester, but it includes recollections of his early London life, bits about his barristerial experiences on circuit, and a miscellany of anecdotes that range far from the city in which he spent a quarter of a century and at which he now occasionally pokes fun. One of the most impressive memories of Manchester is that of its cotton-laden " luries," and Judge Parry says that if he had had a hand in emblazoning a coat of arms he would have chosen " a lurry—not rampant, or courant, but fas-sant—night and day constantly and eternally pas-sant."

It was by his experience in Manchester that Judge Parry came to be an advocate on behalf of a couple of legal reforms which should be hastened by his well-informed championship. One of these concerns the judgment summons, the machinery of which means in effect the establishing of one law for the rich and another for the poor, and the other is the demand for Courts of Conciliation or Reconciliation, where the parties concerned could together discuss the matter in dispute with the judge in an informal fashion and thus often avoid the lottery of an action. The experiment seems one that needs but formulating to be tried, for it might be the production of much good, while it is difficult to see in what way it could do harm. These subjects are more or less incidentally dealt with in this delightful book, but the reader soon realises that they are matters near the author's heart, though the volume in which they occur is in the main a brightly anecdotal one. The blending of seriousness and fun is one of Judge Parry's happy characteristics as a raconteur—a blending which results in his never being either solemnly dull, or merely flippant—and it is difficult to believe that any readers will be disappointed with this record of things experienced, seen and heard by one who has not allowed a number of years on the " peark " to dull his sense of humour, the readiness of his own wit, or appreciation of the wit of other men. One anecdote, as it is that from which the title of this notice is taken, may be quoted from among the large number scattered through the book :

* "What the Judge Saw: Being Twenty-Five Years in Manchester. By One Who Has Lived It." By His Honour Judge Edward Abbott Parry. 7s. 6d. net. (Smith, Elder.)

Shee said a witty thing to Lord Coleridge, who was puzzled with the Lancashire dialect. A witness, in describing a verbal encounter, said : " Then the defendant turned round and said if 'e didn't 'owld 'is noise, 'e'd knock 'im off 'is peark."

" Peark ? Mr Shee, what is meant by peark ? " asked the Lord Chief Justice.

" Oh, peark, my lord, is any position where a man elevates himself above his fellows—for instance, a bench, my lord."

Judge Parry goes on to say that the witness had put an adjective before the word " peark " but he did not repeat it, not wishing " to bring the blush of shame to the cheek of modesty," and adds, characteristically, the decisive judgment that " there is no cheek like the cheek of modesty."

WALTER JERROLD.

A TRAGEDY OF FOUR.*

There are, they say, but five possible plots in the world : of these Mrs. Wharton has chosen in her latest novel perhaps the commonest of all. Yet this fact by no means detracts from the value of the story, for in her hands a motif taken from melodrama becomes a new thing. " The Reef " is at once a study in character contrast of the simplest kind and a revelation in spiritual tragedy of the subtlest. The subject is the contrast between apparent victory and actual defeat, for the woman who seemed to win is really the woman who lost, when laying her hand on substance she found but shadow. Incidentally, too, " The Reef " throws a searchlight on the basic difference between the way in which men and women view the ethics of love adventure.

George Darrow, on his way to Anna Leath, is irritated by a telegram putting off his visit without excuse. By the malice of that fate which waits on weak moments he falls in with Sophy Viner, one of the thousands of women who, with their backs to the wall, are fighting poverty with no weapon of education or professional training. Darrow gives the child what she has never had before—a good time, but emerges from the affair no longer an honourable man. He becomes so much the meaner while Sophy, shallow in brain but profound in instinct, learns from it a power of nobility and sacrifice which nothing else could have taught her. A year later, when his suit of Anna Leath is on the verge of success, he finds Sophy engaged to her stepson.

It is curious to note how Mrs. Wharton deals with a situation so full of irony as this. Where, for instance, Anatole France would have laid stress on the priggish hypocrisy of Darrow, the man who is actually shocked at seeing a woman contemplate the very course of action to which he has already committed himself, Mrs. Wharton is overcome with pity for the four people concerned : for the boy who adores a girl with no love to give him, for the woman so deceived, for the girl so perplexed and the man so harassed. The situation is grimly humorous, but Mrs. Wharton fails to see this apparently. Day after day these people skate over the thin ice of revelation till the facts leap to life just because they are in the air, they cannot remain unknown. And although Sophy effaces herself, it is Anna who will always suffer, since between herself and Darrow at every simplest incident a mocking memory comes before her of the shadowy third. The final touch of satire is given when Darrow refuses to satisfy Anna's morbid curiosity, saying : " It would put something irremediable between us," when the something irremediable is already there to spoil their lives.

The colourlessness of Mrs. Wharton's style bleaches all comment from her pages : what remains therefore of satire is of the very stuff of the tale itself. Yet the work is unequal. Sophy and Anna live; never has the world-tossed wanderer, the smirched thing with a pure heart, been better done titan in the former; never could a grande dame beating at the gates of life be more vivid than in the latter. But the mad Owen is a whirl of inexplicable hysteria; the man Darrow but an irritating enigma. Mrs. Wharton deals so delicately with these masculine nerves that their possessors remain but phantoms. Darrow would not have captured Anna, nor would he have held Sophy: he was not man enough to flutter the dovescotes in this fashion. It is, too, a defect in Mrs. Wharton's delicate cameo-work that her sentimental conflicts are so isolated from the workaday world. Her characters live in a vacuum. Darrow, for instance, is called a diplomat, but actually he has no trade but that of philandering. To draw people so is to botanise without recognising the soil from which a plant grows.

* " The Reef." By Edith Wharton. 6s. (Macmillan.)

Yet to carp thus is rather to gird at a style of novel-writing, for the works of the high-priest of this school, Mr. Henry James, exhibit exactly the same divorce between a drama and what must have been its inevitable setting, the buying and selling, the eating and drinking, all the activities of the market place, whether of national or individual life. And if a good deal of the weird contrast of actuality is lost by this method of secluding a tragedy, at the same time it leaves more room for the subtle interplay of mind with mind which makes Mrs. Wharton's work so fascinating. We are here very near to the "psychic" drama of Maeterlinck, and within its strictly drawn boundaries "The Reef" is a very fine book.

M. P. WILLCOCKS.

THE COMPLETE MYSTERY.*

No book of Dickens's has been more written about than "Edwin Drood," and none has been less generally read by the public at large. Even earnest and devoted Dickensians are deterred from reading it, as Mr. Cuming Walters says in his introductory chapter, "because they do not care to be tantalised by a half-told tale." The tale must always remain half-told, of course, but since some "Suggestions for a Conclusion" appeared in the Cornhill in 1884, a formidable number of critics have exercised their ingenuity in deducing from so much of the novel as Dickens had done a solution of the mystery that he had finished ravelling but had scarcely begun to unravel. The problem divides itself into three main questions: Was Edwin actually murdered, or had he escaped into hiding? Who was Datchery? and how had Dickens meant to pair off certain of the characters at the conclusion of it all?

The variety of solutions that have been offered bear testimony to the cunning with which Dickens had woven his plot. Following close on Dickens's death, Orpheus C. Kerr wrote a burlesque finish of the story in 1870; in the same year four articles were published in different papers making guesses at how it was to have developed; several writers published sequels to the unfinished romance, plays based upon it, and articles concerning it; then Richard Proctor temporarily laid Edwin's ghost in 1887 with his remarkable book, "Watched by the Dead: A Loving Study of Dickens' Half-told Tale." For eighteen years after that the subject was left as severely alone as if it had been settled once for all. Then, in 1905, Mr. Cuming Walters revived it, and in his "Clues to the Mystery of Edwin Drood" ably propounded his theories that Drood was really and undoubtedly dead and that the baffling Datchery was none other than Helena Landless in disguise. A cloud of controversy rose up about him; it is amazing to read here a list of the multitude of articles and books that have been written since, some in agreement with Mr. Walter's theories, some opposed to them and setting up rival theories, each new theorist

* The Complete "Mystery of Edwin Drood," by Charles Dickens. The History, Continuations and Solutions (1870-1912) by J. Cuming Walters. 6s. net. (Chapman & Hall.)

High Street, Rochester.

From "The Complete Edwin Drood," by J. Cuming Walters (Chapman & Hall).

starting his new crowd of supporters or opponents. Last autumn Sir W. Robertson Nicoll took up the running, made an exhaustive study of Dickens's usual methods of construction, and of the characters and the fragmentary plot of "Edwin Drood" in particular, and delivered what was, in the opinion of most critics, a final judgment on the whole case. He not only acquiesced in Mr. Walters's main conclusions, but deduced from the published novel, from an examination of the original manuscript and from other sources, fresh evidence in corroboration of them, and so admittedly left nothing for further investigators to do. But Mr. Walters seems to have felt it an opportune moment to put out this final volume, which contains the unfinished novel, a lucid summary of the continuations that have been written to it and all the various essays that have been made in the solving of its uncertainties, and a very full and very interesting account of the discussion that has raged round "The Mystery of Edwin Drood" ever since Dickens made even more of a mystery of it than he had intended. Mr. Cuming Walters has done his work thoroughly and well. He has included the fragmentary chapter on "How Mr. Sapsea ceased to be a Member of the Eight Club," which was found by Forster after Dickens's death; he devotes one section to a history of the inception and writing of "Edwin Drood" and an account of the localities and characters of the novel; and another to the sequels and solutions, concluding with a large folding table in which the divers conclusions of the book are tabulated, so that one may see at a glance what theories and beliefs have been held on the points in dispute by those who have studied them. There is also a complete bibliography. The numerous illustrations add greatly to the attractiveness and the value of a book that all lovers of Dickens will welcome with both hands.

AN OLD ROMANCE.*

It is so long since Mr. Gosse's version of "Undine" was published that it comes in its present guise almost as a new venture. In any form it is heartily welcome. Discerning donors have by this already noted it and assigned copies (dare we say?) to the stockings of maidens in their early teens; and for such purposes it could scarcely be bettered.

* "Undine": A Tale by F. de la Motte Fouqué. Translated from the German by Edmund Gosse, C.B. 2s. 6d. net. (Siddewick & Jackson.)

Its appearance prompts the remark that nothing is so dead as the average romance of former generations. For proof of this we need not go back to Don Belianis of Greece, or Palmerin of England, or the metrical romances that pass among philologists as literature, we need not go to "Arcadia," which if there have been few to praise there have been fewer still to love. We shall find the least living of books among the wild fictions that flourished in times far less remote from ours, to wit, in the great romantic outburst, of which the French Revolution is, in a sense, merely one of the incidents. To us these stories have become humorous. "Werther" suggests the lady who went on cutting bread-and-butter, rather than the youths who died in romantic imitation of the hero, and Byron himself begins to assume the proportions and character of a legend, and lives as a force and influence rather than as one whose words are vital to this generation. "Undine" is a strange survival. It is a spark, still bright, of the great romantic conflagration that blazed to its height and expired in the works of Wagner, whose machinery of giants, gnomes, nymphs, valkyries, knights in shining armour, magic rings, potions, the spell of the mountains, and the mystery of the forest, is precisely that by which the author of "Undine" sought to create his effects. Certainly not the least romantic fact about "Undine" is that it was the book Wagner was reading on the latest evening of his life.

The author himself was a romance. Handsome and well-born, his first recollection was the riding away of a magnificent officer to the wars, and his first thrill the sight of a suit of armour and a great two-handed sword. Henceforth knights in armour and magnificent steeds were his obsession, and he continued to produce in plays and stories a vast succession of heroes, who (in Heine's words) were as brave as a hundred lions and as senseless as two donkeys. Inevitably he became a soldier, and entered (of course) a cavalry regiment. He saw actual service in the Napoleonic wars and was wounded both at Lützen and Bautzen. He met and worshipped Goethe and Schiller, and was as fond of Chamisso (said a cynic) as any cavalry officer could be of one who had been in the infantry. He was (appropriately) three times married, and lived to 1843, long enough to have witnessed a new romantic revival.

He brings with him to us very little of his vast output. In even his more readable stories, like "Sintram" and "Aslauga's Knight," you will find heroines vaguer than Elsa, and heroes more monumentally priggish than Lohengrin. "Undine" alone is really alive, and even in that a modern finds himself preferring the rather Ibsenitish nymph that Undine was before she obtained her soul. Its real charm is in its sense of natural wonder—the magic of the streams and the woods. There its thrill is genuine, even though the methods and idiom are obsolete. The ride of Huldbrand through the forest is just the "Waldesnacht" of so many romantic poets, terrorless now in literature, but dark and wild as ever in the music of Schubert.

GEORGE SAMPSON.

Buckingham Palace in 1790.

The English Scene in the Eighteenth Century," by E. S. Roscoe (Constable).

PROVINCIAL NERVE CENTRES *

Under this somewhat unilluminative title Mr. Roscoe gives a few impressionist sketches of life in London and the Provinces. It must be confessed that even the best of our historians have been inclined to lay too much stress on the life in London, and Mr. Roscoe's unpretentious pages fill a distinct gap in portraying the work of other nerve centres of our national life. How little does the ordinary history tell us of Liverpool, its curious isolation from the rest of the kingdom, its dependence on the slave trade, the stream of privateers it sent out to fight American vessels in the War of Independence, or the origin of its traditional conservatism! How seldom do popular histories give a correct description of life in farm and cottage during the first half of the eighteenth century, of the two strings to every agriculturist's bow—his agriculture and his manufacture! The realisation of this fact and of our inability to reproduce it under modern industrial conditions is of no little importance in the quest for means of attracting men back to the land.

On these points, in these spheres that he makes particularly his own, Mr. Roscoe is thoroughly interesting and informing. Scarcely less clear and graphic is the contrast drawn between the middle classes of London, unemotional, tranquil, conservative, and the manufacturers who by their energy and enterprise were transforming the Midlands and the North. Equally forcible is the comparison between the shallow-brained, idle aristocrat of the Capital and such intellectual and progressive aristocrats of the Provinces as Lord Townshend, who in 1730 renounced the career of statesman for that of scientific farmer. One virtue our author does allow the noblemen of the Capital. Alone among the other classes they acquired by their study of French and their travels on the Continent a certain sympathy with other Europeans, which blossomed into an actual entente with the aristocracy of France, and also made the great families of England the natural leaders of their country in foreign politics.

Broad and useful as are such impressionist surveys, Mr. Roscoe descends from these heights to steer us through the streets of Bath with their superficial, inconsequential life. Such personalities too as Fanny Burney, Jane Austen and Miss Seward are graceful ornaments of the backwaters of national life, but scarcely deserve the space allotted to them in the study of the main streams of English progress. Nor does Samuel Crisp, Fanny Burney's guide, philosopher-and friend, seem to be quite in his element in such a wide survey. We notice too some awkward repetitions of quotations, etc., and an occasional non sequitur. The fact that the tenants assembled at the Hall to welcome the squire home is brought forward as an illustration of the decay of the feudal spirit, instead of its subsistence. Nor can we agree that the influence of India on the middle class "has never received due attention." Apart from these blemishes this study of the nation's progress is as satisfactory to the student as it is readable by the curious.

"The English Scene in the Eighteenth Century." By E. S. Roscoe. 12s. 6d. net. (Constable.)

GITANJALI.*

We think it probable that a good many people who read Mr. Yeats' very eulogistic introduction to this volume will be rather disappointed when they come to study the actual contents. For these prose translations made by the author from his Bengali poems are clouded in a kind of rosy and gentle mysticism which will be alien to most Western intelligences. They have beauty, but it is the cold and crystal beauty of an ascetic dreamer who has cast from him all the dross of the earth. You will not find in this book the glowing pulse of the East as you will find it in the huge Indian epics, but you will find the pure, exquisite, and pensive visions of a sage. We miss, of course, the cadence of the original verse which is said to be wonderfully delicate and finished, but these translations are quite enough to show us that Mr. Tagore is a true poet. We should not have called him a great poet, but then, naturally, it is impossible to make a statement like this, knowing so little of his work and that in a translation. In India, Mr. Tagore has a reputation of an extraordinarily exalted and universal nature. His genius must indeed be the mouthpiece of a national aspiration and philosophy to have moved so profoundly a country as vast as his. But to English minds, that is to say to the majority of English minds, he would certainly appear to lack substance. He has no obvious grip on reality, without which romance itself, in our eyes, loses its real magic.

There are, in all, 103 poems in the book. They are poems about the experiences of the soul, and they have the calm perfection which might appertain, one imagines, to the outpourings of a disembodied spirit. On the whole, they have the negative rather than the positive qualities of high poetry. They are flawless, but they lack fire. They are noble, but they lack passion. They resemble, somehow, scentless white flowers, with just the tinge of colour on their petals. For they are not altogether without the vital spark, although it is very attenuated. Perhaps the most human of the poems are 10 and 30. They are well worth quoting in full:—

"Here is thy footstool, and there rest thy feet where live the poorest, the lowliest, and lost.

"When I try to bow to thee, my obeisance cannot reach down to the depth where thy feet rest among the poorest, the lowliest, and lost.

"Pride can never approach to where thou walkest in the clothes of the humble among the poorest, the lowliest, and lost.

"My Art can never find its way to where thou keepesst company with the companionless among the poorest, the lowliest, and the lost."

Thy love you have the compassion of a Whitman touched by the humility of a Dostoevsky. It is a rarely beautiful idea.

30 (1st.)

"I came out alone on my way to my tryst. But who is this that follows me in the silent dark?

I move aside to avoid his presence but I escape him not.

* "Gitanjali" (Song Offerings). By Rabindra Nath Tagore. With an Introduction by W. B. Yeats and a Frontispiece Portrait of the Author by William Rothenstein. 10s. 6d. net. (Chiswick Press.)

He makes the dust rise from the earth with his swagger; he adds his loud voice to every word that I utter.

He is my own little self, my Lord, he knows no shame; but I am ashamed to come to thy door in his company."

There is humour in this poem, airy, bloodless, but true. As for the thought, it is one that has constantly pressed upon most of us, the thought of the double self, as it were. Poe described it in "William Wilson," Stevenson in "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde," and now Mr. Tagore describes it in this small but very effective poem.

As can be understood, Mr. Tagore is an optimist in regard to life. His is much too simple a nature (simple in spite of the utmost cultivation) to be affected by the gloomy tendencies of the modern European mind. To him life is not full of hideous complications for which there are no solutions. His mystical acceptance of the world is far too wide for that. As he says (poem 95):

"I was not aware of the moment when I first crossed the threshold of life

"What was the power that made me open out into this vast mystery like a bud in the forest at midnight?"

"When in the morning I looked upon the light I felt in a moment that I was no stranger in this world, that the inscrutable without name and form had taken me in its arms in the form of my own mother.

"Even so, in death the same unknown will appear as ever known to me. And because I love this life, I know I shall love death as well.

"The child cries out when from the right breast the mother takes it away, in the very next moment to find in the left one its consolation."

After all, it is not perhaps surprising that a man who can picture life in such subtle and yet simple language should be a power amongst the allegorical and fatalistic races of the East.

RICHARD CURLE.

Frances E. Willard.

From "Frances Willard: Her Life and Work," by Ray Strachey (Unwin).

FRANCES WILLARD.*

"I started," says Mrs. Strachey, "to write this book as an outsider and a critic, as one who could judge of Frances Willard's life unblinded by loyalty or affection. But I have not succeeded. I am not an outsider any longer, but a follower and a friend." Beneath those words lies, perhaps, the secret of Miss Willard's success. It was one of personality. Quite obviously it was not so much the things she said that were impressive, but the way in which she said them. When you have reached the end of this book, if you ask yourself what was her special message to the world you cannot give any very definite answer. She preached temperance, purity, women's suffrage, philanthropy—nothing new. Nor had she anything new to say on these subjects. "She knew well enough," says the author, "that her books were horrible." Indeed it would have been surprising if they had been anything else, seeing that she once put together 650,000 words of autobiography in three weeks. And yet the Society she organised numbered its members by the million and had its branches in Japan, Spain, Syria, India, and other remote countries. Nor can its success be attributed altogether to its policy—the policy of "Do Everything," on the principle that "any amount of elbow-room is good for folks." No, the genius of the movement was Miss Willard, with her force of character, her energy and persistence, her unwavering goodness, and—her personal charm. "The first time I heard her," wrote a disciple, "I lay awake all night for sheer gladness. It was such a wonderful revelation to me that a woman like Miss Willard could exist. I thanked God and took courage for humanity." So this woman, with the simple, indefinite message given to her by her sister Mary: "Tell everybody to be good," became what it is but little of an exaggeration to call a world-force, the only woman whose statue is in the Capital at Washington. She worked whole-heartedly, and the statistics of her work form one of the most amazing portions of this book. The meetings she attended averaged 365 per annum. In 1881 she and her secretary sent out 10,000 letters, "and besides this she wrote many articles for the temperance papers, and made many hundreds of speeches." In 1883 she visited every State and territory in the Union, "started societies in every one of them, spoke in every town of over 10,000 inhabitants, and travelled over 30,000 miles." All this, and more, is put vividly before you by Mrs. Strachey in a candid, concise, and ably-handled biography, for which she must gain the gratitude of every one who is interested in social work, and of which not the least attractive portion is the sympathetic account of Miss Willard's earlier years in Wisconsin, first as a high-spirited girl, later as a successful school teacher.

ONLY A PROLOGUE.†

It is almost inevitable, in critical days like these, that a hero should incur a certain risk of unpopularity when he is obviously an author's favourite. Half a century ago, when the novel-reading world was more impressionable and sympathetic, Dickens played a safe card when he declared 'David Copperfield his favourite child. Nowadays the tendency is to be derisive, and to be suspicious of a central character who dawns upon the horizon in such a glow of prose as Madame Grand throws into her opening chapter. To do her justice, she maintains a varied eloquence and an unceasing enthusiasm for her theme through more than six hundred closely printed pages, and of the length of her project we shall have more to say presently. What is more, Adnam Pratt retains his prime importance in the centre of the scheme, and approves himself a sterling instance of the modern man whose ideas outstrip his chances and his fortunes. From the idyllic opening to the page where he walks out into the world a penniless and disappointed man, he grips us with a sense of his absoluteness and reality, and upholds the standard of character in contrast with mere opportunities and possessions as embodied in an inferior elder brother. Except that they both proceed from the same yeoman father, the position recalls the contest between the Faulconbridges in "King John," where the measly champion of primogeniture wins his suit against his brother, the man of better parts and lesser title. Shakespeare's hero won in the long run, and we may fairly augur the same of Mme. Grand's.

* "Frances Willard: Her Life and Work." By Ray Strachey. With an Introduction by Lady Henry Somerset and 8 Illustrations. 5s. net. (Unwin.)

† "Adnam's Orchard." By Sarah Grand. 6s. (Heinemann.)

For this novel, in spite of its six hundred pages, is far from finished, and when we arrive at the last of the present chapters we light on the announcement, "End of Prologue." It may be that the author has relied on the average reader's habit of turning to the end first; and therefore we think that people who are proof against this amiable weakness have a technical grievance against the author. Instead of turning off an average novel of average length, she has set herself to plan an epic on the lines of "Jean Christophe," and we wish her the like success. If she can continue on the present scale, and people her canvas with characters like the Chesterfields and Colonel Mickleham, and Adnam and his father, we have no fear for the result. It will be deservedly classified as of the school of "Middlemarch," and, allowing for the difference of standard and achievement, even modified comparison like this is still rare praise.

PASSION AND FICTION.*

If the world wants a thing, you may be sure it will find someone willing to provide it. The world likes to hear of the love affairs of the great and of the notorious, and book after book has been forthcoming whereby it might satisfy its curiosity. Many will be of opinion that the subject had been sufficiently exploited. Not so Mr. Brendon, who presents us with the stories of a dozen great passions. We have no quarrel with Mr. Brendon, for his book is entirely innocuous. No stories of guilty lust does he reveal in purple passages. On the contrary, he is always strictly decorous. The only complaint to be entered against him is that he sacrifices everything to his theme, and even here we are partially disarmed by his frank admission:

"I may be accused, or, if so, shall rightly be accused, of placing the love influence in these stories wholly out of perspective to surrounding influences. But this, of course, is unavoidable, and in making the error I maintain I have erred on the right side, for these stories do not presume in any way to be a contribution to biography; they are merely romances, romances woven around now accepted facts."

Mr. Brendon is clearly an apostle of the dangerous theory that the end justifies the means; but let him continue:

"Hence, if they do anything to make the great persons who figure in them appear more real, more human and more comprehensible than can the calm, clear light of orthodox biography, they will fully serve their purpose, for that is their purpose—to reveal the man, not merely his career . . . After all, the man in love almost invariably is the true man."

It is a long time since the present writer has read anything so amazing. Unless Mr. Brendon is peculiarly unhappy in his expressions, he lays it down that the task of orthodox biography is not to reveal the man, but to give an account merely of his career. Is there another man living who will support this contention? It is true that a bad biographer may not reveal the man any more than he may present an adequate picture of the career of his subject, but that is the fault of the craftsman, not of the art. Still more amazing, however, is Mr. Brendon's statement that the man in love is the true man. Such a remark argues a great courage in the writer, for the whole trend of history goes to oppose it. A man in love does things under the influence of that passion that may be vastly meritorious or utterly vile, for love brings out the best in some natures and the worst in others; but to contend that the best or the worst in man is the true man is to put forward a reductio ad absurdum. It might as well be postulated that a man in hate is the true man!

* "Twelve Great Passions." By J. A. Brendon. With Illustrations. (Hutchinson.)

Mr. Brendon makes no claim to original research, and with this we have no quarrel, for the book is clearly designed, not for the student, but for the populace. Yet even in such a work there should be a respectable regard for facts, and a definite line drawn between fact and conjecture. In his story of Hannah Lightfoot Mr. Brendon states: "Undoubtedly King George III., as Prince of Wales, met her, loved her, and eloped with her." We should be glad to know on what authority Mr. Brendon makes this statement. "George loved her, loved her dearly. Of this there can be no doubt. Nor until he became king did he desert her and take to himself a royal consort. And he hated himself even then for doing so." Again we demand the authority. At the time Hannah Lightfoot married Isaac Axford the prince was fifteen years of age, and the most closely guarded of youths! There was once produced a document in which Dr. Wilmot stated that he married George to Hannah Lightfoot in 1759, and one of the witnesses to this is Lord Chatham. This document and others were produced in court in 1806. "Of course they were condemned as forgeries; the judges had no alternative," says Mr. Brendon, who informs us that a handwriting expert believed in the genuineness of the signatures. But Hannah Lightfoot, as he has said, was married to Axford in 1753, and Axford was certainly alive six years later! And is there anyone but the author of this book who can believe that Chatham would jeopardise his position by signing the marriage certificate of the heir-apparent and Hannah Lightfoot? There is, it may be admitted, much mystery concerning Hannah Lightfoot; but George was not the only lad in the world who might have taken her from her husband, and, as a matter of fact, he, on the occasion of his son's hason with "Perdita" Robinson, volunteered the statement that he had never been engaged in any such discreditable business. But Mr. Brendon, who hints at the dishonesty of judges, will, no doubt, scarcely hesitate to accuse the sovereign of a lie.

LEWIS MELVILLE.

SCOTTISH LIFE AND POETRY.*

It is a welcome thing now and then to get a large book, or indeed any book, without a preface. An author who disdains to explain beforehand what he intends to do is a man whose very courage is attractive. The only drawback is that unless his title is singularly precise, you are launched upon his pages without any clear notion of your course and haven; the result is, you are apt to do him an injustice by attributing to him designs which he never entertained. Mr. Watt's title is large enough, but it is vague. Life is more than poetry, and other than poetry. We can see from his three opening chapters, however, that he means to treat Scotch poetry in relation to the currents of national life, so that when we come to Thomas the Rhymer and Sir Tristram in the fourth chapter we know where we are. This is still more clear in the succeeding chapters on the patriotic poetry of Barbour and his successors. The method of treating poetry at any period of the nation's civilization distinctively as an expression of contemporary aims and feelings has its disadvantages. It tends now and then to become discursive; poetry seems in places to be overlooked in the crowd of prosaic considerations, such as witchcraft and theological controversy. But these defects are probably inevitable, and the method itself is intrinsically correct. Burns' receipt for making poetry applies to the study of poetry.

"The Muse, na Poet ever fand her,
Till by himsel he learn'd to wander,
Adown some trottin burn's meander,
An' no think lang."

* "Scottish Life and Poetry." By Lauchlan Maclean Watt. 12s. 6d. net. (James Nisbet & Co.)

The historian of national poetry has to frequent the streams of contemporary life in any period, "an' no think lang," even though they sometimes flow in strange directions. Unless he has patience enough to overhear the moods and movements of the people, he will often fail to understand the true meaning of this poetry. Mr. Watt has conscientiously endeavoured to follow this line, and although it fails him occasionally, as in the last chapter, it richly repays him in the earlier and stronger section of the book. The ordinary history of poetry tend to become a mere chronicle of names and dates and titles. There is something of this, now and then, in Mr. Watt's volume, particularly in connection with the minor poets whom he records so scrupulously; but generally he keeps in touch with the wider phases of patriotism and religion and social life, both in the Highlands and the Lowlands.

More might have been made, perhaps, of the epochal services rendered by a man like George Bannatyne, who rescued so many pieces from "auld and mankit" manuscripts. Next to being a poet oneself a pi us care for poetry is commendable, and Bannatyne deserves gratitude from lovers and historians of Scotch verse. And why is the worthy Rob Stene unchronicled? Let us hope that Dr. George Neilson is right in identifying him with Robert Stevin who was in the king's service in 1587, and died as master of a school in the Canongate, in 1618. At any rate "guid Rob Stene" was a pretty satirist. He loathed Maitland and put his loathing into verse. The verse is more pungent than poetical. Still it is worth recalling, especially when, or if, we can associate it with a vernacular poet of Edinburgh, who was not content with writing Latin verse or teaching Latin prose.

Mr. Watt properly hails Hamewith as a triumph of latter-day verse in the northern dialect. It smacks of anti-climax to find the paragraph on this recent little masterpiece followed by the isolated remark that "William Cuthbertson, in ballad, sonnet and lay, characteristically dreams his quiet pictures of rural life; and, with a sweet simplicity preserves within his verse, the light of dying days." It is not merely that this sentence is inserted unchronologically, or that it is too bare to be of any value. A survey of Scotch poetry should not tail off in this fashion. Hamewith forms a good climax, and for once Mr. Watt has forgotten his artistic cunning in failing to see this.

The book is written with fervour. The author has evidently gone into many of the critical problems which he scattered across his path, but his main interest is not in texts nor in prosody nor even in authorship, it is in the warmth and energy of the Scottish spirit as reflected in its poetry. Allan Ramsay he praises as the man who "vindicated poetry and the right to smile in Scotland." Even Joanna Bailie he lets down easily. "Her tragedies have been compared to Shirley's and Massinger's; but the comparison would not be made to-day." He refuses to strip King James of his traditional authorship. "The matter remains where tradition left it." But this enthusiasm for the subject has at any rate the merit of life, and Mr. Watt's survey is touched with qualities of popular sympathy and vivacity which a more critical treatment would probably have missed. To say that we occasionally overhear the poet, the preacher, and the patriot, is not to depreciate its usefulness. There are many worse things in writing a history of poetry than the temper which has no desire to pose as an icicle or an iconoclast.

JAMES MOFFATT.

THE NEW MOLIÈRE.*

Mr. Hyndman, in his latest "Reminiscences," wonders what Mr. Shaw might have been had his great gifts been nourished on the best cooking washed down with Burgundy born in a good year. A more difficult speculation still is to imagine the regimen that would raise the commentators on Shaw to the plane of even tolerable interest. Many readers will remember the desolating stream of exegesis poured out some years ago by devout Wagnerians—some backwash of it, by the way, splash up even now, to the delight of the profane and the distress of the faithful. The Shaw stream is rapidly attaining the same proportions and the same character. Small wonder, then, that the younger generation are beginning to blaspheme openly, to pronounce him "awfully ninetyish," and to expose him as a humbug who cribbed his wit from Oscar Wilde, his views of life from Samuel Butler, and his dramatic methods from Molière.

* "The Technique of Bernard Shaw's Plays." By Augustin Hamon. Translated by Frank Maurice. 2s. net. (C. W. Daniel, Ltd.)

A day or two ago a critic of this school declared to me that the only noticeable quality of Shaw was his mastery of stage mechanism. He did not explain why he and his kind will insist on talking to everybody at length about the man in whom they don't believe; but, anyhow, the judgment was remarkable. Turn to the reviews of the plays published in 1898, and you will find Mr. Shaw credited with various literary qualities, but unanimously denied the possession of the theatrical sense. One very friendly writer remarked of "Plays, Pleasant and Unpleasant" that the author had grouped together

"as much good and bad work in one book as perhaps ever was brought together in these two kinds since the printing of books began. There is a kind of play-writing which the French call 'Le Theatre Impossible,' which they print in books that make excellent reading, but which no sane stage manager would put on the boards. With one exception, Mr. Shaw's plays are of this impossible kind."

The one exception is "Arms and the Man" for it was difficult to deny, even in those bleak days of the drama, that a thing that had already achieved a fair run was really playable. But observe: 1913 asserts that Mr. Shaw's most noticeable quality is a command of stage mechanism; 1898 asserted that Mr. Shaw's most noticeable defect was a lack of stage technique and (in the quoted instance) appealed to the French. And now here is a French critic delivering nine lectures at the Sorbonne upon the plays of this questionable person, choosing to publish one of them as a separate booklet, and selecting for that purpose a lecture devoted solely to the Molièrish technique of the Shavian drama. Thus the latest critic allows him both the literary excellences conceded by 1898 and the dramatic gifts acknowledged by 1913. Perhaps there is something in Shaw after all.

I wish it were possible to phrase M. Augustin Hamon's lecture. I hope I haven't read it with my eyes or my mind shut, for it seems to me to do little more than say that Shaw's plays are humorous because they are funny, and to support that desperate statement by solemn appeals to Bergson. Very probably it would read much better in its place among the other lectures. We shall see. Incidentally I ask whether the character called Bryan in one place, Brian in another, and clearly intended for Bohun, is a French version of the legal gentleman whom Mr. Shaw borrowed from "Great Expectations," or is merely a whim of the translators. Likewise who are "Bramsden," "Peter Kerigan," and "Judge Howard Allan"? Can the last be intended for Maud Hallam?

GEORGE SAMPSON.

SWINBURNE: A TEMPERAMENTAL STUDY.*

This book compels an interest due not merely to its author or its subject, but almost as much to the conjunction of author and subject. The most reticent, cool and wise of living critics has set himself to the "critical study" of the most impulsive and prodigal of nineteenth century poets. I am not sure that in this contrast of temperaments we do not find the most valuable aspect of the book. Swinburne has been dead nearly four years, the hour of ceremonious eulogy has passed; and we begin to ask ourselves questions which (as Mr. Thomas reminds us) are more easy than answers. Now, in fact, is the sober judicial voice heard in the land, anticipating (it may be thought) the judgment of posterity. It is Mr. Thomas's voice, the voice of a man free of illusion, a man who has never had, you think, any illusion at all concerning this poetry. Others have felt Swinburne's poetry as an intoxication, an enchantment; for Mr. Thomas there is at most a splendid incantation and a brief spell. His is the self-possession of one whose intelligence is undisturbed by passion, who has seen others strangely moved, and the singer himself most strangely moved of all; and, so seeing, has noted gravely, narrowly, wittily, the means by which the singer has called up that passionate and powerful spirit. The author of "Rest and Unrest" weighs the words of the author of "Atalanta in Calydon," and "Tristram of Lyonesse."

* "Swinburne." By Edward Thomas. 7s. 6d. net. (Martin Secker.)

Mr. Thomas's most penetrating pages are those in which he tries to divine the spring from which Swinburne's lyrical flood streams out—to explain whatever secret there may be in the means by which Swinburne achieves his indubitable impression:

Perhaps the greatest of his triumphs is in keeping up a stately solemn play of words not unrelated to the object suggested by his title and commencement, but more closely related to rhymes, and yet in the end giving a compact and powerful impression.

Of the "Elegy" on Richard Burton he writes:

Memory and thought had been awakened and excited by Burton's death, and the ordinary values of things—the tourist value, for example—had been disturbed or destroyed. His recollections of the mountains ceased to be, if they ever had been, more or less, large, disintegrated fragments of the earth and became a region of the spiritual world, mingling with other mountains, seen, read of, or imagined, coloured and changed by a hundred other images assembled at the passionate thought of death and of the past. . . . Once this paroxysm of emotional thought had begun to enter the form of—"Auvergne, Auvergne, O wild and woeful land" . . . the incalculable suggestions of rhythm began to enter and still further to convert the humorous and rational atheist. The result is, I believe, as accurate and real as a map or a guide book, and that in spite of what, to another view, might seem words only, begotten of words.

Best of all, because a little more cordial, is the analysis of "Ave Atque Vale," ending with such cautious, acute phrases as:

The poem is not a rational meditation, but the uncouth experience of death clothed in the strangest variety of words and ideas, which results in music rather than articulate speech. Perhaps no single sentence in the poem is unintelligible to the mind any more than it is ungrammatical. But the combination is one which the mind cannot judge, though it may approve, seeing the effect, and say that it is beyond her expectation or understanding.

Even in speaking of this poem, and while acknowledging that he "cannot pretend to explain it," he goes on to show with curious precision how its effect is helped or hindered by particular words, and to say that he forbears to question as closely as he might. Frequently you are conscious of this forbearance on the critic's part, and sometimes when it is not evident you will note how easy it is for the critic to become superior to his poet, and, in his quiet, witty way, to make Swinburne appear irreflective, self-contradictory, slightly ridiculous. Witness this, among a long list of Swinburne's phrases about death and immortality:

On the other hand, saluting Baudelaire, he asked the dead if it were well, and were there flowers or fruit where he was, but concluded by bidding him be content.

For whom all winds are quiet as the sun,
All water as the shore.

Mr. Thomas's skill has never appeared so excellent as in brief summaries and pregnant comments of this kind.

There is another way of looking at Swinburne. When Meredith heard the news of his death he wrote to Mr. Watts-Dunton a letter, the last he ever wrote, in which he said:

"The end has come! That brain of the vivid illumination is extinct. I can hardly realise it when I revolve the many times when at the starting of an idea the whole town was instantly ablaze with electric light. Song was his natural voice. He was the greatest of our lyrical poets—of the world, I could say, considering what a language he had to wield.

It is rich and noble praise, struck out in the heat of intense sorrow. When all has been said that the pure intelligence (of which Mr. Thomas speaks) can devise, you are left with this: either Swinburne was no poet at all, however marvellous his gift for verse, or there is an incalculable more—inaccessible to pure intelligence, as secret as life itself, being indeed the life of poetry. It were a bold thing to forecast the regard in which Swinburne's immense volume of work will be held a hundred years hence; but if it survive at all—even by but a few pages of an anthology—it will be because of something rare and individual. That individual thing is the one thing that matters to us now, the one thing we secretly prize, the one thing past analysis. In a dozen ways Swinburne may seem ridiculous, but it is nearly half a century since "Atalanta," "Poems and Ballads," and "A Song of Italy" appeared; and as the flight of so many years finds us still prizing more than a little of these volumes, it would seem that the individual thing is already to be identified though not explained.

THE SURVIVOR

This at least is clear, that beyond any poet Swinburne is dominated by rhythm. A poet strives, sometimes consciously, often unconsciously, to conform to a secret rhythm that may distress him by its vehemence, or delicately elude him; it is always to an inward beat and pause that his response is made. Swinburne seems to me to have been haunted, even possessed, by rhythm strong, insistent, irresistible. Of words he was himself the master, but rhythm subdued him. What he heard was large, not delicate; he loved intense things. His submission to rhythm brought something new into English poetry, something which has not yet been freely developed. The choral parts of "Atalanta," "A Leave-Taking," "The Oblation," and perhaps a dozen other poems, remain among the new and wonderful things. "It is not," says Mr. Thomas, speaking of the revolutionary poems, "it is not thought set to music, but music which has absorbed thought." Thus casually, thus unguardedly (you might think), does he utter the noblest and final praise of Swinburne's work. For those who feel this poet to be among the greatest of lyrical poets there is probably not a sentence in Mr. Thomas's book which they can easily repudiate. They will, perhaps, think it fortunate that the first thorough study of Swinburne should render the work of panegyrist and caviller alike unprofitable and vain.

JOHN FREEMAN.

SCIENCE, NATURE AND ROMANCE.*

In the ordinary way of science M. Fabre, the great entomologist, would have had to work out a lifetime of drudgery by teaching in an academy, with the prospect, like the Abbot Mendl, of coming into fame long after his death. Either this, or he would have had to toil away at the lecturer's desk, and waste himself upon such elements of science as a popular audience will listen to. He took the wiser course of seclusion and a frugal life in order to pursue his studies without distraction, and work them out to a logical completeness. All the world knows the story now, and of the quiet entry into fame of a man who has played the hermit for so many years, to his own content and the profit of mankind. But it has not been sufficiently grateful perhaps to M. Maeterlinck for making the transition possible within the scientist's own lifetime. It prefers to dwell, perhaps, on the inequality which bestows on the poet and playwright more wealth for a single work, perhaps, than has served to keep M. Fabre all his working years. But this disparity is the world's own fault, and is none of M. Maeterlinck's contriving. Mankind will always pay for pleasure more than it will ever pay for knowledge; and the injustice of this is roughly balanced by the consideration that knowledge such as M. Fabre has gathered is not reducible to money terms.

There Was Chaos and All Manner of Unseemly Noises.

From "People of the Wild," by F. St. Mars (Werner Laurie)

It was inevitable that, sooner or later, we should get an authorised and uniform English edition of M. Fabre's writings, especially of his ten volumes of marvellous "Souvenirs Entomologiques," but it was not so certain that this English version would appear as soon as we desired. Happily, we get an earnest of it now in the shape of a well planned and well translated volume of attractive but perfectly serious exterior, and the further the series goes the better we shall be pleased. For the publishers have done well to give the book the best of all introductions. This is the essay by M. Maeterlinck, which for most of us has served as the stepping-stone into that world of fact transmuted by genius, of which M. Fabre is master. As the prologue reminds us, the scientist displays that genius of his in nothing more than in his gift of a rare expository style which has nothing of M. Maeterlinck's twilight glamour about it, but a zest and vividness which tingle the blood as we read. To discuss it all in detail will occupy the learned for many years to come; all we are concerned with at present is to applaud and welcome the present expression of it. And if we add a word, it is to lament that science had no such fascinating form when most of us thirsted for knowledge of Nature and her ways when we were younger than we are to-day.

Mr. F. St. Mars does his sparring with Nature rather less gently. He is undeterred by the attack that Mr. Roosevelt delivered a few years ago on the type of animal novel that Mr. Jack London and Mr. C. G. D. Roberts have cultivated with success. His reply would possibly be that it needed no President to advertise a form of pseudo-Kipling literature that the States have accepted so readily and made so profitable for the author. Landseer made himself famous by putting human emotions into the faces of animals, and the result has survived the condemnation of all critics who deny that sort of anthropomorphism the name of art.

* "The Life of a Spider." By J. H. Fabre. Translated by Alexander Teixeira de Mattos. 6s. net. (Hodder & Stoughton.)
 "People of the Wild." By F. St. Mars. 3s. 6d. net. (Werner Laurie.)

When it is well done there may be the same kind of prospective longevity for the romance that puts superhuman reasoning and audacity into birds and beasts and embarks them on adventures of the breathless description. Mr. St. Mars certainly puts sufficient of the "wild" into his seven stories of magpie, wild cat, wolverine, and the rest. We are prepared to believe that there are wild cats in Scotland answering in ferocity to his account, and capable of surviving shipwreck by sea and encounters with eagles on land. But our admission, like our admiration, has the qualification of distance, and we suspect that the author's courage has the same attribute behind it. He makes free with Scotland because he is writing for Americans; and if Scots naturalists are tempted to take the book up it may survive, like his wild cat, because of its fierce American slang. But there is no mistaking the author's powers of invention and force in writing, and when he ceases to strain after smart effects we may perhaps emphasise our praise still more.

ANATOLE FRANCE.*

These are two volumes of Mr. Lane's English edition of Anatole France's works, and no doubt they will be warmly welcomed by those readers who do not care to tackle them in the original French. All the same it must be admitted that Anatole France does not translate well into English; if anything, he loses even more than Maupassant. The delicate irony, finish and lightness of his touch cannot keep their original bloom. It would need a master as great as himself to translate Anatole France as he should be translated, and even then it is very doubtful whether his native genius is not too Gallic to be rendered satisfactorily in a foreign tongue. However, all this is not meant to discourage translations of his works (which, indeed, are most necessary); rather is it meant to encourage readers of them who may feel a sense of disappointment which they never expected to feel.

Of the two volumes before us, "Jocasta and The Famished Cat" is much the more remarkable. It consists of two stories. The first is one of Parisian life before and after the Franco-Prussian war. There are four main characters—Monsieur Fellaire de Sisac, his daughter Jocasta, her lover Dr. René Longuemare, and a middle-aged, rich Englishman, who marries Jocasta, called Mr. Haviland. Fellaire is a speculator who has raised himself to an insecure affluence from the most wretched beginnings; his daughter is one of these sombre and passionate figures to whom life is nearly always a burden. She and René love one another, but they never speak of their love, and he goes away to Cochin China, and she marries Haviland, half out of pique and half out of a Madame-Bovary-like wish for luxury. Haviland is a curious, narrow, unimaginative, upright man, who heaps jewellery and so on upon her, but would rather die than be cheated out of a franc. Their life together soon bores Jocasta intolerably, especially as her husband has taken a violent dislike to her father, who has lost all his money in the war and has started sponging upon Haviland. Just then René appears from the East, and all the old feeling is awakened between Jocasta and him. The brightness of this time is horribly darkened for Jocasta by the discovery that Haviland is being poisoned to death by his servant, Groult. Her mind is in a fever of torment, of doubt, of disordered thoughts. Haviland dies, and shortly afterwards she commits suicide by hanging herself. It certainly is, as Anatole France calls it, "a sinister story," "a tale steeped in violence and unrest."

"The Famished Cat" reads almost like a dream. Some of its chief actors (there are many) are negroes or half-castes from Haïti and Martinique, who throw a kind of mysterious and exotic atmosphere over the pages. It is a story of Bohemian life in Paris. The characters are mostly exaggerated and bizarre types of the Parisian artistic sets. They meet frequently at "The Famished Cat"—a little, cheap restaurant. One of the students is Sainte-Lucie, an indolent, voluptuous, and cat-like Haïtian—a very fascinating and primitive figure. Round him centres this improbable and delicious phantasy of adventure and love. Anatole France's touch can seldom have been lighter than when he imagined this mosaic of a cosmopolitan city. It has, in fact, not only the singularity of a dream, but that dream-sense as of something else behind it, exciting and vague, which one can never quite get at.

* "Jocasta and The Famished Cat." Translated by Agnes Fearley. 6s. (John Lane.) "The Aspirations of Jean Servien." Translated by Alfred Allinson. 6s. (John Lane.)

It is depressing to have to leave these two masterpieces for the arid and dreary pages of "The Aspirations of Jean Servien." This must be one of Anatole France's least successful efforts. It is the work of a man whose creative faculty is not working properly. To speak quite candidly, it is a dull book—which is always a crime in the eyes of a Frenchman, and doubly a crime in the case of so exquisite an artist and raconteur as Anatole France. Jean Servien is the son of a bookbinder. He is born in Paris in the '40's of the nineteenth century, and is brought up by his father and aunt. We are told about his life through the years of boyhood up till the time of his death at the hands of a Commune mob during the siege of Paris. His is an unhappy life, because his temperament and desires are so wholly at variance with his station. He wants to be a man of the grand world, a man of fashion, and he is merely the son of a poor bookbinder. Moreover, he falls desperately in love with an actress, desperately and hopelessly in love. This sorrow undermines his existence and makes death a matter of comparatively small concern to him. What one misses particularly in this novel is the profound conception of character, the glowing sense of atmosphere, which light up the best of Anatole France's work. "The Aspirations of Jean Servien" is almost dry and colourless, it has little of the magic one associates with the name of its author. Of course it is, in a way, finished and able—it would be impossible for anything that Anatole France did to be otherwise—but it is not in the least degree a great book.

But, to end up on the same note on which we started, it is really unfair on Anatole France to have to judge him by translations. Everyone who knows French would agree to that, and a good many would go to the extent of saying that he was actually untranslatable—that is to say, that it would be beyond human capacity to do justice to him in any English translation whatsoever. However that may be, it is certainly completely obvious that it is much wiser to read him in French than to read him in English. But that is, after all, a counsel of perfection. For those who cannot, we recommend these translations.

RICHARD CURLE.

THE LETTERS OF A POST IMPRESSIONIST.*

The enthusiastic Post Impressionist, whether he be a connoisseur or an artist, will be delighted with this book, for it will not only strengthen his faith, but will enable him to meet those who coldly disapprove, and those who actively oppose, the movement with real argument and not mere emotional enthusiasm. Every reader who has the honesty to put aside prejudice will be convinced that at any rate Van Gogh and Gauguin were perfectly sincere in all their innovations. Mr. Ludovici's essay is a really valuable part of the book, for though it is often dogmatic, in many places very provocative, it contains much very sound theory, and is a careful and reasoned defence, never degenerating into mere enthusiastic eulogy, of the work of Van Gogh. The personality of Van Gogh as here revealed is very attractive, the letters are in no case given in full, personal gossip and matters of ephemeral interest are omitted, but there remains a very intimate expression of his creed, minute explanations of his technic, and interesting descriptions of what his pictures are meant to be; and what will no doubt surprise many a passionate love of beauty and hatred of ugliness. When he writes of living artists, he shows a real and generous appreciation of their work, and his general art criticisms prove that he is no mere iconoclast, but one who can understand and enjoy any manifestation of real greatness. There is too that inevitable sadness which comes to every man who is sincere enough to measure his actual achievements by his own ideals. Mr. Ludovici sums up the most important part of Van Gogh's view thus:

* "The Letters of a Post Impressionist." Being the Familiar Correspondence of Vincent Van Gogh. Translated by A. M. Ludovici, with an Introductory Essay on Van Gogh and his Art. 7s. 6d. net. (Constable.)

"Van Gogh towards the end became quite positive, notably in his attitude towards life itself, but above all in his attitude towards man. After much tribulation and the gravest and most depressing doubts, he at last realised this fundamental truth—that art, sound art, cannot be an end in itself, that art for art's sake is simply the maddest form of individualistic isolation—not to use a less sonorous but more drastic term—and that art can find its meaning only in life, and in its function as a life force. The highest art, then, must be the art that seeks its meaning in the highest form of life. What is the highest form of life? Van Gogh replies to this question as emphatically and uncompromisingly as every rare and healthy artist has done in all the sanest and healthiest periods of history. He says 'Olan'."

Nevertheless, Van Gogh was profoundly dissatisfied with civilised man as he now lives. Mr. Ludovici holds that it was this deep dissatisfaction which brought about his ultimate madness, and gives an explanation of how inevitable it is that in these days so many great men must become mad. This may or may not be true, but it is almost a truism to assert that the most significant feature of all art must be its pre-eminent sanity, and even though Van Gogh's insanity may have arisen from the thwarting of his artist's instincts, an explanation of his comparative failure must also be found in this same insanity. Many thoughtful persons will recognise that there is much that is divine in this present discontent, but no one can expect true art to flourish until this discontent has been removed. Van Gogh with his sincerity thoroughly understood that, as can be seen by this quotation from the letter of Gauguin describing his death:

"He (Van Gogh) fires a bullet at himself, and a few hours later, while lying in bed smoking his pipe, with all his wits about him, full of passionate love for his art, and without any feelings of resentment towards humanity, he quietly passed away."

A. H. J.

EAST ANGLIAN HOUSES.*

Though individually the cottages, farmhouses and other buildings that Mr. Basil Oliver writes about in this interesting volume may be of no particular importance, they do collectively, as he remarks, play an essential part in the history of our national architecture. "They were produced," he says, "by local craftsmen, and are not the work of trained architects, for master-builders were not so designated in England until the days of Inigo Jones and Wren, and such men devoted their attention almost entirely to the larger works. The small buildings were moreover constructed of local materials in the local traditional manner, an ideal combination to which we can never again entirely revert, owing to altered conditions. Thus, being a natural product of the time and locality, the old work invariably harmonized with the surrounding country. Its simplicity and qualities of picturesqueness are also accounted for to some extent by a singular freedom from affectation or any artificial striving after effect, and have consequently given to it a great deal of character." This is amply borne out by the examples of such buildings that Mr. Oliver describes and by the sketches and the numerous and beautifully-printed colotype plates from photographs with which his book is illustrated. Norfolk, Suffolk, and rural Essex constitute East Anglia for Mr. Oliver's purposes, and his work is the more valuable in that though he writes with expert knowledge, he does not use the technical language that only experts can read with pleasure. He knows his subject thoroughly, and has had the art to treat it in a style that makes it attractive to the general reader. His dates and historical information have been carefully verified; the unusual variety in the types of East Anglian architecture give him opportunities of avoiding anything like monotony in his letterpress and pictures and he has taken full advantage of them. It is a book that architects will find of great practical usefulness, and it should especially appeal to all and they are many and increasing in numbers who are anyway concerned with the architectural renaissance that is now become a potent influence in the life of modern England.

*"Old Houses and Village Buildings in East Anglia." By Basil Oliver, A R I B A. Illustrated. 21s. net (Batsford.)

A House in St Nicholas Street - King's Lynn

East Anglian Houses.

From "Old Houses and Village Buildings in East Anglia," by Basil Oliver (Batsford).

RECENT BRITISH HISTORY.

Contributions of considerable value have been made to English History during the past season. October witnessed the apparition of a stupendous volume upon the book-stalls—a book over a quarter of a foot thick, containing well over a thousand pages, weighing about as much as a well nourished baby, and densely packed with illustrations—all for the moderate price of three shillings and sixpence. A more unwieldy book has hardly been seen since Mr. Paul's "Life of J. A. Fronde." The laudable object, no doubt, was to make it a work of reference indispensable to every middle class family and to carry the formidable defences of paterfamilias by a coup de main. The size and the weight no less than the title of "A History of the British Nation" are undoubtedly provocative. The book itself, so far as we can judge, is admirably compiled and shows the author, Mr. A. D. Innes, to much greater advantage as a surveyor of the whole field than does his monograph on "England under the Tudors" as a specialist on a selected period. With its great wealth of illustrations, maps, plans and tables, the book is a priceless addition to the reference shelf of the ordinary citizen. The ordonnance of the book, as the French would say, leaves very little to be desired. Personally, I should have liked a fuller table of contents. The headings are novel and attractive, but are not quite expansive enough. From the student's point of view, the balance of the book would have been greatly improved had rather a fuller allowance been granted to the period from Alfred to Rufus. While one hundred and thirty pages are devoted to Victoria, Alfred the Great is dismissed in three. This disproportion may be popular, but seems rather an excessive compliment to our noble selves. The book excels in condensed statement. Take the Barons War, the Accession of Elizabeth, the Cornua Campaign—the reader will be astonished to find how full and fair an account has been packed into a single paragraph. The chapters on "Aspects," Economic Progress, Society, Manners and Literature are a notable feature. Altogether, this is a book which attains a very high standard of accuracy and diligently acquired merit. It should count upon a large and unanimous public support.

With this work we must take the opportunity of comparing the six-shilling, seven hundred and fifty page volume on "The Groundwork of British History" by G. Townsend Warner and C. H. K. Marten, recently issued by Messrs. Blackie. This is a book more expressly intended for boys, it is less exhaustive, and aims specially at making boys, who are beginning to regard history seriously, use their reasoning faculties in applying themselves to the subject. It is extraordinarily well conceived and well written. "Groundwork" is not taken to exclude personal detail, and the notes are a delight. It is said that a Guardsman confessed to having felt bored at the battle of Waterloo; but, on the other hand, a boy of fourteen who had left Eton to take part in the campaign, wrote to his mother after the battle was over: "Dear Mamma, Cousin Tom and I are all right. I never saw anything like it in my life." The book is a testimony to the increased importance of historical teaching at Eton and Harrow. Mr. Warner's "Landmarks" are already a valuable asset of the history teacher. The name of Mr. Marten is a talisman to Eton boys. Boys who have studied history under him have travelled in the past and have found the journey delightful. The influence that a good history teacher can exercise is almost illimitable. You have only to mention the name Marten to an Eton boy; his face lights up at once, and he puts forth his full powers.

Mr. R. H. Gretton in his "Modern History of the English,"† goes some way towards defying criticism. One has read, it may well be, one's McCarthy and Bright, and grafted upon these the histories of Spencer Walpole and Herbert Paul, but this brief, succinct, yet compendious chronicle of the eighties and nineties of the last century has in it an element of painfulness. It is suggestive of a satire by Mr. Beerbohm, or the perusal of an album of half venerable but ridiculously dowdy old photographs—or dashing in a motor through a cemetery of grass-grown tumuli and experiencing a succession of sensational bumps. Perspective is impossible in a period so near at hand. The central figure is Gladstone. How that name thrilled us in the eighties. How powerless, how nebulous it seems now. What deceptions we seem to have been going through all the time! Above all self-deceptions. It was the period of a colossal self-complacency and self-consciousness of virtue, the period of the two Jubilees which the newspapers fostered to the top of their bent. The little touches about Jumbo, bicycling in Battersea Park, the Baccarat Scandal, and Linger Longer Loo, bring it home to us more than generalisations upon the personalities of politicians or estimates of the fluctuations of England's posture vis à vis of Europe and America. Mr. Gretton pretends to no exceptional vision, but he chronicles for us upon a peculiar instrument of his own, and when he has done we recognise how dexterously he has manipulated the stops. He must be a man of robust temper, so painfully farcical at times cannot fail to appeal this preternaturally modern history. His chance as a dramatic historian will come with the second volume dealing with the period of the Great Boer War. He has to remember that a new generation is growing up which has hardly heard of French and Buller, and knows nothing of Magersfontein and Spion Kop. His narrative in this field promises to be painfully absorbing. In volume I he holds our attention closely but his theme is not heroic—candidly it reminded me for all the world of the "Diary of a Nobody."

* "A History of the British Nation." 3s. 6d. net. (T. C. & E. C. Jack.)

† "Modern History of the English." Vol. I. 1880-1898. 7s. 6d. net. (Grant Richards.)

Miss Kate Norgate was set on this work upon "The Minority of Henry III"‡ by Mr. T. A. Archer, the chronicler of the third crusade, and to his memory she dedicates the book. It will be remembered how valorously she championed him in the great epic battle about the palisade at the Battle of Hastings. It is curious to note the divergence in style between the late J. R. Green's disciples and literary executors. Mrs. Green is crusading in the neighbouring island on behalf of St. Patrick and a medieval Ireland which many deem to be almost entirely fabulous. Miss Norgate exposes the baronial oligarchy of the thirteenth century, an oligarchy in the sincere patriotism of which, so far as we remember, J. R. Green had a touching confidence. She adopts more and more the method of S. R. Gardiner, using chronicles where he uses pamphlets, and the intensity of her devotion to these old Latin chronicling-historians makes her three parts of a medieval chronicler herself. She devotes in this volume three hundred well filled pages to the ten years from 1216 to 1226 and it must have cost her full five years to account for this decade in the minutely, thorough and compendious way she has done. After reading her account of the "Fair of Lincoln" and "The Battle of Sandwich" no one will fail to understand the joint ascendancy exercised during this period by Hubert de Burgh and William Marshal. The Earl Marshal is nobly portrayed. Like Clive and Wellington, he was deemed in youth the fool of the family and dubbed "Will Wastemate." In his old age he became the true mirror of a loyal and faithful knight. "God's Feet," said Richard, "I have always held him for the most loyal knight in all my realm." John, on his deathbed, put his whole trust in him. Henry II. and Philip Augustus tell the same tale. In Stephen Langton's words the grand old Marshal was "the best knight of all the world that has lived in our time."

The genesis of the radical and reform movements in Britain has not, perhaps, hitherto attracted so much attention as it deserved from modern historians. There is, no doubt, the suggestive little book on "The English Jacobins" by Mr. Edward Smith, and there is a good deal of information in Erskine May's and similar compilations. This field is now attracting the attention of a posse of capable writers. The chief motive forces were the American Revolution, the political agitations connected with the name of John Wilkes and finally, of course, the stimulus derived from the great events of 1789. Sir George Trevelyan has recently treated the subject from the American Revolution point of view. We are expecting an elaborate monograph on Wilkes which will, it is hoped, be well documented on the constitutional side from the capable pen of Mr. Horace Blackley; while Mr. Veitch of Liverpool University has long been engaged upon a serious study of relations between French and English Jacobins. But the promise of help from these works is still in futuro. Mr. Henry W. Meikle's book on "Scotland and the French Revolution" is a most useful contribution in esse. Scotland, he shows, was anything but inflammable material between 1745—1789. Even the burning question of church patronage may be said to have smouldered. Dundas mobilised the Parliament representation of Scotland, the country was rapidly growing richer, the menace of 1745 acted as a perpetual remembrancer of the benefits of 1688 and 1715; there existed certainly a languid agitation in favour of borough reform, the abolition of the Test, and of the slave trade; but so long as the trade returns were satisfactory few questions were asked. Mr. Meikle shows how Burke's "Reflections" and Paine's "Rights of Man" transformed this lethargy into a state of active propaganda. Scotland for the first time became a country of politicians and agitators. Two of Burke's most vigorous critics, Christie and Mackintosh, hailed from North of Tweed. Mr. Meikle gives an admirable account of the unrest of 1791, the rise of political societies such as the "Friends of the People," in Scotland; the fullest account we have seen of "The British Convention" with an appendix of delegates; and of the state trials and methods of repression to which these various agitations gave rise. Of Thomas Muir, in particular, he communicates many new particulars; of Muir, who was to have been a member of the Scotch Directory (he died in exile in January, 1799, and was buried at Chantilly), a rival revolutionist, Wolfe Tone, wrote that he was the vainest and most obstinate blockhead he ever met. Mr. Meikle's references to the literature of the period are very welcome and greatly enhance the value of his monograph. He illustrates the political apathy of Scotland in the seventeen-eighties by Mrs. Hamilton's "Cottagers of Glenburnie." He quotes "The Antiquary" and "St. Ronan's Well," and E. H. Strain's "A Prophet's Reward." But in historical value he gives the palm to the novels of John Galt. The "Annals of the Parish" afford a realistic picture of the social and political transformation, while the "Provost" depicts the Augean condition of Scottish municipal and borough politics before the Act of 1833. This is emphatically a book to be studied and kept for reference. The Bibliography is invaluable.

‡ "The Minority of Henry III." With Notes and Index. 6s. 6d. net. (Macmillan.)

THOMAS SECCOMBE.

Novel Notes.

THE HEROINE IN BRONZE. By James Lane Allen. 6s. (Macmillan)

She lived within less than half a block of Fifth Avenue, and an iron fence and rhododendron hedge ran along the front of her mansion. Her father was a New Yorker of immense wealth, more concerned over the hardy adventurous Britisher who might some day lift the "America's" cup, than over the hardy adventurous American who might sooner lift his daughter. And while he was busy with finance and yachting affairs, a young man with neither money nor a title took to talking through the iron fence and rhododendrons to the lovely girl on the other side. It is a charming fairy tale, with a banker's daughter as the princess, and a rather conceited young American novelist as the prince. But Mr. James Lane Allen tells it with such leisurely delight and careful and careless art, that it becomes almost a joyous, actual adventure in a world of beautiful realities. Mr. Allen has always seemed to us an essayist of fine quality who uses the form of the novel for his own purpose. The story in itself does not greatly interest him: and though he falls in love with some of his characters—he is quite in love with his present heroine—yet he likes his work best when it allows him to indulge his special genius. He can be humorous or touching, reflective or whimsical; but he cannot be hurried. Whenever the tale tries to carry him past some point at which he wants to rest and look about him, he stops the action, and holds the reader's attention by keeping him expectant and yet side-tracked. He plays with the story, while pouring out a stream of entertaining remarks and striking observation on life generally. In the present case, he has made the remarkable discovery that modern New York has an idyllic, pastoral side, if approached in the right direction and the right frame of mind. Having by his power of delicate, selective vision, brought out this new aspect of the city of sky-scraping and hustle, he makes it the scene of a pure and enchanting romance. Being, however, an essayist with as keen an insight into human character, Mr. Allen gets an unusual richness of thought and feeling into his beautiful fantasy. His fairy princess subtly changes from a lovely, remote, aerial creature into a woman of flesh and blood; and the conceited young novelist, who tells the story, becomes at last a man. He is really painted with a knowledge of youthful literary ambition which is cruelly frank. He boasts to himself of his coming greatness in a manner that sometimes made us weary of his company. We were quite relieved when Mr. Allen with quiet irony made the supposed great novel, with which the heroine was to be won, turn out a failure. But of course the penniless novelist ends by marrying the banker's rich and beautiful daughter. For, as it always happens in fairyland, she was in love with him from the first.

* "Scotland and the French Revolution." 10s. net. (Glasgow: James Maclehose & Sons.)

THINGS THAT PASS. By Alice E. Robbans. 6s. (McLose)

In a story so full of clever little touches it is a pity that the plot has not more strength; it lacks grip through being spread out over too great a number of years, and develops too much into a record of incidents in the lives of a certain group of people. If the author had expanded on the characters of these people it might have been more effective. Yet the book has many human and interesting moments. It opens with the coming of Mary West, a young bride, to her new home, a farm in the country: she is one of those people "who seem born into the world for the express purpose of serving others," and throughout the tale she plays a quietly influencing, shadowy part, the principal woman character being Lena Williams, who comes as a lady help to the farm and remains as Mary's daughter-in-law.

LITTLE THANK YOU

By Mrs. T. P. O'Connor
2s. net. (Putnam's)

Readers of Mrs. T. P. O'Connor's book of personal recollections, "I, Myself," know that she has a racy gift of humour and a sparkling vivacity of style; they will find these qualities again in "Little Thank You," and added to them a tenderness and quaintness and simple pathos that should carry this charming novel into an easy popularity. It does not attempt to harrow us with grim problems; it is not a tract or a medical pamphlet in disguise; it is just a story of everyday life and pleasant everyday people—a love story that is unconventional in so far as that its heroine is a pretty young widow whose love romance is as simple and girlish and beautiful an affair as if she had never loved before, and yet she had loved her first husband as wholly and as passionately. She has one child, the delightful little fellow who is nicknamed "Little Thank You," and he is that rare thing in fiction a child who is childlike and natural and wins your interest and your liking. As a rule the child in novels is a little nuisance and a bore, but Little Thank You plays so important a part in the story which is named after him that it could not do without him; and he is not only necessary to it, but is really its chief attraction. The plot is slight, but it is strong enough because your interest is so entirely taken with the people concerned in its development. The sketches of South American life and character are admirable. To all who like a happy story of happy people, whose happiness is shadowed at times by the misunderstandings and the passing sorrows that come to all human creatures, we recommend this clever novel of Mrs. T. P. O'Connor's without any reserve whatever.

Mrs. T. P. O'Connor.

THE RECIPE FOR RUBBER. By Ralph Stock. With Illustrations by Norman Lindsay. 6s. (Lynwood.)

Probably the bookstalls have already acquainted you with the outward seeming of Mr. Ralph Stock's heroine, for "The Recipe for Rubber" and the clever drawings which Mr. Norman Lindsay has made for it have already been the light in the pages of a popular magazine. You must know her by sight, surely—that pretty girl in the blue bathing-dress amid the tropical or submarine surroundings? You must not be prejudiced against her, for she is quite the nicest swimmer we have ever met, and so unspoiled and fresh and innocent, too. She is the central figure of a very dramatic and exciting little story, quite excellently well done in its way, and we can very strongly recommend her acquaintance. "The Recipe for Rubber" is a workmanlike and enjoyable tale, which simply insists upon being read at a sitting. Mr. Stock is to be congratulated upon a very refreshing first appearance as a novelist.

GUINEA GOLD. By Beatrice Grimshaw. 6s. (Mills & Boon.)

This is a thoroughly sound healthy book, and will appeal to readers of both sexes who care for adventure, and are interested in living human beings. The story is carefully constructed, and interesting throughout, but it is no mere adventure story in which puppets mechanically go through their parts, the people are actual and always alive. The writing is good, and there are many passages of real poetry and eloquence. It is not, however, a work of great originality, the characters seem somewhat familiar friends, and the incidents are not quite unexpected. But the author is no copyist, in her hands the characters and incidents are alive; this is not the less so, because we are reminded of those we have met before. The story is that of three men, who go into partnership to seek for gold; we follow their steps and their adventures with breathless interest, we see the conflict of their characters and get an intimate knowledge of their lives, we are caught by the romance of gold digging and the perpetual fierce struggle with nature. But we are interested in something besides the gold—a love story with a very pathetic heroine, two of the men love her, she loves one, but they are both loyal and sacrifice everything to make her happy. The adventures in this book are but an incident in the lives of the three men, which will, however, never be forgotten—one at least (the hero) goes back and fulfils his old obligations, and finds satisfaction and happiness in so doing. It is not quite the book that we should expect to be written by a woman, but it contains many of the good qualities which more specially belong to that sex.

PRIVATE SMITH. By Captain Oswald Dallas. 6s. (Herbert Jenkins.)

In a brief foreword to this story Sir Robert Baden-Powell states that "if the nation knew more about their soldiers . . . and appreciated them at their proper worth, instead of merely glorifying them in war and forgetting them in peace, there would not be so much need for conscription or other suggested methods for obtaining soldiers." And although in "Private Smith" Captain Dallas has felt himself called upon to champion Tommy Atkins against public apathy, and even against contempt in some quarters, he certainly has not unduly "glorified" the British soldier, but has given a very fair and vivid description of his parts as displayed in barracks or on the field of battle. Whether the author has unduly extolled the profession of arms is another matter, and one on which some light is thrown by Herr Jansen's recently published "Pride of War." A capital, if somewhat old-fashioned, love-story runs through the pages of "Private Smith," which tells of a subaltern who leaves his regiment under a cloud and re-enters the army as a private soldier in time to serve in the South African campaign. The author gives some graphic scenes from this memorable war, and his book will be appreciated by all who enjoy a typical soldier story.

KING ERRANT. By Mrs. F. A. Steel. 6s. (Hememann.)

A historical novelist who takes liberties with the facts of history and confesses her faults in a preface disarms criticism. That is unless the liberties are inartistic. In this case they are not. If Zahir-ud-din Mahommed, the great head of the so-called Moghul dynasty, had not a Maham among his numerous wives he is to be pitied, and Mrs. Steel is determined that her readers shall not pity him. He is a romantic figure in these pages, exiled, triumphant, ambitious, chivalrous, and glittering. The book rings with his songs and clashes with his battles. It is a pageant of Eastern adventure, drawn with singular deftness, and readable even if the reader can bring little or no historical knowledge to the entertainment. A novel which covers the career of such a royal fighter from youth to death runs the risk of being remembered for episodes rather than for continuous development, and Mrs. Steel's book varies naturally in its power of arresting the attention. But every now and then she sketches a bit of scenery, and these vignettes help to lend a unity to the setting of the tale. They are distinctly Oriental, more Oriental than the language of the dialogues occasionally. But, Oriental or not, the story in the main is a full-blooded romance. It was a daring and difficult theme; Mrs. Steel has succeeded in handling it upon the whole with wonderful sympathy and verve, and Babar, even with his new traits, remains a splendid figure on the borderland of history and fiction.

THE DISTANT LAMP. By Harold Begbie. 6s. (Hodder and Stoughton.)

Mr. Begbie is not the first among recent writers of fiction to handle the story of the children's crusade, but he has made some features of it live again in these pages. The religious fervour of the movement appeals to him in its spontaneity and daring. He contrasts the simple enthusiasm of the young crusaders with the religious indifference of the age. A priest half-cynically tells one of the heroes, "Ah, my son, life is a long road, and Time a cripple that lags thereon. For us priests time wears the shell of tortoise or snail; at first we mount up with wings like eagles, then we run and are not weary, presently we walk and do not faint; but finally we sit down, we stretch the limbs, we close the eyes, and to the buzzing of flies and the humming of bees we fall asleep. The heart grows tired. The mass loses its mystery. One yawns at the altar. I tell you what God should do. He should perform a miracle once a year to keep up the enthusiasm of the clergy." It is against this background that Mr. Begbie develops the rush and glow of the extraordinary crusade which ended in such a tragedy. The brothers, Gaspard and Hildebert, and poor Falaise, who died to save her honour, are the main figures in the tale. No reader will expect any analysis or criticism of the crusade in these pages. He will expect and he will find a vivid narrative, full of strong emotion and fervid piety, which is effective on account of its sharply-drawn contrasts.

UNDER THE YOKE. By Ivan Vazoff. 6s. net. (Heinemann.)

A wholly exceptional interest attaches to a novel describing a nation's struggle for freedom, when written by one of the active participators in that struggle. Be it never so badly written it bears the stamp of actuality; it lives; it is a fact, not a mere tissue woven of the imagination. But this story of the Bulgarian effort of 1875 is not badly written. It is the work of a great artist as well as a great patriot. Dumas himself could not have strung together a series of more thrilling and breathless incidents. Victor Hugo's "Les Misérables" hardly excites more of our sympathy with the suffering magnanimous hero. Like Jean Valjean he develops, grows to the stature of a perfect man. At first a mere hunted fugitive, then, what is not much more exalted, a mere wrecker of primitive punishment of lust and cruelty in the great scene in the mill, and the perpetrator of an act of thoughtlessness which entails much suffering afterwards, he rises and grows into the kindly, great souled patriot. This development of his personality proceeds through and by means of a succession of glowing scenes of Bulgarian life and labour. Truth to tell the brilliancy of these different pictures, the detailed portraiture of numbers of dramatic personæ rather difficult to remember by their Bulgarian names that give no clue to sex, rather stays and hampers the main action. It is "Romola" over again, but with this great difference that it is "Romola" written by a Florentine of the Medici age. So we do not by any means grudge the time and attention expended on these full-blooded, many-coloured pictures: Marko supping with his joyous family under the ivied wall, the nunnery a perfect "School for Scandal;" the monastery, with its imbecile, its glutton, and its Robin Hood for a prior; the wedding dinner at the usurers; the gay and sparkling sewing party—in everyone there is a rush of vivacity, an abundance of life such as is all too seldom found in English novels. In short, we welcome con amore this, the first-fruits of Bulgarian genius.

BACK HOME. By Ivan S. Cobb. 6s. (Heinemann.)

Mr. Cobb is a South American who has gone to live in the North, and "viewing my own State," as he says in a preface here, "and my own people across a perspective of time and distance I had the ambition to set down on paper, as faithfully as I might, a representation of those people as I knew them." Hence his title, "Back Home." He has carried out his purpose in ten stories, stories of life in a town that lies somewhere in the western part of Kentucky, the humour and the pathos of them is unforced and curiously effective, and they are the freshest things of the kind that have come out of America since Bret Harte wrote his first book. "A Judgment Come to Daniel" is the least satisfactory, though it is amusing, with a hint of pathos in the background, and well enough done in its way. The other stories are all admirable, and "Words and Music" is one of the best of them. It tells of how Breck Tandy killed a man in justifiable circumstances, but made the cardinal mistake of calling in a smart alien lawyer to defend him. The jury resented the interposition of this stranger, and moved by this feeling and other local influences would certainly have brought in a verdict of Guilty but for the masterly strategy of Judge Priest, who came to bear witness to Breck Tandy's general good character. The Judge was an old soldier of the Civil War days; he ascertained that two or three of the jury, including the foreman, had also been old soldiers, and whilst giving his evidence he contrived to get in some of his recollections of the war, dropping in the fact that he and Breck Tandy's father had been in the troop that made a forced march to the defence of the town here when an approaching force of Yankees menaced it, and that Breck's father was wounded in the subsequent fighting, and never quite got over it. The Judge had arranged that at a given signal a negro minstrel, who had been busy at a local fair, should play outside the Courthouse the stirring old tune to which the Southerners had marched through the town to that fight in old days, and the effect of this music on the people in Court, just when they were caught by the Judge's recollections, is a wonderful bit of description. The hard old woman, leader of public opinion in the place, moves across and seats herself beside the prisoner's desolate little wife, the fire blazes anew in the dull eyes of those ancient soldiers on the jury, and that is a fine touch, too, of how, as the Judge passed from the witness stand, the old foreman raised his hand to a military salute. Sentiment, you may say, but glorious sentiment, after all, and you feel, as the jury and every soul in the Court felt, there is no condemning of the prisoner in the face of it. These little touches of sentiment that linger in the Southern heart about all remembrances of the war make one of the great charms of more than one of Mr. Cobb's stories. They are clever stories, and, better than clever, they are delightfully, humorously and poignantly human.

THE GODS OF THE DEAD. By Winifred Graham. 6s. (Rider.)

Cosmo Turnus is the possessor of a mummy of virulent appearance. He is convinced that it is bringing bad luck upon him and his family and suddenly resolves to burn it. Fortunately for the purposes of the story he chooses for this operation the exact moment when his only daughter is being born. The window of his wife's room is open and the smoke blows in. So, of course, "the room was full of mystery and wonder. Hovering near were the Gods of the Dead, influencing the new life, which an Eastern spirit blessed and beautified in passing" which accounts for whatever is strange in the character of Camilla, and there is a good deal of strangeness about her and her history. You can always rely upon Miss Winifred Graham for a good, dramatic story, and in "The Gods of the Dead" her work is fully up to its usual level, while the eerie atmosphere which it possesses is not the least excellent of its many good qualities. It can be recommended to anybody in search of a thrill.

THE JOYOUS ADVENTURES OF ARISTIDE PUJOL. By W. J. Locke. Illustrated 6s. (John Lane.)

Mr. Locke's ideal audience is of the sort that suffers rogues gladly. He has run down pretty nearly the whole scale of gaucy, except the hysterical sort that leaves regrets the next morning, to the tune of jarred nerves and a throbbing pulse. But of his varied repertoire we like his happy-go-lucky rogues and vagabonds best. "Septimus" was amiable but businesslike, Marcus Ordeyne was gentlemanly but unconventional; his "Beloved Vagabond," whose name we forget, was gallant and reckless. The brave Aristide is a mixture of all of them, and as entertaining as the three combined. He rushes in where detectives fear to tread; in other words, his nature is above any sort of pursuit. Aristide was born to lead. He rises superior to Arsène Lupin and Sherlock Holmes, because he needs no criminal hypothesis to set him going. All he requires is a chance encounter in a French provincial town, and the help of a passing motor-car. When we think of the advantages of the popular adventurer over his predecessors of ten or twenty years ago—the automobile, wireless, and the airship—we think on the whole, perhaps, that Sherlock did pretty well, and we feel inclined to amend the comparison. Let us make it equal as far as achievements are concerned. Aristide, however, wins by his wit, and Sherlock had not an ounce of wit in his composition. Aristide also gains by his freedom from scruples. He lies like a Cretan, and travels like a hare. It is not till he lands in England that we see him at his best. He drops into a picture fraud of the seamiest description, and emerges from the conspiracy a hero. Analysis of his motives would ruin the situation, perhaps, but he forfeits a good round sum of ready money for a whim, and this stands for heroism in the school of Mr. Locke, whatever his namesake, the philosopher, might have to say. To go a step further, we think it a blemish on Aristide's originality that he had studied the character of Autolycus in the original text, for we cannot think of a restless genius like him ploughing through Shakespeare for ideas. His author may have done it, and probably has; but Aristide never. If he emerges into another volume, and in Shakespearean phrase we desire him of more acquaintance—we hope he will leave books out of his scheme of things. They add a lustre of erudition where it is needless and out of place. They tarnish him with a suggestion of second-hand, and we like our "brav' Aristide" best when he is spontaneous. It only remains to add that Mr. Alec Ball has made him live in the pictures just as vigorous and vivid as he is in the text; and what could we say more?

"Between the folds of the blanket peeped the face of a sleeping child."

From "The Joyous Adventures of Aristide Pujol," by W. J. Locke. (John Lane.)

OUR ALTY. By M. E. Francis (Mrs. Francis Blundell). 6s. (John Long.)

If we were given to sentimentalising over stories we should write that those by Mrs. Blundell held the scent of new-mown hay within them and the song of the lark. But it would be doing Mrs. Blundell a real wrong to indulge in sentimentality when the clear, unaffected sentiment which she reveals in her pages is so genuine and so charming. The country idyll of "Our Alty" is a slighter thing than we usually get from this writer unless she is actually giving us a short story. It is just the love story of a thorough country girl and the two men who courted her, the one an educated, poor-spirited Adonis who pleased himself regardless of Alty's heart or name; the other the rough, kindly farmer in whose service Alty worked. Mrs. Blundell has used skill and care in developing her heroine's character, showing her to us as she gradually awakens to womanhood, and, while learning what love means, learns also the sharp cut of deception, and the worth of a good man. The weak part of the story is that which is concerned with the family and friends of Alty's smart lover. It is a somewhat theatrical blot upon a pretty country tale, and in addition to this it is not very clearly presented. But those readers who enjoy a book for its quiet excellence, its wholesomeness, its naturalness and its truth to nature and human nature, may look for some pleasant hours in following Alty's career from the day when her grandmother sniffs the knuckle of the ham which is "savin' up for the buryin'" of Alty's grandfather to that day when her eyes are opened and her true lover declares "we're happy."

CEASE FIRING. By Mary Johnston 6s. (Constable.)

Taken by itself, Miss Mary Johnston's new novel "Cease Firing" may seem a ragged piece of work. It is likely at times to perplex a reader unacquainted with the author's last book; and some misunderstanding would, we think, have been prevented if the new volume had been plainly put forward as a continuation of "The Long Roll." It is really the second part of a trilogy, which is not yet completed. Slowly and carefully, Miss Johnston is composing a great panorama of the American Civil War, taken from an unusual point of view. A Daughter of the South, descended from a famous fighting stock, she writes with intense and yet restrained partisanship. Nevertheless, she treats the North with the courteous fairness becoming in a Virginian of the old school, but sadly lacking in the multitude of modern American novelists who take the popular, triumphant side. In some respects, she is rather more of an historian than a novelist in the fine and important work on which she is now engaged. The story in "Cease Firing" is a mere thread which scarcely connects together all the chapters of the book. What Miss Johnston aims at depicting and succeeds in depicting is the whole life of a dying nation. For the South was a nation, distinct from the North in manners, spirit and tradition. And this distinction was the fundamental cause of the civil war. Properly handled, the slavery question might have been settled without an armed conflict; for a majority of the planters was inclined to some pacific scheme of emancipation. But between the industrial democratic Northerners and the agricultural gentry of the South, there was a division as deep as that which once separated our Puritans and Cavaliers. "Free Government," says one of the characters in "Cease Firing," "is founded on the consent of the governed, and every community strong enough to establish and maintain its independence has a right to assert it. My father fought Great Britain in defence of that principle." But being behind the North in industrial power, the planters were at last defeated and broken, and it is as a tragic picture of a high-spirited people in their day of irretrievable disaster, that Miss Johnston's new work fills and touches the mind. It is not an historical novel built from books, and deriving all its animating power from the writer's imagination. The author has woven her fine work out of the living memories of her relatives and friends of the older generation. The result is a peculiar vividness of treatment. The whole struggle of the South is seen in so intimate a way that the living, fighting, desperate nation becomes the real hero, and the individual figures count for what they represent more than for what they singly are. The characterization is always clear and interesting, but it is merged in the larger subject.

THE RELUCTANT LOVER. By Stephen McKenna. 6s. (Herbert Jenkins.)

Of the several new novelists whose works the young firm of Herbert Jenkins has put before the public, Mr. Stephen McKenna is not the least noteworthy. "The Reluctant Lover" is a modern comedy of manners, presenting an ultra-modern type of character and one which has—naturally enough—been little dealt with before. Cyril Fitzroy, who considers himself a decadent and a cynic, is the Reluctant Lover of the title, and Myra, the young lady who prefers a reluctant to a willing lover, is the character which the publishers seem to find especially unconventional and attractive. (It is of no particular moment that our own taste lies in another direction.) Between them the two arrange upon a probationary period of two years, during which Cyril is to prove that he is possessed of more than merely surface attractions. During the interval that follows, Cyril becomes the guardian of a singularly attractive young girl, whose life he eventually saves—in truly Victorian manner—by his use of a sucking-tube when she is about to succumb to diphtheria. Thus he proves himself—and proves also that his affection for Myra is no more than affection, which is admittedly a surprise to that scintillating young lady. It is all very pleasant, amusing and clever—but just a trifle unsatisfactory. Whether it be that the book is lacking in variety, or whether the characters are uniformly too young, and their conversation too consistently brilliant, there can be no doubt about that point. Mr. McKenna has not yet quite found himself. When he does, we believe that he will do really big things—and in the meantime we are properly grateful for so refreshing and so fascinating a piece of work as "The Reluctant Lover."

OFFICER 666. By Barton W. Currie and Augustin McHugh. 6s. (Stanley Paul.)

If you want a fresh, breezy, rollicking story you cannot do better than get a copy of "Officer 666"—the novel of the successful play now running at the Globe Theatre. It is exceedingly entertaining, with an ingenious plot and sparkling dialogue. The action of the tale takes place all in a few hours and almost entirely in one scene—the house of young Travers Gladwin, American millionaire. Gladwin returns from Egypt secretly, because he suspects a shady plot between his ex-valet and his lawyer, and stumbles across another plot, discovering that someone has been using his name in his absence and that a beautiful young girl, Helen Burton, is about to elope with "Travers Gladwin" that very evening. One exciting event follows rapidly on the heels of another in the next few hours, in all of which "Officer 666," or at any rate his coat and hat, plays an important part. At the meeting of the real and the false Travers Gladwin the marvellous wit and pluck of the latter compels the admiration not only of the reader, but of the real Gladwin himself, and he actually helps his impersonator to escape from a house full of policemen. It is a book that no laughter-loving individual can afford to miss.

The Bookman's Table.

THE OLD IRISH WORLD. By Alice Stopford Green. 4s. net (Macmillan.)

This is a collection of lectures concerning Ireland, with a certain unity in its variety, and forming an attractive and valuable addition to Mrs. Green's epoch-marking book, "The Making of Ireland and its Undoing," and her less ambitious but brilliant and informing work entitled "Irish Nationality." "The Way of History in Ireland" is a powerful and often crushing reply to haughty but conventional critics of the first-named volume. "The Trade Routes of Ireland" emphasises far-revealing points in a sphere in which Mrs. Green is a first-rate authority, while "A Great Irish Lady" sheds a flood of light on the character and complexity of the civilisation of the real and inner Ireland in the Middle Ages. The volume contains a store of fact, and a liberal infusion of that far finer essence, soul-fact. Such a book ought to go far to destroy old passions and prejudices.

It is valuable to Ireland, perhaps even more valuable to England. In regard to mediæval Ireland Irishmen of to-day have much to learn, Englishmen much to unlearn. The truth has surprises, but ought to make for mental enlargement, after a certain chastening.

RAMBLES IN IRELAND. By Robert Lynd. Illustrations by Jack B. Yeats. 6s. (Mills & Boon.)

Even those who know much of Ireland, and know it intimately, will find freshness and fascination in Mr. Lynd's enlivening and penetrative pages. He is a delightful Rambler, but a Rambler who sets forth on his tours with a fine store of knowledge of Ireland's past and present; her history, her literature, her art, her ideals. He is in fact an educated Irish enthusiast, and wherever he happens to be, at home or abroad, he carries a vivid and varied mental Ireland along with him. But in work like the present all this is suggested very unobtrusively, just in flashes and glimpses and reveries. When he gets out anew amongst the people he becomes the seeker, the observer, the learner again, just as if Ireland were a precious and curious novelty to him. So the reader, like himself, has an ever-widening field of wonder and character; he is in a land at once ancient and venerable and ruined, yet romantically human, pathetically curious, astonishingly complicated, vivaciously new. There is ever the sense of discovery, whether it be darksome or lightsome or both together, with gleams of beauty never long out of the picture.

With most writers on Ireland we need to be wary and critical. Whether they know much or little they put into their work and pictures a great deal of their own personalities. Ireland seems to make personality shine or bristle; she is not apparently conducive to detachment. One great charm of Mr. Lynd is that while he is a wise and cultured Irishman he can really be detached. He can tell us what he sees, can tell us with art and zest of what lives and happens under his eyes.

Some of us wish that he had seen his way to deal fully or in detail, rather than by suggestion, with the intellectual and spiritual ideas and trends of contemporary Ireland, as for this task he has special qualifications. He has restrained himself, however, though he must have felt the temptation acutely at times. East, west, and south he has kept to plainer ways and themes, but the result is invariably refreshing and revealing.

View of Ardglass, from Ringfadd.

From "The Old Irish World," by Alice Stopford Green (Macmillan).

THE POEMS OF CATULLUS. With notes and a Translation by Charles Stuttaford. 6s. net. (G. Bell & Sons.)

There are two kinds of translation that are acceptable. The first is rarely to be found: it demands so many excellences of different kinds. To begin with, the translator must be steeped in his original, he must catch its exact spirit and proportion and perspective and point of view, and he must have a sensitive feeling for the connotation of the words and phrases he has to render. But that is not enough. To this sympathy and understanding he must join an uncommon knowledge of the language into which he is to translate, and he must have that rarest and highest capacity, the gift of distinction in writing. This last is the greatest need of all, without it a scholar may by taking thought achieve a careful and adequate and scholarly version of his author and yet something so dull, so colourless, so correctly cold as to leave the reader languid and uninterested. You cannot find Shelley's translation of the Homeric Hymn to Mercury uninteresting, it is a fine poem and means something, even though you may cavil at its accuracy, if you think it worth while. The other kind of translation is made because of an enthusiasm, it is a real labour of love, and as all love has something admirable in it we find ourselves disarmed, our criticism becomes kindly, we allow what otherwise could hardly be permitted to pass unchallenged. We read with sympathy, glad to find a felicity, passing lightly over a turn that seems heavy or out of keeping, dwelling on what is good, forgetting what is less satisfying. Such a translation is before us in Mr. Charles Stuttaford's Catullus. His version is clearly born, as they say every child should be, of a great love, and when in reading we find his English fail to charm, we can turn to the opposite page and find the jewelled Latin. And if in reading the English we disagree with or dislike a phrase, when we look at the Latin we can nearly always see why Mr. Stuttaford adopted his wording—a high tribute of praise to the translator. Yet perhaps this may be disadvantageous to the whole poem, to have it made into a mosaic of phrases corresponding to the original, but not always in harmony with each other in English. Mr. Stuttaford has had so much delight in making these versions that we are inclined to look kindly on a translation that must be ranked among those that fail to show distinction.

THE AMERICAN DIARY OF A JAPANESE GIRL. By Yone Noguchi. 7s. 6d. net. (Elkin Mathews.)

Mr. Noguchi, the poet, we have long admired, he is one of the two Japanese authors who have captivated us in the net of their imperfect, very skilfully imperfect, English. He seemed to us before to be a Japanese butterfly which had strayed somehow into a Hebridean sunset and had grown deliciously intoxicated. At the same time he strayed no more out of himself than did Shelley, and we apprehended that in attempting to depict a Japanese girl on whose untutored mind America thrusts itself, Mr. Noguchi would bring too much of himself into the sketch. He is indeed far too profound for his heroine, and in some places he goes so far in the direction of naïveté that we look askance at the performance. In other words, it seems to us that the requisite sense of European humour there is no humour worth dignifying with the title American. As an example of observation not unworthy of Tolstoi we have this:

"It is astonishing to notice what a condescending manner the white gentlemen display towards ladies. They take off their hats in the elevator some showing such a great bald head, like a funny O Binzuru, that is as common as spectacled children—if any woman is present. They stand humbly as Japs to the august 'Son of Heaven.' They crawl out like lambs after the woman steps away. It puzzles me to solve how women can be deserving of such honour.

"What a goody-goody act!

"But I wonder how they behave themselves before God!"

Again, is it not rather Noguchi than this Miss Morning Glory, the book's heroine, who says:

"Snake, one of my greatest foes! (The others being cheese and mathematics.) I turned pale. But I bravely faced it, hoping that it would speak a word or two, as one did to Eve. I placed my eyes on it, though in fear. Perhaps it wasn't as intelligent as the one in the Garden of Eden. Maybe it thought it nothing but a waste of time to address a Jap poorly stored in English. It crept away. I ran down the hall!"

And, on second thoughts, even if Mr. Noguchi does not give us—surely he does not!—the simple soul of this Miss Morning Glory, yet we have reason to be thankful for what he does give.

'NEATH OAK AND OLIVE. By Harold Sanford. (Wellingtonborough: Perkins & Co.)

The prevailing note in these poems is one of pensive thoughtfulness; a dreamy, rather morbidly melancholy spirit broods over some, but not over the best of them: the best glimmer with a sort of starlight of hope and breathe a music of quiet happiness. Still, even the gloomiest are usually strengthened by a touch of stoic courage. "The Outer Darkness" ends with a prayer for "an untrammelled fighting chance"; "In Praise of Death," for all its sombreness glows with a fine high-hearted faith that good shall be the final goal. The descriptive poems are admirable; and there are dainty and graceful lyrics, such as "The Winged Love":

"Maiden with April eyes,
And moods of changing skies,
Let not the winged Love pass

The three sonnets, "In a Forest," are finished with scholarly care and show real imaginative power; there is fancifulness and charm in the picturesque lines "In an Old Garden"; and characteristic of the author's happier moods is the sonnet on "Mortality," of which this is the octave:

"Love me from airy morn till mystic night,
Yea, for my very faults but love me more,
Not for the heavens to which my wings would soar
In speechless rhapsody of dazzling light,
But for my failure to attain the height
Of passionate desire. Now, as of yore,
With thy large tenderness erase the score
Of my transgressions from thy loved sight"

It would be easy to point out flaws, but we have been less struck with these than with the genuine poetry that is in this little book, and the promise of better things that is inherent in much of it—a promise that we shall look with interest and with confidence to see Mr. Sanford fulfil.

THE TRIAL OF JEANNE D'ARC. By Edward Garnett. 3s. 6d. net. (Sidgwick & Jackson.)

Mr. Edward Garnett's new play, more even than its predecessors, "The Breaking Point" and "The Feud," is of the extremely modern kind which puts in nothing except what is necessary to guide the actors. It is meant to be acted, not to be read, and only a most experienced dramatic critic could pretend to see it as its author meant it to be. That is to say, the words are little more than shorthand. Mr. Garnett has studied the records of Jeanne d'Arc's trial. He has made a selection from his own point of view, and has added a scene or two necessary to complete it but not to be found in the records. The shrewd simple maid is continually before us against a changing background of subtle or malignant priests and brutal soldiers, but she has rather a smaller proportion of the actual speaking than the Magdalen in Maeterlinck's play. Several scenes, particularly the last—the execution—leave us in no doubt of their dramatic effectiveness. Of the rest we can only say that they are of extremely careful workmanship, and that they make us wish it were possible either to see them speedily upon the stage or to have a fuller poetic version for the study. The merit of Mr. Garnett's framework is indisputable. It is well arranged and it offers a very suggestive abridgment of the trial. It remains to be seen how these brief lines, so many of them accompanied by guiding parentheses for the actors, will be translated into speech: if they have their deserts they should make a fine play.

TENNYSON. By Aaron Watson. The People's Books. 6d. net. (T. C. & E. C. Jack.)

The little book on Tennyson that Mr. Aaron Watson contributes to Messrs. Jack's admirable series of People's Books is a model of condensed biography and criticism.

From a photo by the Stereoscopic Company, London.

Lord Morley

MR. JOHN LANE
PROCLAIMS
FOUR NEW POWERS
IN LITERATURE

A NEW POWER OF LAUGHTER

PETER BLUNDELL

The Finger of Mr. Blee

6s.

An irresistible tale of an irrepressible Eurasian, who uses his brains and his humour to thwart the shady schemes of a pompous merchant and his vulgar wife. [Now Ready.]

A NEW POWER OF TEARS

GEORGE STEVENSON

Topham's Folly

6s.

A charming novel by a new author who presents an entirely fresh outlook on familiar things. The narrative in its leisurely grace resembles Trollope, but the work as a whole is so individual that it is almost impossible to think of another author who could have written "Topham's Folly." [Now Ready.]

A NEW POWER OF LOVE AND HATE

MAUD CRUTTWELL

Fire and Frost

6s.

Mrs. Cruttwell contrasts the passionate temperament of an Egyptian prince with the cold deliberation of an English girl, who is induced to marry him in curious circumstances. And then there commences a struggle for supremacy between two people who even think in a different language. This is an extraordinarily dramatic book. [Shortly.]

A NEW POWER IN HISTORY AND POLITICS

ESME C. WINGFIELD STRATFORD

(Fellow of King's College, Cambridge)

The History of English Patriotism

2 Vols. 25s. net.

This work embodies in Half a Million Words the substance of Eight Years of uninterrupted labour. Leading experts who have read the MS. praise it unstintedly. The book is not only "The History of English Patriotism," but it is a new history of England written from an entirely fresh point of view. The author has woven together the threads of religion, politics, war, philosophy, literature, painting, architecture, law, and commerce. [Shortly]

Now Ready.

WEEDON GROSSMITH

From Studio to Stage

16s. net.

A rarely delightful and entertaining work—no ordinary theatrical chronicle, but a book for men and women. We see Mr. Grossmith as artist and actor; we have many little intimate glimpses of life behind the scenes, we are told many pleasing stories of celebrities in the land of Bohemia and out of it.

NEW LIBRARY BOOKS*LIFE OF MADAME TALLIEN (Translated by J. L. MAY) 12s. 6d. net.

L. Gastine

THE EMPRESS JOSEPHINE 12s. 6d. net.

Joseph Turquan

A continuation and completion of "The Wife of General Bonaparte."

LIFE AND LETTERS OF WILLIAM COBBETT 2 vols., 32s. net.

Lewis Melville

LETTER BAG OF LADY ELIZABETH SPENCER STANHOPE

A. M. W. Stirling

2 vols., 32s. net.

ROMANTIC TRIALS OF THREE CENTURIES 12s. 6d. net.

Hugh Childers

THE STORY OF DON JOHN OF AUSTRIA

Luis Coloma

16s. net. Translated by LADY MORETON.

DOWN THE MACKENZIE AND UP THE YUKON 5s. net.

Elihu Stewart

AUSTRIA: Her People and Their Homelands

James Baker

21s. net. With 48 Pictures in Colour by DONALD MAXWELL.

TAPESTRIES: Their Origin, History, and Renaissance

George Leland Hunter

16s. net. 151 Illustrations.

DEBORAH: A Poetic Play 2s. 6d. net.

Lancelles Abercrombie

POEMS 3s. 6d. net.

Lucy Masterman

Just Out.A MOST BRILLIANT FIRST NOVELThe Man Who Would Not Be King

SIDNEY DARK

A thoroughly entertaining new book by the celebrated literary and dramatic critic concerning the adventures of a "square peg in a round hole."

THE BODLEY HEAD

LONDON AND NEW YORK.

A Charming Volume of Sketches of Canadian Rural Life. 5/-

WHERE THE SUGAR MAPLE GROWS.

By ADELINE TESKEY

Author of "The Yellow Pearl," etc.

Miss Teskey has produced in these idylls of a Canadian Village something unique in the way of character studies, equal in all respects to the quaint types of "Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush." Her work will prove a revelation to those who claim that Canada has no Literature.

THE MUSSON BOOK COMPANY, LIMITED,
Mansion House Chambers, 11, Queen Victoria Street, London, E.C. Head Office—Toronto, Canada.

The Complete Edition in One Handsome Volume of the Poetical Works of E. PAULINE JOHNSON, the Great Canadian Poetess.

"FLINT AND FEATHER" is the first volume of the complete poetical works of E. PAULINE JOHNSON, the famous Mohawk poetess, and the daughter of the late Chief Johnson of the Six Indian Nations fame. The reader of "The Bookman" has only to look upon the face of the portrait here reproduced, to conclude that the poems of Indian life and love which make up this delightful edition, are the work of a most accomplished writer. The volume has just been issued in a handsome binding, and will make an ideal present for friends both home and abroad.

FLINT AND FEATHER

Being the Complete Poems of

E. PAULINE JOHNSON
("Tekahionwake")

With a brief biographical sketch of the author. With portrait frontispiece. Cloth, 6/- net.

This collection of verse I have named FLINT AND FEATHER because of the association of ideas. Flint suggests the Redman's weapons of war. Feather the eagle's plume that crowns the head of a warrior chief; so both flint and feather bear the hall mark of my Mohawk blood.
E. PAULINE JOHNSON

THE MUSSON BOOK COMPANY, LIMITED,
Mansion House Chambers, 11, Queen Victoria Street,
London, E.C. Head Office—Toronto, Canada.

Songs of the Day.—Songs of the Night.

3/6 net.

CANADIAN CANTICLES.

A Companion Volume to those two beautiful anthologies "The Garden of Love" and "Fragrance of Flowers." A most tasteful production, and will prove a very acceptable present for Christmas or any other time. The compiler has divided the selection into two parts, viz.—"SONGS OF THE DAY" and "SONGS OF THE NIGHT," the aim has been well carried out and with good judgment.

The following is but a short selection of the varied contents of this attractive volume.

The God of Courage—The Call of the Ruler—The Irish Emigrant—The Spirit of the Ocean—The Heart of the Woods—The Gold God—The Death of Yesterday—Life and Death—The Soul—The Need of Love—The Soul Market—The City of the Sea—Divine Blessings—The Ghost of Poverty—My First Love—For Eternity—The Spirits of Music—Hope's Golden Sea—My Lady's Glove—Repentance—Since I Know You Love Me—To My Love—The Spirits of the Night—Ghosts—Hows—Love and I—Death's Brute—The City of Silence—I Miss You—Her Bridegroom—Expectation—Immortal Love—My Bird of Hope—The Fountain of Tears—The Soul of the Murderer—Little Love—The Palace of Tears

THE MUSSON BOOK COMPANY, LIMITED,
Mansion House Chambers, 11, Queen Victoria Street, London, E.C. Head Office—Toronto, Canada.

ALSTON RIVERS'S FIRST BOOKS FOR 1913

THE TRUTH ABOUT CARLYLE

By DAVID ALEC WILSON, author of "Mr. Froude and Carlyle," etc. With Preface by Sir James Crichton-Browne. 1s 6d. net.

SIX SHILLING NOVELS

THE HOUSE OF RENNEL

By Mrs. H. H. PENROSE, author of "Denis Trench," "A Sheltered Woman," "Charles the Great," etc.

NEVERTHELESS

By Mrs. ISABEL SMITH, author of "Mated," "The Minister's Guest," "The Jewel House," etc.

THE PRICE OF STEPHEN BONYNGE

By MARGARET LEGGE, author of "A Semi-Detached Marriage"

AUNT OLIVE IN BOHEMIA

By LESLIE MOORE, author of "The Notch in the Stick" and "The Cloak of Convention"

THREE BRILLIANT SUCCESSES

THE HAPPY WARRIOR

By A. S. M. HUTCHINSON, author of "Once Aboard the Luggar," Third large impression. 6s.

ST. QUIN

By DION CLAYTON CALTHROP, author of "Tinsel and Gold," "Everybody's Secret," etc., etc. 6s.

THE DEBT

By WILLIAM WESTRUP, author of "The Land of Tomorrow," etc. Fourth large impression. 6s.

LONDON: ALSTON RIVERS, LTD., BROOKE ST., E.C.

STANLEY PAUL'S NEW LIST

"A Literary Event"

THE CELEBRITY'S DAUGHTER

By VIOLET HUNT. 6/-

SIR GALAHAD OF THE ARMY

By HAMILTON DRUMMOND

6/-

THE POODLE- WOMAN

By ANNESLEY KENLALY

6/-

IN GREAT DEMAND. THE WHITE SLAVES OF LONDON

By W. N. WILLIS. 1/- net. At all Booksellers and Bookstalls.

The BISHOP of LONDON says "This book will, I hope, shock London."

Incorporating appeals to the Nation by His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Bishop of Birmingham, and Mrs. Branwell Booth

THE LORDS OF THE DEVIL'S PARADISE

By G. SIDNEY PATERNOSTER. Illust., 8/- net.

"Revelations that will stagger humanity."

THE CAREER OF BEAUTY DARLING

By DOLE WYLLARDE. 6/-
Eighth Edition.

A BABE IN BOHEMIA

By FRANK DANBY. 6/-
Ninth Revised Edition.

Also ready at 6/- each
SUSAN AND THE DUKE (2nd ed.) - Kate Horn
THE THREE DESTINIES - J. A. T. Lloyd
THE THREE ANARCHISTS (rd ed.) - Maud Stepmey Rawson
THE METEORIC BENSON - Vincent Mills-Malet

By the Daughter of LORD
ROSBURY.

SAMPHIRE

By LADY SYBIL GRANT.

(r. 8vo, 3/6 net.

THE DINER'S OUT VADE MECUM. After Dinner Toasts and Speeches, &c. 1/6 net

THE EVERYDAY SAVOURY BOOK. A Tasty Recipe for every day in the year. 1/- net.

THE EVERYDAY PUDDING
BOOK. By F. K. A Tasty Recipe for every day in the year. Crown 8vo, 1/- net.

STANLEY PAUL & CO., 31, ESSEX STREET, LONDON.

FOUR NEW 6/- NOVELS READY IMMEDIATELY

WITCHING HILL

By E. W. HORNUNG

Author of "Raffles," "Peccavi," etc.

The Creator of "Raffles" returns to the field of his fame in "Witching Hill."

SKIPPER ANNE

By MARION BOWER

Author of "Guests of Mine," "The Puppet Show," etc.

A novel which took a high place in our £1,000 Prize Novel Competition.

THE LITTLE GREY SHOE

By PERCY JAMES BREBNER

Author of "The Brown Mask," "Princess Maritza," etc.

A dashing tale of a daring trooper's pursuit of a charming but elusive maiden, by the author of "Princess Maritza."

THE BLUE WOLF

By W. LACEY AMY

A thrilling and enthralling tale of a lonely prairie ranch.

HODDER & STOUGHTON, PUBLISHERS, LONDON, E.C.

A SELECTION OF
HODDER & STOUGHTON'S NEW SPRING NOVELS.

E. PHILLIPS OPPENHEIM —THE TEMPTATION OF TAVERNAKE	6/-
Author of "The Lighted Way," etc.
E. W. HORNUNG —WITCHING HILL	6/-
Author of "Raffles," "Peccavi," etc.
HAROLD BEGBIE —RISING DAWN	6/-
Author of "The Vigil," "The Priest," etc.
ROBERT BARR —THE IDEAL WOMAN	6/-
Author of "Cardillac," "The Sword Maker,"
MRS. HUBERT BARCLAY —EAST OF THE SHADOWS	6/-
Author of "A Dream of Blue Roses."
G. B. LANCASTER —THE LAW BRINGERS	6/-
Author of "The Altar Stairs," "Sons o' Men."
DAVID WHITELOW —THE LITTLE HOUR OF PETER WELLS	6/-
Author of "The Man with the Red Beard," etc.
O. DOUGLAS —OLIVIA IN INDIA	6/-
MORICE GERARD —THE MYSTERY CAR: XYZ 747	6/-
Author of "The King's Signet," "Rose of Blenheim," etc.
A. W. MARCHMONT —WHEN LOVE CALLED	6/-
Author of "The Egrave Square Mystery," etc.
JACQUES FUTRELLE —MY LADY'S GARTER	6/-
W. PETT RIDGE —MIXED GRILL	3/6
Author of "Table d'Hôte," "Light Refreshment," etc.
MARION BOWER —SKIPPER ANNE	6/-
JOSEPH I. DOKE —THE SECRET CITY	6/-
ANNIE S. SWAN —THE FAIRWEATHERS	3/6
Author of "Woven in the Wind," "The Last of Their Race."
DELL H. MUNGER —THE WIND BEFORE THE DAWN	6/-
PERCY JAMES BREBNER —THE LITTLE GREY SHOE	6/-
Author of "The Brown Mask," etc.
H. A. CODY —THE LONG PATROL	6/-
Author of "The Frontiersman," "The Fourth Watch," etc.
BEULAH MARIE DIX —THE FIGHTING BLADE	6/-
W. LACEY AMY —THE BLUE WOLF	6/-
J. J. BELL —COURTIN' CHRISTINA	Paper 1/- net. Cloth 2/- net.
Author of "Wee Macgregor," "Oh! Christina!" etc.

HODDER & STOUGHTON'S £1,000 PRIZE NOVEL COMPETITION.

The following novels took the first six places in Hodder & Stoughton's recent £1,000 Prize Novel Competition. It will be found that they deal with an unusual variety of topics—not one of them can be said to resemble any of the others in the remotest degree. All—with, of course, the exception of "The Lee Shore," already published,—will be issued during the Spring of 1913.

ROSE MACAULAY —THE LEE SHORE	(First Prize of £600)	Third Edition.	6/-
DAVID HENNESSEY —THE OUTLAW	(Second Prize of £400)		6/-
MAY EDGINGTON —THE SIN OF EVE			6/-
J. HARVEY —MY FATHER'S SON			6/-
A. KEITH FRASER —A GARDEN OF SPICES			6/-
E. R. PUNSHON —THE WILDERNESS LOVERS			6/-
Author of "The Choice," etc.

Novels by CHARLES READE.

COLLECTED LIBRARY EDITION in Seventeen Volumes, crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. each.

1. Peg Woffington; and Christie Johnstone
2. Hard Cash
3. The Cloister and the Hearth
With a Preface by Sir WALTER BESANT.
4. "It is Never Too Late to Mend"
5. The Course of True Love Never Did Run Smooth; and Singleheart and Doubleface
6. The Autobiography of a Thief; Jack of all Trades; A Hero and a Martyr;
and The Wandering Heir
7. Love Me Little, Love Me Long
8. The Double Marriage
9. Griffith Gaunt
10. Foul Play
11. Put Yourself in His Place
12. A Terrible Temptation
13. A Simpleton
14. A Woman-Hater
15. The Jilt, and other Stories; and Good Stories of Man and other Animals
16. A Perilous Secret
17. Radiana; and Bible Characters

Also in Twenty-one Volumes, post 8vo, illustrated boards, 2s. each.

Peg Woffington
Christie Johnstone
"Never Too Late to Mend"
The Course of True Love
Never Did Run Smooth
The Autobiography of a Thief; Jack of all Trades; and James Lambert
Love Me Little, Love Me
Long
The Double Marriage
The Cloister & the Hearth
Hard Cash

Griffith Gaunt
Foul Play
Put Yourself in His Place
A Terrible Temptation
A Simpleton
The Wandering Heir
A Woman-Hater
Singleheart & Doubleface Good Stories of Man and other Animals
The Jilt, and other Stories
A Perilous Secret
Radiana

THE CLOISTER AND THE HEARTH

With 16 Photogravure and 84 Half-tone Illustrations by MART. B. HERVEDINE. Fcap 4to, cloth, 6s. net.
Also an EDITION DE LUXE, with 20 full-page Plates in Four Colours and 10 in Line, together with a Title, Cover
Design, and End-papers, by BYAM SHAW, R.I. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 12s. 6d.; parchment gilt, the plates mounted, 16s. net.

FINE PAPER EDITIONS. Post 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 2s. net each, leather, gilt edges, 3s. net each.

"It is Never Too Late to Mend."

The Cloister and the Hearth. With 32 Illustrations

The Wandering Heir. Large Type Edition. Fcap
8vo, cloth, 1s. net.

POPULAR EDITIONS.

Peg Woffington; & Christie
Johnstone
Hard Cash
Griffith Gaunt
"Never Too Late To Mend"
The Cloister and The Hearth
A Woman-Hater

Medium 8vo, 6d. each.

Foul Play
Put Yourself in His Place
A Terrible Temptation
The Double Marriage
Love Me Little, Love Me
Long
A Perilous Secret
The Course of True Love

CHATTO & WINDUS, Publishers,
111, St. Martin's Lane, LONDON, W.C.

A NOVEL DESTINED TO BE THE NOVEL OF 1913

Such is the faith of the publishers in this Work that they have produced a First Edition of 5,000 copies, and the trade, which has had an opportunity of reading the book before publication, thinks so well of it that it has practically exhausted the Edition.

THE LURE OF CROONING WATER

By MARION HILL.

Just Published by John Long, 6/-

JOHN LONG'S NEW NOVELS

By J. S. FLETCHER, Author of "The Fine Air of Morning."

THE BARTENSTEIN CASE

A murder, in which a certain sword stick which had been in a family for many generations, plays a part, is unravelled by a Scotland Yard man after many adventures.

By G. YSTRIDDE-ORSHANSKI, Author of "An Exile's Daughter."

A TARTAR'S LOVE

A Story of Southern Russia, in which is shown the clash of temperament and ideal of the two races, Russian and Tartar. A novel quite out of the range of ordinary fiction

By F. DICKBERRY, Author of "The Storm of London."

STEPHEN ORMOND

A strikingly original novel, which should prove a worthy successor to 'The Storm of London,' a book which made all London shake with laughter

By EDMUND BOSANQUET, Author of "A Society
Mother," &c.

CATCHING A CORONET

Mr Edmund Bosanquet is one of the few authors whose fame has come within the last twelve months. Such speedy recognition is a guarantee of unusual talent.

By STEPHEN FOREMAN, Author of "The Fen Dogs."

THE TERRIBLE CHOICE

Athenum "There is art in the unusual style of Mr. Foreman. He keeps a seemingly unlimited stock of surprises up his sleeve, which he springs upon us with adroitness, and the climax is worked up to with vigour and subtlety"

By BEATRICE KELSTON, Author of "A Three-Cornered Duel."

SEEKERS EVERY ONE

Athenum "This novel of to-day is an excellent piece of work."

By HARRY TEMPLE, a New Author.

FRESH AIR

Athenum "Provincial life is cleverly hit off in this story of the suburb of a manufacturing town."

By E. SCOTT GILLIES, Author of "The Shadow of the Guillotine."

A SPARK ON STEEL

A brilliant story of the love of a Prussian officer for a daughter of France in the dark days of 1870.

All the above Novels Now Ready at 6/- each.

At all Libraries and Booksellers.

The following 6/- Novels will be published during February —

THE ONLY PRISON	- Ellen Ada Smith
THE HOUSE OF THE OTHER WORLD	- Violet Iweedale
A MASQUERADE AND A MONASTERY	- Anne Weaver
A GIRL OF NO IMPORTANCE	- Olivia Ramsey
THE IMPENITENT PRAYER	- Amy J. Baker
THE DECOY DUCK	- By a Peer
THE TURN OF THE TIDE	- R. Penley
NATHALIA	- Fred Whishaw
UNQUENCHED FIRE	- Alice Gerstenberg
A SOUL IN SHADOW	- Else Carrier
THE MAN IN THE CAR	- Alan Raleigh
THE LITTLE MAISTER	- R. H. Forster
HOBSON'S CHOICE	- G. G. Chatterton

Messrs. JOHN LONG have just published the following important
New Works:—

COMPOSERS, IN LOVE AND MARRIAGE

By J. CUTHBERT HADDEN. 12/6 net. (Illustrated.)

KING RENÉ D'ANJOU AND HIS SEVEN QUEENS

By EDGCUMBE STALEY. 12/6 net. (Illustrated.)

LONDON: JOHN LONG LIMITED, 12, 13, 14, Norris St., HAYMARKET

Macmillan's

New and Forthcoming Books

Letters of Lord Acton to Mary, Daughter of the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone. Edited with an Introductory Memoir by HERBERT PAUL. New Edition. 8vo. [Immediately]

This new edition has been revised, and contains a series of hitherto unpublished letters covering the period from 1883 to 1901.

Of Six Mediæval Women, to which is added a Note on Mediæval Gardens. By ALICE KEMP-WELCH. With Introduction and Illustrations. 8vo. [Immediately]

Wayfaring in France, from Auvergne to the Bay of Biscay. By E. HARRISON BARKER. Illustrated. Extra Crown 8vo. [Immediately]

MAURICE HEWLETT'S NEW BOOK.

Helen Redeemed, and other Poems. By MAURICE HEWLETT. Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d. net. [Immediately]

An Adventure. A New Edition, with Appendix and Maps. Extra Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net. [Immediately]

Portraits and Speculations. By ARTHUR RANSOME. 8vo. 7s. 6d. net. [Ready]

CONTENTS.—Art for Life's Sake; Aloysius Bertrand; Alphonse Daudet; The Retrospection of François Coppée; Friedrich Nietzsche; Walter Pater; Remy de Gourmont; The Poetry of Yone Noguchi; Kinetic and Potential Speech.

A Necessity of Life, and other Stories. By BETTY VAN DER GOES. With a Frontispiece. Extra Crown 8vo. [Immediately]

St. Paul and Justification: being an Exposition of the Teaching in the Epistles to Rome and Galatia. By the Ven. Archdeacon F. B. WESTCOTT. 8vo. [Immediately]

Repton School Sermons: Studies in the Religion of the Incarnation. Being the Sermons preached in Repton School Chapel between Sept. 1910 and July 1912. By the Rev. WILLIAM TEMPLE, Headmaster of Repton, Chaplain to the Archbishop of Canterbury, Author of "The Faith and Modern Thought," etc. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net. [Immediately]

S. Paul and His Companions. By E. BASIL REDLICH, M.A. (Cantab), Diocesan Inspector of Schools in the Diocese of London. Crown 8vo. [Immediately]

Socialism from the Christian Standpoint. Ten Conferences. By FATHER BERNARD VAUGHAN, S.J. With Portrait. Extra crown 8vo. 6s. 6d. net. [Ready]

Buddhism and Science. By PAUL DAHLKE, Author of "Buddhist Essays." Translated from the German by the Bhikkhu Sīlacāra. 8vo. 7s. 6d. net. [Ready]

* * Macmillan's Spring Announcement List post free on application

MACMILLAN & CO., Ltd., LONDON.

Mr. HEINEMANN'S LIST

Important New Books

LOST IN THE ARCTIC.

By CAPTAIN EJNAR MIKKELSEN. Illustrations, Map, &c. Crown 4to. 18s. net.

"Captain Mikkelsen's book may be accounted one of the best that has ever been devoted to the story of Arctic Exploration."—Daily Telegraph.

WITH THE TURKS IN THRACE.

By E. ASHMEAD BARTLETT. Royal 8vo. 10s. net.

THE POSITIVE EVOLUTION OF RELIGION.

By FREDERIC HARRISON, D.C.L. Demy 8vo. 8s. 6d. net.

PAUL I. OF RUSSIA:

The Son of Catherine the Great. By K. WALISZEWSKI. Royal 8vo. 15s. net.

RECENT EVENTS & PRESENT POLICIES IN CHINA.

By J. O. P. BLAND. Royal 8vo. Illustrated. 16s. net.

IN THE SHADOW OF THE BUSH.

By P. A. TALBOT. With many Illustrations. Large Demy 8vo. 18s. net.

THE CHILDHOOD OF ANIMALS.

By P. CHALMERS MITCHELL, F.R.S. (Sec. of the Zoological Soc.) With Illustrations in Colour, &c. Royal 8vo. 10s. net.

WILD LIFE AND THE CAMERA.

By A. RADCLYFFE DUGMORE. Demy 8vo, with Special Plates. 6s. net.

SIMPLICISSIMUS. By HANS VON GRIMMELSHAUSEN. Special Edition, limited to 1,000 copies. Large crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

ESTHER WATERS. A Play, by GEORGE MOORE. Demy 8vo. 2s. 6d.

JESUS OF NAZARETH:

A Poetical Drama. By ALEXANDRA VON HERDER. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

THE LOEB CLASSICAL LIBRARY.

Five New Volumes are now ready. (1 & 2) Euripides Vols. III. & IV. (3) Appian's Roman History, Vol. II. (4) Catullus, Tibullus, Pervigilium Veneris. (5) Lucian, Vol. I. Full particulars of the Loeb Library on application to Prospectus Dept. XXII.

Fine New 6s. Novels

The HIPPODROME - Rachel Hayward
The FRONTIERS OF THE HEART

Victor Margueritte
The STORY OF STEPHEN COMPTON - J. E. Patterson

WHERE ARE YOU GOING TO?

Elizabeth Robins
A RUNAWAY RING Mrs. Henry Dudeney
KING ERRANT - Flora A. Steel

MOLYNEUX OF MAYFAIR

Duncan Schwann
ADNAM'S ORCHARD - Sarah Grand

BETWEEN TWO THIEVES Richard Dehan

The Great Romance of Bulgarian Liberation.
UNDER THE YOKE (2nd Imp.) Ivan Vazoff

WILLIAM HEINEMANN, 21, BEDFORD STREET, W.C.

The Bookman.

"I am a Bookman."—James Russell Lowell.

No. 257. VOL. XLIII.
Subscription rate 11s. per annum post free.

FEBRUARY, 1913.

PRICE SIXPENCE.
Published Monthly.

CONTENTS.

NEWS NOTES .. 243-248

THE BOOKSELLERS' DIARY 251

THE BOOKMAN GALLERY—

Maurice Baring. By ROBERT
BIRKMYRE .. .. 249

THE READER—

Charles Reade. By LEWIS
MELVILLE .. .. 253
Prize Competitions .. .. 260
George Saintsbury. By THOMAS SECORMB .. 260
Maitland of Lethington. By
DR. HAY FLEMING .. 260

NEW BOOKS—

Rudolf Eucken's Philosophy.
By T. E. PAGE .. .. 270
A French Study of Chaucer.
By W. H. HUDSON .. 271

Lady Victoria Campbell. By
DR. JAMES MOFFATT .. 272

Courage in the Writing of Fiction. By G. S. LAYARD 273

A View of the Rural Labourer 274

Greuze .. .. 275

The Starry Line By KATH-
ARINE TYNAN .. .. 275

Glimpses of the Past .. .. 276

The Inevitable War-Book. By PERCIVAL GIBBON .. 276

The Importance of the Parson's Daughter. By ED-WARD WRIGHT .. .. 277

Somerset .. .. 278

Henry Newbolt's Poems .. 278

The Flowing Road By RICHARD CURLI .. .. 279

Cale Young Rice's Poems .. 280

The Land of Muscovy. By
GEORGE SAMPSON .. 280

NOVEL NOTES—

Harry the Cockney The Story of Stephen Compton At What Sacrifice? Chess for a Stake—St. Quin—The King's Master—Sun Ram—
Revolutionist—The Fool in Christ .. .. 281 283

THE BOOKMAN'S TABLE—

Verses and Reverses—A Short History of Germany to the Present Day
The Green Fields Unseen Friends—Edouard
Manet .. .. 283 286

NOTES ON NEW BOOKS .. 286

NOTICES.

All communications intended for the Editor must be addressed to the
Editor of THE BOOKMAN, ST. PAUL'S HOUSE, WARWICK
SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

A preliminary letter of enquiry should be sent to the Editor before any manuscript is submitted for his consideration.

News Notes.

The March BOOKMAN will be a Henry James Number, and will contain a special article on Henry James by Dixon Scott. Other important articles in that Number include "Gray's Letters," by Professor Saintsbury; "Doctor Macgregor," by C. W. Boyd; "Writ in Water," by A. E. Waite; "Napoleon," by Walford D. Green; "Philosophy at the Cross-Roads," by M. P. Willcocks; "The Chinese Republic," by Philip W. Sergeant; "Samuel Butler's Note-Books," by A. St. John Adcock; "Japan and the Japanese," by Clive Holland; "Some Recent Poets," by Edward Thomas; "The Windham Papers," by Walter Sichel; "Cobbett," by F. E. Green, etc.

Charles Reade.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT:

TWENTY-ONE GUINEAS PRIZE POEM COMPETITION.

The Prize that we have been offering in THE BOOKMAN every month for some time past for the best original Lyric has produced, on the whole, such very satisfactory results that we have decided to offer in competition SPECIAL PRIZES amounting to Twenty-five Guineas divided as follows:

A First Prize of Five Guineas and a Second Prize of Two Guineas will be given for the best and second best original Lyric.

A First Prize of Five Guineas and a Second Prize of Two Guineas will be given for the best and second best original sonnet on Shakespeare, Milton, Chaucer, Keats, Shelley, Burns, Scott, Byron, Wordsworth, Wellington, Nelson, Gladstone, Disraeli, Darwin, or any other famous Englishman.

A First Prize of Five Guineas and a Second Prize of Two Guineas will be given for the best and second best original humorous poem in not more than forty lines.

All Poems should be addressed to the Editor, and should reach whose new book "The Tyranny of the Country Side" (Pisher Unwin) is reviewed on page 274.

Mr. F. E. Green,

the offices of THE BOOKMAN, St. Paul's House, Warwick Square, London, E.C., not later than the first post on the 2nd June next, if sent from any part of the British Isles, and by the 1st July if from the Colonies, India, or elsewhere abroad. Envelopes should be marked Twenty-one Guineas Competition.

The name and address of the competitor must be written on each MS., and will be published in the event of a Prize being awarded to him. Any competitor who wishes to do so may add a pseudonym, to be used instead of his own name if his poem is printed but does not receive a prize.

The awards will be announced in THE BOOKMAN for August next, and in addition to the winning poems a large selection of the best of the other poems sent in will be published in a special Supplement to that Number.

A "regular student of THE BOOKMAN, and an earnest admirer of Lord Morley," writing in hearty appreciation of our January Number, adds: "May I ask you to make, through the medium of your columns, the suggestion that the leisure of the evening of Lord Morley's life be devoted to the preparation of a final, authoritative and complete edition of his works."

Mr. Seppings Wright.

Everyone who read that brilliant novel "According to the Evidence," must have foreseen that its author, Mr. Oliver 'Onions, would have to write a sequel to it, and in "The Debit Account," which Mr. Martin Secker has just published, he has done so.

Messrs. Ouseley are publishing this spring a new novel entitled "Little Grey Girl," by Miss Mary

Photo by J. Russell & Sons.

Miss Mary Openshaw.

Mrs. Mackirdy
(Olive Christian Malvery).

Openshaw. The story is of the latter years and fall of the Second French Empire, a love romance running through the terrible days of the siege of Paris to a pleasant ending in rural England. Miss Openshaw's earlier stories, notably "The Loser Pays," and "The Cross of Honour," have met with exceptional popularity both in England and America.

Mr. Seppings Wright, the well-known correspondent of the Illustrated London News, whose "Two Years Under the Crescent" will be published in March by Messrs. Nisbet, has been in Tripoli and Thrace for the last two years, and has seen as much of Turkey's two recent wars as any of the many correspondents who are writing about them. His book, illustrated by himself, will be looked for with especial interest.

Two other important War books are Mr. Ellis Ashmead Bartlett's "The War in Thrace," which Mr. Heinemann is publishing, and Major Lionel James's "With the Conquered Turk," which whose first novel, "The Sword," has just been published by Messrs. Chapman & Hall.

Miss C. A. Benton,

Messrs. Nelson have in hand. Maj. James was The Times correspondent in the Balkans, and made his reputation in literature with that brilliant record of the Boer War, "On the Heels of DeWet."

"Queen Tara," a play by Mr. Darell Figgis, which is to be produced on the 25th February at the Gaiety Theatre, Dublin, will be published this month by Messrs. Dent.

As Olive Christian Malvery, Mrs. Archibald Mackirdy won renown as a journalist some few years ago. She has since done good work as a writer of fiction, and has become well known as the founder of several Homes for friendless women and girls, and as the author of "The Soul Market" and other whose clever travel book, "Doreen Coasting" was recently published by Messrs. Longman books on social questions which have had a wide vogue. Before she married, Mrs. Mackirdy was known as an author of charming little stories and songs, and as a reciter and singer she toured extensively, and appeared before large audiences in both the Old and the New World. Latterly she has done excellent work in the crusade against the White Slave Traffic, and her book "The White Slave Market" went through twelve editions within a few weeks. Amongst all these activities she has found time to return to the writing of fiction, and has now completed a love story which she is calling "Love's Soldier." It will be published this spring by Messrs. Cassell.

Mrs. Alys Lowth,

Mrs. Caulfield (K. M. Edge), whose new novel, "Through the Cloudy Porch" (Murray), is reviewed by Mr. G. S. Layard in this number of THE

Photo by Monteath, Melbourne

Mr. Donald MacLean.

BOOKMAN, is the daughter of the Right Honourable Sir John Edge, P.C., formerly Chief Justice of the North West Provinces of India, and wife of Major C. T. Caulfeild, R.H.A., now commanding a H.A. Brigade at Ipswich. Mrs. Caulfeild has lived for many years in India, and has travelled extensively in Kashmir, Italy and South Africa. She began her literary career by contributing to the Pall Mall Gazette, and has published three other successful novels. She is a good amateur actress; a non-militant, but enthusiastic, member of the N.U.W.S.S.; the mother of two children, about the education of whom she has her own very definite ideas; a good platform speaker, and withal, a lover of wild and open spaces.

We are to have a Life of John Greenleaf Whittier, by Mrs. King Lewis, from Messrs. Headley Brothers.

Photo by Mrs. Thompson

Mrs. Caulfeild
(K. M. Edge.)

Mrs. Lewis is a daughter of the late Dr. Stoughton, whose biography she wrote some years ago. She is known, too, as the author of an admirable biography of Mrs. Elizabeth Fry, the Prisoners' Friend, which is now in its third edition.

Mr. J. Cuming Walters, whose new book "The Complete Mystery of Edwin Drood" (Chapman & Hall) was reviewed in last month's Bookman.

Mr. Donald MacLean, whose successful novel, "John Scarlett," was published last autumn by Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton, is an Australian, born in Victoria between thirty and forty years ago. Family misfortunes sent him "cruising amongst the isles of circumstance" when he was only twelve years old. He knocked about the Colony getting an education as best he could, and in due course became successively a bush missionary, a "navvy parson," and a city minister. A few years back he had a very bad

Photo by G. C. Beresford.

Miss Annesley Kenealy.

nervous breakdown and went to rest at that Lorne of which Kipling writes in his song of the flowers

"gathered where the Irskine leaps

Down the road to Lorne,"

and it was whilst there that he first began to write "John Scarlett," that being the outcome of the "navvy parson" days when he lived amongst the navvies pretty much as he has described John Scarlett's life in the book.

"The Two Carnations," a new novel by Miss Marjorie Bowen, is to be published this spring by Messrs. Cassell. It is a story of the French Revolution, with a heroine who finds herself at the beginning of the great struggle in a French prison, from which, after some stirring adventures, the hero rescues her. Miss Bowen's real name is Miss Gabrielle Margaret Vere Campbell, and she inherits her literary gifts from her mother, Mrs. Vere Campbell, who is also a well-known novelist.

Mr. Stanley Paul is starting a new series of novels dealing exclusively with the Woman's Suffrage Movement and the various questions affecting women which are involved in it. The first volume in this "Votes for Women" series is "The Poodle-Woman" by Miss Annesley Kenealy. It is a story of how a woman's talents and faculties are repressed and her happiness destroyed by a man who takes advantage of the power conferred on husbands by the laws of marriage and divorce. Miss Annesley is a daughter of the celebrated Dr. Kenealy, counsel for the Tichborne claimant; she has done good work as a journalist on the Morning Post, Daily Graphic, Daily Mail and other papers, and is on the Committee of the Woman Writers' Suffrage League.

On every hand one is glad to see signs of a re-awakening interest in poetry. The Poetry Society has become a flourishing institution; a Poet's Club has been firmly established; there are at least four magazines devoted almost entirely to the publication of poetry, and now we have a Poetry Book-shop mainly given over to the sale of it. For this latter development we are indebted to the enthusiasm and enterprise of Mr. Harold Monroe, himself a poet of considerable promise. The shop is at 35, Devonshire Street, Theobald's Road, Bloomsbury: an old Georgian building, in a somewhat drab, obscure neighbourhood, not wholly in the busy world nor quite beyond it; which is as it should be, for the true place of poetry is where the people live, and not in those roaring centres of commerce where they make their money. The shop was formally opened on the 7th January, when a large and distinguished audience gathered to listen to an admirable address by Mr. Henry Newbolt. The rooms above the shop are reserved, one as a lecture hall, and the rest for living purposes. Three of them are to be let furnished to literary workers. A good and growing stock of poetry, largely modern volumes, is displayed in the shop; conferences, meetings, and discussions will be held there every Tuesday and Thursday, and some of the most prominent of living poets have promised to be present at these and to take part in the proceedings; but the shop will, of course, be open every other day of the week as well—one can hardly say for business, because Mr. Monro is making a pleasure of it, and the more visitors he has the better he is pleased. It is the duty of every lover of poetry to make a point of calling upon him and encouraging him in an interesting undertaking that may also prove to be a very useful one.

The Poetry Bookshop.

Mr. Maurice Drake, whose important folio on English Glass Painting has just been published by Mr. Werner Laurie, has made an interesting discovery concerning Robert Louis Stevenson. He noticed, in reading the "Vailima Letters," that in 1885 Stevenson had been ill, and was in that year staying at Exeter. Mr. Drake wrote to Sir Sidney Colvin, and Sir Sidney was able to trace that Stevenson had lived for some time in Exeter at the New London Hotel. On searching the hotel visitors' book Mr. Drake discovered, between September 9th and 14th, the entry in R.L.S.'s handwriting which we reproduce in facsimile. Plans of the three floors of the hotel were sent to Mr. Lloyd Osbourne, who was with Stevenson at Exeter, and the room was identified as No. 16 on the first floor. Mr. Drake designed a panel of stained-glass, and this has now been placed in the window with an inscription commemorating R.L.S.'s visit.

Mr. Maurice Drake.

For much assistance with the Charles Reade illustrations in this Number we are indebted to the kindness of Mr. C. W. F. Goss, the Chief Librarian of the Bishopsgate Institute, to Messrs. W. Collins, Sons & Co.; and in particular to Messrs. Chatto and Windus, publishers of the complete copyright edition of Reade's works.

THE BOOKMAN GALLERY.

MAURICE BARING.

MR. MAURICE BARING is a poet and a playwright with a peculiar charm and distinction; he is, moreover, a traveller whose illuminating insight has not only unfolded the meaning of Russia to us, but a world of culture derived from many literatures.

When we read "Diminutive Dramas," and "Dead Letters" we looked upon Mr. Baring as a whimsical dilettante, with something of the spirit of Ariel in his nature, playing with the foibles of letters as a sort of recreation from more arduous tasks; a satirical spectator of the mask of life saturated with the classics, who could turn an epigram with the precision of Oscar Wilde and caricature a type with the urbane humour of Mr. Max Beerbohm. Comparison with Mr. Max Beerbohm seems inevitable when one discusses Mr. Baring as a parodist. But although "Max" catches to the life the speech and gesture of the subjects whom he parodies he does not give us the fine exuberant flavour, and the boisterous mirth that we find in the best examples of Mr. Baring's treatment of the parody. The author of the "Diminutive Dramas" touches the border line of farce, and the compound is a very agreeable one. A comparison of this sort is of course bound to be invidious. We would not for the world under-estimate the inimitable "Max" even in favour of so agreeable an author as Mr. Maurice Baring. How well the author of the "Diminutive Dramas" has caught the delicate art of farcical portraiture will be seen in the delightful skit entitled "The Member for Literature," in which the urbane "Max" himself is inimitably parodied with all his quips and quiddities to perfection, and we feel sorry somehow that he was not elected in the burlesque competition. If you wish to know what Mr. Maurice Maeterlinck looks like in the garb of travesty turn to "The Blue Harlequin," where the parody is so exuberant that it hovers on the border of the burlesque. This, of course, is only one side of his talent. In order to understand and appreciate Mr. Maurice Baring as an author, we must take him at a larger valuation. There are many facets to his genius—so many indeed as almost to dazzle and bewilder the plodding critic. The "Diminutive Dramas" was only the prelude to the more brilliant performance to be found in the trilogy of plays contained in "The Grey Stocking." The "Dead Letters" in the same fanciful vein seem to have been thrown off with careless ease as a sort of surcease from the more serious and specialised work dealing with the vast problem of Russia. But although Mr. Baring has found his true métier in the artistic interpretation of Russian life and character, we confess to a lurking predilection for those brilliant and amusing skits, and hope that he may be induced to take up the idea at a future period and give us another series in the same vein. They are unique of their kind, and if Mr. Baring had never written another line, these two books would have been sufficient to have given him a permanent claim to distinction.

The career of Mr. Maurice Baring has been a particularly brilliant and successful one; and one, we may add, that seldom falls to the lot of the average man of letters. Mr. Baring, who is the fourth son of the first Lord Revelstoke, was born in 1874, and was educated at Eton and Cambridge. He then entered the diplomatic corps, where he spent seven years, his duties taking him to Paris, Copenhagen and Rome. He found a wider and probably a more congenial sphere for his activities, when he became war correspondent for the Morning Post in Manchuria, where he wrote those brilliant and impressionistic letters from the front that were later embodied in "With the Russians in Manchuria." He then became special correspondent for the Morning Post in Russia. In the year 1909, he went to Constantinople in the same capacity, and was there during the coronation of the Sultan. It is of interest to note in this connection, that when he was in Constantinople he wrote a series of letters to the Morning Post, in which he predicted the downfall of the Turks if they fought the Bulgarians. Recent events have proved how pathetically true this prediction has been. More recently he was in the Balkans as correspondent for The Times. Such in brief are the bare facts of an extraordinarily active and successful career, which can be augmented from the author's own works dealing with his experiences as a war correspondent.

Mr. Maurice Baring.

One cannot form a proper estimate of Mr. Baring's work without taking into consideration the wide and cosmopolitan culture of the author; a culture all the more refreshing as it does not savour of the schools. He is a master of many literatures, both ancient and modern; and to him more than to any other modern writer we are indebted for whatever knowledge we possess of Russian authors. Indeed, before we read the work of Mr. Maurice Baring, we had looked upon Russia as a barren and benighted land for ever in the grip of revolution, but we have been happily disillusioned. In "A Year in Russia" he has given us a series of delightful travel pictures, and in the monumental volume entitled "The Russian People" he has revealed to us the whole vast panorama of that romantic and unfamiliar land. We have seldom read anything more vivid than the author's estimate of writers like Tchekov, Gogol and Dostoevsky, in his "Landmarks in Russian Literature." Could anything be more perfect than this critical note written round Tourgeniev?

"I have said that he was a great poet, but the words seem bare and dead when one considers the peculiar nature of the shy and entrancing poetry that is in Tourgeniev's work. He has the magic that water gives to the reflected images of trees, hills and woods; he touches the ugly facts of life, softens and transfigures them so that they lose none of their reality but gain a majesty and a mystery that comes from beyond the world, just as the moonlight softens and transfigures the wrinkled palaces and decaying porticoes of Venice, hiding what is sordid, heightening the beauty of line, and giving a quality of magic to every stately building, to each delicate pillar and chiselled arch."

It is impossible in a short article such as this to do adequate justice to an author of Mr. Baring's versatility and range of subject. Instead of the finished portrait we should like to paint we can only submit an imperfect sketch. We have still to take him as a dramatist and a writer of short stories. The effort of compression therefore must leave something to the imagination. The three plays contained in "The Grey Stocking," the other two being "The Green Elephant" and "The Double Game," have been produced by Miss Gertrude Kingston and Mr. Granville Barker. "The Grey Stocking" has for its motif the study of the shuttered life of a society woman for whom the friendship of a cultured Russian opens a wider vista to her spirit. There is much satirical observation in this drama, and the contrast between the Russian character and that of the English is not always flattering to the latter. It is a tragic drama, and so is "The Double Game," which deals with the revolutionary Russia so familiar to those who know it in no other guise. "The Green Elephant" is a sort of travesty written round a lost trinket, and includes many farcical characters and situations. In dealing with the plays we must not forget the little drama in verse entitled "Desiderio," which is full of some of the noblest passages in modern poetic drama.

We quote this poignant utterance of "Desiderio" as an example of Mr. Baring's mellifluous verse:

"My life is walled with darkness and with sorrow;
But love is something bright to me. A sun
That floods the prison of my soul with light.
I am in prison and love is the song
The prisoner hears far off at eventide;
Love is the dawn I feel but may not see;
The moonlight of my everlasting dream,
The space of luminous calm I cannot reach,
That stretches endlessly beyond the bars."

In the collection of short stories contained in "Orpheus in Mayfair" the author reveals himself a master of satirical comedy, but although the shaft of his satire, which is aimed at the foibles of society and human nature as a whole, is keen and generally hits the mark, it is a satire that is always as urbane and agreeable as the prose in which it is written. Indeed, the prose style of Mr. Baring is not one of the least of the many charms to be found scattered about his books. It has the luminous directness of the French romancists; it sparkles with epigram; a lambent humour plays about the page whether he is revealing to us the beauties of his favourite Russian authors or weaving a flower fancy such as "The Story of Forget me Not and Lily of the Valley."

We have said too little of Mr. Baring as a poet. Indeed it is the poetic note that makes his prose so magical and enriches his imagination even when he is most prosaic—that is to say when he is dealing with facts rather than with fancies—when he is critical rather than creative. The poems are not the least precious of his work. They are instinct with genuine feeling and romantic fervour, and some of the sonnets are perfect examples of the art. Perhaps we may be permitted to quote one of them, which, apart from its intrinsic beauty, adds a sort of personal note to a personality singularly impersonal:

"I have loved summer and the longest day,
The leaves of June, the slumberous film of heat,
The bees, the swallows and the waving wheat,
The whistling of the mowers in the hay.
I have loved words which lift the soul with wings,
Words that are windows to eternal things.
I have loved souls that to themselves are true,
Who cannot stoop and know not how to fear,
Yet hold the talisman of pity's tear:
I have loved these because I have loved you."

We have tried thus briefly to outline the principal claims of Mr. Maurice Baring to be considered one of the cleverest and wittiest and one of the most cultured of twentieth century writers; he is still, so to speak, on the threshold of his career, and we shall look forward to his future work in prose and verse with a zest that has been whetted and stimulated by that which he has already written to our profit and entertainment. We believe that Mr. Baring is writing a new play, and we are Philistine enough to hope that it will be a diminutive drama but on a larger and a more ambitious scale.

ROBERT BIRKMYRE.

The Booksellers' Diary.

LIST OF FORTHCOMING BOOKS.

February 1st to March 1st, 1913.

Messrs. Allen & Co.

- FREUD, PROFESSOR.—The Interpretation of Dreams. Translated by A. A. Brill, Ph.D. 15s. net.
 GOLSWORTHY ARNOLD ("JINGLE")—A Little World. A Novel. 6s.
 LOVEMAN, LEONORA.—The Snow Queen. Adapted from Hans Andersen. 6d. net and 1s. net.
 MACKLIN, REV. W. H.—Monumental Brasscs. Revised Edition. 3s. 6d. net.
 REID, ROBERT.—Letters to My Mother. 1s. net.
 STRINDBERG, AUGUST.—Some Thoughts from August Strindberg. Translated by Rev. Claude Field. 5s. net.
 TASMANIA, THE BISHOP OF.—Nature Mysticism. 3s. 6d. net.

Messrs. J. W. Arrowsmith, Ltd.

- BUTLER, JOSEPHINE.—The Voice of One Crying in the Wilderness. 6d. net and od. net.

Messrs. Cassell & Co., Ltd.

- BOWEN, MARJORIE.—The Two Carnations. 3s. 6d.
 CLEGG.—Practical Drawing for Evening Schools. 1s. net.
 DEBBING, WARWICK.—Return of the Petticoat. 1s. net.
 JONES, BERNARDIE.—Reinforced Concrete. 15s. net.
 LAKE, MARY.—The Drug Slave. 6s.
 MACKIRDY, MRS.—Love's Soldier. 6s.
 MCKEOWN, NORMAN.—The Gate of To-morrow. 6s.
 NUTTALL and CORKE.—Trees and How They Grow. 6s. net.
 PEMBERTON, MAX.—White Motley. 6s.
 THOMAS, H. H.—Garden Work for Every Day. 1s. net and 1s. 6d. net.
 WARD, G. H. B.—The Truth About Spain. New Edition. 7s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Chapman & Hall, Ltd.

- CULLUM, RIDGWEILL.—The Golden Woman. 6s.
 D'AUVERGNE, E. H.—My Wander Years. 12s. 6d. net.
 EYRE, A. MONTGOMERY.—St. John's Wood: Its Houses, Its Haunts and Its Celebrities. 4s. net.
 GRIBBLE, FRANCIS.—The Tragedy of Isabella II. 15s. net.
 HAMMOND, FRANCIS.—Let Them Say! 6s.
 JAMES, WINIFRED.—The Mulberry Tree. 7s. 6d. net.
 MACMAHON, ELIA.—The Divine Folly. 6s.
 RADCLIFFE-HALL, MARGUERITE.—Songs of Three Counties. 5s. net.
 REYNOLDS, MRS. FRED.—The Granite Cross. 6s.
 RIDLEY, LADY.—Margery Tutton. 6s.
 SELBIE, REV. PRINCIPAL.—The Theology of Shilemarcher. 7s. 6d. net.
 SIMPSON, VIOLET A.—The Beacon Watchers. 6s.
 THURSTON, FATHER F. J.—The Theology of the Roman Church. 7s. 6d. net.
 WORSLEY, F. W.—The Theology of the English Church. 7s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Chatto & Windus.

- BESANT, WALTER.—The Lady of Lynn. Cheap Edition. 6d.
 CROKER, B. M.—The Spanish Necklace. Cheap Edition. 6d.
 DENT, EDWARD J.—Mozart's Operas: A Critical Study. 12s. 6d. net.
 DOYLE, A. CONAN.—The Firm of Girdestone. Cheap Edition. 6d.
 HUNGERFORD, MRS.—A Modern Circle. Cheap Edition. 6d.
 HYATT, ALFRED H. (Compiler).—The Charm of Paris. A Library Edition. Illustrated in Colour by Harry Morley. 5s. net and 7s. 6d. net.

Messrs. W. B. Clive & Sons.

- BRIGGS, WILLIAM, LL.D., M.A., B.Sc., and STEWART, R. W., D.Sc.—Qualitative Analysis. 3s.
 COLLINS, A. J., M.A.—Burke's American Speeches. 2s. 6d.
 GARDINER, L. J., M.A.—Intermediate French Reader. 2s. 6d.
 YOUNG, A. W., M.A., and PLAISTOWE, F. G., M.A.—Virgil: Georgics II. 1s. 6d.

Messrs. Digby, Long & Co.

- BLYTH, JAMES.—The King's Guerdon. 6d.
 CANNING, ETHEL.—The Sky-Line. 6s.
 DELANNOY, BURFORD.—A Studio Model. 6d.
 HARTLEY, PERCY.—Ism of Carpathia: A Romance of the Balkans. 6s.
 RUSSELL, DORA.—Silent Watchers. 6d.
 SMITH, J. C.—Short Annals of a Lancashire Village. 1s. 6d.

Mr. A. C. Fifield.

- BUTLER, SAMUEL.—Erewhon. 7th Impression. 2s. 6d. net.
 ROSE, HENRY.—Henrik Ibsen: Poet Mystic and Moralist. 2s. 6d. net.
 STAINER, MAX.—The Ego and His Own. New Issue. 2s. 6d. net.
 SWAN, TOM.—Edward Carpenter: The Man and His Message. 4th Impression. 6d. net.

Messrs. G. G. Harrap & Co.

- CHAPMAN, J. B.—Horace and His Poetry ("Poetry and Life" Series) 1s. net.
 CHASE, LOUIS N.—Poe and His Poetry ("Poetry and Life" Series) 1s. net.
 CRUSE, AMY.—Elizabethan Lyriists and Their Poetry. 1s. net.
 DICK, WILLIAM.—Byron and His Poetry. ("Poetry and Life" Series) 1s. net.
 DOPP, K. E.—The Early Sea People. Illustrated. 2s. net.
 EDMUNDS, E. W.—Pope and His Poetry. ("Poetry and Life" Series) 1s. net.
 HUDSON, WILLIAM H.—An Introduction to the Study of Literature. New and Enlarged Edition. 4s. 6d. net.
 JOHNSON, R. BRIMLEY.—Tennyson and His Poetry. ("Poetry and Life" Series) 1s. net.
 SMEATON, OLIPHANT.—Longfellow and His Poetry. ("Poetry and Life" Series) 1s. net.
 TAPPAN, E. M., Ph.D.—In Feudal Times With 200 Illustrations. ("Poetry and Life" Series) 3s. net.

Messrs. Headley Bros.

- GRAVESON, CAROLINE C.—The Divided Kingdoms. (Vol. VI.: "Teachers and Taught" Text Books.) 1s. net and 1s. 6d. net.
 JONES, RUFUS M.—A Dynamic Faith. New Edition. 1s. net.
 LEWIS, GEORGINA KING.—John Greenleaf Whittier: His Life and Work. 3s. 6d. net.
 ROWNTREE, M. L., and Others.—Peace Pioneering in Germany. 3d. net.

Mr. Wm. Heinemann.

- AUTHOR OF "HE WHO PASSED"—The Life Mask. 6s.
 BENSON, E. F.—The Weaker Vessel. 6s.
 GILLERUP, KARL.—Minna. 6s.
 ROLLAND, ROMAIN.—The Journey's End; John Christopher IV. 6s.
 SLADE, DOROTHEA.—Gutter Babies. 6s.

Messrs. Hutchinson & Co.

- BURGIN, G. B.—The Second Slighter's Daughter. 6s.
 DANBY, FRANK.—Concert 1st tch. 6s.
 JEPSON, EDGAR.—The Determined Twins. 6s.
 MOORE, F. FRANKFORT.—Fanny's First Novel. 6s.
 SINCLAIR, MAY.—The Combined Maze. 6s.

Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton.

- ALBANESI, E. MARIA.—Susannah and One Other. 7d.
 ANSTEE, F.—The Pariah. 1s.
 BARCLAY, MRS. HUBERT.—East of the Shadows. 6s.
 BARR, ROBERT.—The Ideal Woman. 6s.
 BARR, ROBERT.—The Sword Maker. 6d.
 BEGBIE, HAROLD.—The Priest. 6d.
 CODY, H. A.—The Long Patrol. 6s.
 COMSTOCK, SARAH.—Pioneers. 6s.
 DE LA PASTURE, MRS. HENRY.—Adam Grigson. 1s.
 DOUGLAS, O.—Olivia in India. 6s.
 DOYLE, A. CONAN.—The Mystery of Cloombur. 7d.
 FLEMING, D. HAY LL.D.—Critical Reviews Relating Chiefly to Scotland. 12s. net.
 GARVICE, CHARLES.—A Woman in It. 6d.
 GREEN, ANNA KATHARINE.—The Millionaire Baby. 6d.
 HUNGERFORD, MRS.—Rosamoyne. 6d.
 INNES, A. TAYLOR, LL.D.—Chapters of Reminiscence. 5s. net.
 KEYTE, REV. J. C., M.A.—The Passing of the Dragon. 6s.
 LEIGHTON, MARIE CONNOR.—Money. 6d.
 LEIGHTON, MARIE CONNOR.—The Missing Miss Randolph. 6d.
 MUNCER, DELL II.—The Wind Before the Dawn. 6s.
 ORCZY, BARONESS.—I Will Repay. 1s.
 ORCZY, BARONESS.—The Emperor's Gandelstick. 1s.
 OXENHAM, JOHN.—Pearl of Pearl Island. 6d.
 STEUART, J. A.—The Red Reaper. 1s.

Messrs. Hurst & Blackett, Ltd.

- GRAHAM, WINIFRED.—The Mormons: A Popular History. 6s. net.
 LE QURUX, WILLIAM.—The Price of Power. 6s.
 MARKIOTT, CHARLES.—The Catfish. 6s.

Messrs. T. C. & E. C. Jack.

- ADAMS, J. J.—Everyday Law. ("People's Books.") 6d. net.
 ASH, E. C., M.R.C.—Pond Life. ("People's Books.") 6d. net.
 BARTHOLOMEW, J., F.R.G.S.—Atlas of the World in Colour. 6d. net.
 BENNETT, W. H., M.A., D.D., LL.D., and ADENEY, W. F., M.A., D.D.—The Bible and Criticism ("People's Books") 6d. net.
 COLVIN, IAN D.—Cecil John Rhodes, 1854-1902. ("People's Books.") 6d. net.
 COLVIN, IAN D.—South Africa ("Romance of Empire" Series) 3s. 6d. net.
 COXHEAD, MARGARET.—Mexico ("Romance of History" Series) 3s. 6d. net.
 DAVEY, HENRY.—Handel ("Masterpieces of Music" Series.) 1s. 6d. net.
 HORSLEY, RFGINALD.—New Zealand. 3s. 6d. net.
 JOURDAIN, J. E. B., M.A.—The Nature of Mathematics. 6d. net.
 LANG, DR W. H.—Australia ("Romance of Empire" Series) 3s. 6d. net.
 LANG, JOHN.—Outposts of Empire ("Romance of Empire" Series.) 3s. 6d. net.
 LANG, JOHN.—The Land of the Golden Trade (West Africa) ("Romance of Empire" Series) 3s. 6d. net.
 MACBRIDE, PROFESSOR E. W., M.A., F.R.S.—Zoology: The Study of Animal Life. ("People's Books.") 6d. net.
 MACDONALD, JOHN, M.A.—Turkey and the Eastern Question. 6d. net.
 MACGREGOR, MARY.—The Netherlands ("Romance of History" Series.) 3s. 6d. net.
 MACKENZIE, SIR A. C.—Liszt. ("Masterpieces of Music" Series.) 1s. 6d. net.
 MASSON, ROSALINE.—Wordsworth. ("People's Books") 6d. net.
 MUGGE, M. A.—Friedrich Nietzsche. ("People's Books.") 6d. net.
 REDWAY, MAJOR G. W.—Wellington and Waterloo. 6d. net.
 SURRIDGE, VICTOR.—India ("Romance of Empire" Series) 3s. 6d. net.
 WATT, H. J., M.A., Ph.D., D.Phil.—Psychology. ("People's Books.") 6d. net.
 WILLSON, BECKLES.—Canada. ("Romance of Empire" Series) 3s. 6d. net.

Mr. T. Werner Laurie.

- BEACH, BELLE.—Riding and Driving for Women. 12s. 6d. net.
 FORD, SEWELL.—Trying Out Torchy. 6s.
 GAUNT, MARY.—Every Man's Desire. 6s.
 GULL, RANGER.—Murder, Limited. 6s.
 HUME, FERGUS.—The Curse. 6s.
 MOORE, GEORGE.—Impressions and Opinions. 6s. net.
 TRUSCOTT, PARRY.—Hilary's Career. 6s.
 WORMELEY, K. P.—The Ruin of a Princess. 14s. net.
 —The Sakatas or Wise Sayings of Bhartihari. 3s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston & Co.

- BERGER, FRANCESCO, Hon. R.A.M.—Reminiscences, Impressions and Anecdotes. 10s. 6d. net.
 PRICE, JULIUS M. (Special Artist Correspondent of the Illustrated London News).—Dame Fashion, 1766-1911. 150 plates mostly coloured. 32 2s. net.
 LEWIS, C. T. COURINEY (Compiled and Edited by).—The Baxter Print Handbook, 1912-13. 6s. net.

Messrs. Lynwood & Co.

- HALES, ADA M. M.—Leslie: A Novel. 6s.
 HENNIKER-ANDREWS, MRS.—An Indian Mystery: A Novel. 6s.
 MICHELL, C., and KILPATRICK, H. E.—The Elizabethan Voyagers, and Other Poems. 1s. 6d. net.
 ROWE, JOSEPHINE V.—McCushla, and Other Poems. 2s. 6d. net.

The Manchester University Press.

- DEAKIN, MARY H., M.A.—The Early Life of George Eliot. With an Introductory Note by Professor Herford.
 HACKFORTH, R., M.A.—The Authorship of the Platonic Epistles.
 SIDGWICK, MRS. HENRY.—University Education for Women.

Messrs. Methuen & Co.

- ADAMS, J.—Unconventional Molly. 6s.
 ALBANESI, E. M.—The Beloved Enemy. 6s.
 ARNOLD, MRS. J. O.—Requital. 6s.
 BAILEY, WILLIAM E.—Led into the Wilderness. 6s.
 BICKNELL, E. E.—Paris and Her Treasures. 5s. net.
 BIRMINGHAM, G. A.—The Adventures of Dr. Whitty. 6s.
 GOULD, S. BERING.—Old Country Life. 1s. net.
 HAIG, K. G.—Health Through Diet. 3s. 6d. net.
 HOBSON, J. A.—Gold Prices and Wages. 3s. 6d. net.
 HUGHES, C. E.—Early English Water Colours. 2s. 6d. net.
 LORIMER, G. H.—Old Gorgon Graham. 2s. net.
 LUCAS, E. V.—The British School. 2s. 6d. net.
 ORCZY, BARONESS.—Fire in Stubble. 1s. net.
 PLEYDELL, G.—The Ware Case. 6s.
 RAPPAPORT, A. S.—Home Life in Russia. 10s. 6d. net.
 RYLEY, A. D.—Old Paste. 42s. net.
 SNAITH, J. C.—An Affair of State. 6s.
 WEBLING, PEGGY.—The Pearl Stringer. 6s.
 WILLIAMSON, C. N. & A. M.—The Love Pirate. 6s.

Messrs. Mills & Boon.

About Baby. 1s net.
 ARMSTRONG, CECIL J.—Century of Famous Actresses 10s 6d. net.
 EDGAR, GEORGE.—Swift Nick of the York Road. 6s.
 JERMYN, HARRY.—The Absence of Aubrey 6s.
 LEBLANC, MAURICE.—The Frontier. Cheap Edition. 1s. net.
 MACK, LOUISE.—Attraction. 6s.
 O'KANE, W. M.—Guppy Guyson. 6s.

Mr. Eveleigh Nash.

ASKEW, ALICE and CLAUDE.—Poison. 3s. 6d. net.
 FLEISCHMANN, HECTOR.—The Emperor's Spy. 6s.
 HENRY, G.—Roads of Destiny 1s 6d. net.
 HODGSON, W. HOPE.—Carnacki, the Ghost-Under 6s.
 JERROLD, CLARE.—The Married Life of Queen Victoria 15s net.
 LE QUEUX, WILLIAM.—The Lost Million 6s.
 MATURIN, MRS. FRED.—With Gun, Rifle and Camera in Rhokasia 15s net.
 MCCABE, JOSEPH.—A History of the Jesuits 10s 6d. net.

Messrs. T. Nelson & Sons.

AUTHOR OF "ELIZABETH AND THE GERMAN GARDEN". Princess Priscilla's Fortnight. 7d. net.
 BLACKMORE, R. D.—Iona Doone. Vol II. 6d. net.
 DOYLE, A. CONAN.—The Sign of Four 7d. net.
 JAMES, MAJOR LIONEL.—With the Conquered Turk: The Story of a Latter-day Adventurer. 2s. net.
 Nelson's Encyclopedia Year Book, 1912-13 1s net.
 TREVELYAN, SIR GEORGE O.—Life and Letters of Lord Macaulay Vol. II. 1s. net.

Messrs. J. Nisbet & Co., Ltd.

BENSON, A. C.—Along the Road 7s. 6d. net.
 BIRT, LILIAN M.—The Children's Home-Finder: The Story of the Life Work of Annie Macpherson and Louisa Birt among the Poor Children of Liverpool and London. 3s. 6d. net.
 ELIZABETH, CHARLOTTE.—The Siege of Derry. 1s. net.
 GRENFELL, WILFRED T. M.D.—What Life Means to Me. 2s. net.
 KERR, CAROLINE F. (Translated by).—The Bayreuth Letters of Richard Wagner. 6s. net.
 PATERSON, H. J., M.D., F.R.C.S.—Surgery of the Stomach 12s. 6d. net.
 SMITH, REV. JOHN, D.D.—Broken Links in Scottish Education 2s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.

WARRICK, REV. JOHN, M.A.—The Moderators of the Church of Scotland from 1690 to 1740. With Portraits. 10s 6d. net.

Messrs. John Ouseley, Ltd.

"BACHELOR."—Poems 3s. 6d. net.
 BROADBENT, R. D.—Poetical Compendium 6s. net and 10s. 6d. net.
 HASLETTE, JOHN.—The Shadow of Salvador 6s.
 HAYES, BENSON.—From an Umbrian City. 2s. net.
 "IIM."—The Others and She 6s.
 JEANS, ALICE.—Mingled Seed 6s.
 KINMOUNT-ROY, D.—Linked Lives 6s.
 LUSK, LEWIS.—Sussex Iron. 6s.
 MONCKTON, G. F.—Lop-eared Duck 6s.
 OPENSHAW, MARY.—Little Gilly Gilly 6s.
 PLUMMER, REV. A. D.D.—Humankind of Christ. 3s. 6d. net.
 TIGHE, HARRY.—A Watcher of Life 6s.

Messrs. Kegan Paul, Trench & Co.

GOLTZ, BARON COLMAR VON DER (Royal Prussian General Field Marshal)—Jena to Eylau: A Study in German Military History. Translated by Capt C F Atkinson With Maps 6s net.
 GRISAR, HARTMANN, S. J. (Professor at the Royal University of Innsbruck)—Luther, Vol. I. Authorized English Translation to be issued in 6 Vols.
 HAIG, ELIZABETH.—Floral Symbolism of the Great Masters. With 16 Full page Plates 6s net.
 "IGNOTUS." The Lawyer Our Old Man of the Sea. With a Foreword by Sir Robert F. Fulton, M.A. 7s. 6d. net.
 RUSSELL, H. G.—From Hussar to Priest A Memoir of Father Charles Rose Chase.

Messrs. Stanley Paul & Co.

ANDERSON, A. J.—The ABC of Artistic Photography. Illustrated. 5s. net.
 BAZIN, RENE.—The Redeemer 6s.
 BINGHAM, CLIFTON.—I've an Old Sweet Song 2s. net.
 HERVEY, H. J. A.—The European in India Illustrated 12s. 6d. net.
 JOHNSON, A. T.—California An Englishman's Impression of the Golden State. Illustrated 10s. 6d. net.
 LIND-AF-HAGEBY, L.—August Strindberg. Illustrated. 6s. net.
 MEADE, L. T.—Ruffles 2s. net.
 PEARCE, CHARLES E.—Polly Peachum. Illustrated. 16s. net.
 "RTA."—A Grey Life. 6s.
 "RTA."—My Lord Connet 6d.
 SANDARS, MARY F.—Princess and Queen. The Life of Mary II. of England. Illustrated 16s. net.
 SLADEN, DOUGLAS.—The Curse of the Nile 6s.
 STANTON, CORALIE, and HOSKEN, HEATH.—Called to Judgment. 6s.

Sir Isaac Pitman & Sons.

BALDENSPERGER, PHILIP J.—The Immovable East. With 24 Illustrations and Map. 7s. 6d. net.
 CHADWICK, MRS. ELLIS H.—Mrs Gaskell: Haunts, Homes and Stories. New and Cheaper Edition Illustrated. 5s. net.
 COLES, ARTHUR, A.C.I.S.—Company Accounts 5s. net.
 DAY, E. HERMITAGE, D.D.—The Ministry of the Church. 2s. 6d. net.
 HOLLINGS, B. T. B.—How to Write a Good Hand. 1s. net.
 INNES, J. W., and CAMPBELL, T. COLIN.—Colliery Office Organisation. 3s. 6d. net.
 RANKIN, H. A., and BROWN, F. H.—Simple Pictorial Illustrations. Illustrated in Colour. 4s. net.
 RAWLINGS, B. BURFORD.—A Hospital in the Making. Illustrated. 5s. net.

Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons.

BURNETT, FRANCES HODGSON.—My Robin 1s. net.
 DOCK, LAVINIA L.—The History of Nursing, Vols. III and IV 21s. net.
 DRESSER, JASMINE STONE VAN.—How to Find Happy Land. New Edition. 4s. net.
 HENDERSON, ERNEST F.—Symbol and Satire in the French Revolution. 16s. net.
 HOLMES, CLAY W.—The Elmira Prison Camp. 15s. net.
 HULMES, THOMSON J.—Psychic Phenomena. New Edition. 6s.
 IRWIN, FLORENCE.—The Fine Points of Auction Bridge. 3s. 6d. net.
 JAMES, ALICE L.—The Charming Dish 4s. net.
 KEY, ELLEN.—Woman Movement 6s. net.
 MAUREL, ANDRE.—Little Cities of Italy Second Series. 9s. net.
 MEAD, LUCIA.—Swords and Ploughshares. 6s. net.
 MEREDSKOWSKI, DMITRI.—The Romance of Leonardo da Vinci. Illustrated Edition. 2 Vols. 21s. net.
 MORITZEN, JULIUS.—The Peace Movement in America. 12s. 6d. net.
 SHOEMAKER, MICHAEL M.—Indian Pages and Pictures. 10s. 6d. net.
 TYLER, MASON WHITING.—Recollections of the Civil War. 10s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Alston Rivers, Ltd.

MOORE, LESLIE.—Aunt Olive in Bohemia. 6s.
 PENROSE, MRS. H. H.—The House of Renel. 6s.
 SMITH, MRS. ISABEL.—Nevertheless. 6s.
 WILSON, DAVID ALEC.—The Truth About Carlyle. With Preface by Sir James Crockett-Browne, M.D. 1s. 6d. net.

Messrs. G. Routledge & Sons.

BULKELEY, REV. CANON H. G.—Poems and Verses by Father and Son.
 HAMILTON, C.—Technical School Organization and Teaching. 7s. 6d. net.
 INGHAM, A. F.—First Year's Machine Construction. 2s. 6d. net.
 PERTWEE, ERNEST.—The Reciter's Second Treasury of Verse. With Introduction on Rhythm and Metre. 3s. 6d.

Messrs. Sands & Co.

ANON.—St. Gertrude. Being Vol. V. of the "Notre Dame 'Lives of the Saints.'" Illustrated. 3s. 6d. net.
 ANON.—St. Gilbert of Sempringham. Being Vol. VI. of the "Notre Dame 'Lives of the Saints.'" 3s. 6d. net.
 HARRETT, REV. M.—Our Lady in the Liturgy: Considerations on the Feasts of the Blessed Virgin. 3s. 6d.
 CURTIS, FELICIA.—In the Lean Years. A Romance of Jacobite Days. 6s.

Mr. Robert Scott.

CALDECOTT, W. SHAW.—Synthetic Studies in Scripture. Introduction by Bishop of Durham. 3s. 6d. net; paper boards. 2s. 6d. net.
 FLEMING, REV. W. R., M.A., D.D.—Mysticism in Christianity. 5s. net.
 OTTLEY, REV. R. L., D.D.—The Rule of Life and Love. 5s. net.
 PILCHER, REV. C. VENN, D.D.—The Passion Hymns of Iceland. Introduction by Bishop of Durham. 2s. 6d. net.
 SHETTLÉ, REV. GEO. T.—Them Which Sleep in Jesus. Introduction by the Bishop of Aberdeen and Orkney. 1s. 6d. net.

The Walter Scott Publishing Co., Ltd.

ABRAMOWSKI, O. L. M., M.D.—Vitalism: The Art of Eating for Health 2s.
 BITHELL, JETIRO, M.A.—Life of Maeterlinck. 1s. net.
 COOPER, REV. A. N. ("The Walking Parson").—Tales of My Tramps. 1s. net.
 DUTTON, THOMAS, M.D.—Digestion and Diet. 2s. net.
 KENNEDY, JEAN E.—Baumbach's "The Water of Youth" 6d. net.
 LORD, CAPTAIN W. R.—Real Life at Sea. 3s. 6d.
 NEWMAN, JOHN HENRY.—Apologia pro Vita Sua. ("Scott Library," 12 Vols.) 1s. 6d. net per vol.
 TOLSTOY.—The Kreutzer Sonata. 1s. net.
 WATSON, KATHLEEN.—Litames of Life. 2s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Sidgwick & Jackson.

BAKER, ELIZABETH.—Chains. (3rd Imp.) 1s. 6d. net and 1s. net.
 BARKER, GRANVILLE, and HOUSMAN, LAURENCE.—Prunella (6th Imp.) 1s. net.
 BARKER, GRANVILLE.—Waste (8th Imp.) 2s. net and 1s. 6d. net.
 CANNAN, GILBERT.—Four Plays 2s. 6d. net.
 DALE, LUCY, and FAULDING, G. M.—Time's Wallet. 6s.
 DODGE, JANET.—An Inn Upon the Road 6s.
 HOUGHTON, STANLEY.—Five One-Act Plays 2s. net and 1s. 6d. net.
 HOUGHTON, STANLEY.—Huddle Wakes (4th Imp.) 2s. net and 1s. 6d. net.
 MAYOR, F. M.—The Third Miss Symons. With an Introduction by John Masefield 3s. 6d. net.
 MONKHOUSE, ALLAN.—Mary Broome. (2nd Imp.) 2s. net and 1s. 6d. net.
 SCHNITZLER, ARTHUR.—Anatol (3rd Imp.) 2s. net and 1s. 6d. net.
 SOWERBY, GITHA.—Rutherford and Son. (2nd Imp.) 2s. 6d. net.
 WILLIAMS, HAROLD.—Discovery 6s.

Mr. Elliot Stock.

DODDS, M. L.—The Wider Gospel 3s. 6d. net.
 FAIR, CHARLES G.—Words With Wings.
 INGE, THE VERY REV. W. R., M.A.—Death the Fulfilment of Life. 6d. net.
 MACHAR, AGNES MAULE.—Stories of the British Empire. 2 Vols. 4s. net each.
 ORR, CECIL.—The White Man, or, the Drama of the Adamites.
 WHATMORE, ARTHUR W.—Insula Britannica. With Four Maps. 20s. net.
 "Why Weepst Thou?" Words of Comfort for the Sick Room. 1s. net.
 WILKINSON, LIE VON. BASIL.—There is No Death. 1s. 6d. net.
 WILSON, REV. F. K.—The Supreme Service 2s. net.

Mr. T. Fisher Unwin.

GUERARD, PROFESSOR ALBERT LEON.—French Prophets of Yesterday. 12s. 6d. net.
 HANNAH, IAN C.—The Berwick and Lothian Coasts. 6s. net.
 MACGOWAN, J.—How England Saved China. 10s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Ward, Lock & Co., Ltd.

BINDLOSS, HAROLD.—The Wastrel. 6s.
 HILL, HEADON.—The Cottage in the China 6s.
 LEIGHTON, M. CONNOR.—Put Yourself in Her Place 6d.
 LE QUEUX, WILLIAM.—As We Forgive Them. 1s. net.
 MILFORD, BERTRAM.—The River of Unrest. 6d.
 OPPENHEIM, E. P.—Postmaster of Market Drayton. 2s. net.
 ROWLAND, EFFIE A.—In Love's Land. 6d.
 TRACY, LOUIS.—No Other Way. 6s.
 TRENT, PAUL.—The Foundling 6s.
 WHITE, FRID. M.—The Mystery of the Ravenspurs. 6d.

Messrs. Wells Gardner, Darton & Co.

ADDERLEY, THE REV. THE HON. J. G.—The Creed and Real Life. With Introduction by the Bishop of Lincoln (Dr. Hicks) 2s. 6d. net.
 HEAZELL, REV. F. N., and MARGOLIOUTH, MRS. (Edited by).—Kurds and Christians. 3s. 6d. net.
 LONDON, THE BISHOP OF.—The Attractiveness of Goodness. 2s. 6d. net.
 NEWHOLT, REV. CANON.—The Holy Trinity and Daily Life. 1s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Williams & Norgate.

BAILEY, JOHN.—Dr. Johnson and His Circle. 1s. net and 2s. 6d. net.
 BOUTROUX, EMILE.—Education and Ethics. Trans. by Fred Rothwell. 5s. net.
 CARPENTER, PROFESSOR J. ESTLIN.—Comparative Religion. 1s. net and 2s. 6d. net.
 CHESTERTON, G. K.—The Victorian Age in Literature. 1s. net and 2s. 6d. net.
 DIBBLE, G. BINNEY.—The Newspaper. 1s. net and 2s. 6d. net.
 EUCKEN, PROFESSOR RUDOLF.—The Truth of Religion. Translated from entirely new German Edition by Dr. W. Tudor Jones. 12s. 6d. net.
 FISHER, HERBERT.—Napoleon. 1s. net and 2s. 6d. net.
 GOULD, E. J.—Noble Pages from German History. Illustrated.
 GWYN, JOHN J.—Making a Newspaper. 6s. net.
 HANNAH, DAVID.—The Navy and Sea Power. 1s. net and 2s. 6d. net.
 LE ROY, EDOUARD.—A New Philosophy: Henri Bergson. Translated by Vincent Benson. 4s. net.
 MELDOLA, PROFESSOR RAPHAEL.—Chemistry. 1s. net and 2s. 6d. net.
 MIKAMI, YOSHIO.—The Development of Mathematics in China and Japan. 19s. net.
 MOORE, PROFESSOR BENJAMIN.—The Origin and Nature of Life. 1s. net and 2s. 6d. net.
 ROBERTSON, PROFESSOR J. G.—The Literature of Germany. 1s. net and 2s. 6d. net.
 SMITH, RT. HON. F. E., K.C., M.P.—Unionist Policy. 5s. net.
 WEDMORE, SIR FREDERICK.—Painters and Painting. With Half-tone Illustrations. 1s. net and 2s. 6d. net.

THE READER.

CHARLES READE.

BY LEWIS MELVILLE.

WHEN we speak of the Victorian novel, we think at once of Thackeray and Dickens, writers so immeasurably superior to any of their contemporaries as to throw the rest into the shade. Yet among those contemporaries were many brilliant authors, George Eliot and Charlotte Brontë, Lytton and Disraeli, Wilkie Collins and Trollope, and the subject of this paper, Charles Reade. Indeed, at no time before or since in the annals of English literature was such fare put before novel-readers. It was not only an age of masterpieces, but also an age of excellent stories only ranging lower than the best. Even to-day, when the standard of the novel is so high, the man must be singularly unappreciative who cannot spend many an hour over the output even of the writers of the second class who flourished in those days. Amongst these, Charles Reade takes a high place. A singular man he was, and one demanding an inspired biographer—in this respect he has been unfortunate, for he has been the subject only of a very pedestrian memoir, and of a singularly chaotic book of reminiscences by George Coleman. His "life" remains to be written, and in the hands of a sympathetic admirer should be verily a human document, the record of a great-hearted, pugilistic, irascible, persevering, litigious, contradictory, loving and lovable genius.

Born when the nineteenth century was but fourteen years old, he was educated at private schools, and went to Oxford in 1831, when he was elected to a demyship at Magdalen College. He distinguished himself at the University, with which he maintained a close connection for many years, becoming Dean of Arts at Magdalen in 1845, a position he relinquished at the end of the following year, and in 1851 vice-president of his college. At one time contemplating a legal career, he was called to the bar at the age of twenty-nine, and read for a while with his brother-novelist, Samuel Warren; but the law did not satisfy him, and he turned to literature. To letters he served a stern apprenticeship. "Good God!" he said, "had it not been for the fellowship—which, though it bound me to celibacy, preserved me from pauperdom—and a mother's generous help, I must have been in the workhouse, or breaking stones on the highway." In 1851 he drew up his "account with literature."

"Item.—My family had brought me up, and educated me, till I was sixteen

"Item I earned my demyship, eighteen pounds a year, at seventeen.

"Item.—At twenty-one I obtained my fellowship, beginning at two hundred and fifty pounds per annum, and ultimately rising to six hundred and fifty

"Item. Eighteen years devoted to the study of dramatic art."

"Now let us see what I had gained for this outlay.

"Item. 'Ladies' Battle,' nil.

"Item.—'Masks and Faces,' half of one hundred fifty pounds, seventy-five pounds.

"Item.—From Bentley, for book of 'Peg Woffington' thirty pounds.

"In all, one hundred and five pounds. That is to say, about half-a-crown a year for eighteen years—enough to pay for pens and paper, leaving copy and shoe-leather out of the question."

Such an experience might well have deterred another, and made him turn his energies in a different direction. Not so was Charles Reade affected. He foamed with rage. He cursed the managers who would not have his plays. He abused those who produced them, in his opinion, unsatisfactorily. But he never ceased to write. It was in his blood, and from his pen, in rapid succession, came play after play, and then novel after novel. That he became a novelist was due to the advice of that charming actress, Mrs. Laura Seymour, "the wisest counsellor, the truest friend, that ever crossed my path."

"Masks and Faces," a comedy written in collaboration with Tom Taylor, and produced at the Haymarket in the winter of 1852, was his first dramatic success, and the only play of his first period that demands mention here, though his melodrama, "Gold," at Drury Lane, was far more profitable. "Masks and Faces" Reade, prompted by Mrs. Seymour, turned into the novel so well-known as "Peg Woffington." It must be confessed that the story is better as a play than as a work of fiction, its principal characters and scenes being more effective on the stage than in the book. In cold print much of it is unconvincing, and, in spite of the undoubted cleverness of the book, its unreality is its most marked feature.

Charles Reade in 1880.

Ipsden, Oxfordshire, the Birthplace of Charles Reade.

From "Charles Reade as I Knew Him," by George Coleman (Treherne & Co.).

"Peck Woffington," however, was a great success, with the public, and Reade followed it with "Christie Johnstone," adapted from another of his plays, but this time an unacted one. It is a much more remarkable production. In the first we have a woman redeemed from sin, in the second a man converted from an idle purposeless life to one of healthy and kindly exertion. "Christie Johnstone" is a picture rather than a story, a picture of the Newhaven fisheries and fisher folk. Christie herself is a fine character, but the best pages of the book are those concerned with Lord Ipsden and the old woman whom he assists with money and invites to unbosom herself of her troubles.

"'My trouble, laddie?'" cried she, trembling all over. 'The sun wad set, and rise, and set again, ere I could tell ye a' the trouble I hae come through. Oh, ye need na vex yourself for an auld wife's tears; tears are a blessin', lad, I shall assure ye. Mony's the time I hae prayed for them, and could na hae them. Sit ye doon! sit ye doon! I'll no let ye gang fra ma door till I hae thankit ye; but gie me time, gie me time, I canna greet a' the days of the week.' "

And then she unfolds the miseries of her life, and many and dreadful they are. When the full tale of them is recounted, hunger, cold, anguish, and death, she begins to thank him for his sympathy, and, warming to her

Charles Reade.

Drawn by M. Stein from a photograph taken about 1858.

70, Knightbridge.

Charles Reade's Residence from 1868 to 1880.

Here were written "Foul Play" (1868), "Put Yourself in His Place" (dramatized under the title of "Free Labour" in 1870); "A Terrible Temptation," 1871; "The Wandering Heir," 1872, "A Simpleton," 1873, "A Woman Hater," 1877, and in 1879 his greatest dramatic success, "Drink" (an adaptation of Zola's "L'Assommoir"), for which he received upwards of £20,000.

task, blesses him for his kindness, and the blessing is that of a patriarch:—

"A thousand good wishes came, like a torrent of fire, from her lips, with a power that eclipsed his dreams of human eloquence; and then, changing in a moment from the thunder of a pythoness to the tender music of some poetess mother, she ended, 'An' oh, my boenny, boenny lad, may ye be wi' the rich upon the airth a' your days, AND WI' THE PUIR IN THE WULD TO COME!'"

Though Reade had successfully novelized (if the expression may be used) two of his plays, he did not yet think of himself as a writer of fiction, but remained faithful to his early love, and during the next two years (1854-5) no less than six of his plays were produced. Two of these are still occasionally to be seen, "The Lyons Mail" and "Nance Oldfield," in which, within the memory of the present generation, Sir Henry Irving in the first, and Miss Ellen Terry in the

Hazel and Helen on Godsend Isle.

From one of George Du Maurier's drawings illustrating "Foul Play," by Charles Reade and Dion Boucicault.

"I am a man that's down," said Wylie in a low and broken voice. "Don't hit me any more."

From one of George Du Maurier's drawings illustrating "Foul Play."

Scene from "The Courier of Lyons" which was produced at the Princess's Theatre in 1854, and afterwards became famous as "The Lyons Mail."

The Fight at the Diggings.

Scene from "It is Never too Late to Mend," which was produced at the Princess's Theatre in 1865.

Scenes from two of Charles Reade's famous dramas.

From a photo by J. & C. Watkins. Tom Taylor, who collaborated with Charles Reade in writing "Masks and Faces," on which Reade afterwards founded his novel,
"Peg Woffington."

second, gave magnificent renderings of the principal characters. Reade subsequently dramatized some of his books, wrote other plays, and produced a version of Zola's "L'Assommoir," but from 1855 it is as a novelist rather than as a dramatist that he must be regarded.

It was almost by accident that Reade again turned to the novel. In August, 1855, a great sensation was created in England by the trial and conviction of Lieutenant William Austin, Governor of Birmingham gaol, for cruelty to the prisoners in his custody. Reade was appalled by the revelations, and made a study of the conditions of prison life. Very dissatisfied was he with what he learnt, and he wrote "It is Never Too Late to Mend" to expose the abuses of the system. There is much that is good in the book, but, as in most novels with a purpose, the purpose is insisted upon to a degree that throws the story out of proportion. The author's whole-hearted indignation led him into exaggerations, which could not be defended, and which succeeded only in irritating many readers. The book, and a dramatized version of it, achieved great popularity.

Read was now fairly launched upon his career as a writer of fiction, and he published in rapid succession "The Course of True Love Never Did Run Smooth" (1857), "Jack of all Trades" (1858), "The Autobiography of a Thief"

Photo by Van Doorn. Dion Bouicault,
who collaborated with Charles Reade in writing the novel
"Foul Play."

(1858), "Love me Little, Love me Long" (1859), and "White Lies" (1860). "The Cloister and the Hearth" appeared in 1861, and two years later "Hard Cash" in which he exposed the danger to the community of sanctioning private lunatic asylums. Of his later books, it is only necessary to mention "Griffith Gaunt" (1865), which was violently attacked by those whom Reade denounced as "prurient prudes"; and "Foul Play" (1869), which deals with the scuttling of ships by owners desirous to draw the insurance.

As a story-teller, Reade had many merits. He could write well, he could draw character, he had undoubted powers of description, he had imagination--in varying degrees he had almost every gift of the novelist except humour--and he summoned even humour to his aid in "Christie Johnstone," in the opening chapters of which there are some quaint turns in the dialogue that Oscar Wilde would not have disowned. As against this, however, in spite of the realism of the details, he all too frequently indulged in over-emphasis, which resulted in throwing over the whole an air the language. The present writer would say that it is the best historical novel in the language with the exception of "Esmond." "Esmond" is written in the grand manner, and endowed with the charm of Thackeray's style and with those wonderful scenes of Esmond returning home bringing his sheaves with him and of Lady Castlewood confronting his Grace of Hamilton with the information that Esmond is the head of the House of Castlewood—those wonderful scenes that are no interpolated purple passages, but arise naturally in the course of the development of the narrative.

[illegible]

Theatre poster announcing the first performance of one of Reade's dramas.

To praise "Esmond" is not, however, to disparage "The Cloister and the Hearth." A first version of the latter book, entitled "A Good Fight," appeared serially in 1859 in Once a Week, and, it is said, that the circulation of the periodical went up by twenty thousand copies. The editor, not knowing when he was well off, took liberties with the manuscript, whereupon the indignant author abruptly wound up the tale. Two years later, having revised and partly re-written the story, Reade published it in book form under the title by which it has become famous. It is so much greater a work than any other that he has written, that he must be included in the small band of authors whose reputation rests serenely upon a single book. It is, in fact, "The Cloister and the Hearth" first, and the rest nowhere. On every page Reade's erudition is obvious, yet never is it so obtruded as directly to call attention to it or to divert the reader's attention from the story. The period would, indeed, appear to have been chosen because the author knew it so well, not because he thought the period specially suitable for an historical romance. The real characters introduced in the tale are not dragged in because there should be real characters in such a book, they make their appearance in it naturally. And what a canvas it is which Reade has chosen! And with what a portrait-gallery he has covered it! In these days when the novel is, more often than not, of the hole-and-corner variety, treating of a London slum, a street in Camberwell, the life of the bargee, or of the fast set, how refreshing it is to turn to this book where the novelist takes us from one end of Europe to the other, visiting Holland, Germany, France, and Italy, presenting us with indelible pictures of the manners and customs of the various folk.

The book is cast in the heroic mould. "Not a day passes over the earth, but noble men and women of no note do great deeds, speak great words, and suffer noble sorrows." This is the text of "The Cloister and the Hearth," as spoken by the author in the first lines, a text that is adhered to throughout, the principal characters being, one and all, unimportant in the life of nations, having no part in great events, living entirely in their own humble spheres. It is a love-story primarily—the story of the love of Gerard, the son of Elias and Catherine of Tergow for beautiful, red-haired Margaret Brandt. Gerard, by a forged letter written by his brother, is told that his mistress, who was to be his wife, is dead, and, in despair, he becomes a monk. When he learns that he has been deceived, he goes to his home, and arrives unexpectedly as the family is about to sit down to supper.

"The covers were withdrawn, and the knives brandished. Then burst into the room, not the expected Margaret, but a Dominican friar, livid with rage.

"He was at the table in a moment, in front of Cornelis and Sybrandt, threw his tall body over the narrow table, and, with two hands hovering above their shrinking heads, like eagles over a quarry, he cursed them by name, soul and body, in this world and the next. It was an age eloquent in curses, and this curse was so full, so minute, so blighting, blasting, withering, and tremendous, that I am afraid to put all the words on paper. 'Cursed be the lips,' he shrieked, 'which spoke the lie that Margaret was dead, may they rot before the grave, and kiss white-hot iron in hell thereafter, doubly cursed be the hands that changed those letters, and be they struck off by the hangman's knife, and handle hell-fire for ever; three accursed be the cruel hearts that did conceive that damned he, to part true love for ever; may they sicken and wither on earth joyless, loveless, hopeless, and wither to dust before their time; and burn in eternal fire.' He cursed the meat at their mouths, and every atom of their bodies, from their hair to the soles of their feet. Then turning from the cowering, shuddering pair, who had almost hid themselves beneath the table, he tore a letter out of his bosom, and flung it down before his father.

"Read that, thou hard old man, that didst imprison thy son, read and see what monsters thou hast brought into the world. The memory of my wrongs and hers, dwell with you all for ever! I will meet you again at the Judgment Day; on earth you will never see me more."

"And in a moment, as he had come, so he was gone, leaving them stiff and cold, and white as statues, round the smoking board."

As a companion picture to this scene of passion shall be given a scene of exquisite tenderness, when Gerard, known as Brother Clement, discovers in his hermit's cell the baby that, unknown to him, Margaret has borne him.

Charles Reade.

"Clement laid down his psalter softly and began to rock his new treasure in his arms, and to crone over him a little lullaby well known in Tergow, with which his own mother had often set him off.

"And the child sank into a profound sleep upon his arm. And he stopped croning and gazed on him with infinite tenderness, yet sadness; for at that moment he could not help thinking what might have been but for a piece of paper with a lie in it.

"He sighed deeply.

"The next moment the moonlight burst into his cell, and with it, and in it, and almost as swift as it, Margaret

Brandt was down at his knee with a timorous hand upon his shoulder.

"Gerard, you do not reject us? You cannot."

As is the case with all great books, even the best passages and scenes lose much when wrested from the context. The above extracts may give some idea of Reade's range, but to enjoy its full quality the book must be read in its entirety, read and re-read, and read again. Then can be appreciated the beauty of the work, its tenderness, its sympathy, and its humanity.

"THE BOOKMAN" PRIZE COMPETITIONS.

FEBRUARY, 1913.

Answers to these competitions (each on a separate sheet bearing the name and address of the sender) should be forwarded not later than the 15th of the month to

"The Prize Page," THE BOOKMAN, Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton, Warwick Square, E.C.

The date fixed above for sending in answers does not apply to Competitors resident abroad, except in the case of competitions Nos. 1 and 3; answers from Foreign or Colonial readers for competitions 2, 4 and 5 (the subjects of these being the same each month) will be admissible to the first competitions that are adjudicated upon after the date of their receipt.

Each competitor may send in any number of attempts, provided each attempt is written on a separate sheet of paper.

- I.—A PRIZE OF ONE GUINEA is offered for the best original ballad in not more than forty-eight lines.
- II.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best quotation from English verse applicable to any review or the name of any author or book appearing in this number of THE BOOKMAN. Preference will be given to quotations of a humorous nature.
- III.—A PRIZE OF THREE NEW BOOKS is offered for the best letter in not more than a hundred and fifty words, giving advice to a young poet.
- IV.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best review in not more than one hundred words of any recently published book. Competitors should give the names of Authors and Publishers at head of their reviews.

- V.—A copy of THE BOOKMAN will be sent post free for twelve months to the sender of the best suggestion for THE BOOKMAN Competitions. The Editor reserves the right to use any suggestion submitted.

Note.—Special attention is directed to the Twenty-one Guineas Prize Poem Competition announced on the first page of this Number.

Two ladies glided into the room.

From "Put Yourself in His Place," by Charles Reade (Chatto & Windus).

RESULTS OF COMPETITIONS FOR JANUARY.

I.—The PRIZE OF ONE GUINEA for the best original Lyric is awarded to Miss Grace M. Measham, of 15, Sanderson Road, Jesmond, Newcastle-on-Tyne, for the following :

ONE THING NEEDFUL.

Oh eyes,
What matters it if the pure blue o' the skies
Dwell in your depths, or all the stars of night ?
So you be bright
With tenderness, you want no other light.

Oh mouth,
We ask not, that the fragrance of the South
Breathe from thee, that thou seem a scarlet flower
From Cupid's bower,—
If smiles and gentle speeches be thy dower.

Oh hands,
Needs not ye gleam with gems from many lands,
That like a snowflake's is your white caress,—
Your loveliness
Is that ye work for others' happiness.

Oh heart,
Whatever joy be thine, or sorrow's smart,
Whate'er thy dreams, thy yearnings all unguessed,—
Thou shalt find rest
Only in love,—that is the one thing blest.

GRACE M. MEASHAM

We select for printing :

SPRING.

Fling a robe of white and blue about her,
Oh, ye skies !
Hush the winds of March lest they should flout her,
In surprise ;
Kiss away the April tears from out her Shining eyes !

Spread the wonder of the woods before her,
April sweet !
Stretch a living arch of greenness o'er her ;
At her feet
Every dear delight you've gathered for her,
Cast complete !

Weave a mesh of bud and bloom to hold her
In a net !
Every fairest flower of May unfold hither !
She'll forget
Just the way to leave us, till she's told her Secret yet !

O, our hearts grow weary for the liting
Songs you sing !
Though men say you're just a huckle, jilting,
Wayward thing ;
Yet we love you, and we want you, oh come quickly !
Happy Spring !

(Mr. L. T. George, Pentney, The Avenue, Lewes.)

THE HOSPITAL CHAPEL.

Where shall we build Thee a house, O Christ ?
In the midst of the country fair ?
In a grove of stately cedar trees,
Shall we build Thee a palace there ?
For whom shall we build Thee a house, O Christ ?
Shall it be for the strong and wise ?
To worship Thee, Lord, in luxury,
Hard-hearted, with pride-full eyes ?

Ah, no, we have built Thee a dwelling, Lord,
In the dank and squalid town,
In the midst where the poor and suffering dwell,
In the midst of Thy very own.
We have raised Thy Cross in the hospital
Its shadow will heal and bless,
For the sick whom Thou lovest most of all,
And the sad Thou lovest no less.
So did we build Thee a dwelling, Lord,
In the midst of this place of pain,
That the sick and sad at Thy Altar sweet
May all be made whole again.

(E. W. Higgs, 33, Thistlewaite Road, Clapton, N.E.)

"And they led him to the Stadthouse."

Drawn by Charles Keene.
From the "Cloister and the Hearth," by Charles Reade (Chatto & Windus).

A SONG.

It was not song of bird,
That first the mild air stirred ;
A sweet voice softly spoke—
Out of the green, out of the green,
In all its joyous, golden sheen,
A daffodil awoke !

It was not sight of flowers,
Nor scent of springtide's bowers,
It was not sunshine's gold,
That made birds sing, that made birds sing !
It was the Spring, it was the Spring,
Who did all glad hearts hold !

For her sweet things are born,
On each new joyous morn,
Blue hyacinths she doth own,
And glad birds' trills, and glad birds' trills !
Pink tulips and gold daffodils,
They bloom for her alone !

(Constance Goodwin, 25, Cautley Avenue, Clapham, S.W.)

FAIRIES.

Far and far away the little folk are calling,
Calling us to come to them across the shadow-lands,
Wailing in the coverts and in the windy places
To those that cannot hear them nor feel their clinging hands ;
Crying in the moonlight and the starlight cold and chill,
When all the world is quiet and the wind has got his will,
And the flying shadows shift and deepen and are still.

The air is full of voices from the bees among the heather,
And the curlew in the uplands whistles long and sweet,
Yet the world is all too busy to leave its haunts and listen
And it cannot hear the message for the roaring of the street ;
Could we but forsake our buying and let our selling be,
And leave the dusty highway for the moorland and
the sea,
All our bonds should then be loosened, and our souls be free.

"You are an angel of goodness."

From "Hard Cash," by Charles Reade (W. Collins, Sons & Co. Illustrated Pocket Classics)

The dreary endless houses overshadow us with greyness,
And our ears are dulled and heavy with the wheels that come and go
Grinding on for ever down the grim discordant roadways
To the sound of countless footsteps hurrying to and fro;
Yet above the noise and turmoil of the people going by,

Comes a rune-song of the mountains and the cloudless
open sky,
And the glamour of the marshes with the peewits flying high.

A ceaseless haunting melody of loved things half-forgotten,
Of undiscovered kingdoms luring us to roam;
A song that always called us, a song of many meanings,
But one that sings to all men of the fair road home.
And you and I will rise, dear heart, and go while yet we may
Beyond the peaceful sunset isles and borders of the day,
For the fairy-folk are calling us, far and far away. ..

(B. R. M. Hetherington, Wide-open-Dykes, Carlisle.)

Many other Lyrics sent in are of equal merit with these four, and we should print more but for lack of space. We highly commend those received from Margaret K. McEvoy (Cricklewood), E. F. Parr (Clifton), A. M. Bowyer-Rosman (Ladbroke Grove), Kathleen A. Foley (Salisbury), G. Lenorme (Bingley), J. Herbert Howlett (Coventry), K. Elsie Hunt (North Shields), J. A. S. Wilson (Edinburgh), J. J. de Courcy (Mill Hill), E. W. Priest (Norwich), H. W. Foote (Piccadilly), R. B. Boswell (Southampton), Phyllis Tweeddale (Birkdale), D. M. Tweeddale (Birkdale), H. R. Smith (Newcastle-on-Tyne), Mrs. Edward Ormsby (Sheffield), Audrey Thompson (Hastings), Violet Gillespie (Forest Hill), W. A. Lambe, Emily Kingston (Blairgowrie), Frank Brebner (Portlethen), M. A. P. Price (Birmingham), E. Summers (Duckinfield), Cyril Falls (London, W.C.), Irene Wintle (Liverpool), M. F. Aikman (Glasgow), A. S. Barnard (Walsall), Kathleen A. Foley (Salisbury), T. D. Thomson (Finchley), Ernest A. Kesten (Thornton Heath), Alec W. G. Randall (New Barnet), A. L. de Burgh (New Southgate), Evelyn J. Banks (Sheffield), H. B. Dawes, Junior (Southport), Margaret Waitham (Bridgwater), Elsie S. Mead (Burnley), Harold R. Lingwood (Ipswich), A. Lee, Jun. (Southport), Eleanor L. Clark (Dublin), Ivan Adair, E. F. Shirley (Dumfries), Ada E. Mann (St. Annes-on-Sea), Miss I. M. Northcott (West Kirby), Rev. Edm C. Lansdown (S. Woodford), Alice Wise (Leicester), Miss E. M. Heartley (Oxford), J. G. Horne (Blairdrummond), Arthur G. Dugdale (King's

"One inadvertent tug and the fair enthusiast came back to earth."

From one of W. Small's drawings illustrating "Griffith Gaunt."

P. V. Poole (Andover), R. G. Wyatt (Wim-
 "Syned" (Jersey), D. G. Yarrow (Glasgow),
 Frawley (Cloughton), John W. Oliver
 h), J. D. C. Monries (Putney), Wilfrid leby (Southend), Letty Ison (Ashby de la
 John H. Gladwell (Worcester), H. M.
 Payne (St. Austell), Margaret Dunnett
 d), Rodney Bennett (Reading), Will Louden mline), Dora E. Kennedy (Ancrum), R. H.
 (Devonport), H. Beckett (Oxford), A. W. s (Stoke), Margaret McDonnell (Glasgow),
 e Ogle (Colne), Alice Binks (South Shields), Brooks (Wood Green), J. D. Smith (Miln-), Miss E. A. Pearson (Fleet), M. A. Newman ingham), Ernest F. Seymour (Kilburn), an Purser (Walton Village), Kitty Lilian
 n (Wimbledon), E. A. Blackman (Worthing), e Ashby (Torrington), Maurice J. Frank ndon, S.W.), Miss F. M. Knipe (Putney), ifred Auld (Cricklewood), Douglas C. Pearce hill), Albert Fuller (Cardiff), G. W. Turner rnley), Sybil M. Hyla (Greves), Horace n (Hull), Eveline A. Thompson (Constanti-le), Doris Dean (Bromley), Ethel Miller uddersfield), D. E. Bailey (Sydenham), J. H. glois (Leeds), Norman Donnelly (Bolton),
 Sidney Ellen (Bromley), Leonard J. Shruball
 ndon, S.W.), Agnes E. M. Baker (W. Hamp-ad), R. W. King (Catford Hill), R. Cogger artford), Vernon Nott (Takeley), M. T. de utour (New Milton), Bernard Delorme (Canon-y), Mona Douglas (Birkenhead), Ethel Good-(Clapham), Lilly Salisbury (Norwich), Edith ince-Snowden (Shipston-on-Stour), Miss E. Rippon ull), Eric Thirkell (Woldingham), Arthur M. rry (Luton), W. Nettleton (Huddersfield), M. C.
 Jobson (Middleton-one-Row), W. M. Lodge (Upper Norwood), H. Douglas Hamilton (Bristol), Miss A. M. Morgen (Sheffield), Minnie E. Mason (Rei-gate), E. T. Sandford (Saltash), S. B. Irene Bell (London, W.C.), Edmund Howard (Putney), W. R.
 Clark (Huddersfield), Guenn F. Newnham (Gilling-ham), Noel D. Braithwaite (Ashton-under-Lyne), Arbel M. Aldous (Saffron Walden), Alice W. Linford
 (S. Tottenham), Miss E. M. ; Miss Macdonald (Bridge of Allan), Vernon H. Porter (London, E.C.), H. L. Carrad
 (Birmingham), Miss V. E. Horley (Harrow), Beatrice
 Craig (Straidarran), Arthur S. Wilshire (Dalston), Robert
 Overall (Plaistow), Clement H. Whitby (Yeovil), Mabel
 Knight (Bromley), Miss A. R. Reid (Cambridge), M.
 Molyneux (Torquay), G. M. Hennings (St. Albans), Miss
 M. V. Stanislaus (Worthing), Ruth Ranken (Barnet), Gulielmus G. Jackson (Northampton), Willred J. Grout
 (Folkestone), Violet D. Chapman (Burnham), G. Duncan
 Grey (Weston-super-Mare), Bertram N. Parker (Matlock Bath), Edwin Waters (Denmark Hill), Lettie Cole (Pon-trilas), G. J. Holme (Great Malvern), Miss Northcott
 (West Kirby), A. Renshaw (Sheffield), J. C. Campbell (Harrietsham), Hadley Ford (Clifton), A. Clarke (High Wycombe), George Whitfield (Liverpool), F. E. Fry
 (Norwich), C. Ashworth (Bradford), Margaret Painter
 (Wimbledon), A. M. Wilcock (Scarborough), Isabel
 Clarke (London, S.W.), Flo M. Wilson (Bangor), Rose M.
 Lomas (Newbury), Lily E. Lord (Amersham), B. Vicary (Bradford), John W. Oliver (Edinburgh), Major J.
 Berkley (Andover).

II.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best quotation is awarded to the Rev. J. R. S. Wilson, M.A., 23, Kirkhill Road, Edinburgh, for the following :

THE WOMAN MOVEMENT. BY ELLEN KEY. (Putnam.)

"Was there a man dismayed ?

O, the wild charge they made !
 All the world wondered."

TENNYSON—The Charge of the Light Brigade.

Mrs. Gaunt and the Priest.

Drawn by Luke Fildes.
 From "Griffith Gaunt," by Charles Reade (Chatto & Windus).

We also select for printing :

THE PROVINCIAL AMERICAN BY MEREDITH
 NICHOLSON (Constable)

"And having got rid of a thumping quid,
 He spun this painful yarn :"

W. S. GILBERT—The Yarn of the "Nancy Bell"

(W. McC. Miller, Straidarran House, Co. Londonderry.)

THE MAN IN THE CAR BY ALAN RALPHIGH.
 (John Long)

"And when I asked you what the matter was,
 You stared upon me with ungente looks"

SHAKESPEARE—Julius Caesar (Portia).

(S. J. Morrison, 72, Holker Street, Barrow-in-Furness.)

THE WOMAN MOVEMENT. BY ELLEN KEY. (Putnam)

"Broke the good meeting,
 With most admir'd disorder"

SHAKESPEARE—Macbeth, Act iii Sc 4

(A. Ernest Smith, 119, Whipp's Cross Road, Leytonstone.)

TIDE MARKS. BY MARGARET WESTRUP (Methuen)

"You very imperfect ablutioner"

W. S. GILBERT—The Mikado.

(Charles Powell, 290, Oxford Road, Manchester.)

ANOTHER DEVICE. BY STEPHEN PAGET.
 (Hodder & Stoughton.)

"Take a large piece of lemon, and mind that you chew hard,
 (If it does you no good, you can call for the steward)."

G. M. FENN—That Proud Young Man.

(Rev. Edwin C. Lansdown, The Manse, Derby Road,
 S. Woodford, N.E.)

III.—A very large number of entries were received for this Competition, and the general standard attained was above the average. We congratulate Mr. J. Richard Ellaway, of Lynnhoo, Basingstoke, on a very pretty "continuation" of a well-known nursery rhyme. THREE NEW BOOKS have been awarded to him for the following:

*Hush-a-bye baby, on the tree-top,
When the wind blows the cradle will rock
When the bough breaks the cradle will fall,
Down will come baby, cradle, and all!
Baby will heave just the softest of sighs,
Open in wonder those dewy blue eyes;
Soon in their slumberous depths will appear
Just a small shadowy, silvery tear
Welling and welling, and then will begin
Coursing red cheeks to a dimpled wee chin;
Ere baby's rosy lips open to cry,
All the good golden-winged fairies will fly
Over the tops of the blowing trees tall,
Lift fallen cradle, and baby, and all;
Then with warm kisses and music's sweet strain
Hush-a-bye baby to slumber again*

We specially commend the work sent in by Violet Gillespie (Forest Hill, S.E.), L. W. Kempson (East Grinstead), B. R. M. Hetherington (Carlisle), Miss A. Julian Briggs (Crown Hill, Devon), Miss J. A. Jenkins (Liverpool), Mrs. Charles Wright (Sutton), Alice W. Linford (South Tottenham, N.), Miss A. Holmes (Malvern), Audrey Thompson (Hastings), Robert B. Boswell (Southampton), Miss I. Lewis (Edinburgh), Hilda M. Dowden (Rathgar, Dublin), A. S. Barnard (Walsall), Nellie Wepley (Bandon), Elise Lester (Eastbourne), Mabel Knight (Bromley, Kent), Thomas Lanfear (Anerley, S.E.), Charles Powell (Manchester), Bessie R. Ferguson (Belfast), Kitty Lilian Lyon (Wimbledon, S.W.).

"I would have thee burned at the stake."

From "The Cloister and the Hearth," by Charles Reade (W. Collins, Sons & Co.: Illustrated Pocket Classics).

Mary Troughton (Saffron Walden), Grace Ashby (Torrington), Miss K. F. Haines (Bournemouth), S. Norman Dykes (Glasgow), Ernest F. Seymour (Kilburn, N.W.), M. A. Newman (Framlingham), Miss E. A. Pearson (Fleet), A. Clarke (High Wycombe), Miss K. Green (Wimbledon, S.W.), L. W. Jennings (Devonport), Margaret McDonnell (Glasgow), R. W. King (Catford Hill, S.E.), Ellen L. Clutterbuck (Bromley, Kent), Ethel Goodwin (Clapham, S.W.), Lily Salisbury (Norwich), Claude L. Penrose (Woolwich), Alice Wise (Leicester), Mrs. Oliver Lodge (Upper Norwood), Ada E. Mann (St. Anne's-on-Sea), Olivia Moir (London, S.W.), Miss E. M. Kennedy (Manchester), Miss G. M. Northcott (West Kirby, Birkenhead), S. J. Morrison (Barrow-in-Furness), Rev. Edwin C. Lansdown (South Woodford, N.E.), E. Summers (Dukinfield, Cheshire), Irene Wintle (Liverpool), Cecil E. Golothan (Chester), Lettie Cole (Pontifilas), J. D. Thomson (Finchley, N.), George K. Grice (Alnwick), G. Duncan Grey (Weston-super-Mare), Eleanor L. Clark (Dublin), M. C. Jobson (Middleton-one-Row, Co. Durham), W. McC. Miller (Londonderry), Constance Goodwin (Clapham, S.W.), E. T. Sandford (Saltash), S. B. Irene Bell (London, W.C.), Albert Fuller (Cardiff), Arbel M. Aldous (Saffron Walden), Margaret Dunnett (Liscard, Cheshire), Violet E. Horley (Harrow), Doris Phillips (Norwood, S.E.), E. A. Lawrence (Waterloo, Liverpool), W. M. Lodge (Norwood, S.E.), Mrs. M. Wise (Maida Hill, W.), Mrs. Fielding (Heywood, Lancs.), Miss A. Colling (London, N.), Miss E. Hallamore (Wimbledon, S.W.), Mary Rogers (Stony Stratford), Rev. F. Hern (Rowland's Castle, Hants.), Miss E. Shore (Worthing), C. A. Bayley (Bangor, Co. Down), K. Elsie Hunt (North Shields), Rev. J. A. S. Wilson (Edinburgh), Frank Cooper (Blackpool), Mrs. Edward Ormsby (Sheffield), Reginald G. Wyatt (Wimbledon, S.W.), Miss M. F. Lewis (Edinburgh), Emily Kington (Blairgowrie, Perthshire), G. F. A. Salmon (Penzance), Edwin Waters (Denmark Hill, S.E.), and Horace W. Walker (Beeston, Notts.).

IV.—The PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best Review in not more than a hundred words is awarded to Mr. Ernest A. Carr, of Lyndall, Park Crescent, Tonbridge, for the following:

THE PRIVATE LIFE OF HENRY MAITLAND. By MORLEY ROBERTS. (Nash.)

Here, thinly veiled, is the tragic record of a distinguished man of letters, transcribed from life by an intimate friend. As remote from conventional biography as from the roman à clef, the book is startlingly honest and sincere. Nothing is sacrificed to literary or artistic motives. With a frankness that is relentless and sometimes brutal, but never malicious, the author depicts a tragedy of temperament—the betrayal of a fine character and great gifts by flaws of will and courage. It is a vivid, arresting, pitiful story. But what avails a disguise that cannot conceal?

We also select for printing:

THE R. L. STEVENSON ORIGINALS. By E. B. SIMPSON. (T. N. Foulis.)

All lovers of Stevenson will welcome Miss Simpson's new book. It is full of the charm of R. L. S. himself, his love of his native country, and the boyish delight in adventure, which he never lost. There is a certain pathos in it, too, in its reminder of how his imagination continually inhabited "the cold old huddle of grey hills" from which he was an exile. It was this fact which made "Weir of Hermiston" the masterpiece it undoubtedly is, and the chapter on its "originals" is, perhaps, the most interesting in a very delightful book.

(Marjorie C. Barnard, 39, Nevcrn Square, S.W.)

HIGHWAYS AND BYWAYS IN SOMERSET. By EDWARD HUTTON. (Macmillan.)

In Somerset, if anywhere, lies the cradle of English history. The wayfarer who stands, as Mr. Hutton did, upon the summit of the Roman wall above Wells, will see a countryside packed full of noble tradition as any region can provide. Avilon's island valley at his feet—the Fosse way lying behind him, while far away to the north spreads Bath. Here came Alfred's soldiery to victory at Athelney; here little Jack Horner made off with his tabled pie. This book will set the heart of every West Countryman beating with pride for the goodly heritage of being Somerset's sons.

(M. A. Newman, Albert House, Framlingham, Suffolk.)

MARGARET HARDING.

BY PERCEVAL GIBBON.

(Methuen)

Anyone who has come into contact with the colour-problem in South Africa will read this book with absorbing interest. The ostracism of Margaret Harding for permitting a Kaffir to kiss her hand—the anomalous position of the educated Kaffir, Kams, who is rejected by black and white alike—the shifts (and villainies) of the derelict Europeans, Boy Bailey and Mrs. du Preez—the pathetic efforts of the doctor's wife to screen her drunken husband—these are skilfully woven into a picture of everyday life on the veldt, and the whole rendered charming by the personalities of the principal characters.

(A. S. Barnard, 5, Victoria Terrace, Walsall.)

THE DIARY OF FRANCES, LADY SHELLEY. Edited by RICHARD EDGUMBE.

(John Murray.)

One parts from the writer of this Diary with feelings of regret as from a charming friend, and one remembers with wonder that the spirited chronicle was written a century ago. Many notable people become delightfully human in these pages, and the warm friendship existing between Lady Shelley and Wellington shows the kindly chivalrous nature of the great man. The spirit of adventure which caused the Shelleys to travel "so that," she says, "I may be made a pleasanter companion by the fireside of old age" was amply rewarded in spite of dangers and discomforts encountered, and makes pleasant reading.

(Miss E. A. Pearson, Fleet.)

THE HAPPY WARRIOR. BY A. S. M. HUTCHINSON (Alston Rivers.)

This book will appeal to all who enjoy healthy and bracing literature. The well-drawn characters prove the author to be a keen student of human nature and human character. The Happy Warrior himself, at once attracts us; and we follow him, with unabated delight, from hearty and rollicking boyhood to robust and virile manhood; until the time which calls for an inspiring act of high courage and self-sacrifice. Written in an easy, graceful style, our interest is sustained to the last; and we lay down the book, grateful to Mr. Hutchinson for giving us an exceptionally good story.

(Bernard C. Gillott, Upton Fields, Oakenthorpe, Alfreton.)

ST. QUIN. BY D. C. CALTHORP. (Alston Rivers)

Like Peter Pan, Mr. Calthorp will never grow up, for he possesses the priceless gift of seeing life by the magic light of imagination. A tap of the Harlequin's wand, and it is no longer a grey, dry-as-dust world, but an enchanted Land of Romance. "St. Quin" tells of a young couple upon whom their wealth and position pall. Both seek Adventure to find it—in each other. If occasionally, as in the case of Edward, the author's whimsical propensities threaten to run away with him—all is forgiven for the sake of his idealistic views—delicious scraps of wisdom—and incurable optimism.

(Lucy G. Chamberlain, Plas Brith, Llandudno.)

WILLIAM SHARP (FIONA MACLEOD): A Memoir, compiled by His Wife, Elizabeth A. Sharp. (Heinemann.)

All lovers of this inveterate dreamer, who, under the inspiration of a "sublimated self," thought aloud, as it were, thoughts startling in brilliancy, that merged into pictures of

Photo by W. & D. Downey

Charles Reade's Grave in Willeaden Churchyard.

The figure at the head of the grave is Mr. George Coleman, one of Reade's biographers. Reade and Mrs. Seymour are buried in the same grave, and the stone has a long inscription to her on the other side, and on this side the following:

"Here lie by the side of his beloved friend, the mortal remains of Charles Reade: Dramatist, Novelist, and Journalist. Born June 8th, 1814. Died April 11th, 1884. His last words to mankind are on this stone. 'I hope for a resurrection, not from any power in Nature, but from the will of the Lord God omnipotent, Who made Nature and me. He created Man out of nothing, which Nature could not. He can restore Man from the dust, which Nature cannot. And I hope for holiness and happiness in a future life, not from anything I have said or done in the body, but from the merits and the mediation of Jesus Christ. He has promised His intercession to all who seek it, and He will not break His word, that intercession once granted cannot be rejected, for He is God, and His merits infinite, a man's sins are but human and finite.' 'Him that cometh to me, I will in no wise cast out.' If any man sin we have an advocate with the Father Jesus Christ the righteous, and he is the propitiation for our sin."

Nature, radiant with gorgeous tints, will welcome this loving, tender attempt at an explanation of her husband's dual personality by Mrs. Sharp. And we linger long over his letters, shot through as they are with the rich lights of fancy. Through every page is breathed sympathy and understanding, and we divine that only through the constant self-sacrifice of this devoted wife was the full beauty of the "manifestations" of "Fiona Macleod" achieved.

(Margaret Key, St. Brannocks, Edge Hill Road, Bournemouth.)

Good reviews were also sent in by Beatrice Craig (Londonderry), Rodney Bennett (Reading), Miss L. Mugford (South Norwood Hill, S.E.), A. H. Mannington Sayers (Sheffield), E. Percy Adam (Nottingham), Maurice I. Frank (London, S.W.), Mrs. Hooper (Selby), Ernest F. Seymour (Kilburn, N.W.), Gwendoline Jones (Swansea), R. H. Kipling, (Devonport) Rev. George Mellelieu (Hull), Leo Delicati (Cotham, Bristol), Arnold S. Walton (Newcastle-on-Tyne), Miss Richey (Belfast), Lilly Salisbury (Norwich), Edward C. Luin (Stamford Hill, N.), Muriel M. B. Aikman (Glasgow, W.), Sybil Waller (London, S.W.), E. B. (Stirling), A. Gordon Fletcher (Erdington, Birmingham), H. M. Creswell Payne (St. Austell), L. H. Cooke (Heaton Moor, Lancs.), Bertha C. Priestley (London, W.C.), Miss J. A. Jenkins (Liverpool), Horace W. Walker (Beeston, Notts), Mrs. Wright (Sutton), Mrs. Edward Ormsby (Sheffield), D. Lefebvre (St. Aubyn's, Jersey), Miss Ethel Tudge (Cricklewood, N.W.), Neil Cornell (Twickenham), Rev. Robert Brewin (Loughborough), Miss M. M. Machan (Glasgow).

V.—The PRIZE OF ONE YEAR'S SUBSCRIPTION TO "THE BOOKMAN" is awarded to Mr. Henry G. Dowling, of 75, Kingston Road, Portsmouth.

GEORGE SAINTSBURY.

BY THOMAS SECCOMBE.

MR. SAINTSBURY has denounced, if I mistake not, in no measured terms the impertinence of live appreciations of living celebrities. He will probably glance at this, if it should chance to meet his eye, with an ultra-critical frown. It is impossible to avoid differing with him on many points, but we may well agree to differ with so staunch an upholder of literary tradition and of the rightful claims of native literature. It is inevitable that one should regard with profound respect the most signal polymath of our day, the doyen of English critics and professors of literature, who stands to-day in this country where Brunetière stood at the Sorbonne a decade ago, who has proved himself a paladin of letters, moreover, who has been into the tenebrous places, the antres vast and deserts wild of Bookland, and who bears the weight of such superhuman and almost incredible erudition upon his shoulders with so much jocularity, so much zest, and so vivid a joie de vivre.

The "Saint" as he is endearingly called by his disciples, has edited not only books but whole series, and has contributed articles to journals, papers, magazines, quarterlies and encyclopædias of every complexion. But his antecedents must be kept in mind all the time that we appraise him. He is a very typical Oxford man of the generation after Freeman and Froude. He was a giant and a polyhistor, a good classicist too, at Merton, where he was Post Master in the 'sixties. He has always been a good alumnus of Oxford and of Merton, and has cherished the remembrance of his life and contemporaries there with the scrupulous fidelity of a schoolmaster. For after he left Oxford he went to Elizabeth College, Guernsey, as head classical tutor, and remained there for seven or eight years of the most formative period of life. Schoolmaster in all for ten, he must have been journalist for well nigh a score of years. Much of this was spent in the service of satire and the Saturday. The future Professor learned the lesson there of accumulating rapidly and dogmatising determinedly on any given subject. He was, I believe, for a considerable time second in command, and he wrote frequently for other Conservative organs both daily and weekly. He read enormously, as the practice was in these days, studied French literature exhaustively, and laid about him with a will. As a writer of compendious text books and manuals, later on, he met with a more than just share of retribution in the form, now of the buffet, and now of the wasp-sting, after a fashion which, since the disappearance of Churton Collins, Furnivall and Swinburne, seems to have lost its zest for contemporary readers and reviewers. Saintsbury, meanwhile, had become such an authority on literature that he seemed almost too big a man to be settled in a Chair. The satisfaction was great therefore, when in 1895 this erudite Englishman won a Scottish Chair and obtained a fixed benefice. A voice of great volume was thus drawn up from the wilderness and set upon a high place.

Saintsbury's great idea has been to codify our literature and apply to it "the rules"; he has a grammarian's hatred of aliquid novi, though he is himself, it must be admitted, a daring and most licentious neologist. He has carried his legislation to an extreme. But on the whole the benefit that he has conferred has been no slight one. His scales may not convince all his readers of their unerring rectitude, but they have led to an unconscionable amount of weighing, standardizing, testing and turning over. His books have served the purpose of a species of literary clearing house. Few will contest his work systematically, because they have not the mind-storage or memory capacity. Mr. Saintsbury is a professor of an antique pattern for faithful service. He resembles the great classical scholars in power of back no less than power of brain. He delves deep in his library which, as described by him in footnotes (for he always, like a true bookman, mentions the edition he uses and annotates), must have attained colossal proportions. He reads half the night, remembers what he reads, and at nine o'clock next morning for two hours is steadily working away, ticking off pages of omniscience like a veritable dragon.

There is something great about the march of his style and the huge terram of learning which he expands over in spite of the tiresome double and treble distillations of phraseology; and in spite of fatiguing verbosities, warnings and ponderosities, we feel unmistakably that we have still been in communion with a large and commanding intellect. We crave often for something more of the graces and of the serious persuasiveness which Chesterfield enjoins in place of the hectorings, uncouth pleasantries, and vaticanisms, to which the Dominie is so inveterately addicted, but we cannot miss the edification of a life marked by indefatigable labour, and the sanctification of work guided by devotion to good writing, to honest reading, and to the propagation of the highest and best in literature of which the world is cognisant.

The term "dominie" is a little irresistible where our Professor is concerned, for he has much of the arbitrariness of the schoolmaster who must adhere to an ipse dixit at all hazards, and to whom to have said a thing twice is to have fixed it for all time. But he also has the prodigious book-lore and book-learning of a Johnson, and the conviction inseparable from the dominie that he will be better appreciated hereafter. His power of quotation and knowledge of pedagogical tags and loci critici is also of the old world and absolutely amazing. One of the distinctions between creative and critical writers is that the latter read as well as write. George Saintsbury has read prodigiously, enormously. Even better than reading, though, I believe that he loves writing. It is a curious fact to consider how little it seems to affect the writing whether it is done willingly or against the grain. The most persuasive pen on literary matters to-day, that of Sir Walter Raleigh, pursues its course with groans of reluctance, the most erudite, that of Professor Ker, is hardly less tormented. The princes of the light essay, such as Max Beerbohm and A. B. Walkley, do not write, I imagine, with any fervour of enthusiasm in the process. Henry James again, whose "Partial Portraits" are among the most seductive critical garlands of our time, writes with enthusiastic abandon; E. V. Lucas shuts himself in between given hours, regardless of civil war, earthquake or eclipse, and writes sternly against time. Hilaire Belloc outdistances the old enemy, writing as he grumbles at writing, upon the wings of the wind. The "Saint" writes formally, solemnly, deliberately, and stands to win in the race by sheer force of steady persistence. In his case there is need for little creative effort. His functions are not even those of advocate. For he sits most habitually upon the bench, and his tone is judicial and High Court. He is not merely critic, he is Professeur à son métier, and his function is not so much æsthetic as doctrinal. Yet when he writes, he writes with his might, the learning of all the ages perpetually flowers in a single word—it is possible that you may not understand it. A polyglot lexicon is indispensable to the sedulous peruser of Professor Saintsbury. But when you have found it out, you have mastered something. You are being dealt with, exposed, rattled, convicted of loss of memory, aphasia, and crass ignorance; but it is all good for you. The Professor's vast reading has effected a permanent lodgment in his mind; much of it is available in the form of ready money; and Saintsbury will quote you not merely text but contemporary opinions and counter-opinions. From these will have emerged a harmony of some sort or another in his mind. Though immutable, this compromise may be fallible, the tasting power and delicacy of palate that have gone to it may be inadequate to their task, the independence of view may be no great matter, the intensive quality that you would meet in an Arthur Symonds might be wholly absent; but, after all, how much more this compromise is likely to be right than the unhampered, untutored view of the common beachcomber of letters! When this critic sets to work it must be remembered that an enormous amount of reading and accumulated knowledge is put into operation through the medium of a mnemonic instrument of a very fine and selective quality. The process works up a kind of critical yeast, and if the resultant is something not alluring perhaps either in the attraction of style or originality, it is not merely a dexterous register of contemporary judgment or prejudice, but something more judicial and likely to be much more stable and more permanent. People may condemn his constant descents to the vast cellars of his learning as a trifle pedantic; it is a way people have of revenging themselves on the knowledge they do not possess. The Professor, happily, goes on his way totally unmoved by such flippant detraction. He has knowledge worthy of a scholiast or a Scaliger of the sixteenth or early seventeenth century, when men made the whole of learning their province, and he is neither ashamed of airing it nor afraid of the labour of exercising it for our advantage. His passion indeed is its exploitation. "L'homme, c'est l'œuvre," is as much his motto as it can have been Zola's or Flaubert's. But he uses his labour in very different causes. Naturalism is his natural enemy, and he is all in favour of the romantic school, emotion conveyed through the chaste medium of style, and the hushing preparatory to hearing the elfin harps in letters. I wish I were in a position to give examples of the range and tenacity of the Professor's memory, which would probably strike the reader as being as peculiar as it is extensive. I remember being at a loss to remember the name of the Cambridge equivalent of "Verdant Green" name and author were immediately supplied by the Professor, who happened to be present. He showed an intimate knowledge that evening with Surtees, with the "Pitcher" and his work, and with "The Druid." The range of his reading is so catholic that he is easily first as a walking encyclopedia—five or six of Dr. Brewer's Handbooks rolled into one—of literary information. His reading in French novels of a past age is incredible. I sincerely believe that he could tell me offhand the plot of such a book as Gozlan's "Notaire de Chantilly." He would give you the author, plot, date and reception of "Granby." Such gifts are not to be concealed. One only wishes that he would be more simply communicative of his learning, that he would pour out the stores of it at fitting moments in an easy-flowing untortured stream—as Dr. Bukbeck Hill was wont to do, for instance, when he found an appreciative audience. The fountain of literary knowledge from whom I have derived most, was Richard Garnett. He, too, had an enormous memory, unerring flair for what was exceptional and interesting in letters and literary history, and an incomparable gift of easy and perspicuous narrative. Professor Saintsbury has retained much of the Oxford manner of assuming knowledge and progressing by means of allusion and innuendo with dark hints as to the insipience of the auditor who fails to follow him. His jocularities are similarly apt to be injurious because they are to his audience so often unintelligible. After a severe bout of the Professor's adjectives such as "epideictic" and "esenoplastic," and his Meredithianisms, one is often reduced in tears to exclaim with Mr. Yellowplush, "Igsplane this, men and angels, for I've tried every way." Incontinence in holding back these ἀγνώματα has led at times to saturnalia in the class-rooms, from which they were designed to expel the children of Morpheus. The scorpionic jocularities of the old Saturday, grafted upon the arbitrary rescripts of the class-room, were not congenial to the free children of our bracing North British Universities. The literature class-room at the opening of a new session in Auld Reekie is not exactly a bed of roses. But it is extraordinary to what an extent the sheer force of learning and the respect which radiates from a scholarship as inflexible in its disinterestedness and sincerity of application as it is profound in its depth and amplitude of range has gradually disarmed the real animus of the opposition. The sincerity of the man is at the root of the secret by means of which he has gradually surmounted a succession of waves of opposition to his manner, to which a weaker offender would have again and again succumbed. Much hated as his style has been, and doubtless is, by many, it is at any rate no affectation, it is the man himself. His touchstone, too, is a perfectly sincere one. Among few of his fellow-countrymen, he is one of those who has the passion and instinct for form, and he judges most things by this. He treats form, it will be thought by many, as too much abstracted from substance, structure, environment and make-up generally, but this is, in England especially, far better than the converse error. Here, as in religion and politics, he has the full courage of his opinions, and accepts all (Adam and Eve and High Toryism) or nothing as his motto. In literature, as in religion, he is a man of liturgy and precise creed. Criticism is equal or very nearly equal to creation in his mind, and he would rank Aristotle, Longinus and Coleridge in his Paradiso, along with Homer, Shakespeare, and Dante. Letters, in his view, to be properly studied, must be abstracted, isolated from history and biography, and assessed by methods and standards and canons of their own. He believes in literary circles, a definite hierarchy of kinds and ranks and principalities, in a separate literary heaven. He is convinced of the necessity of treating it as a subject apart and hedging it thornily from sciolists with doctrines, principles, hard riders and difficult rules. To those who regard books as indeterminate fractions of human experience, treat of literature as a side issue of history, and authoritative criticism as mere vapouring in a sphere which should be dedicated wholly to lawless adventure and casual impressionism, he has little to say, save "Anathema" and "Retro Sathanas!" But, while the impressionists disperse their efforts, he concentrates, he codifies, he accumulates ponderous tomes of learning which are the title deeds of the Saintsburnian faith.

Photo by Moffat, Edinburgh

Professor Saintsbury.

His books, as a whole, are far too numerous to survey or even to enumerate here. But one must endeavour to convey a brief impression of their oceanic character.

He has written so much that one would not be greatly surprised if in time to come his name came to signify that of a scholiast, to whom all the commentaries, including all the editions we now attribute to Henry Morley, Edward Arber, Everyman, Andrew Lang, etc., etc., were in reality to be assigned. I possess books by him on Lord Derby, on the Duke of Marlborough, on the History of Manchester, on French Lyrics, Jacobean Pamphlets, Elizabethan Literature, obscure Caroline poets. He has written on fur and feather, on culinary subjects, on Oxford nightcaps. Among his hobbies are Peacock, Thackeray, Dryden, Fielding, and I believe Smollett, Shadwell, Donne, Racine. The Introductions he has written are as the sands of the sea. He is an expert on Balzac, and has a private and particular acquaintance with Sainte-Beuve. A special tribute is due to his solemn declaration on this subject that the superiority of French criticism to our own is a fond thing vainly invented. Dryden, Coleridge, Hazlitt and Arnold (not to speak of Lamb) he represents to be top-most among the big heads. Of his essays the best are those on English Literature, between 1780 and 1830, two series of which illustrate a minute and solid acquaintance with the great romantic period. These two volumes I cherish, and a third, containing his "Essays on French Novelists," is the one of all which I make quest after and covet, for that is the most purely expository and the least controversial of any of his books. From it I learned to make acquaintances which have given me the greatest possible pleasure. These essays were written over thirty years ago, I believe, some probably for John Morley at the "Fortnightly," when the future Professor was in the full activity of his literary practice as contributor, reviewer, translator, commentator, and prolegomenist. He was himself the editor for a time of Macmillan's Magazine. In every literary kind his experience must have been great. Of plays he has been an enormous reader, but an indifferent spectator. When he produced his standard "History of Criticism" in three massive volumes the book was said to be his diplomapiece. If so, he has easily surpassed it in the difficulty and diversity of the themes he has expounded since that great work saw the light some ten years ago. His critical theories are often difficult, his idolatry of Coleridge, his comparative obscuration of the superior connoisseurship of Lamb, his overpowering pleasantries—these things may exasperate, but the general effect is one of exhaustiveness, organised erudition, ripeness and maturity of judgment and reasoned sagacity. Few will be found to differ greatly with his conclusion that criticism is the endeavour to find, to know, to love, to recommend, not only the best but all the good that has been known and thought and written in the world. Since then he has written two very hard books, one on "Prosody," and one on "Prose Rhythm," both on a most capacious scale. All the world has wondered at these manifestations of profound learning, and has agreed that if the Professor has identified himself with no particular series, or author, or period, he has driven his chariot wheels triumphantly along the causeway which links and generalises and unites the literature of periods and countries into one luminous whole.

MAITLAND OF LETHINGTON.*

BY D. HAY FLEMING, LL.D.

IN the course of an address to the Philosophical Institution of Edinburgh, in 1865, Froude said: "It would be well if some competent man would write a life of Maitland, or at least edit his papers. They contain by far the clearest account of the inward movements of the time; and he himself is one of the most tragically interesting characters in the cycle of the Reformation history." Fully twenty years elapsed before Froude's friend, the late Sir John Skelton, published his two volumes entitled—"Maitland of Lethington and the Scotland of Mary Stuart." Like everything else from "Shirley's" pen, these volumes are charming in style, but as a vindication of Lethington they were unsuccessful. The brilliant writer had effectually tied his own hands. In his "Impeachment of Mary Stuart," he had not only argued that the Casket Letters were forgeries, but had ventured to indicate who was the forger: "The master-wit of Lethington was there to shape the plot; Lethington, with numberless scraps of the Queen's handwriting in his possession, and with a divine or diabolic spark of genius in his nature, which might have made him on a larger theatre one of the leaders of mankind." This inconvenient statement may have escaped Sir John's memory ere he tackled his larger work, in which he boldly says of Maitland: "He had been behind the scenes; he had examined the fragments of manuscript which the industrious animosity of Morton's hirelings had pieced together; and his belief in Mary's innocence had not been shaken."

* "Maitland of Lethington, the Minister of Mary Stuart. A Study of His Life and Times." By E. Russell. 15s. net. (Nisbet)

This somersault may have been performed unconsciously, but no number of acrobatic feats on the part of a biographer could justify Maitland's conduct if he knew that the Casket Letters were forged. He signed the Article of 4th December, 1567, alleging them as proofs of the Queen's guilt, and he sat in the Parliament which endorsed that opinion. He was one of those who submitted these and other documents as genuine to the Duke of Norfolk, the Earl of Sussex, and Sir Ralph Sadler. The documents so submitted included the marriage-contract, alleged to have been signed by Mary and Bothwell before the divorce, before the capture, before the mock-trial; two letters to prove her consent to the capture; and the long Glasgow letter so damaging and so horrible. Instead of attempting to vindicate his hero's conduct regarding these documents, Sir John quietly ignored it, preferring to speak of him as naturally unselfish, as always magnanimous, as a patriot to the core, and as devoted to Mary.

From a purely literary point of view, Mr. Russell's work is on a lower plane than his predecessor's; but is very much superior in every other respect. He has evidently approached his subject unfettered and with an open mind. He does not appear to have done much, if anything, in the examination of unpublished manuscripts; but he has thoroughly explored and carefully studied all the most likely printed sources of reliable information, especially state-papers—Scottish, English, French, Spanish, and Venetian. There is no ostentatious display of authorities, although vouchers are usually given for important statements. The titles of some of the books cited might have been given more fully with advantage. For example, one of the references is, "Wright, i. 61." Those who are intimate with the history of the period know, of course, that the work so indefinitely indicated is Thomas Wright's "Queen Elizabeth and her Times." All Mr. Russell's readers, however, cannot be expected to know this, and possibly more than one of them who may wish to look up the reference will have no idea where to find it. If they consult a good library catalogue, they will find that Thomas Wright wrote a "History of Scotland," and a great many other books, and much time may be wasted in discovering the proper one. Or, again, there is such a reference as this, "Robertson, iii. 273-9." As five Robertsons have written on Scottish history, the work should have been named, and as it has gone through more than twenty editions, it would have been well to mention the edition too. This occasional looseness in specifying his authorities is the only fault I have to find with Mr. Russell's method.

Lethington Tower (Lennoxlove).

From "Maitland of Lethington, by E. Russell. (Nisbet).

In Maitland he sees much to admire, but he is not a blind admirer, and does not attempt to justify him in all his ways. His main object, indeed, has evidently been to get at the real facts, and to state them fairly. To do so intelligently, it was absolutely necessary to investigate closely the history of the period, as far as it bears on Maitland's aims, plans and policy; and the essence of these investigations is given in this volume, which is practically a history of that period. Queen Mary occupies nearly as much of the canvas as Lethington, who for years was closely associated with her. The Regent Murray, Knox, Kirkcaldy of Grange, and the Regent Morton also figure very prominently. The Casket Letters are accepted as genuine.

Mr. Russell does not merely exhibit the facts as he finds them, and as they appear to him, but gives estimates, well-weighed, of all the leading actors, and tries to account for and explain many of their actions by noting the immediate political exigencies of the time. I have observed very few mistakes of any kind in the volume and they are trifling. Oddly enough, there is one in the very first page. In describing Haddington, he refers to "its abbey," and also to "its monastic establishments, which included a nunnery." The error is by no means a new one; but the truth is that the nunnery was the abbey. The few quotations which I have tested are substantially correct, although not so exact as they might have been. The spelling is modernized, the order of the words is sometimes altered, and occasionally an irrelevant or redundant clause is left out although no indication of omission is given.

In these days of feverish haste and over-production, few books are like this, which has cost its author ten years' labour. All honour to the man who grudged neither time nor trouble to satisfy himself regarding his facts before he put them in type.

New Books.

AN INTERPRETATION OF RUDOLF EUCKEN'S PHILOSOPHY.*

This small volume deals with two vast subjects—religion and philosophy. Their mere bibliography is immense, and to study their history in any adequate manner might require the leisure of a lifetime. And yet the very bulk and magnitude of the literature attests the perpetual interest of their theme. Despite all the attractions of the world of sense and intellect—and they were never more powerful than to-day—there are yet times when all of us, to borrow the image of the Roman poet, "stretch out longing hands towards a further shore," and seek to win, as it were, some secure footing in a world to which neither sense nor intellect can attain. Many find such security in the venerable dogmas of an established creed; they submit themselves to authority and are at peace. But there are others of less acquiescent and more independent mood with whom symbols, articles of faith, decrees of councils, and the like carry no weight at all, except so far as they make a living and intimate appeal to their own thoughts and feelings. But how can the dry formulæ of a distant past speak to such men with a direct and living voice? What vital concern have they in the spelling of "Homœousias," for which men of old went gladly to the stake, or in the question of the "Double Procession," which centuries ago divided Christendom? Assuredly but little; for indeed such formulæ have to do with the husk rather than the kernel, with the "time-vesture," rather than the permanent reality, of religious truth, and when Harnack—the most learned theologian of our age—asks to-day, "What is Christianity?" his answer is that not of a formalist but of a prophet, whose business it is to strip off what is outward, and interpret to the world what is inward and spiritual in the divine message. Eucken, however, goes much further than Harnack. The latter desires to show what is that seminal principle from which a particular religion derives its vitality, but Eucken asks what religion itself is. He seeks to discover what is that deep spiritual truth or reality on which, "by divers fashions and in divers manners," men in all ages have ever been struggling to lay hold; and in the judgment at least of his "interpreter," his grip upon it is a stronger one than that of most who have gone before him. "The world," he writes in almost his concluding words, "is beginning to get tired of the mechanism and shallowness of our age, and is once more on the point of turning to the spiritual fountains of life. Where can it find a better guide to lead it to the waters of life than in Rudolf Eucken?"

That assuredly is a bold question. And yet in spite of its audacity, after reading this book, it does not altogether startle or repel. For no one can read it without feeling that this humble Professor in the quiet University of Jena is a man who both possesses a living faith and has also won that faith only after long wrestling, only by strong determination never to yield until "at the breaking of the day" he should at last "prevail" and be "face to face" with truth. And such men are ever among the rarest. They are, indeed, the prophets of the modern world. The "prophets" of old time were often simple men and might even in that age be "unlearned and ignorant men," but to-day the spirit of prophecy, if it is to have power, must be supported also by the spirit of knowledge. Science has wholly altered our conception of nature; criticism and the comparative study of religions have largely changed our views on revelation; the range of thought and experience has been almost infinitely widened, and we need in our spiritual leaders not only zeal but also understanding.

* "An Interpretation of Rudolf Eucken's Philosophy." By W. Tudor Jones, Ph.D. (Jena). 5s. net. (Williams & Norgate.)

Rudolf Eucken.

From "An Interpretation of Rudolf Eucken's Philosophy," by Dr. W. Tudor Jones (Williams & Norgate).

And Eucken undoubtedly has both. He is at once an enthusiast and a life-long student. If any judgment may be formed from the number and variety of his writings, many of which have obtained wide circulation, he comes now to the study of the philosophy of religion with a full equipment. Whether indeed there is anything wholly new in what he has to say is a point which only a specialist could determine. His present "interpreter," no doubt, thinks that there is, and speaks of him as "discovering" this or that truth, but for the ordinary reader his real distinction is that he does set before us, in a manner suited to our day and which takes full account of modern thought, the claim of spiritual life to be accounted the greatest and most central of realities. To establish that claim has been the aim of the greatest and truest thinkers of every age and country. They have used many different forms of expression, so that the language of Paul and the language of Plato and Plotinus may differ widely, but in meaning and in substance they are one. To all of them truth and justice, love and duty are not mere abstractions or intellectual forms but positive realities, or rather those only realities which, "though heaven and earth pass away," shall yet not pass away, and by apprehending which the soul of man is brought into relation with the divine and passes into a new and eternal world. And indeed we all dimly feel that these things are so—for what other basis has any natural religion that has ceased to be one of terror?—but they need continually re-stating in terms, not only of feeling but of intellect, and never more so than at the present time. For the intellect grows daily more aggressive and imperious; it is winning for itself everywhere new domains, encroaches everywhere upon the realm of spirit, and even tends to bring it into a state of vassalage. Man looks around him in the world, and he sees everywhere what he terms "the triumphs of intellect." He looks back into his age-long past and sees there a continual advance in intellectual power and achievement. And thus looking on the past and on the present he has at last grasped the great conception of evolution. He has realised that, as Eucken puts it, he is a being "with capacity for more," and within the domain of knowledge every advance of science confirms and establishes the fact. Of intellectual evolution he is convinced, and sets almost no bounds to its possibilities. But the very splendour of that evolution overpowers, absorbs, and, as it were, dazes him. For is there not, asks Eucken another and higher form of evolution? Is not the life and growth of spirit equally as real as that of intellect? If science has demonstrated the one, may it not, with equal justice, accept the conception of the other? We daily live, move, and have our being in an intellectual world which man by his mental activity has created for himself, an intellectual world of whose existence he is assured; and why should he not also create a spiritual world of the reality of which he is no less convinced and which is, in fact, equally real? There is nothing more certain that whatever he was once—"a monster of the slime," if you will—he is now no longer a mere animal. He has evolved the power of understanding the laws of nature in a manner which, however marvellous in itself, is yet subject to hourly ocular demonstration. And he has also, assuredly, evolved the power of conceiving other laws—"spiritual norms," Eucken calls them—which, though not capable of ocular demonstration, may yet in reason be equally real as the "laws of nature." He has everywhere attained to the conception of Right and Wrong, of duty, and of "the idea Good." History proves the fact, for such ideals have constantly been its moving forces, and it can also "testify to an innumerable host of individuals" in whom "their conceptions of the highest good became a permanent experience and possession of their highest being." And were they wholly deceived? Is this "highest good" a phantom? Or does it point to the real subsistence of an "absolute spiritual life," a something beyond nature and intellect, in which we may become ever more and more partakers? The dilemma faces all thinkers. But if these ideals, these spiritual laws—"δράγματα κἀσφαλῆ θεῶν νόμιμα," as Sophocles terms them—are illusions, then assuredly "they are the most tragic illusions conceivable"; then all effort, all progress, all evolution lead, by what seems a self-contradiction and to a final blank.

No doubt all this—and who can touch on such a theme without a deep sense of his own incapacity?—will seem attenuated, shadowy, and perhaps unreal. And indeed the best conclusions of philosophic mysticism must always seem to lack substance when compared with a positive creed, nor can any "idea of Goodness," even when it rises to an intuition of "the Divine," appeal with such directness to the heart as the revelation of a personal God. Yet on the other hand, every positive religion, which draws its evidence at least in part from certain historical facts, as those facts recede continually into a more remote past, must more and more require whatever support the human mind can afford by its own living operation and experience in the present. Its proofs that are from without need a constant ratification and renewal from within; and Christianity to-day, when what Eucken calls its "Existential-form" is subject to many attacks, may well accept the aid of a great thinker whose aim it is to show that its "Substance" at least, its "pure spiritual nucleus" is a central reality of life which science can never disprove, and which philosophy can unhesitatingly affirm. Against all the insistency of "sense and intellect" he sets the not less insistent claims of spirit to an equal, though deeper, recognition. He "relegates" the whole "world of phenomena to a subsidiary place." He accepts the principle of evolution, but it is to give it a new and more extended meaning, for "where organic evolution ends" there, he holds, "the evolution of the soul begins," and it is there that "the life process," to which all nature bears witness, finds its true purpose and consummation.

T. E. PAGE.

A FRENCH STUDY OF CHAUCER.*

In the preface to his translation of Professor Legouis' monograph on Chaucer, M. Lailavoix refers in passing to those recent French writers who "through their patient and unostentatious efforts have brought English studies in France to the level of true scholarship, and also have produced from time to time contributions which for accuracy, soundness of judgment, and breadth of treatment are second to none." Our only possible ground of quarrel with M. Lailavoix is that he is much too modest in the claims which he advances in behalf of his fellow-countrymen's labours on the field of our literature. For my part I should go so far as to say that, with little exception, the most vital and illuminating work in English criticism is at present being done in France. The freshness and independence of the French critic's point of view, and his freedom from the disturbing influences of national tradition (powerful with us, like all traditions) are, to begin with, distinct advantages. But the fundamental value of the work in question is, after all, to be explained by reference to the inherent qualities of the French mind and to the methods in which it is trained. French criticism possesses an extraordinary power of penetration—of going to the heart of a subject and disengaging its essential features from the mass of accidental detail. It is at the same time characterised by a largeness of outlook and by a strong sense of perspective, environment, and historical background. More than any other body of criticism it recognises the social forces in literature and brings evolutionary principles to bear upon the matter of art; yet it does this without any sacrifice of the demands of art as such. It has adequate erudition at its command, but that erudition is seldom allowed to get out of hand and destroy the total effect; while the great objects of criticism—interpretation and valuation—are kept steadily in view throughout. The usual purpose of the English critic is to give you his opinion of an author. The usual purpose of the French critic is to show you the author himself. Professor Legouis' book on Chaucer, already well known to students of the poet in the series of "Grands Ecrivains Etrangers," and now available in an excellent translation, is an admirable example of the French critical monograph, which is tantamount to saying that it is a model of its kind. Learned and full, yet lucid and well-proportioned, it leaves us with a most satisfactory impression of thoroughness and balance; the writer's touch is as light as it is sure; and precision of statement is combined with felicity of expression. Though it is at once shorter and less concentrated than "La Jeunesse de Wordsworth," this volume is quite entitled to stand beside that masterly study in which, at a bound, the author placed himself in the front rank of English scholars.

* "Geoffrey Chaucer." By Emile Legouis. Translated by L. Lailavoix. 5s. net. (Dent.)

Professor Legouis' plan is to link Chaucer's writings with his life and personality, and both with the conditions and movements of his age. In particular, he is solicitous to follow stage by stage the evolution of the poet's genius and art, and to analyse the influences which helped to produce, now the "Boke of the Duchesse," now "The House of Fame," now "Troilus and Criseyde," and now "The Canterbury Tales." Under this head special interest attaches to the chapter entitled "The Making of Chaucer as a Poet," and to the strong emphasis which the author lays in it upon Chaucer's indebtedness to France. This has, of course, been recognised by English as well as by French writers since Sandras led the way in 1859 with his memorable volume, "Chaucer considéré comme Imitateur des Trouvères." But Professor Legouis is not content with repeating what are now the commonplaces of criticism regarding what the English poet borrowed from Machaut, Guillaume de Lorris, and Jean de Meung. He speaks, and rightly, of another kind of indebtedness which Chaucer shows to France—an indebtedness "far greater and more diffused, indefinable, and yet quite certain." He admits with those writers who are anxious to safeguard Chaucer's originality, that his immense direct borrowings in themselves go for little; if Chaucer borrowed and stole, so later did Shakespeare, and Molière, and La Fontaine. But, he argues, the indebtedness to be appreciated "does not consist in some special bounty conferred on him; it is a legacy which he enjoyed, or rather it should not be looked for amongst the gifts of fortune, but in his very nature. His mind was French, like his name. He was a direct descendant of the French trouvères, and he had all that was theirs save the language." Nor is this all. It is customary to divide Chaucer's activity as a poet into three periods, and to call these his French period, his Italian period, and his English period. Professor Legouis maintains that this is a mistake. Though it is true that Chaucer's immediate connection with the French poets belongs only to his earlier life, the characteristics which he had in common with them persisted throughout his whole career, and are as well marked in "The Canterbury Tales" as in his first experiments in verse. "All the primary sources of his poetic art must be sought in France." And again: "He is always French, but, as a French writer might do also, he drew treasures from other lands, he saw and marvelled at the beauty of antiquity or of Italy. Thus to a groundwork which never disappeared he added some Italian and Latin variations, and in the end again, it was in his French style and manner that he painted contemporary society in England."

This insistence upon the French derivation and affiliations of Chaucer's poetic art naturally brings Professor Legouis into conflict with those who assert the unbroken continuity of our literature from Anglo-Saxon (or, as it is now proper to say, Old English) times onward. He does not indeed go out of his way to challenge this view in general. But he challenges it vigorously enough so far as it relates to his theme. "Absolutely nothing of the Anglo-Saxon literary past" subsisted, he declares, in Chaucer's verse, "although it was being revived around him, very little modified in form and spirit." It was indeed because Chaucer broke with that past and found his inspiration and models elsewhere that he became the first truly English poet. The clearness with which this historic aspect of the subject is brought out is not the least important feature of Professor Legouis' delightful and valuable book.

WILLIAM HENRY HUDSON.

LADY VICTORIA CAMPBELL.*

Lady Campbell, the third daughter of the Duke of Argyll, was called Victoria at the request of the Queen, when Dr. Cumming baptised her. But it was another * "Lady Victoria Campbell: A Memoir." By Lady Frances Balfour. Third Edition (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Photo by W. Crooke.

Lady Victoria Campbell (1895).

From "Lady Victoria Campbell," by Lady Frances Balfour. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Dr. Cumming, a retired Indian surgeon, who dubbed her "V.C.," and she must be admitted to have earned the playful title. Her life was a plucky struggle against ill-health. An attack of rheumatism in childhood left her a cripple, in spite of all efforts to cure the disease. It was an exertion to her to move her limbs, and under this severe handicap her life had to be spent. "Fortunately, the disablement came early," her biographer writes, "and became a second nature, but it never ceased to be a conscious trial." At the age of fifteen she was taken to Cannes, where she regained her health after a dangerous illness, but thereafter her sphere was in England and Scotland. She refused to become an indolent invalid. There was a buoyant, unselfish spirit in her, and the cheery tone of the biography is due to the heroic way in which she threw herself into work for others, for cripples, for girls, and especially for the welfare of the Western Highlands and islands. It was this latter part of her work which has stamped her memory upon Scotland. She was fond of travelling, in spite of her physical handicap, and about 1882 resolved to find her special sphere among the islands of the West. She was nothing if not thorough; she set herself to learn Gaelic, and by tact and unselfishness made her way into the heart of the people. Classes for girls and women were started. The social and religious welfare of the folk opened up various lines of practical service for this dauntless lady, and her sheer energy carried her over many an obstacle among the peasantry and officials alike. It was not a smooth task at the outset. She had to contend with more than her physical handicap. Her father was bitterly unpopular in some of the highlands and islands of Argyll, and Tiree, where she began her efforts, was seething with disaffection. Lady Victoria did what the Duke should have done; she went in person to the people, and managed eventually to live down the odium which attached to her family. The story of all this, with its perils by sea and land among the Hebridean Islands, is an inspiring record. Even for a person in normal health, the work achieved would be creditable, but it is doubly remarkable when one remembers the difficulties under which Lady Victoria laboured. They did right to call her "V.C." Her courage and bright spirit were a triumph, and those whom she served so assiduously came to recognize that before long.

The book has pleasant records of her relations with nurses and servants. This is a fine feature of the story. She had also friends in all the churches, though she remained a staunch member of the Church of Scotland.

"The great awakening of her spiritual life had come to her when she was under the influence of the Free Church of Scotland. She knew and thoroughly understood all the history of that body of Presbyterian belief. She drank of its evangelical fervour, but the fruits of the sin of schism had been seen by her, and she knew it was best to abide in the National Church."

This was largely due to the influence of Professor Charteris. But Lady Campbell could be firm friends with men like Dr. Saphir, Dr. Guthrie, and Dr. John Ker, Mr. Webb-Peploe and Dr. Oswald Dykes. Such catholicity of temper is only one of the many attractive features in her character, which her biographer manages to bring out skilfully. It is an admirably drawn sketch, and it reveals a personality of singular interest in the ranks of aristocratic religious women. They are not always so attractive.

JAMES MOFFATT.

COURAGE IN THE WRITING OF FICTION.*

Courage is the keynote of Mrs. Caulfeild's new novel, "Through the Cloudy Porch," and courage is a characteristic of Mrs. Caulfeild's writing. But courage is manifested in many ways. And, paradoxical though it may sound, the creator of Naomi, the charming protagonist of this story, might with advantage learn a lesson in courage from her own creation. Mrs. Caulfeild's courage is evidenced in two ways. In the first place she has dared to present us with a flawless heroine, thus courting a danger which, had she not the gift of compelling the reader's interest from moment to moment, might well have ended in disaster. In the second place she has dared to risk an anti-climax such as would have wrecked the ordinary novel founded upon plot, by divulging the great secret of Naomi's life before she has got half-way through her story. The fact that, notwithstanding, the author has triumphed, and compels the reader to persevere to the end with little abatement of interest, proves that her courage is justified and that she has those higher qualities which raise a novelist out of the ruck.

Let me therefore say at once, and before I proceed to justify my opening remarks, that this is a novel well worth reading. And further let me say that one proof of its fine quality lies in the fact that it is an achievement which leaves a distinct and vivid mental impression when it is laid aside. And this impression is just such as we find on occasion in all the arts. By some curious mental process, we find the performance in one art translating itself into the complementary terms of quite another art than that in which it has been expressed. We know that many of Whistler's paintings, for example, translate themselves into terms of music.* Just so "Through the Cloudy Porch" translates itself into a picture gallery, such a picture gallery, to compare lesser things with greater, as Carpaccio provided for the School of Saint Ursula. For, on putting down this novel, we seem to have been walking through a gallery in which the artist has exhibited a suite of pictures, some full-length portraits, some kit-cats, some landscapes with figures, some mere thumbnail sketches, all neatly framed and glazed, but all subservient to one beautiful and gracious figure which dominates the whole series, a figure patient and saintly as a Godiva, who faces ordeals for others which nothing on earth would have induced her to face for her own ends. The backgrounds of many of these pictures are painful, some horrible, one indeed so hateful as to be but just permissible, but all necessary by way of accentuating the beauty of Naomi's ever-recurring figure.

And yet, at the risk of being accused of hypercriticism, of "botanising on a parent's grave," I repeat that Mrs. Caulfeild, courageous though she is, might learn a lesson in courage from her heroine, which I believe would prove invaluable to her art. For Naomi's courage is of that highest order which faces that supreme adventure, Life, that supreme awfulness, the Future, full of appalling and unknown possibilities, with brave front and smiling face; the courage which the Creator of All Things, who knows and can see The End, must surely marvel at and admire in his creatures; a courage which (I say it in all reverence) the Creator cannot experience, for Foreknowledge draws the Sting of Fate. And it is a courage which the novelist may share, if he chooses, facing the Future hand in hand with his creations, going with them step by step and refusing to plan beforehand that to which they are predestinate. I am speaking from my own experience as the writer of scores of stories of a very inferior type to that of Mrs. Caulfeild's, and I have proved, at least to my own satisfaction, that the difference of method is so fundamental, so vital indeed, that I doubt if any great novel has ever been written where the author knew when he began, what end his characters would come to. Like Ulysses or Columbus or any other of the great adventurers we are "sailing beyond the sunset" in search of we know not what—imagining a goal when there may be no goal at all. From day to day we are faced with the Veil through which we cannot see. So I say that the novelist who creates his characters, starts with them on a voyage in a chosen direction, and dares with them the Unknown, is more courageous and will prove more convincing than the novelist who adopts the attributes of Providence.

* "Through the Cloudy Porch." By K. M. Edge (Mrs. Caulfeild). 6s. (John Murray.)

* Just as I had written this, I take up last month's BOOKMAN and read of another writer: "He writes in octaves, striking all the chords . . . with either hand."

Let me say in conclusion that I should not have been at the pains to preach this sermonette to a novelist who was not worthy of more than ordinary consideration. But it is my admiration of "Through the Cloudy Porch" which has made it worth while to discourse upon principles in place of paying the poor compliment of indiscriminate praise, or merely academic criticism.

G. S. LAYARD.

A VIEW OF THE RURAL LABOURER.*

As a piece of special pleading "The Tyranny of the Country Side" is the most powerful book that Mr. F. E. Green has yet written. That it is sincere there can be no doubt. Mr. Green is a writer whose views upon the land question are well known, and only the most bigoted opponent could deny that the condition of rural England to-day is anything but satisfactory. But, if the disease is admitted, there are divergent opinions as to the degree of its malignity, and equally divergent opinions as to the cure which should be prescribed, and it is not to be expected that the blankly uncompromising attitude of Mr. Green will find favour even with all those who are in general sympathy with him. For Mr. Green is, indeed, terribly, ruthlessly uncompromising; so much so that, at times, he goes too far in his indictments of rural conditions and diminishes rather than increases one's sympathy by an insistent elaboration of his theme which is at once uncalled for and, from the purely literary standpoint, inartistic. One flagrant example of Mr. Green's summoning adventitious aid is to be seen in his references to the Roman Consul, Agricola, who "laid the foundations of civilization in Britain." "Agricola, the husbandman," Mr. Green calls him twice within half-a-dozen lines, as though Agricola had won this name owing to his successful policy of colonization in this country. The point is not, in itself, of any great importance, but it may serve as an instance of Mr. Green's method. And that he should descend to such unworthy artifices is the more remarkable because, with all his strong convictions, Mr. Green is not a fanatical party man. He does not maintain that that political intimidation over which Liberal orators grow so eloquent at election times—particularly if a Conservative is elected—is solely confined to the Conservatives. In fact he seems to admit that where a Liberal family is territorially strong similar intimidation is exercised.

* "The Tyranny of the Country Side" By F. E. Green. 5s. net. (T. Fisher Unwin)

The roof is off the end cottage, the next is boarded up and uninhabited, whilst the nearest one is doomed. The entire village of Great Rissington is tumbling down in this manner. From "The Tyranny of the Country Side," by F. E. Green (Fisher Unwin).

The "tyranny" which he describes is something deeper rooted than that sporadic intimidation which breaks out acutely every five or six years. The tyranny he speaks of is economic rather than political, and it "endures long after the wave of political passion has passed." It is upon the large farmers that Mr. Green especially fastens:

"If one of the governing classes is to be indicted rather than another, it is certainly the large farmer class. For if rural England was once ruled by its magistracy, to-day it is ruled by the large farmers; and it is this class more than any other, which is bringing about its decay."

And again:

"The tyranny exercised by the farming class over the labourer is an excoiation that knows no rest. The large farmer is not only on the Parish Council, but is invariably to be found on the Rural District Council, and very often on the County Council. In the employer-landlord of the country-side are to be found the three jaws of Cerberus—the P.C., the R.D.C., and the C.C.—and he is the watchdog to the domains of Pluto, who keeps the labourer imprisoned within the Hades of village life. His dog-in-the-manger policy, of preventing labourers from having access to the land, is one that is detrimental not only to the labourer but to all of us, for it leads to bad tillage."

These passages serve to explain to a great extent why it is that Mr. Green has such a poor opinion of the Rural Magna Charter of 1894, of the Housing and the Public Health Acts and of the Small Holdings Acts. In an imaginary conversation with a typical labourer Mr. Green makes Hodge say that Housing Acts are no good to him, because if he complained to his master who lets him his cottage, or to the sanitary inspector, he would only get turned out on to the roadside. "You don't build any new cottages with your Acts—that's the trouble. You only closes them. What is the good of the Parish Council to us when all the power is left in the hands of the Rural District Councillors? And who are they? Why, the farmers who employ us."

"It is true enough, I think," (says Mr. Green), "that nearly every 'rural reform,' with the exception of the Old-Age Pension, has been costly to the agricultural labourer. The Enclosure Acts squeezed him out of his land. The Public Health Act has squeezed the pig out of his garden pig-stye. The Town Planning Act has squeezed him out of 13,000 cottages, and found him only 116 new ones instead. Bacon Trusts, Cotton Syndicates, and Coal Combines have shorn him of food, fuel and the shirt from his back."

In support of these statements Mr. Green gives many doleful pictures of English country life. He describes with fervour the struggles of the labourers at Winterborne Strickland to get more cottages built; he describes the similar contest at Potterne, near Devizes, in which the labourers, backed by influential friends, gained a victory

"at the usual cost—the persecution and boycotting of the principal reformers;" and he tells afresh the story of the evictions at Foxham, Wilts. One chapter is devoted to "The Great Estate" and to the evils of the big landlord; another to "The Lust of Sport;" a third to "The Parson and the Labourer;" and so forth. But what precise remedy Mr. Green offers for all these evils is not quite apparent. One can imagine legislation being enforced which shall secure for the labourer the cottage he lacks and the increased wages which he demands, but how the labourer, when his day's work is done, is to be enabled to vanish out of his employer's ken as completely as can the factory hand of a Lancashire town it is hard to see. The only real remedy, apparently, which Mr. Green here advocates is that all the agricultural labourers should strike and march to Trafalgar Square. But even so Mr. Green does not tell us what he wants to happen when the labourers have won and the manhood of the nation has gone down "on its knees to crave their pardon for years of neglect." Is the labourer, like Edmund, to say :

"Well, then,
Legitimate Edgar, I must have your land"

by fair means or foul? If Mr. Green has his solution to the problem it is a pity that he has not expounded it in direct terms.

M. H. H. M.

GREUZE.*

Mr. Rivers's volume is a really excellent specimen of book-making à la mode. The author has not unearthed any fresh material concerning Greuze or his models, and does not pretend that he has; but he has been carefully through the existing material, and his rechauffé is strung together with a good deal of skill and sprightliness. The chief authority on Greuze is, of course, Greuze himself. It is his Mémoire that tells us how, in Rome, he came nigh to marrying the fair Princess Letitia—who proposed to him; and how he actually did marry the Paris bookseller's daughter, Gabrielle Babuti—who also proposed to him. It tells us also of the tragedy that came of the marriage. These two women may be said to have constituted the feminine interest in his life. But it was Gabrielle who was paramount in his art; she is the lady of "The Listening Girl," "Ariadne," "The Broken Pitcher"; indeed, she sat for nearly all those embodiments of tenderly voluptuous young-womanhood which have endeared Greuze to succeeding generations. There were other models; Greuze was a good portraitist and a bad history-painter, as well as the initiator of his own inimitable genre. But no other persisted through his painting as did Mademoiselle Babuti.

Next to her, we should say that the most important influence in Greuze's career was Diderot. The early picture of "The Father of a Family explaining the Bible," attracted the critic's attention in the first place, and originated the life-long friendship between the two men. It was Diderot, alas, who was responsible for introducing Greuze to the society of the fascinating little bookseller of the Quai des Augustins. "I myself loved her well," wrote the Encyclopædist in his later years, meaning that he liked occasionally to pass the time of day with her; and his ready praise of her "goodness" doubtless did something towards bringing the painter to the point, as he ungallantly said, of promising her "everything she desired," for Greuze, while willing to flirt, was very much afraid to wed. But if anybody "boomed" Greuze's art it was Diderot with his long-winded praise, and well-calculated blame—a discreet mixture that would have made public indifference an impossibility in any case. Moreover, it was he who urged Greuze to be the Greuze we love, and to stick to moral stories told in pictures. Thus has Greuze come by the title of the French Hogarth. The superficial resemblance of Greuze's art to Hogarth's, so far as intention was concerned, is obvious. The actual difference between them is well summed up by Professor Muther, in his "History of Modern Painting":

"Hogarth scoured the vices of the Third Estate in order to raise them to morality. . . . Hogarth swung over these human animals the stout cudgel of morality in the manner of a sturdy policeman and Puritan bourgeois. With such a people a delicate forbearance would have been misplaced. . . . Greuze employs the Third Estate as a mirror of virtue, sets forth its noble qualities as an edification to an aristocracy that has grown vicious. . . . He knew that he dared not exact too much from the nerves of his noble public; he merely wished to stir them to a soft vibration."

What admirably "soft vibrations" his voluptuous innocences or veiled immodesties excite! How vain to apply to them the sterner codes of criticism! How idle even to judge Greuze's personal character by the ordinary standards of humanity! Weak to a degree, with the superabundant childish vanity of true weakness, high-tempered and rough-tongued when he was crossed, often not a little ludicrous—this is one, and the more noisy, side of the picture his biographers present. On the other side is writ domestic long-suffering, a wonderful compassion and goodness towards his less fortunate fellow-man, and a truly sympathetic understanding of woman. The latter sympathy perhaps went deeper than the modern world imagines. When Greuze died, poor and neglected:

"A scene, as moving as it was unexpected, gave a touch of life to the simplicity of his obsequies. As the body was about to be taken out of the church . . . a young person, whose emotion and tears could be seen beneath the veil which covered her face, approached the coffin. She placed a bouquet of immortelles upon it, and immediately retired to the back of the church, and there continued her prayers. The stems of the flowers in the bouquet were tied together in a paper wrapper, on which was written these words: 'These flowers, offered by his most grateful pupils, are the emblem of his glory'."

The incident suggests a good deal more than perfunctory grief or gratitude.

We have wandered a little way from Greuze's models, but so has our author—rightly so, for Greuze, apart from his age and his associates, including even Diderot's immortal "Rameau's Nephew," would not be Greuze. A symphony in F., as Whistler intimated, should not merely be a continued repetition of F, F, F.

F. M.

THE STARRY LINE.*

Father O'Neill having set out to make a selection of the great English poetry for the use of students—he is Professor of English in University College, Dublin—has gone on to make an anthology to please his own taste, and an interesting and delightful volume he has made. Apart from the voluminous notes there is nothing of the school-book about this selection: no air of turning the great poetry into an exercise to the weariness of young readers. His taste is very good and very Catholic. It is arresting to find in a book of the kind the selections from Blake, quite off the beaten track, and the unhackneyed choice from the Elizabethans. Father O'Neill begins with Chaucer and ends with De Vere, about the middle of the nineteenth century. Naturally, with such a wide field to roam over, he was obliged to limit his selections. We hope this book may be much in use as a school-book. What a possession for the imaginative boy or girl, somewhat cramped as to reading for delight, to come upon this modest but precious book, with its selections from practically all the great poets of the five centuries! If one misses the "Ode on the Intimations of Immortality," which is certainly one of the first, if not the first and greatest, of English poems, one is consoled by Milton's "Ode on the Nativity," by Crashaw's "Mary Magdalen," and by "Sir Patrick Spens,"—immortals all. Father O'Neill gives some remarks on reading poetry aloud which are excellently to the point, and one feels assured that with his students at least divine Poesy will not be made the handmaid of a competitive examination. He has realised the truth that poetry should be overheard rather than heard; and one trusts that his opinions on the subject may carry weight so as to encourage in schools the reading of poetry aloud, not in the stilted and lifeless way of the ordinary reciter, but with passion, with sincerity, with appreciation. Then there shall be a new and a beautiful accomplishment added to those already in request. The Irish, dramatic people as they are, should find the reading of poetry as easy as the acting of plays. He is a benefactor of his kind who will make an open door to this realm of gold, in which hitherto only the elect have wandered; for it is a hardly recognised fact, nevertheless a fact, that poetry well read or recited will win ten lovers for the one who will discover it in the printed page.

K. T. H.

* Greuze and His Models. By John Rivers. With 44 Full-page Plates. 10s. 6d. (Hutchinson & Co.)

* "Five Centuries of English Poetry." By the Rev. George O'Neill, S.J. 3s. 6d. (Longmans.)

GLIMPSES OF THE PAST.*

This is the record of mid-Victorian life from the windows of a High Church educationalist who belonged to the Wordsworth class, and who had opportunities of seeing far and wide. One of the features which strikes the modern reader of Victorian autobiographies or biographies is the vogue of Miss Charlotte Yonge's novels, and especially of the "Heir of Redclyffe." Mr. Mackail, in his life of William Morris, speaks of the influence which the story exerted over Morris and his circle, and adds that "in this book, more than in any other, may be traced the religious ideals and social enthusiasms which were stirring in the years between the decline of Tractarianism and the Crimean war." Dr. Hort was more critical in his attitude. He praised the book, but noted its avoidance of all perplexing questions about theology and morals. "In short, it is bread without yeast." Miss Yonge's church-principles naturally appealed to Miss Wordsworth, and the novelist appears more than once in this volume of reminiscences. She is even compared, not to her discredit, with Jane

Susanna Wordsworth, wife of the Bishop of Lincoln.

From a painting by E. V. Eddis (1881)
From "Glimpses of the Past," by Elizabeth Wordsworth (Mowbray & Co.).

Austen, although Miss Wordsworth tells how Mrs. Humphry Ward, after Bishop Stubbs' lecture upon the death of Henry II., exclaimed eagerly: "It was as bad as the 'Heir of Redclyffe.'" The prestige of Miss Yonge is a problem for those who belong to the next generation, but it was real prestige, and evidently it was not confined to girls and the novel-reading public. Conington is another figure in these reminiscences. He was an intimate friend of Miss Wordsworth's brother John, afterwards Bishop of Salisbury. But her reminiscences of him and of Wilberforce are slight. There is a little more about Ruskin, and also about Jowett, who helped Miss Wordsworth and her allies in the fight for the higher education of women at Oxford. This is the main interest of these memoirs, though it is but slightly sketched. Lady Margaret Hall was started in 1879, and when Miss Wordsworth resigned in 1909, after thirty years' service as principal, the number of students had risen from eight to sixty-four. But the early days of the movement brought their own discouragement. Her brother was lukewarm. When she consulted him about accepting the appointment he replied: "Well, if I thought your not going would put an end to the whole thing, I should say, Don't go: but as I don't suppose it will, I think you had better accept." Even orthodox Anglicans, who might have been expected to favour the constitution of Lady Margaret Hall, looked askance. The opinion was that if women wanted to be active, they should enter a sisterhood. However, Miss Wordsworth and her companions managed to secure some powerful support, and eventually the Hall was firmly established.

* "Glimpses of the Past." By Elizabeth Wordsworth. With eight illustrations. (A. R. Mowbray & Co., Ltd.)

Two of the most interesting parts of the book are the description of Ruskin's visit, and of the opening of Keble College. The latter appealed to Miss Wordsworth. She declares, by the way, that the dominant idea in her mind, as the result of her long experience, is "the need of a religious basis in the lives of all educated women."

There is a misquotation from Jane Austen on p. 61. Emma did not say to Mr. Knightley, "I used to call you George, when I was saucy, to tease you." What she said was: "I remember once calling you George in one of my amiable fits, about ten years ago. I did it because I thought it would offend you."

J. M.

THE INEVITABLE WAR-BOOK.*

It is probable that the world means to deny itself the luxury of a second Kinglake; its wars will shape themselves like crimes, in secrecy and darkness, and the world outside them will not learn the horror and vileness of the details of which they are composed. Even the Bulgarians, of all nations in Europe the most conscious of and sensitive to the Press, find it expedient to hide their heavy bayonet charges, though no correspondent, no spy, even, could have done anything to render them less effective. The ideal of the general staff was a swift and furtive war, without heroes, without renown, without a record of those things which were done in the Thracian villages which might make their adventure disreputable, and a big booty of conquered territory to justify the whole.

Mr. Grant, who contributes to this book an account of his experiences with the main Turkish army, profited by its disorganisation to see a good deal of the retreat upon the Chataldja lines and its sufferings there when the cholera made its appearance. As a press photographer, his business was to seek and to see incidents rather than to gain any survey of the campaign, and since an incident may be eminently worth photographing while yet it misrepresents conditions, he was probably a much more dangerous companion for an army in the field than his collaborator, Mr. Gibbs, who saw practically nothing of the war. He contrives, however, to present an interesting picture of that retreat, which should have been a rear-guard action keeping the Bulgarians deployed and wearing them out, but was a saute qui peut.

"Never shall I forget that ride in the dark night to Chorlu, the vague forms of the retreating army passing with us and around us like an army of ghosts, the strange, confused noise of stumbling feet, of voices crying to each other, of occasional groans, of clanking arms, of clinking bits and bridles, the sense of terror that seemed to walk with this army in flight, the acuteness of our own senses, clugly strung, apprehensive of unknown dangers, oppressed by the gloom of this mass of tragic humanity."

That was the army to defeat which the Bulgarian forces were organised. Possibly against no other troops in Europe could their tactics have been successful, their bayonet charges against infantry intrenched and their great movements of massed bodies. Even as it was, their losses were enormous, and it is noteworthy that against Adrianople and the forts of Chataldja they made no headway at all.

* "Adventures of War with Cross and Crescent." By Philip Gibbs and Bernard Grant. 2s. net. (Methuen.)

It was before Adrianople that Mr. Gibbs had his view of war at a distance. Much of his share in this book is devoted to a description of what he saw and did at Sofia, Starasagora and on trains; twice he speaks of a "street of adventure." The censorship, which caused him to be arrested and expelled from the front—in as far as Mustafa Pasha was the front—prevented him from viewing much more of actual fighting than shells bursting at a distance, but he makes the most of his sojourn at Mustafa Pasha, its mud and its crawling columns of transport. "The noise of all this struggling mass of men and beasts stunned my ears, made me dazed, almost drunk," he writes. To go home to his lodgings after dark was "a perilous adventure." He "stumbled upon a bullock waggon," and "saved myself from being trampled to death." The sense of wonder and adventure transfigures everything for him; even the old Turkish bath-house, where the field-telegraph stores were stacked, is touched with glamour and becomes "a tiny Roman temple." Returning from an excursion in the direction of Adrianople, he describes the search-lights of the besieged town "touching the crests of the hills with silvery rings and searching into the hollows of the valleys," which sounds like a thing imagined rather than a piece of observation.

"Then waving arms of light enveloped me for a moment in their glory. It seemed as if the eyes of Adrianople had searched me out, a little, lonely figure in the great darkness, stumbling over the rock-strewn ground."

This book is a testimony to the decline of the war-correspondent. If Bulgarian officials had had the courage of Bulgarian infantry men, they would have declined at the outset to receive newspaper-men, and the foreign Press would have been saved from an unpleasant contact with the unintelligent and arbitrary officials of the censorship bureau. It is strange that a civilization which has made the newspaper necessary to itself should so distrust it, that it should prefer the emotional misadventures of Mr. Gibbs to, say, a narrative of actuality by an Archibald Forbes.

The photographs with which the book is illustrated are excellent, and that which serves for frontispiece is particularly fine.

PERCEVAL GIBBON.

THE IMPORTANCE OF THE PARSON'S DAUGHTER.*

In the American "Who's Who," are 10,000 persons of note, and 1,000 of them are sons of ministers. In proportion to population, only 50 should have won mention. There is as striking a disproportion in the multitude of the sons of clergy entered in that book of fame, our "National Dictionary of Biography." So at least I am told. But after whiling away a period of convalescence with incessant novel reading—as bad for the mind as chain cigarette smoking for the body I am rewarded by the great discovery that the daughters of the clergy are more important in modern fiction than the sons of the clergy are in modern life. For instance, out of the eight stories I have last read, three are entirely concerned with the love affairs of parsons' daughters. None of the three ladies is beautiful: but a couple of dukes and a lord, a baronet and a commoner of great wealth, fall deeply in love with them. Another curious point is that Mr. Edward Burke in "Bachelor's Buttons," Mr. Victor L. Whitechurch in "Left in Charge" and Miss Kate Horn in "Susan and the Duke," are agreed that the girls of the manse stand no chance beside the young ladies of rectory and vicarage.

* "Bachelor's Buttons." By Edward Burke. 6s. (Herbert Jenkins.)—"Left in Charge." By Victor L. Whitechurch. 6s. (John Long.)—"Susan and the Duke." By Kate Horn. 6s. (Stanley Paul & Co.)—"The Knave of Diamonds." By Ethel M. Dell. 6s. (Fisher Unwin.)—"The Friendly Enemy." By T. P. Cameron Wilson. 6s. (Mills & Boon.)—"The Armchair at the Inn." By F. Hopkinson Smith. 6s. (Werner Laurie.)—"Tim and the Squire." By Lilian Street. 2s. net. (Putnam.)

The writers do not explain. Was it the dukes who, finding the rectory very close to the castle, set the fashion? Or did a band of parsons' daughters take to writing novels in the old days, and portray themselves—or their sister—as heroine? If so, the daughters of the Free Churches are now suffering from their grandparents' disdain of the lighter sort of literature.

There seems still some dispute in regard to the traits of the most fashionable of heroines. Miss Kate Horn thinks that life in a picturesque rural rectory would bring out all the soft, gentle, clinging qualities of a girl: and the two dukes retain apparently the early Victorian ideal of feminine grace. Mr. Burke and Mr. Whitechurch are more modern: they concur in admiring the parson's daughter for her fighting qualities. Miss Soapy in "Bachelor's Buttons" and Miss Wrenfield in "Left in Charge," run their respective parishes. Miss Soapy is a darling. A plain little charming girl of twenty-two, she emerges in the act of thrashing a drunken villager. She shows the man's wife—a big, powerful, timid woman—how to manage him with a stick, and waits in the cottage to see that her first lesson in management is carried out in a practical manner. It is about a week since I read "Bachelor's Buttons," and I am still in love with Miss Soapy. She is painted for us by the shyest of bachelors that ever lived in novel-land. His character wavers on the line that divides comedy from farce: but so fine is the art of Mr. Burke that the novel never becomes farcical. It is uncommonly humorous and uncommonly entertaining, with an exquisite play of original observation and tender whimsical feeling. I can recommend it as a tonic for convalescents.

Miss Wrenfield of "Left in Charge" only filled me with respect and rather distant admiration. A middle-aged spinster, somewhat soured and narrowed by the work unfairly thrown on her by her father and mother, she has character but no charm. Happily she meets a man sickened of charm in women and sceptic of their strength of character. He is a clergyman from the Australian bush, and he takes charge of the parish for a few months, while the old vicar goes away for his health. Miss Wrenfield's fighting qualities are then angrily displayed: for the stranger is very masterful, and takes everything into his own hands. The struggle between the rightful princess of the village and the powerful usurper is depicted by Mr. Whitechurch in a very engaging way. He never aims directly at picturesqueness, but his quiet style is very telling: freshness and trueness give distinction to his picture of a pastoral village on the Downs. I could have done without the episode, somewhat in the manner of Mr. William Le Queux, of a Foreign Office affair, in which a wicked German spy seduces the vicar's son from the path of patriotism.

In "Susan and the Duke" the melodramatic element predominates. There is a bold, bad, brilliant, beautiful woman, who tries to rob a parson's daughter of the love of a couple of dukes. I feel sure she will stand comparison with "The Worst Woman in London." Miss Horn, however, is not naturally melodramatic: she has native gifts of vivacity, humour and satire which are genuinely entertaining. I should advise her to cultivate them at the expense of her newly acquired taste for impossible monsters. Susan and the younger duke and the old retainers are depicted in a life-like way; and I did not put down the book until I had seen the shy little parson's daughter safely married to her ducal lover.

Yet melodrama and fine tragedy are, to my way of thinking, somewhat allied. Some of the best of our novelists of the present day are weakened by a fear of being melodramatic. It is by beginning with melodramatic novels, like "Desperate Remedies" that a writer learns to handle tragical figures like "Tess." Shakespeare's "Titus Andronicus" is a crude and frigid horror; but in composing it the poet learned to rise afterwards to the sublimity of "Lear." Miss Ethel M. Dell begins her novel "The Knave of Diamonds" with a brutal baronet who falls in love with his bailiff's daughter, and forces the girl to marry him in order to save her father from penal servitude. Starting from this hackneyed and only dimly realised situation, she develops the story with remarkable power. Her chief characters are unusual. The hero is a Red Indian half-breed, who reminds me rather of an unbalanced and very savage type of mulatto. His inner traits seem negroid rather than Red Indian. On several occasions in the book, he practically goes Fantee. The action of the story is violent. The savage wants the wicked baronet's adorable wife to run away with him. He is eager to shoot the husband and carry off the lady by force and trickery. To add to the horror of the plot, the baronet also becomes a madman with homicidal tendencies. All these elements of a melodrama, however, are transformed into a fine study of human nature in its intensest mood, by the truth and insight and humanity with which the young novelist draws her characters.

When a father brings his daughter to London and leaves her for a moment, and then loses his powers of memory, all sorts of things are likely to happen. In "In Search of Each Other," Miss Sophie Cole takes care that only pleasant things shall befall the lost father and his bewildered daughter. For Marcelle is a pretty and a capable girl, and she settles in Soho and lives in a circle of entertaining Bohemians. Among them are a young dentist and a woman journalist, both drawn with a light gay touch. The dentist falls in love with the daughter and the woman journalist with the lost father, and everything ends happily in this happy little world. More thoughtful and more humorous is "The Friendly Enemy" by a new writer, T. P. Cameron Wilson. A fantasia of the London slums with a socialistic man of wealth as the god from the machine, it is a brilliant and unusual piece of work. Miss Lillian Street's novel "Tim and the Squire" is a pretty essay in sentiment which is certain to be popular among women: while Mr. F. Hopkinson Smith's "The Armchair at the Inn" is likely to appeal more to men of letters. Mr. Hopkinson Smith is in the same boat as the needy knife-grinder: he has no story to tell. But being the most versatile of living men—mechanical engineer, Government contractor, lighthouse builder, lecturer, a painter with a fine reputation, and, now at the age of seventy-three an agreeably discursive writer—he has a store of anecdotes, reflections and entertaining remarks, out of which he has composed a very pleasant and freshly conceived volume.

EDWARD WRIGHT.

HIGHWAYS AND BYWAYS IN SOMERSET.*

Even the most superficial of "skimmers" cannot fail to recognize the enthusiasm of Mr. Edward Hutton's writing on Somerset. Quite clearly it is for him the English county. "It seems to me that I think of it as perhaps the last stronghold of English life, of English poetry and legend. It keeps alive for me and in me the ideal England of my heart. . . ." And so you will find him a very pleasant companion in your wanderings about the county. His information seems to be almost inexhaustible; he can write very pleasantly indeed when he likes, and he possesses that peculiar tactfulness by the exercise of which the Philistine is guided insensibly to admire the proper things in the proper manner. Yet we are not sure that we are altogether entranced by Mr. Hutton's method. It would have been better, possibly, to have given us a little more of Somerset and a little less of himself. There is no reason that we can see why the guide-book of an English county should be made a medium for a series of attacks upon Protestantism in general and Anglicanism in particular. One notes, for instance, that Wells Cathedral is "full of sweetness and all delight, in spite of the stale odour of Anglicanism, which, alas! everywhere pervades it, and which its beauty, gaiety, and enthusiasm continually deny"; and again, in speaking of Glastonbury, Mr. Hutton * "Highways and Byways in Somerset." By Edward Hutton. With 100 Illustrations by Nelly Erichsen, and a Map. 5s. net. (Macmillan.)

Wells: Part of the Bishop's Palace.

From "Highways and Byways in Somerset" (Macmillan).

is even more emphatic: "No one can look upon these ruins and be at peace. For if he be of the faith which is founded upon this shameful and cruel ruin, these poor stones are a continual and unanswerable reproach before which he can but hang his head; and if he be of the old Faith, how can he restrain his tears, or remembering modern England and our misery, how shall he not be angry and afraid? But it is impossible and useless to comment upon a murder and a sacrilege so foul and bloody." All this sort of thing seems to us to be out of place in what is intended to be—and otherwise is—a popular and readable account of Somersetshire. It is a pity that it should prejudice the reader (as it may do) against Mr. Hutton's book. For Miss Nelly Erichsen's many fine illustrations one can have nothing but praise.

HENRY NEWBOLT'S POEMS.*

One of the most hopeful facts about modern poetry is, it has so many tendencies that it seems to have none. Twenty years ago the poets were divided up into the schools of Tennyson, Swinburne, Browning; and where are those school-parties now? It has happened, as it always will, that, school-time being over, the scholars have gone away and only the Masters remain. Nowadays it is not so easy to group our living bards and dismiss each group with a label. Thomas Hardy has his followers; Kipling his; Yeats his; but the majority of our poets, though they may have affinities with one or with all of these three, are not slavish imitators; the music they are beating out, whether it be a great music or not, is at least, in the main, their own. Some of them are, perhaps, mistaking strong language for strength of feeling and imagination; some are cheating themselves with a notion that to be eccentric is to be original; many of them are too daintily given over to verbal prettiness and tricks of technique, as if they had not lived enough yet to learn that poetry is an essentially human thing, born of human experience, and not a select butterfly-pastime to be played only in gardens of artificial flowers. We have outgrown the rather childish ideal of the poet as a lonely creature singing apart on remote peaks, and we know that unless he is first a man among men he will never become a god among gods. For this reason one looks askance on a certain latter-day weakness for founding select clubs and societies of poets, and publishing magazines devoted exclusively to poetry. That is not the way to do it. You starve and warp the poet when you segregate him in that fashion, he will certainly learn less to his purpose by joining a Club of Poets than if he went roughing it with natural men in the Territorials or became a member of the Ancient Order of Buffaloes. The man who limits his circle to poets, and reads, thinks, talks nothing but poetry will never be much of a poet himself. After all, you must gather your sticks before you can light your fire, and you must know more than one type of man and one phase of life before you can write of such matters to any purpose.

* "Poems New and Old." By Henry Newbolt. 5s. net. (John Murray.)

The weakness of most modern poetry is that it is too anemic, too merely pretty and preciously insincere, and this because our poets draw their inspiration from each other and from books instead of taking their gloves off and handling life for themselves. We have perhaps half-a-dozen living who have each his individual note, and who write as if they were robust, flesh-and-blood human creatures, with interests that are common to the rest of us; and one of these is Mr. Henry Newbolt. With such stirring ballads as "Drake's Drum," "Admirals All," "The Fighting Temeraire," "The Sailing of the Longships," "The Old Superb," "Sailing at Dawn," he appeals mightily to the national spirit, the patriotic pride of every Englishman who has any feeling for the glory of his heritage, in "Clifton Chapel," "Vital Lampada," he has written some of the noblest and most inspiring of public-school songs; these are the distinctive things in his work, but outside this range he has written enough poetry of a miscellaneous kind to make him a separate reputation—graceful and charming lyrics and ballads of the love and homelier joys and sorrows of quieter life; but, when all is said, you turn again for his highest achievements to those school songs and to those great ballads of seafaring and sea-fighting that first made him known to us. They sprang into an immediate popularity, and have ended, as they deserved to, in becoming famous.

It is fifteen years since "Admirals All" made its appearance, and this collected edition of Mr. Newbolt's poems includes the contents of that volume, and of the three that followed it: "The Island Race," "The Sailing of the Longships," and "Songs of Memory and Hope." There are also here ten poems that have not hitherto been published between covers, and of these "The Little Admiral," "Sailing at Dawn," and "The Song of the Guns at Sea" are as dramatic and vigorously imaginative and sing themselves as irresistibly as the best and best-known of his ballads of our sea-kings.

THE FLOWING ROAD.*

The sub-title of this book, "Adventures on the Great Rivers of South America," will explain adequately the rather enigmatic title. Since 1902 Mr. Whitney has made no less than five river expeditions in South America, and he gives us here the cream of his experiences. And yet he has failed, somehow, to write a really interesting volume. It lacks to a singular and depressing degree the fascination of the tropical wilds. It is not that Mr. Whitney is without romance (the undertaking of these dangerous and formidable journeys proves the opposite), but that he is unable to give us the magic glow without which all these descriptions of the forests and of the rivers are so many dry bones. The statistics of travel and sport are nearly always dreary in themselves, and frequently, moreover, muddle the reader rather than enlighten him. And yet, related artistically and with the ability to build up a sense of atmosphere, they can be strangely moving. It is a rare gift, given to few. And Mr. Whitney is not one of the few. His book is excellent from the point of view of observation, tireless courage and energy, and the spirit of adventure, but it just lacks the one thing needful, for he is not impressive, he has not the artist's gift, and to English readers his use of Americanisms is very distasteful, though it is hardly fair to blame him for this.

His journeys took him up or down many a famous river. He has voyaged upon the Orinoco in Venezuela, upon the Rio Negro in Brazil, upon the Parana in Argentine. He has skirted the Cordilleras of Colombia, crossed the Andes into Chile, penetrated the pampas of Argentine and the forests of Brazil. He knows South America from one end to the other, he has seen the real life of the Indians and the jungle, he has shot jaguar, deer, tapir, capybara—almost

* "The Flowing Road" By Caspar Whitney Illustrated. 12s. 6d. net (Heinemann.)

Photo by G. & M. Brown.

From "The Flowing Road," by Caspar Whitney (Heinemann).

San Fernando de Apure
in the rainy season.

every big type of mammal of the continent. And, with it all he has the true soul of adventure and not merely that lust for slaughter which actuates so many daring men to feats of endurance. He is the sort of man who will probably go on wandering till the end of his life, a modern Burton as it were. And, like Burton, he will, no doubt, continue to write books of his travels (he has written a fair number already), valuable books of their kind, but books which won't be read for long. Who reads Burton nowadays, apart from the Mecca volume and his translations? This is the fate that overtakes the work of so many of these eager men who are anxious to share with you the joys of the wilderness, but are unable to make them appear engrossing.

RICHARD CURLE.

CALE YOUNG RICE'S NEW POEMS.*

There are certain lyrical qualities in the dramas of Mr. Cale Young Rice, and certain dramatic qualities in many of his finest lyrics that make it very difficult for the critic to resolve whether he is at his highest as singer or as dramatist. "Porzia" is a poetic play in which these two gifts blend with subtle and powerful effectiveness. It is not written in the stereotyped heroic verse, but in sensitive metrical lines that vary in beat and measure with the strength, the tenderness, the anguish, bitterness, and passion of love or hate that they have to express. The bizarre and poignant central incident on which the action of "Porzia" turns is such as would have appealed irresistibly to the imagination and dramatic instincts of the great Elizabethan dramatists, and Mr. Rice has developed it with a force and imaginative beauty that only they could have equalled, and with a restraint and delicacy of touch which makes pitiful and bearable a story that they would have clothed in horror and grimmest tragedy. He turns what might have been a tragic close to something that is loftier and more moving than the mere slaying of a villain by the man he had wronged. If you turn to his latest volume of lyrics, "Far Quests," you find the same poetic vision, intense humanity, and emotional power giving soul and music to his songs. Such a lyrical ballad as "The Wife of Judas Iscariot" startles and grips the imagination with its stark sense of dark terror and the simple directness of its drama; and for contrast there is the breezy ecstasy of "Highland Joy," and the grace of thought and feeling of the homelier "Recompense," or of "Sufficings" (addressed to A.H.R.), with its infinite riches of meaning in a little room:

"Day for the mind,
But night for the soul,
Sun for delight,
But moon to console;
Song for the glad,
But silence for rest;
God for the world—
But you for my breast."

It matters little that we hesitate between ranking Mr. Rice highest as dramatist or lyricist; what matters is that he has the faculty divine beyond any living poet of America; his inspiration is true, and his poetry is the real thing.

THE LAND OF MUSCOVY.†

"Westward the course of Empire takes its way." So runs the one memorable line of Berkeley's one poem, enunciating a general truth of racial and national expansion. In this, as in many other respects, Russia is exceptional, for its movement has been generally towards the rising sun, from the long distant entry of the Eastern Slavs out of the Carpathians into the Russian plain, down to the present time when its railways have crept along to the Pacific shore, and its range of influence has widened out into Persia.

* "Porzia" By Cale Young Rice.—"Far Quests." By Cale Young Rice. 5s. net each. (London: Hodder & Stoughton. New York: Doubleday, Page & Co.)

† "A History of Russia" By V. O. Kluchevsky. Translated by C. J. Hogarth. In 3 Vols. Vols. I. and II., 7s. 6d. net each. (Dent.)

Another singular fact is that, in moving to the East, Russia has encountered the West. How the Russian occupation of North-Eastern Asia may affect the North American continent is yet to be seen. It is a remote and perhaps needless speculation. It is elsewhere that difficulty may arise. I am just old enough to have caught some echoes of the Jingo days when Russia was the general enemy. Now, in these even more scare-worn times, it is Germany that fetches the gallery in topical allusions and disturbs the slumbers of trembling imperialists; but, in spite of that, I fancy the Foreign Office is less consistently troubled by Teutonic adventures in more or less open spaces than by thoughts of that Asian region of anxiety where Bear and Lion climb slowly towards each other over the Roof of the World.

In letters, too, as well as in politics, Russia and England are drawn very near together. Russian literature, for all its apparent remoteness and its alien language, is far more widely read and far more powerful as an influence here than the literature of (say) modern Germany. Tolstoy is quite acclimatised and has become a sort of institution; Turgenev, beloved of those who dislike the hot-gospel of Tolstoy, has been elevated by those same people into a gospel of the novelistic art; and Dostoevsky, long known to discriminating readers, is rapidly increasing in fame among the general public.

Russian history, therefore, lies quite close to the interests of many British readers; and there should be a warm welcome for this rendering of Kluchevsky's well-known work. He is the Green of Russian history. His theme is the Russian people, and his standpoint that of the sociologist. When the inevitable strangeness of new fact and circumstance has been overcome, the English reader will find himself quite at home in the atmosphere of Kluchevsky's narrative; for the art of the Russian writers who are best known in England is art that has (to borrow a phrase from Mr. Yeats) a genuine geography. Mind, such a phrase as this must not be turned into a catch-word. A genuine geography is not a necessity of any art. Some of the greatest works are not only for all time but of all space. It is not the genuinely geographical part of "Hamlet" that has made it the most popular play in the world. However, there are some writers who are specially interpretative of places—Hardy and Synge, for instance. The great Russian writers seem to do even more—they interpret not only a place, but a nation—just as Kipling (to take an opposite example) with all his strenuous insistence on patriotism, imperialism, and the other national assets, does not interpret either England or the English, or just as Sienkiewicz, in that epic trilogy of novels, interests us greatly in his story, but does not interpret Poland or the Polish to us as do the poems of Mickiewicz. In the country of Kluchevsky's narrative the English reader will move familiarly, because it is the country of Tolstoy and Turgenev, of Gogol and Dostoevsky. Take for example such a passage as this:

"Everywhere the swamps and forests of Great Russia of the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth centuries confronted the settler with a thousand unforeseen risks, difficulties, and hardships. Consequently he learned to watch nature very closely ('to keep an eye open on both sides of him,' as the saying is), to scan and probe the ground on which he walked, and never to attempt the passage of a strange river where there was not a ford. All this bred in him resourcefulness in the face of minor perils and difficulties, and inured him to patient wrestling with hardship and misfortune. No people in Europe is so unspoiled, so handy, so taught not to wait upon nature or fortune, so long-suffering under adversity, as the Great Russian. The peculiar features of the country caused its every hole and corner to beset the settler with some new and difficult industrial problem to solve. Wherever he thought of establishing his homestead he had first of all to study the locality and its conditions, that he might know what it had to offer in the way of profitable resources. Hence originated the extraordinary faculty of observation which we see disclosed in the Great Russian primeti, or popular nature-sayings—sayings in which we see caught with astonishing fidelity all the characteristic, yet frequently most elusive, phenomena of nature's yearly round in central Russia. In them we see noted her multitudinous phases, both climatic and industrial, and the entire annual routine of the rural homestead sketched. The seasons of the year, the months—nay, almost every day of every month, find their place in this series, with their several climatic and industrial features duly distinguished. Moreover, these observations of nature not only give us a clear picture of the physical phenomena described, but also furnish us with a portrait of the observer himself. We can see him contemplating his surroundings, and thinking how best he can identify them with the names and festivals of his saints, since it was the Church's calendar which served him both as a note-book of nature-observation and diary for the register of his thoughts concerning his daily toil. The Church, too, it was which first taught him, not only to use his powers of observation, but also to reckon time by fasts and festivals; with the result that he came to connect those fasts and festivals with all the natural objects by which he found himself surrounded."

This, surely, has that interpretative note of which we have spoken. You will notice, by the way, how well the translation reads. Mr. Hogarth is the most modest of men. He refuses himself the justifiable privilege of note or preface and confines himself to a bare name on the title-page. I hope he has his reward; for a more excellent piece of difficult and extended translation it is impossible to imagine. I suggest to Mr. Hogarth and the publishers that the addition of a map or two and a chronological summary would greatly increase the attractiveness of the work for the general reader. There is yet time; for a third volume is still to appear.

Our quoted passage is descriptive of Great Russia. That region does not come into the earliest story. The country as we now know it is the offspring of Little Russia and the mother-city is Kiev, not Moscow. The name "Russia" itself is comparatively modern, for it did not replace "Rus" in general use till the close of the seventeenth century. Moreover, for a long time, Rus, to Western ears, meant the Polish-Lithuanian kingdom, rather than the Muscovite dominion. In quite a special sense the history of Russia is the history of colonization. The mysterious movement of peoples, and especially the Tatar invasion of the Ukraine, scattered the Russians over a wider area. Kievan Rus, broadened out into the Upper Volga region till it included the whole of Great Russia, and the expansion has steadily gone on until, within living memory, the Pacific shores were reached. Kluchevsky sums up this movement in an instructive paragraph.

"The chief stages of migration group themselves into four periods, which, if named according to the localities in which the Russian population (or such portions of it as helped to make history) was massed during each epoch, may be termed the Dnieperian, Upper Volgan, Great Russian, and Pan Russian periods, respectively, it, according to the political regimes in force at the time the Town Province, Principality, Muscovite Empire, and Russian Empire periods; and if according to their respective economic systems—the Forest Industrial, Free Agricultural Labour, Military Landowning, and Serf-Labour epochs of Russian history."

It is from this point of view that Kluchevsky tells his story; and to the thoughtful observer of political phases there is a curious interest in noticing how the simple clan-leadership of early days developed by gradual stages into a general autocracy, divinely ordered and appointed, and involving complete subjection of life and property to a ruling family. It is significant, too, that each extension of royal authority was accompanied by a further extension of national slavery. From which it would appear that Russian history, besides its interest, has also its lessons.

GEORGE SAMPSON.

Novel Notes.

HARRY THE COCKNEY. By Edwin Pugh. 6s. (Werner Laurie)

Mr. Pugh is always at his best when he is not hampered with any plot but sets himself to fashion some natural human entity and tell the story of his life as minutely, as realistically as if it were all merely true and he had imagined none of it. Here he writes the autobiography of a born Cockney; not of a typical Cockney, for, as he rightly says, there is no such being, but of a man who was born in London, and grew up "subject to all the common influences of circumstance and training and environment that London brings to play" upon his character. Harry

Weaver was the son of a Marylebone barber; descended from many generations of barbers; he is a diffident boy who has to fight against a sort of inherent timidity of disposition; he has the somewhat menial spirit of his race, and is a curious blend of subservience, industry, flashy vanity, seriousness and snobbishness. The barber's shop, his father, the queer assistant, the masterful old grandmother who dominates the establishment—the whole thing is pictured with wonderful accuracy, and you are made to realise the boy's daily life and such surroundings, to share his dreams and breathe his very atmosphere. You are with him at the board-school; and appreciate the feelings with which, imitating the swaggerings of robust boys, he entered upon his first crude flirtations with the small girls there. The time comes when he gets into a solicitor's office, indulges in mature love-makings; begins to rise in the world and drift away from his own people and become ashamed of his origin. He studies hard, makes headway in his profession, is at length called to the bar and, turning his attention to politics, is elected to Parliament, marries, and ought to have been happy but is still fretted by a feeling that he is a pariah, that his wife and children belong by birth to a class above him, that he is alien to the world in which he has achieved distinction. Always the barber-strain taints his blood, and he moves lonely and out of place among the good society into which he has climbed. His story is full of incident and variety, but they are the incident and variety of actual life, and it is this that gives it its compelling interest and charm. The weaknesses of Harry Weaver are common, human weaknesses; even in his pitiful snobbery, and self-distrust he is akin to the majority of us; and the best and the worst of him are portrayed with a shrewd humour, an understanding and a quick sense of the pathos of mortal things that win your sympathy for this unheroic hero and hold you unflaggingly interested in his doings. "Harry the Cockney" is a book of unusual insight and power; the art of Defoe could not have handled ordinary lives with a more intimate subtlety or have made them more vividly real to us, more intensely alive.

THE STORY OF STEPHEN COMPTON. By J. E. Patterson. 6s. (Heinemann)

In his new novel, "The Story of Stephen Compton," Mr. J. E. Patterson shows an advance of importance in his art. He began by aiming at producing an impression of power, and in such novels as "Fishers of the Sea," he certainly succeeded in his aim. But the undoubted power of his writing was purchased at the expense of other qualities which are more valuable in literature. He resembled those sculptors of the sixteenth century who sacrificed everything to the effect of strength, and in search of an impression of elemental force exaggerated the muscular lines of all their figures. He saw life in a kind of white intensity, from which was absent the sweetening, individualising play of the softer lights and shadows of human existence. There was a lack of flexibility and variety in his way of writing. It is here that "The Story of Stephen Compton" marks a development in his art. The opening chapters of this political romance are as strong as anything that Mr. Patterson has written. Some persons indeed may find them too violently frank; for they depict with a sort of savage indignation the most unpleasant side of character of the hero's very unpleasant brother. In one way Mr. Patterson is a writer of the realistic school, for he resolutely paints the entire life of his characters. Stephen and his brother are portrayed with a daring intimacy that makes them uncommonly lifelike: they are slum children in a Lancashire spinning town, and nothing is omitted in the picture of the misery and foulness of their early circumstances. But on this foundation of realism, Mr. Patterson builds a fine, thoughtful study of the nobler forces obscurely working in our industrial civilization. They become incarnate in the manner of the two boys, Stephen, who is merely strengthened and tempered by the adverse conditions of his life. He becomes a socialist of the revolutionary school and the firebrand of Lancashire, and he loses the girl he loves rather than give up his career as an agitator. By sheer ability he wins sufficient money at last to enter political life, and growing aware of the practical value of a cultivated mind, he goes into the world of society in order to "acquire the weapons of the enemy." It is this part of Mr. Patterson's work that delighted the present reviewer. It is brilliant, varied and lightened with touches of humour and wit: a throng of diverse characters is brought upon the scene and handled easily and naturally, and in a quiet, subtle way the development of Stephen's character is portrayed without any apparent effort to portray it. One merely sees him grow up. On arriving at his full stature he becomes a political force of a reconciling kind: for, while acquiring the weapons of the enemy, he learns also to appreciate what is valid in their point of view. So when he is made Prime Minister, with an overwhelming majority of reformers inspired and directed by him, he is able to reorganise the life of the country in such a way as to please both labour and capital.

Mrs. Annie O. Tibbits.

Frontispiece portrait from "At What Sacrifice?" (Digby, Long & Co.)

AT WHAT SACRIFICE? By Annie O. Tibbits. 6s. (Digby, Long & Co.)

This is the story of two great mistakes which shadow the career of a young girl named Effie Gale-Carew. From a life of perfect happiness and ease she is suddenly engulfed in trouble and misery through her own misunderstanding, her own folly of jumping too quickly to a wrong conclusion. She is the spoiled and dearly loved daughter of a wealthy widower, disliked by her step-brother, who feels she has usurped his place in his father's house, and hated by that brother's wife. It is these two, scheming together, who deepen Effie's misery at length to despair. The story begins on the brilliant morning of a spring day, as fresh and as sunny as Effie's own existence—then, all at once Effie's world becomes steeped in gloom, she is brought face to face with death, mystery, and a suspicion so horrible, so unbearable, that she runs away from it all; away from the old home and the man she has loved, and is lost alike to those who loved and hated her for six long years. At the end of that weary period her lover meets her again, but she is so changed by the suffering she has endured that he scarcely recognises her. And there is more pain and unhappiness for them both before they come together at last, through tragedy and darkness, to the end that is really a beginning. It is a well-planned, dramatic novel, and many exciting incidents are skilfully introduced into its cleverly constructed plot.

CHESS FOR A STAKE. By Harold Vollings. 6s. (Smith, Elder)

This is the novel of a thoroughly competent writer who succeeds entirely in his aim. It is quite interesting; as the name suggests, it has a somewhat complicated plot, there are two love stories which run along side by side, but often cross each other, and the plot is carefully worked out in every detail. The mothers of the heroines are both worldly women, determined that their daughters shall make good matches, but the one mother has a real affection, and from the very beginning we expect her to give way, the other is a selfish hypochondriac who loves no one, and only cares for herself. One love story runs smoothly; as no third person intervenes, the two lovers simply have to wait events, which they do in full confidence, and with even a reasonable amount of patience and content. The chief character—the villain of the piece—is Jago Polwhele who hesitates at no villainy, but is sincere in his love. There is a hitch in Jago's love, and he wreaks his vengeance on the nephew of his rival, who is a boy in the school in which he is a master. The school story here introduced has an important part in the plot; it is almost too harrowing, but is the most powerful part of the book. The headmaster is unscrupulous, but has a certain strength of character, and the author wishes to get some sympathy for him. Jago, by a bold callous stroke, wins all along the line, his victory is short-lived, and ultimately he has to disappear; the selfish mother is put aside, and the book ends with two happy marriages.

ST. QUIN. By Dion Clayton Calthrop. 6s. (Alston Rivers)

The "Elfin Spirit" is the title of a chapter in this entrancing story, and from cover to cover the elfin spirit dances and wantons in Mr. Dion Clayton Calthrop's imitably light and airy manner. Teddy St. Quin belongs to an ultra-respectable, aristocratic family whose lives are "almost public property." On reaching the age of twenty-one, however, Teddy learns that a sympathetic ancestor has left a legacy which enables the St. Quins to have five years of Bohemian freedom before settling down to the life respectable. Here, then, is the opportunity for some novel adventures abroad, and Teddy returns from the Continent poor in pocket but rich in experience. He marries, as a respectable St. Quin should marry, the bride of course being his parents' choice. But there is a vein of romance in Teddy which his wife cannot satisfy, and it finds its outlet in all sorts of queer ways. For example, chancing to alight upon a delightful early-Georgian house in Chiswick, he decides to furnish it in Georgian style and provides servants to attend him in the picturesque dress of the period. With the engagement of the butler, the cook, and "the young person," all most entertaining characters, everything is ready for the romantic advent of Pamela, the Georgian mistress of this unique household. The manner in which Teddy St. Quin indulges his whim is quite in Mr. Calthrop's best vein. "St. Quin" is just the kind of story to bewitch the reader who delights in the lightest of light fantasy.

THE KING'S MASTER. By Olive Lethbridge and John de Stourton. 6s. (Stanley Paul.)

King Henry VIII. is growing tired of Anne Boleyn; he has, in fact, already fallen in love with Lady Jane Seymour. The only thing that troubles him is the method he shall employ for the disposal of his wife. If you remember your history you will recollect that this was where Thomas Cromwell came in useful, and these three, with Sir Henry Noireys, the Queen's devoted admirer—we had almost written lover—are the principal characters of this breezy and well-manufactured story with its tragical climax. The figure of the wire-puller, Thomas Cromwell, who supplies the book with its title, is particularly well drawn, and the authors are careful not to allow the reader's attention to wander. In dramatic interest and in its workmanlike manner of telling "The King's Master" is not the least effective of the many novels which deal with a period of which it is pleasanter to read about than it was to live in.

SIRI RAM: REVOLUTIONIST. 6s net (Constable)

It would be difficult to praise too highly this really admirable exposition of the discontent in India and its causes. All the dramatis personæ of the tragedy are portrayed with life-like effect, and the background is startling in the breadth of its conception and the beauty of its realisation. First there is the poor village youth struggling through an education not in the least adapted to his modes of thought. Upon him and his discontent works with lightning effect the trained eloquence of the ascetic, the much travelled prophet of the Arya Samaj, who has seen the superficial elements of our civilisation at every point and found it wanting because its real strength has been hidden from his eyes. His selflessness, his devotion to an ideal, his exquisite culture, a culture as refined in its way as that of a University Fellow of the best type, are described with masterly skill and most sympathetic insight. On the other side is sketched with mortifying vividness the paltry life of many Anglo-Indian women, their despicable bridge squabbles; but there is also sketched with something of epic sublimity the heroic struggle of those men who take up the white man's burden with willing, strong, resourceful hands, and fight the cholera as it rages in an Indian village. The picture of this village, where everything is drab-coloured, where everything betokens "the Hindu's perpetual instinct of segregation, fear, suspicion, distrust of his neighbour, shunning into himself," is a perfect masterpiece. From this Dantesque scene we are suddenly taken to very different country, as we follow the Hindu youth on his journey through Kashmir to the cave of the ascetic. Drabness gives place to a fairyland of silver birches, flowers, bees and butterflies, with the ascetic sitting in the middle of it all and despising it all. And along the road tramp, and by the side of the road squat, such a variety of queer types as not even "Kim" presents us with. Whoever would understand not merely the agitation in India, but normal India, and the never-ending never-changing fascination of the East should read this extraordinary book, written by one who speaks from the fulness of his knowledge, a book chronicling that great struggle between the incarnation of speculative thought and the incarnation of practical efficiency.

THE FOOL IN CHRIST. By Gerhart Hauptmann. 6s (Methuen.)

This is a haunting piece of work. In a romantic setting of the mountainous country separating Silesia from Bohemia there wanders a poor carpenter's son. Devoted from an early age to the study of the Scriptures he conceives himself at last to have received a special gift of the Divine Spirit. Cursed by a drunken stepfather, scorned by his little world, his religion naturally takes on a strong Manichæan tinge. Though the Bible has filled him with a really divine love and compassion for his fellow-creatures, especially for those who have been wounded in life's battle, for the world in general, society, man's environment, he has the strongest aversion. In fancied imitation of the Carpenter's Son of Nazareth he refuses to touch money. Trust in his own unaided intelligence also misleads him into denouncing prayer, miracles, finally the Bible itself. "He sought not God with the understanding, but with love," as his creator sums him up. Loose ambiguity of phrase and the usual devotion of untaught intelligences to wholesale quotation from the Bible leads his followers hopelessly astray, until their one idea is the millennium, and that idea in its turn becomes daily grosser and more materialistic. The first part of the book inclines one to the belief that Hauptmann seriously set out to portray a man living "in Christ." That belief becomes untenable when the man declares himself to be greater than St. Peter. There is no doubt still "a pure serious sacred attempt" on the carpenter's part to accomplish his mission, but the attempt fails, and we are left in doubt as to Hauptmann's purpose. The book, however, is worth reading for other reasons, worth reading as the portrait of a thoroughly honest if "foolish" man, who surrenders everything to follow his ideal. His exquisite patience and tenderness in the terrible scenes enacted in the Schuberts' mountain hovel, his conquest of the hideously repulsive smuggler, his beautiful way with the old woman in the smuggler's hut, who chaunts sublimely: "My little shirt is sewed. My little bed is made. Come, oh, come, thou last eternal night"; his joyful suffering of wounds—all these things endear the man to us more than his theology repels. And his excessive mildness and meekness, adopted in wilful or unconscious oblivion of the lesson taught by the scourge of small cords that drove out the money-changers from the Temple courts, stands out in strong contrast with the muscularity of his supporter, Bohemian Joe, who throws two persecutors into "a deepish frog pond." As a background to this lovable man's life there is the grinding poverty of the weavers, who see everywhere round them "destructive powers crouching like beasts of prey," and eagerly grasp at the spiritual comfort afforded by the carpenter.

RED HARVEST. By Newman Flower 6s (Cassell)

"Red Harvest" is a vigorous, frankly-melodramatic novel drawing its life-blood from that network of conspiracy and secret diplomacy which culminated in the assassination of King Alexander and Queen Draga of Serbia. It is a first novel, and Mr. Newman Flower has used his wide experience as editor of more than one popular magazine, and has filled every chapter with the fire of adventure and the smoke of deepening mystery. The story opens with the announcement that the unexpected birth of a child has robbed Paul Cazalet, the promising political journalist, of an inheritance worth a quarter of a million sterling. The shock stuns Paul, and he flings himself madly into the first desperate venture which offers—a mission of intrigue in Serbia. By appointment he meets in the dead of night an Austrian Count on his yacht in Dover Harbour, and, as luck will have it, the Count is shot dead in the cabin under his very eyes by a mysterious woman whose escape leaves Paul in a very unenviable position. London, Paris, and Belgrade lend each a distinctive atmosphere and glamour to this ably written and thrilling story. Mr. Newman Flower knows his public, and it is safe to say that after reading "Red Harvest" the public will want to know more of Mr. Newman Flower as a novelist.

The Bookman's Table.

VERSES AND REVERSES. By Wilfrid Meynell. 1s net (Herbert & Daniel)

In a quaint prefatory apology for his title, Mr. Meynell says "these little Verses are, in truth, all Reverses: first thoughts that refuse to obey marching orders, runaways from the right line of formation. I can marshal them into print only under friendly cover of this old manner of label." Howbeit, one feels that this would be a delightful world if all the reverses we have to meet in it were as pleasant as these. Even the slightest of them has its own curious charm; some characteristic sparkle of humour, some touch of fancy or wistful thought to give it grace and distinctiveness; and such as the lines to "Christina Rossetti," as "The Welcome," "The Climber in the Cot," "To One who hastened Heavenward," are fine poetry, and perhaps the finer for the casual, unpremeditated air and manner of them. One cannot quote any one example as fairly representative; the book is so compact of whimsicality and seriousness, of light epigram, large humanity and deep religious feeling; but "To Her: At Pisa," comes as near as any to the average tone of it:

"Thou finished Tower of Womanhood, Rooted and fast in Nature's good,
Yet reaching, flower-like, to the skies:
The first to catch the sun—his rise;
And, when the day's for others done,
The last to lose the lingering sun.

Thy walls all treasures enfold
Within their ivory and gold;
Thou can'st withstand the straitest siege,
Nor askest aid from thus thy liege;
Alone thou risest in thy power:
Yet be towards me a Leaning Tower."

A SHORT HISTORY OF GERMANY TO THE PRESENT DAY. By A. W. Holland. 6d. net. (British German Friendship Society.)

In this admirable and useful little book the author's aim is two-fold. First, to give the general reader as comprehensive an idea as possible of the German Empire; and secondly, to establish a better relationship between Germany and England. In the first the author is entirely successful and within the space of less than a hundred and fifty pages he presents a picture of the German Empire from the troubled times of Arminius down to the highly successful and progressive Germany of the Emperor William. Mr. Holland presents his facts with a terseness and clarity that are beyond praise, and while the book is mainly a "history" it is a history that explains itself and leaves nothing to the imagination—the besetting sin of the educational text book. For example, when Mr. Holland discusses the ramifications of the Reichstag and the Bundesrath, he gives us at the same time a clear and concise idea of the Imperial Parliament. It is of interest to note that the author holds the same ideas with regard to international politics as Mr. Norman Angell, but Mr. Holland summarises the whole matter in a couple of terse pages. We should like to see a new and enlarged edition of this admirable little book, in view of which we would submit that the author might enlarge to advantage and give as much space to German art and letters as he has given to trade and politics. The book is provided with an excellent bibliography.

THE GREEN FIELDS. By Kenneth Hare. 1s. net. (Elkin Mathews.)

Though there is perhaps no living poet whom we can with absolute assurance place among the immortals, the art of poetry, viewed as a whole, is in a more hopeful condition than it has been for many a day. That the nineteenth century produced a series of matchless poets is undeniable; but during its magnificent progress a gulf gradually widened between poetry and life. Accomplished sterility was the inevitable result. Now, however, the art has opened its arms once more to the whole of life, and a quickening fire has run through all its members. We see this in the work of Mr. Masfield, of Mr. Davies and others. We see it unmistakably, if in little, in the slim output of Mr. Kenneth Hare. "The Green Fields" is a delightful book. In dedicating it to Sir Walter Raleigh (who sustains so worthily a name of almost intolerable honour) Mr. Hare at once betrays his predilections. His green fields are those where Corinna went a-maying. He writes with the Elizabethan zest, the Elizabethan love of birds and flowers, of fairies and mortal maidens; with no little, moreover, of the right Elizabethan lilt. There are pieces, too, which recall the Greek Anthology in their economy and precision; and epigrams of an eighteenth century polish. Not that Mr. Hare is derivative: he is an authentic poet, and frankly proud of the fact, writing:—

We that have thought and paper
Seek no man to give,
Content with the God's gift in us
And the thought that shall live
And we hold these things are princely
Beyond eclipse,
And above fraud, trade, and cunning,
Spilt blood and ships.

But he is in the finest tradition to which an English poet can belong, at once classical and national. His work is slight so far (Herrick's was always), and it is possible that he will one day sound deeper depths. His present note, however, is good enough for us; at once fairy and humane, gay, but not altogether preoccupied with gaiety, full of a sense of gentle and delicate and beautiful things, best summed up in his own haunting couplet:

Not to the man-at-arms or mariner,
I drink the merry long-haired lute-player.

UNSEEN FRIENDS. By Mrs William O'Brien 6s. 6d. net. (Longmans.)

These are friends in the past who have meant more to Mrs. O'Brien than any she has met in everyday life, though in the social sphere she is evidently a gentle and sympathetic spirit. They include Mrs. Oliphant, Charlotte Brontë, Jean Ingelow, Eugénie de Guérin, Christina Rossetti, and certain foundresses and members of religious orders. They have become part of her own life, and she writes of them with the kindly and interested detail she might employ in writing of intimate friends to other intimate and mutual friends. She loves byways as well as highways. That the reader is likely to know much or ought of the immediate theme she does not apparently consider; she tells all she knows, as if it were an entirely new story. How frankly and feelingly she has identified herself with Irish country ways, and her husband's people, is notable.

EDOUARD MANET. With an Introduction by Louis Hourticq, and Notes by Jean Laran and Georges Le Bas. With 48 Plates. 3s. 6d. net. (Heinemann.)

One of a useful series, this little book, with its crisp introduction, and its very readable notes on certain pictures,

Photo by Elliott & Fry.

Mr. A. W. Holland.

TO VIOLIN LOVERS.

A Joannes Baptista Guadagnini VIOLIN. Fine tone and splendid preservation. Authenticity guaranteed. For particulars, apply B.A., Box 909, Bookman Office, St. Paul's House, Warwick Sq., London, E.C.

TO AUTHORS. The best offers for original MSS. are secured by THE SURREY LITERARY AGENCY. Novels, Short Stories, and Articles read and placed. Beginners' work a speciality. Write for free prospectus to "Locksley," Presburg Road, New Malden, Surrey.

TYPEWRITING, DUPLICATING, MSS., Legal Work, Addressing, &c., &c., carefully and promptly executed. Strictest secrecy observed.—26, Wolseley Gardens, Chiswick, London, W.

Stammering and Child Welfare.

By J. BRETHERTON HADLEY.

Post free from the Author.

(Reprinted from "The Child.")

Address:

DUNELM, BROADWATER, WORTHING.

Price, 1/6 Net.

Post Free 1/8.

HYPNOTISM: ITS HISTORY, NATURE, AND MODERN USE IN THE HANDS OF THE PHYSICIAN.

By A. BETTS TAPLIN, LRCP & LM (Edin.), Member and late President of the Psycho-Medical Society of Great Britain.

"Very interesting little book"—Latter

"It is interesting to learn what Hypnotism really is, and to have the clouds of doubt and fiction which have exaggerated its proportions, cleared away."—Nottingham Guardian.

LITTLEBURY BROS., Publishers, 3, Crosshall Street, LIVERPOOL.

READERS OUT OF REACH

of a good local bookseller, or who live abroad, are asked to write direct to London for their books, which will be sent by return of post, at lowest cash prices, on receipt of remittance with order.

German or French Books (if not obtainable in London) are posted to customers direct from Leipzig or Paris by my agents there, thus saving postage.

LONDON AGENT FOR LIBRARIES ABROAD

Subscription Newspaper and Periodical Agency for British and Foreign Publications.

List of 1600 Subscription Rates free on application.

CATALOGUES SENT POST FREE

1. Reference Book Catalogue of 146 pp. of Standard Literature.
2. Remainder Catalogue of over 1000 Titles of Publishers' Remainders, in good condition as issued, at from 30% to 80% off published prices.
3. Colonial Librarian's Handbook, indispensable to Librarians outside Europe, with complete list of Colonial Editions, etc., etc.
4. Price List of Subscription Rates for British Periodicals abroad, with a selection of the most popular American, French, German, and Spanish periodicals.

ESTABLISHED
1851

ALFRED WILSON

Export and Retail Bookseller

18-19 GRACECHURCH STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Telephone: 7463 Central.

Bankers: London County & Westminster (Lombard Street).

Cambridge Manuals

General Editors: P. GILES, Litt.D.,
and A. C. SEWARD, M.A., F.R.S.

Price 1s net

bound in cloth; in lambskin 2s 6d net

TEN NEW VOLUMES

Ready February 11

Ancient Babylonia. By C. H. W. JOHNS, Litt.D.

The Earth: Its Shape, Size, Weight, and Spin.
By J. H. POYNTING, Sc.D., F.R.S.

The Atmosphere. By A. J. BERRY, M.A.

The Icelandic Sagas. By W. A. CRAIGIE, LL.D.

The Physical Basis of Music. By ALEX.
WOOD, M.A., D.Sc.

The Modern Warship. By EDWARD L.
ATTWOOD, M.Inst.N.A.

Comparative Religion. By F. B. JEVONS,
Litt.D.

The Story of a Loaf of Bread. By Prof.
T. B. WOOD, M.A.

Ancient Stained and Painted Glass. By
F. SYDNEY EDEN.

The Vikings. By Prof. ALLEN MAWER, M.A.

A prospectus giving full particulars of the series, with a list of the volumes ready and in preparation, of which there are a very large number, will be sent post free on receipt of a postcard addressed to D.C.M.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS

Fetter Lane, London, E.C.

SECOND EDITION

THE PROBLEM OF EDWIN DROOD

A Study in the Methods of

Dickens. By Sir

W. ROBERTSON NICOLL, LL.D.

3/6 net

ARTHUR WAUGH "Solves the mystery of forty years."

J. CLIMING WAITERS "The Drood case is, I think, ended. It has reached a final Court of Appeal, and a verdict has been delivered."

C. K. S. in The Sphere "I am overwhelmed by the arguments produced by Sir William. They have indeed converted me."

THOMAS SPENCER "Not only one of its author's most interesting productions, but also one of the most considerable critical performances of recent years."

Daily News "This must become the classical survey of the fascinating problem."

Times "Sir William Robertson Nicoll proves himself a literary detective of no mean capacity."

Athenaeum "A real contribution to the subject. The present reviewer regards it as an absolutely satisfactory strengthening of the best views concerning the two main issues of the story."

Glasgow Herald "A brilliant addition to Dickens' Literature."

Hirmingham Daily Post "Takes a place among the few who must be regarded as indispensable to anybody who seeks to solve the riddles Dickens left unanswered."

HODDER & STOUGHTON, PUBLISHERS, LONDON

Emile Zola.

From "Edouard Manet" (Helneimann).

is a model in the art of concise writing. In the shortest possible space it contrives to give a sparkling outline portrait of Edouard Manet himself, an excellent résumé of the character of his art, and a good deal of what contemporary critics thought about it. In regard to the latter, one is apt in the fuller biographies to miss the real reason of the public's quarrel with Manet. M. Hourticq sums up this as his "bold inconstancy"; that is to say, he was always changing, always progressing from one audacity to a fresh one, without giving his public time to digest the last. It was this characteristic rather than any innate and fixed quality in his work that aroused resentment. As a matter of fact, M. Hourticq doubts, and we share the doubt, whether Manet knew "exactly the new kind of painting that he was trying to substitute for the old." The only certain thing is that he strove to paint objects in open daylight instead of in the manipulated light of the studio - to model indeed, but to model without light shadows. He "unhesitatingly sacrificed all the finesse of modelling in order to be able to see and to render absolute contrasts." The result was a certain garishness that startled and dismayed a public already sufficiently disturbed by conflicting art-currents. Manet's persistence in experiment against the opposition even of quondam friends makes one of the most remarkable stories in the history of painting. Had he been less of a fighter, he must surely have compromised with his enemies; as it was, he fought them to the day of his death. Reverses and derision meant, not starvation—he was provided against that—but unrelieved embitterment of spirit. Indeed, had it been money that he wanted, he might at any rate have had the consolation of knowing, as several of our modern painters have come to know, that there is money in being misunderstood by a sufficient number of people for a sufficiently long time. His relationship to the Impressionists, which is a good deal more distant than hasty critics would have it, is lightly touched upon by M. Hourticq whose general estimate of the painter is refreshingly impartial. The illustrations are well chosen and there is a short but useful bibliography.

Notes on New Books.

MESSRS. STANLEY PAUL & CO.

A chance meeting in the Elgin room at The British Museum between English, Americans and Russians provides the starting-point for the strange tale of Fate which Mr. J. A. T. Lloyd unfolds in The Three Destinies (6s.). Appropriately enough the meeting takes place before The Three Fates, and appropriately enough, too, the party was joined by the eccentric savant, Professor Fotheringham who, like the witches in Macbeth, confidently predicted when they should all meet again. The central figure of the story, Eustace Longwood, is a strange type of unpractical dreamer, whose only purpose in life is to be the supine instrument in the hands of Destiny to vindicate the Professor's prediction. Thus does he drift into marriage with Esmé Harding, thus is he swept off his feet by the second of the Museum maidens, now a world-famed diva with a sinister husband in the background; and thus does he find for the first time a prospect of peace in yet another encounter in the Elgin room with the real Lady of Destiny.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & CO.

A book of thrilling fascination for boy or, indeed, man, is Dr Sven Hedin's exhaustive "journey" From Pole to Pole (7s. 6d. net). It is a translation, "edited and abridged for the use of English-speaking young people," of Fran Pol till Pol, and may be termed a personally conducted tour (on paper) across the world. In Part I the author, starting from Stockholm, makes his way to Berlin, and then journeys on from country to country, his eyes observant, his spirit cheerful, his nature adaptable, till he has feasted his gaze upon Turkey, Persia, Russia, India, Tibet, China, Japan; rounding home by Russia again, and so back to Stockholm the starting-point. Part II, finds him, with the same thoroughness of plan, wending his way to London and Paris, and thence off and away to Rome, Africa, America, North and South, to the South Seas and to the North and South Polar regions. A genius for travel is displayed in every chapter; the reader cannot fail to realise it.

MESSRS. HODDER & STOUGHTON.

To the numerous admirers of Mr. A. C. Benson's books the volume which Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton have now published should prove a valued friend. It is called The Beauty of Life, and it is compiled from Mr. Benson's various writings, by Caroline Abbott Derby (6s. net). It is a prose anthology for every day of the year, containing faith, hope and charity strongly, simply and sympathetically expressed. Here are words of cheer and encouragement, of experience and tolerance, of observation and understanding, of meditation and comfort. One of the great charms of Mr. A. C. Benson's writings is, of course, the personality which he has the gift of making felt throughout his pages. That charm has by no means been lost in these extracts. "I have thought," says Mr. Benson in his Introduction to this volume, "not of the effect to be produced, but of the thing itself as it appeared to me . . . I have not attempted to avoid homeliness and plainness of speech, because I have not aimed at art so much as the far greater thing which is behind all art, the transfiguring emotion, which is beyond all symbols, and of which all symbols are but the expression, as coinage is the expression of wealth."

MESSRS. WARD, LOCK & CO.

Miss Mary Grant Bruce is, of course, known as an entirely trustworthy writer for girls, but she has seldom done better work than is to be found in Glen Eyre (2s. 6d.), which is a really delightful study of a girl's life in the wilder parts of the state of Victoria, Australia. Although primarily designed for girls it is probable that the book will appeal almost as widely to the general public. It is pleasantly illustrated.

MR. JOHN LANE.

Mr.—or, more probably, Miss—Bertal Heeney has written in Pickanock (6s.) a quiet, pleasant little tale of Settlement Days in Canada. The author presents French Canadian character in an attractive light, and the book has also a strong religious interest. It is somewhat lacking in movement, but the reader's attention should be centred on the atmosphere and the characterisation rather than the plot.

YEAR BOOKS.

We have received the new volume of The Literary Year Book (6s. net) now published by Messrs. John Onseley & Co. Certain useful features have been omitted, but the full directories of authors, publishers, booksellers, magazines and newspapers are retained, with the usual and serviceable information that no author or journalist can dispense with. We have received also the invaluable Hazell's Annual, published by Messrs. Hazell, Watson & Viney, and giving the amplest and most concise record of the world's progress in every direction during the past year. It is every man's ideal handbook, no matter what his business or profession may happen to be.

G.W.

DESKS

50 Styles.

Style No. 1633, shown below, is very popular with those who prefer a low desk. It gives one a clear view of the room, and the pull out writing bed is useful when one wants to examine plans, maps, drawings, and large papers, etc. Altogether this is a very compact little desk. It is well finished, and can be had in either quartered oak or mahogany. Ask for Catalogue No. 18n.

Packing Free.—Orders of £2 Carriage Paid to any Goods Station in the British Isles.

The Globe-Wernicke Co.

44, HOLBORN VIADUCT, LONDON E.C.
22, VICTORIA STREET, N.W.
22, BISHOPSGATE E.C.

THIS PEN will not leak—no matter how you carry it.

Waterman's (Ideal) Fountain Pen

“Safety” Style.

Upside down in pocket or bag—doesn't matter a bit.
The Pen can't leak—it's sealed when open and sealed
when closed.
As a pen—absolutely efficient Writes smoothly,

without spurt-
ing or faltering, lasts a lifetime. Nibs to suit every hand.

Of Stationers and Jewellers everywhere.
Booklet free from L & C HARDING
Ltd, Kohinoor House, Kingsway,
London (New York 173, Broadway)

TWO WONDERFUL NOVELS

(1) CORPORAL CAMERON

BECAUSE

It is now in its 35th Thousand.

It is by the famous author of “The Sky Pilot.”

“It has,” says the Daily Chronicle, “the breath of the prairies, the zest of heroic endeavour, and plenty of fine manliness. It is a book all can enjoy and be the better for reading.” “Ralph Connor gives us,” writes the Morning Post, “a vigorous study of a man of tough fibre and staunch loyalty.” “There is no better depicter of Canadian life to-day than Ralph Connor,” remarks the Church Times.

“CORPORAL CAMERON” is a Tale of the North-West Mounted Police. By RALPH CONNOR, Author of “The Sky Pilot,” “Black Rock,” etc. 6/-

(2) THE LADY MARRIED

BECAUSE

It is now in its 30th Thousand.

It is by the author of that world-famous book, “The Lady of the Decoration.”

“It is,” says the Pall Mall Gazette, “altogether delightful.” The Daily Telegraph writes of it as being “delightfully fresh, and shot through and through with sparkles of genuine humour.” The Scotsman says, “It is written with the same womanly feeling and alertness as made its predecessor so successful.” “The Lady of the Decoration” is one of the most popular books ever written, and the British Weekly predicts a no less enthusiastic reception for this book, which is written with the same charm and gentleness.

THE LADY MARRIED. By the Author of “The Lady of the Decoration.”

6/-

HODDER AND STOUGHTON, PUBLISHERS, WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

WARD, LOCK & CO.'S POPULAR NOVELS FOR 1913.

Large Crown, 8vo, Cloth Gilt, 6s.

Special attention may be directed to the artistic bindings of these novels. Each has an attractive envelope printed in colours, and is illustrated by first-class artists.

THE WASTREL.

Harold Bindloss.

Somehow everyone seems interested in anything about the Colonies, and that is perhaps one of the reasons why Mr. Bindloss is so successful. In the course of a powerfully engrossing and dramatic story he has the knack of imparting to the reader a mine of information about the country in which his scene is laid, and that without ever becoming dull or prosaic.

THE HARVEST MOON.

Justus Miles Forman.

When appearing serially in The Windsor Magazine, "The Harvest Moon" was accounted one of its best attractions. It is of enthralling interest.

THE COTTAGE IN THE CHINE.

Headon Hill.

Mr. Headon Hill can always be depended upon for a story comparable to one of Wilkie Collins', and "The Cottage in the Chine" is one of more than ordinary power.

NO OTHER WAY.

Louis Tracy.

An adventure story in its author's best manner, and with a plot that mystifies the reader on the first page and holds him enthralled through a maze of incident until it is elucidated.

THE GOLDEN ROSE.

Fred M. White.

Mr. Fred M. White's work differs from that of Messrs. Oppenheim and Le Queux, with which it is comparable, in that it is even more full of incident and sentiment.

LORD PETWORTH'S DAUGHTER.

Florence Warden.

Miss Warden's popularity seems as great as ever, and she will earn the thanks of new and old admirers for this sincere and moving story.

THE FOUNDLING.

Paul Trent.

One of the most successful novels published within the last few years was "The Vow," by Paul Trent. Four editions were sold in England and six in America. The author's new story has been eagerly anticipated.

HER CONVICT HUSBAND.

Marie Connor Leighton.

Although Mrs. Leighton's work is often spoken of as "melodramatic," it is of the kind that one enthuses over by reason of its emotional interest and unusual realism.

GREY TIMOTHY.

Edgar Wallace.

There is never an end to Mr. Wallace's versatility—he has now turned to the English turf for the background of his new novel. "Grey Timothy" is a breezy and humorous story that is likely to be talked about.

WARD, LOCK & CO., LTD., SALISBURY SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

THE WORLD FAMOUS CENTURY MAGAZINE

Some of the Contents of the February Number.

THE FAIRY WIFE. By MAURICE HEWLETT, Author of "The Forest Lovers," etc., with picture in colour by Arthur Rackham.
JAPAN'S COMMERCIAL CRISIS. By JAMES DAVENPORT WHALLEY, "Illustrated."
NATIONAL HEALTH AND MEDICAL FREEDOM. Both sides of a question of public interest. By B. O. FLOWER and IRVING FISHER.
COLES ENGRAVING OF MASTERPIECES. The Countess Loccali. By Vandyke.
THE PICTURED HORSE. By MARION HAMILTON CARTER. Illustrated.
PERENNITIES IN WOMEN'S COLLEGES. By the Presidents and Deans of various Colleges for Women.
THE HAVE. By RICHARD DEHAN, Author of "The Dop Doctor." Illustrated.
T. TEMBAROM. By FRANCES HODGSON BURNETT. Illustrated.
LINCOLN'S PLEDGE, WITH FACSIMILE. Lincoln as a Boy Knew Him. By JOHN LANGDON KAINE. A new story of Lincoln's assassination. By JESSIE W. WEIR.
THE LADY OR THE TIGER? By FRANK R. STOCKTON. Illustrated.
SONG OF THE OPEN LAND. By RICHARD BURTON.
LONG SAM "TAKES OUT." By ELLIS PARKER BUTLER, Author of "Pigs is Pigs." Illustrated.
ALASKA AS A TERRITORY OF THE UNITED STATES. By ALFRED HOIMAN. Illustrated.
IMPRESSIONS OF NEW YORK. By PIERRE LOTI.
TOPICS OF THE TIME. OPEN LETTERS, IN LIGHTER VEIN, ETC., ETC.

If you want the best and only the best in Art and Literature, subscribe to "The Century." Subscriptions may begin at any time. Price 18/- post free per annum. Single numbers 1/4.

HODDER & STOUGHTON, PUBLISHERS, LONDON, E.C.

Dux Eng Co Ltd

CHARLES READE

WARD, LOCK & CO.'S POPULAR FICTION.

Large Crown 8vo, Cloth Gilt, 6s.

Special attention may be directed to the artistic bindings of these novels. Each has an attractive envelope printed in colours, and is illustrated by first-class artists.

THE WASTREL.

Harold Bindloss.

Somehow everyone seems interested in anything about the Colonies, and that is perhaps one of the reasons why Mr. Bindloss is so successful. In the course of a powerfully engrossing and dramatic story he has the knack of imparting to the reader a mine of information about the country in which his scene is laid, and that without ever becoming dull or prosaic.

THE HARVEST MOON.

Justus Miles Forman.

When appearing serially in The Windsor Magazine, "The Harvest Moon" was accounted one of its best attractions. It is of enthralling interest.

HAROLD BINDLOSS

THE FOUNDLING. Paul Trent.

One of the most successful novels published within the last few years was "The Vow," by Paul Trent. Four editions were sold in England and six in America. The author's new story has been eagerly anticipated.

GREY TIMOTHY. Edgar Wallace.

There is never an end to Mr. Wallace's versatility—he has now turned to the English turf for the background of his new novel. "Grey Timothy" is a breezy and humorous story that is likely to be talked about.

HIDDEN LIVES. E. R. Punshon.

A story with a thrill on every page. Once started upon it will not be laid aside until the last page is reached.

THE GOLDEN GIRL.

Alice and Claude Askew.

One of the best stories by these popular Authors.

LOVE CONQUERS ALL THINGS.

Arthur Applin.

"Love Conquers All Things" is absolutely the best Mr. Applin has ever written, and is deserving of great popularity.

THE COTTAGE in the CHINE. Headon Hill.

Mr. Headon Hill can always be depended upon for a story comparable to one of Wilkie Collins', and "The Cottage in the China" is one of more than ordinary power.

NO OTHER WAY.

Louis Tracy.

An adventure story in its author's best manner, and with a plot that mystifies the reader on the first page and holds him enthralled through a maze of incident until it is elucidated.

THE GOLDEN ROSE.

Fred M. White.

Mr. Fred M. White's work differs from that of Messrs. Oppenheim and Le Queux, with which it is comparable, in that it is even more full of incident and sentiment.

PAUL TRENT

WARD, LOCK & CO., LTD., SALISBURY SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

From CHATTO & WINDUS'S NEW BOOKS.

A NEW BOOK BY MR. SWINBURNE
IN THE PRESS. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 3s. 6d. net.

CHARLES DICKENS.

By ALGERNON CHARLES SWINBURNE.

Demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 12s. 6d. net.

MOZART'S OPERAS.

A Critical Study by EDWARD J. DENT.

WITH ILLUSTRATIONS AND MUSICAL EXAMPLES.

Demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net.

CAMBRIDGE FROM WITHIN.

By CHARLES TENNYSON.

With 12 Illustrations in Colour and 8 in Sepia by HARRY MORLEY.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. net, velvet calf, 7s. 6d. net.

THE CHARM OF PARIS.

Passages Selected and Edited by ALFRED H. HYATT With 12 Illustrations in Colour by HARRY MORLEY.

A BRILLIANT FIRST NOVEL BY A NEW WRITER.

THE EVERLASTING SEARCH.

By CECIL DUNCAN-JONES. 6s. [Shortly.]

A NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "PANNY MEAREN," "HARROWS," &c.

A "YOUNG LADY": A Study in Selectness.

By HORACE W. C. NEWTE. 6s. [Shortly.]

LONDON: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, ST. MARTIN'S LANE, W.C.

New List in Belles Lettres.

SIR F. WEDMORE—PAGES ASSEMBLED: A Selection from the Writings, Imaginative and Critical of FREDERICK WEDMORE, Fcap 8vo, Cloth 1s. 6d. net, Wrapper, 1s. net

JOHN MASEFIELD BALLADS AND POEMS. By JOHN MASEFIELD Royal 16mo 2s. 6d. net [Third Impression]

W. W. GIBSON—FIRES. By WILLIAM W. GIBSON. Complete in Three Books 3 vols. Crown 8vo 4s. 6d. net

* May be had separately, also—uniform in size and price—DAILY BREAD. 3 vols.

ERNEST DOWSON—DILEMMAS. By ERNEST DOWSON. Crown 8vo 2s. 6d. net [New and Cheaper Edition]

YONE NOGUCHI—THE AMERICAN DIARY OF A JAPANESE GIRL. Frontispiece in Colour, printed from 25 Wood Blocks. Crown 8vo 7s. 6d. net

FRANCIS ERNELEY WALROND—THE GODS OF AFRICA. Royal 16mo 1s. 6d. net

GEORGE GREENWOOD, M.P.—POEMS. By GEORGE FORESTER Cr 8vo 1s. 6d. net

"One of the most inspiring facts of the present day is the number of excellent books of verse that appear year by year. Here for instance we have Mr. G. Forester with a preface which in the form of a letter from a friend gives a reason for the book's existence, as though any other reason were needed than the muse of his poem, "The Beaulieu River". And as for the sensitive translations from de Rainger and Catullus we warmly agree with Mr. Forester's candid friend, their excellence is unquestionable." —Observer.

WILLIAM GERARD—PIERS GAVESTON: A PRINCE'S FAVOURITE. A Drama By WILLIAM GERARD Crown 8vo 2s. 6d. net [In the Press]

VIGO CABINET SERIES—New Volumes.

Royal 16mo. Cloth, 1s. 6d. net, Wrapper, 1s. net

M. BARTLETT—The Raised Road, and other Poems.

E. A. HENTY—Australian Idylls.

K. W. LUNDIE—English Echoes from the Quartier Latin.

A. HUGH FISHER—Poems. [In the Press]

N.B.—Please note change of Address.

LONDON: ELKIN MATHEWS, CORK STREET, W.

A Charming Volume of Sketches of Canadian Rural Life. 5/-

WHERE THE SUGAR MAPLE GROWS.

By ADELINE TESKEY

Author of "The Yellow Pearl," etc

Miss Teskey has produced in these idylls of a Canadian Village something unique in the way of character studies, equal in all respects to the quaint types of "Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush." Her work will prove a revelation to those who claim that Canada has no Literature.

THE MUSSON BOOK COMPANY, LIMITED,

Mansion House Chambers 11, Queen Victoria Street, London, E.C. Head Office—Toronto, Canada

The Complete Edition in One Handsome Volume of the Poetical Works of E. PAULINE JOHNSON, the Great Canadian Poetess.

"FLINT AND FEATHER" is the first volume of the complete poetical works of E. PAULINE JOHNSON, the famous Mohawk poetess, and the daughter of the late Chief Johnson of the Six Indian Nations fame. The reader of "The Bookman" has only to look upon the face of the portrait here reproduced, to conclude that the poems of Indian life and love which make up this delightful edition, are the work of a most accomplished writer. The volume has just been issued in a handsome binding, and will make an ideal present for friends both home and abroad.

FLINT AND FEATHER

Being the Complete Poems of

E. PAULINE JOHNSON
("Tekahionwake.")

With a brief biographical sketch of the author. With portrait frontispiece. Cloth, 6/- net

This collection of verse I have named FLINT AND FEATHER because of the association of ideas. Flint suggests the Redman's weapons of war, Feather the eagle plume that crests the head of a warrior chief, so both flint and feather bear the hall-mark of my Mohawk blood.
E. PAULINE JOHNSON

THE MUSSON BOOK COMPANY, LIMITED,
Mansion House Chambers, 11, Queen Victoria Street,
London, E.C. Head Office—Toronto, Canada.

Songs of the Day.—Songs of the Night.

3/6 net.

CANADIAN CANTICLES.

A Companion Volume to those two beautiful anthologies "The Garden of Love" and "Fragrance of Flowers." A most tasteful production, and will prove a very acceptable present for Christmas or any other time. The compiler has divided the selection into two parts, viz.—"SONGS OF THE DAY" and "SONGS OF THE NIGHT," the aim has been well carried out and with good judgment.

The following is but a short selection of the varied contents of this attractive volume:

The God of Courage—The Call of the River—The Irish Emigrant—The Spirit of the Ocean—The Heart of the Woods—The Gold God—The Death of Yesterday—Life and Death—The Soul—The Mead of Love—The Soul Market—The City of the Sea—Disgraced Blessings—The Ghost of Poverty—My First Love—For Eternity—The Spirit of Music—Hope's Golden Sea—My Lady's Gown—Repentance—Since I Know You Love Me—To My Love—The Spirit of the Night—Ghosts' Hoves—Love and I—Death's Bride—The City of Silence—I Miss You—Her Bridalroom—Expectation—Immortal Love—My Bird of Hope—The Foundation of Tears—The Soul of the Murderer—Little Love—The Palace of Tears

THE MUSSON BOOK COMPANY, LIMITED,

Mansion House Chambers, 11, Queen Victoria Street, London, E.C. Head Office—Toronto, Canada.

A SELECTION FROM
HUTCHINSON & CO.'S
 SPRING ANNOUNCEMENTS

TWO IMPORTANT HISTORICAL NARRATIVES

Little Jennings and Fighting Dick Talbot

The Story of the Duke and Duchess of Tyrconnel

By PHILIP W. SERGEANT

With photogravure plates and other
 illustrations

In 2 vols., demy 8vo, cloth gilt and gilt top,
 24s. net

An Exiled King

The absorbing life-story of Gustav
 Adolph IV of Sweden

By SOPHIE ELKAN

With photogravure plates and other
 illustrations

In 2 volumes, demy 8vo, cloth gilt and gilt top. 24s. net

Adventures among the Birds

By W. H. HUDSON

Author of "The Land's End," "Afoot in England," etc.

In crown 8vo, cloth gilt. 10s. 6d. net

The Tragedy of an Army: La Vendée in 1793

By I. A. TAYLOR

In 1 volume, demy 8vo, cloth gilt and
 gilt top. 16s. net

With photogravure frontispiece and other
 illustrations

FOR ALL LOVERS OF ## ART

The Year's Art, 1913

Thirty-Fourth Year of Issue

Over 600 pages, with illustrations.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. net

SCIENCE

A Day in the Moon

By the ABBÉ MOREAUX

Translated by A. HILLIARD
 ATTERIDGE

In crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.

With numerous illustrations

MUSIC

How to Listen to an Orchestra

By ANNIE W. PATTERSON,
 Mus. 1st oc., B.A. (Univ. of
 1st land).

In crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 5s. net.
 With numerous illustrations on art paper

HUTCHINSON'S NATURE LIBRARY

Messmates: A Book of Strange Companionships

By EDWARD STEP, F.L.S.

Author of "The Romance of Wild Flowers," "Shell Life," etc.

With 55 Illustrations, from photographs on art paper, 6s. net

The Infancy of Animals

By W. P. PYCRAFT,
 A.L.S., F.Z.S.

With over 175 plates on art paper and numerous illustrations in the text,
 6s. net

POPULAR POCKET NATURE BOOKS

Each in small volumes (7½ in. by 5 in.), richly gilt, rounded corners, 5s. net

Toadstools & Mushrooms of the Countryside

By EDWARD STEP, F.L.S.

With 8 coloured plates and 128 other illustrations from photographs, on art paper

Astronomy

By G. F. CHAMBERS, F.R.A.S.

With 8 coloured plates and 358 other illustrations

British
Fresh-Water Fishes

By Sir HERBERT MAXWELL,
 Bart

With 24 beautiful coloured plates

NEW 6/- NOVELS

CONCERT PITCH

Frank Danby
 (2nd Edition)

THANE BRANDON

F. Bancroft

BY THE BLUE RIVER

Isabel C. Clake

FANNY'S FIRST NOVEL

F. Frankfort Moore

PATRICIA PLAYS A PART

Mrs. Barnes-Grundy

MONTE CARLO (4th Edition)

Mrs. H. de Vere Stacpoole

THE HONEY-STAR

Tickner Edwardes
 (2nd Edition)

IN OLD MADRAS

B. M. Croker

THE DETERMINED TWINS

Edgar Jepson

THE COMBINED MAZE

(2nd Edition)

May Sinclair

HORACE BLAKE

Mrs. Wilfrid Ward

THE SECOND SIGHTER'S

DAUGHTER

G. B.
 Burgin

AN AVERAGE MAN

R. H. Benson

THE MOUSE TRAP

M. P. Willcocks

In crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

OUT OF THE NIGHT

Mrs. Hugh Fraser and Hugh Fraser

London: HUTCHINSON & CO., Paternoster Row, E.C.

HURST & BLACKETT'S
 BOOKS for the SPRING

AN IMPORTANT LITERARY DISCOVERY

Memoirs of William Hickey

In 1 volume, demy 8vo, cloth gilt and gilt top,
 12s. 6d. net

My Life in Teheran

By THE BARONESS D'HERMALLE

In 1 volume, demy 8vo, cloth gilt and gilt top, very fully illustrated. 12s. 6d. net

To Menelek in a Motor Car

By CLIFFORD HALLÉ

With an introduction by C. J. WELD-
 BLUNDELL, B. Litt. Oxon., F.R.G.S., F.Z.S., etc.

Profusely illustrated with reproductions of the Author's photographs on art paper

In demy 8vo, cloth gilt and gilt top.
 12s. 6d. net

An Important New Work by the Author of "Hearts of Men," "The Soul of a People," etc.

The World Soul

By H. FIELDING-HALL

In demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 10s. 6d. net

A TIMELY BOOK

The Mormons

A Popular History

By WINIFRED GRAHAM

Author of "Ezra the Mormon," "The Zionists," etc.

In crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s. net

NEW 6/- NOVELS

THE CATFISH

Charles Marriott

CIRCE'S DAUGHTER

Priscilla Craven

THE LOVERS OF

MADAMOISELLE

Clive Holland

CALLING THE TUNE

Justin H. McCarthy

THE CRYSTAL STOPPER

Maurice Leblanc

THE PRICE OF POWER

William LeQueux

HIS BROTHER'S KEEPER

Judge McDonnell Bodkin

THE DAUGHTER-IN-LAW

E. W. Savi

London:

HURST & BLACKETT, Ltd.

Paternoster House, E.C.

WYMAN & SONS LIMITED

Largest Installation of Monotype and Linotype
Machines in the Kingdom
Fine Art Miehle and other Presses for best
Bookwork

High-class Rotary Machinery for half-tone
printing and quadruple Presses producing 16, 20, 24, 28 and 32 pp. papers at 30,000 per hour, folded

Newspaper, Book and General Printers and Lithographers

Binding Plant complete, including the latest machines for Case-making and Casing-in

Books set up by Monotype, submitted entire in proof, printed and bound complete

BOOKSTALL CONTRACTORS ON LONDON & NORTH WESTERN, GREAT WESTERN AND OTHER RAILWAYS

Wholesale Booksellers and Newsagents :: Railway, Press and General Advertising Contractors

LONDON AND READING

W. J. MACKAY & Co., Ltd.

Book and Magazine Printers, CHATHAM.

MONOTYPES, LINOTYPES, ROTARIES and PERFECTING MACHINES.

Close Prices for long runs of Crown Octavo and Crown
Quarto Work; also for Crown Folio and Crown Quarto
Weekly or Monthly Magazine.

ESTIMATES IN AN HOUR OR TWO. CORRESPONDENCE INVITED.

Full Particulars from London Agent—

A. H. BURTON,

92, Avenue Chambers, Bloomsbury Square, W.C.

CHANCE & BLAND, BOOK & COLOUR PRINTERS, GLOUCESTER.

SPECIALITIES—6/-, 6d., and 7d. Novels.

Prices at an hour's notice from Lonaon Agents :

MODERN ADVERTISING CO., LTD.,
92, Avenue Chambers, Southampton Row, W.C.

READERS OUT OF REACH

of a good local bookseller, or who live abroad, are asked to write direct to London for their books, which will be sent by return of post, at lowest cash prices, on receipt of remittance with order.

German or French Books (if not obtainable in London) are posted to customers direct from Leipzig or Paris by my agents there, thus saving postage.

LONDON AGENT FOR LIBRARIES ABROAD.

ESTABLISHED
1881

Subscription Newspaper and Periodical Agency for British and Foreign Publications.

List of 1600 Subscription Rates free on application.

CATALOGUES SENT POST FREE

1. Reference Book Catalogue of 146 pp. of Standard Literature.
2. Remainder Catalogue of over 1000 Titles of Publishers' Remainders, in good condition as issued, at from 30% to 80% off published prices.
3. Colonial Librarian's Handbook, indispensable to Librarians outside Europe, with complete list of Colonial Editions, etc., etc.
4. Price List of Subscription Rates for British Periodicals abroad, with a selection of the most popular American, French, German, and Spanish periodicals.

ALFRED WILSON

Export and Retail Bookseller

18-19 GRACECHURCH STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Telephone : 7463 Central.

Bankers : London County & Westminster (Lombard Street).

Duckworth & Co's New Books.

GENERAL LITERATURE

From the Congo to the Niger and the Nile

By ADOLF FRIEDRICH, DUKE OF MECKLENBURG. With over 500 illustrations, 20 Coloured Plates, and a Map. In 2 Vols. Demy 8vo. Cloth gilt, gilt top. 32s. net.

Memoirs of the Husband of an Ex-Crown Princess

By ENRICO TOSELLI (Husband of the Crown Princess of Saxony). With a Frontispiece Portrait. Demy 8vo. Cloth gilt, gilt top. 10s. 6d. net; postage, 5d.

Germany and the Germans

By PRICE COLLIER, Author of "England and the English," "The West in the East." Demy 8vo. Cloth gilt, gilt top. 7s. 6d. net; postage, 5d.

THE OFFICIAL "LIFE" OF MICHAEL FAIRLESS Michael Fairless: Her Life and Writings

By WILLIAM SCOTT PALMER and A. M. HAGGARD. With a Photogravure Portrait. Fcap 8vo. Cloth gilt, gilt top, designed end papers. 2s. 6d. net; postage, 3d. [The Roadmender Series]

Women of the Country

By GERTRUDE BONE
Author of "Children's Children," "Provincial Tales." Fcap 8vo. Cloth gilt, gilt top, picture end papers. 2s. 6d. net; postage, 3d. [The Roadmender Series]

West Indian Tales of Old

By ALGERNON ASPINALL
Tales, romantic and otherwise, revealing the History of the British West Indies. Illustrated. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

Love Poems and Others

By D. H. LAWRENCE
Author of "The Trespasser," "The White Peacock." Crown 8vo. Cloth gilt. 5s. net.

FICTION

The Red Cross Girl

By RICHARD HARDING DAVIS
Author of "Soldiers of Fortune." Illustrated. Crown 8vo. 6s.

The Contrast

By ELINOR GLYN
Author of "The Visits of Elizabeth." With a Frontispiece. Crown 8vo. 6s.

Jewels in Brass

By JITTIE HORLICK
Author of "A String of Beads." Crown 8vo. 6s.

Something New

By HELEN C. ROBERTS
Author of "Old Brent's Daughter." Crown 8vo. 6s.

THE READERS' LIBRARY

NEW VOLUMES

Studies in Four Poets

By STOPFORD A. BROOKE, M.A.
Author of "Studies in Poetry," "Tennyson and Browning," etc. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net; postage, 4d.

Faith

By R. B. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM
Author of "Success," "Progress," etc. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net; postage, 4d.

A Crystal Age

By W. H. HUDSON
Author of "The Purple Land," "Green Mansions," etc. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net; postage, 4d.

Essays

By COVENTRY PATMORE
In 1 Vol. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net; postage, 4d.
Full List of Titles (33 Volumes) in the Series will be sent, Post Free, on application.

A Descriptive List of Announcements, also a New General Catalogue of Publications, will be sent free to any address on application.

DUCKWORTH & CO., COVENT GARDEN, LONDON, W.C.

Messrs. Methuen's New Books

Books marked with an asterisk * will be published during March. The others are now ready.

GENERAL LITERATURE.

THE POEMS OF RUDYARD KIPLING. 4 Vols. Fcap. 8vo. Cloth. 4s. 6d. net each vol.

THE BRITISH SCHOOL: An Anecdotal Guide to the British Painters and Pictures in the National Gallery. By E. V. Lucas. With 16 Plates. Fcap 8vo. Round corners. 2s. 6d. net.

*THE ANCIENT HISTORY OF THE NEAR EAST FROM THE EARLIEST PERIOD TO THE PERSIAN INVASION OF GREECE. By H. R. Hall, M.A., F.S.A. With 13 Illustrations and 14 Maps. Demy 8vo. 15s. net.

*THE SOLDIERS WHOM WELLINGTON LED. Deeds of Daring, Chivalry and Renown. By Edward Fraser. With 12 Illustrations and 4 Maps. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

GOLD, PRICES, AND WAGES. By J. A. Hobson, Author of "The Problem of the Unemployed." Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

*TRADE UNIONISM. By Henry H. Schloesser, Barrister-at-Law, Joint-Author of "The Legal Position of Trade Unions." Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.

*CHRIST AND HIS AGE. By Douglas G. Browne. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

*THE FAITH OF ALL SENSIBLE PEOPLE. By David Alec Wilson. Fcap 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

HEALTH THROUGH DIET. By Kenneth G. Haig, L.R.C.P., M.R.C.S. With the advice and assistance of Alexander Haig, M.A., M.D. (Oxon). Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

*THE GOLFING SWING. By Burnham Hare. Fcap. 8vo. 1s. net.

THE COMPLETE HORSEMAN. By W. Scarth Dixon. With 19 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

PARIS AND HER TREASURES. By Ethel E. Bicknell. With 64 Illustrations, 2 Plans, and a Map. Fcap. 8vo. Round corners. 5s. net.

FICTION.

*THE LOVE PIRATE. By C. N. and A. M. Williamson. Authors of "The Heather Moon." Crown 8vo. 6s.

A KNIGHT OF SPAIN. By Marjorie Bowen, Author of "I Will Maintain." Crown 8vo. 6s.

*THE ADVENTURES OF DR. WHITTY. By George A. Birmingham, Author of "Spanish Gold." Crown 8vo. 6s.

AN AFFAIR OF STATE. By J. G. Snaith, Author of "The Principal Girl." Crown 8vo. 6s.

MARY ALL-ALONE. By John Oxenham, Author of "The Quest of the Golden Rose." Crown 8vo. 6s.

THE BELOVED ENEMY. By E. Maria Albanesi, Author of "Olivia Marv." Crown 8vo. 6s.

THE PEARL-STRINGER. By Peggy Webling, Author of "A Spirit of Mirth." Crown 8vo. 6s.

THE FOOL IN CHRIST. By Gerhart Hauptmann. Crown 8vo. 6s.

*CHANGE OF CLIMATE. By A. A. Methley, Author of "The Key of Life." Crown 8vo. 6s.

THE TERRORS AND OTHER STORIES. By Archibald Marshall. Crown 8vo. 6s.

*IF IT PLEASE YOU! By Richard Marsh, Author of "Judith Lee." Crown 8vo. 6s.

LED INTO THE WILDERNESS. By William E. Bailey. Crown 8vo. 6s.

W O. By Maurice Drake. Crown 8vo. 6s.

REQUIT. By Mrs. J. O. Arnold, Author of "Honours Easy." Crown 8vo. 6s.

THE EVOLUTION OF EVE. By Bertha Shelley, Author of "Fudgby." Crown 8vo. 6s.

PASSIONS OF STRAW. By Evelyn F. Heywood. Crown 8vo. 6s.

HADOW OF 'SHAWS. By Theo. Douglas (Mrs. H. G. Everett). Crown 8vo. 6s.

*STUDIES IN LOVE AND IN TERROR. By Mrs. Belloc Lowndes. Crown 8vo. 6s.

UNCONVENTIONAL MOLLY. By Joseph Adams. Crown 8vo. 6s.

*THE WARE CASE. By George Pleydell. Crown 8vo. 6s.

METHUEN'S SHILLING BOOKS.

Fcap. 8vo. 1s. net. The New Volumes are:—

DAN RUSSEL THE FOX. By E. C. Somerville and Martin Ross

FIRE IN STUBBLE. By Baroness Orczy

INTENTIONS. By Oscar Wilde

OLD COUNTRY LIFE. By S. Baring-Gould

Methuen's Sevenpenny Novels.

Fcap. 8vo. 7d. net.

A New Series of Novels by popular Authors. The first volumes are:—

ANGEL. By B. M. Croker

PRINCE RUPERT THE BUCCANEER. By C. J. Cutcliffe Hyne

I CROWN THEE KING. By Max Pemberton

THE BROOM SQUIRE. By S. Baring-Gould

METHUEN & CO., LTD., 36, ESSEX STREET, LONDON, W.C.

NISBET & Co.'s Announcements

NOW

READY.

BY
A. C. BENSON.

Second Impression. 7s. 6d. net.

FIRST LARGE IMPRESSION
SOLD OUT BEFORE PUBLICATION

'ALONG THE ROAD.'

BY
A. C. BENSON.

Second Impression. 7s. 6d. net.

DO NOT FAIL TO ASK YOUR BOOKSELLER OR LIBRARIAN
FOR A COPY

THE BAYREUTH LETTERS OF RICHARD WAGNER.

Translated by CAROLINE V. KERR. With Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 6s. net.

In these Letters may be read for the first time in English the story of the conception and realisation of Wagner's scheme for the Opera House at Bayreuth. JUST PUBLISHED

BROKEN LINKS IN SCOTTISH EDUCATION.

By the Rev JOHN SMITH, D.D., President of the Scottish School Boards Association 2s. 6d. net. JUST PUBLISHED

READY THIS MONTH

TWO YEARS UNDER THE CRESCENT.

A War Correspondent's Experiences with the Turks in Tripoli and Thrace.

By H. C. SEPPINGS WRIGHT.

With numerous Sketches, Photographs and Coloured Drawings

Demy 8vo 10s. 6d. net.

JAMES NISBET & Co., Ltd., 22, Berners Street, London, W.

TWO STANDARD SCOTTISH BOOKS.

SCOTTISH LIFE AND POETRY.

By L. MACLEAN WATT, M.A., B.D. 12s. 6d. net.

MAITLAND OF LETHINGTON.

By E. RUSSELL With Illustrations 15s. net.

WHAT LIFE MEANS TO ME.

By WILFRED T. GRENFELL, M.D., C.M.G. Author of "Down North on the Labrador," etc. 2s. net.

JUST PUBLISHED.

A. T. PIERSON: A Biography.

By his Son, DELAVAN L. PIERSON With Portrait and Illustrations 6s. net.

SECOND REVISED EDITION

THE PROBLEM OF EDWIN DROOD

A Study in the Methods of Dickens. By Sir

W. ROBERTSON NICOLL, LL.D.

3/6 net

ARTUR WAGNER "Solves the mystery of forty years."

J. CUMING WATKINS "The Drood case is, I think, ended. It has reached a final Court of Appeal, and a verdict has been delivered."

C. K. S. in The Sphere "I am overwhelmed by the arguments produced by Sir William. They have indeed converted me."

THOMAS SICCUM "Not only one of its author's most interesting productions, but also one of the most considerable critical performances of recent years."

Daily News "This must become the classical survey of the fascinating problem."

Times "Sir William Robertson Nicoll proves himself a literary detective of no mean capacity."

Athenaeum "A real contribution to the subject. The present reviewer regards it as an absolutely satisfactory strengthening of the best views concerning the two main issues of the story."

Glasgow Herald "A brilliant addition to Dickens literature."

Hermingham Daily Post "Takes a place among the few who must be regarded as indispensable to anybody who seeks to solve the riddles Dickens left unanswered."

HODDER & STOUGHTON, PUBLISHERS, LONDON

Cambridge Manuals

General Editors: P. GILES, Litt.D.,
and A. C. SEWARD, M.A., F.R.S.

Price 1s net

bound in cloth, in lambskin 2s 6d net

TEN NEW VOLUMES

Ready February 11

Ancient Babylonia. By C. H. W. JOHNS, Litt.D.

The Earth: Its Shape, Size, Weight, and Spin.
By J. H. POYNTING, Sc.D., F.R.S.

The Atmosphere. By A. J. BERRY, M.A.

The Icelandic Sagas. By W. A. CRAIGIE, LL.D.

The Physical Basis of Music. By ALEX.
WOOD, M.A., D.Sc.

The Modern Warship. By EDWARD L.
ATTWOOD, M.Inst.N.A.

Comparative Religion. By F. B. JEVONS,
Litt.D.

The Story of a Loaf of Bread. By Prof.
T. B. WOOD, M.A.

Ancient Stained and Painted Glass. By
F. SYDNEY EDEN.

The Vikings. By Prof. ALLEN MAWER, M.A.

A prospectus giving full particulars of the series, with a list of the volumes ready and in preparation, of which there are a very large number, will be sent post free on receipt of a postcard addressed to D.C.M.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS

Fetter Lane, London, E.C.

MR. LANE'S BOOKS

The Book of the Season

From Studio to Stage From Studio to Stage

16s. net By WEEDON GROSSMITH

"One of the liveliest and best humoured volumes of reminiscences that it has been our good fortune to enjoy. Mr. Grossmith writes as well as he acts, and shrewdness and mercurial play lightly over every page. —Daily Telegraph

Recent Successes

THE EMPRESS JOSEPHINE Joseph Turquan
(12s. 6d. net)

Containing much new matter concerning the life of Josephine after her divorce.

LIFE & LETTERS OF WILLIAM COBBETT
(2 vols., 32s. net) Lewis Melville

LETTER BAG OF LADY ELIZABETH SPENCER STANHOPE A. M. W. Stirling
(2 vols., 32s. net)

THIRTEEN YEARS OF A BUSY WOMAN'S LIFE (16s. net) Mrs. Alec Tweedie

ROMANTIC TRIALS OF THREE CENTURIES
(12s. 6d. net) Hugh Childers

THE STORY OF DON JOHN OF AUSTRIA
(16s. net) Translated by Lady Moreton Luis Coloma

NAPOLEON'S LAST CAMPAIGN IN GERMANY (12s. 6d. net) F. Loraine Petre

DOWN THE MACKENZIE AND UP THE YUKON (8s. net) Elihu Stewart

AUSTRIA: HER PEOPLE AND THEIR HOMELAND (21s. net) James Baker
48 Pictures in Colour by Donald Maxwell

TAPESTRIES. Their Origin, History, and Renaissance
(16s. net). 15 Illustrations George Leland Hunter

DEBORAH: A Poetic Play Lancelotti Abercrombie
(2s. 6d. net)

POEMS (3s. 6d. net) Lucy Masterman

THE STRUGGLE FOR BREAD "A Rifleman"
A Reply to Norman Angell's "Great Illusion" (8s. net)

THE VIOLET BOOK (8s. net) D. & A. Allen Brown
With Coloured Illustrations by Irene Johns

Brilliant Six Shilling Novels

TOPHAM'S FOLLY George Stevenson

Mr. F. G. BRIDGEMAN in Sunday Times. The style of the book is such as to give and persuade such a compelling fascination that the reader will be half way through it before he becomes aware that he has been turning its pages.

THE FINGER OF MR. BLEE Peter Blundell

Times: "Mr. Blee is an original, a real joy. The plot is ingenious and has the true ring about it."

Evening Standard: "Often screamingly funny."

FIRE AND FROST (Shortly) Maud Grieve

THE MAN WHO WOULD NOT BE KING Sidney Dark

Daily Telegraph: "As fresh, jolly, and entertaining a story as we have encountered for more than a couple of publishing seasons."

MY FRIEND'S BOOK Anatole France

JOYOUS ADVENTURES OF ARISTIDE PUJOL William J. Locke

THE UNBEARABLE BASSINGTON H. M. Munro (Saki)

MYLES CALTHORPE, I.D.B. F. E. Mills Young

AT ALL LIBRARIES

THE BODLEY HEAD VIGO ST. W.

Messrs. Stanley Paul's List.

THE LORDS OF THE DEVIL'S PARADISE

By G. SIDNEY PATERNOSTER

Illus., 5/- net

Graphic: "Should make civilization rise in revolt."

WESTERN MEN WITH EASTERN MORALS

By W. N. WILLIS

Author of 'The White Slaves of London, &c.'

With a Preface by R. A. Bennett, Litterateur of Truth (Cr. Sv.) Illus. 5/- net

THE A.B.C. OF ARTISTIC PHOTOGRAPHY

By A. J. ANDERSON

With Photographic Plates and Half-tone Illustrations. Large Cr. 8vo., 5/- net.

Amateur Photographer: "A most delightful book. Every amateur photographer with an interest in pictorial work should get it."

THE EUROPEAN IN INDIA

By H. H. KELLY

(Indian Telegraphs secured).

Demy 8vo. Illustrated. 12/6 net

Sheds a flood of light on the life of the European in India. Mr. Kelly writes with an entertaining pen, and crowds his book with brightness and amusement.

* * * THIRD EDITION

THE WHITE SLAVES OF LONDON

By W. N. WILLIS 1/- net

Incorporating appeals to the Nation by His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Bishop of London, the Lord Bishop of Birmingham and Mrs. Brimwell Smith.

THE DESTINY OF CLAUDE

MAY WYNN

Author of "Henri de Navarre, &c." "JUSI READY"

The Times says: "An exciting adventure of the 17th Century."

THE CELEBRITY'S DAUGHTER

VIOLET HUNT

Second Large Edition being rapidly exhausted.

Daily Graphic: "One of the success stories of the season."

RAFAEL SABATINI'S GREATEST ROMANCE

* * * First Large Edition Exhausted

THE STROLLING SAINT

By RAFAEL SABATINI

Author of 'The Lion Skin', 'Birds of the Wilderness', 'The Life of Cesare Borgia', &c.

WHAT THE PRESS HAS SAID OF RAFAEL SABATINI

"Mr. Sabatini unquestionably is the most exciting writer of the cloak and dagger novel." —Daily News
"Mr. Sabatini has a vivid and realistic pen." —Yorkshire Observer
"Mr. Sabatini is a capital writer of the 'Literary World'." —Literary World
"Mr. Sabatini is a novelist of much real excellence." —Northern Whig
"What Mr. Sabatini does not know of the life and times of Cesare Borgia is not worth considering." —Guardian

THE REDEEMER

KEN BAZIN

Author of 'The Sun, &c.'

The Catholic Herald says: "The author is a writer of exceptional charm."

The Times says: "Should count among Mr. Bazin's most thoughtful studies many excellent character studies."

THE POODLE-WOMAN

A story of Resurrection at Connaught Rights

ANNE ST. JOHN

Daily Telegraph: "Absorbing from the first page to the last."

THE INSANITY OF GENIUS

By J. I. NISBET

Sixth and New Edition

With Preface by Dr. B. R. ARDOLLI ANDER

Crown 8vo. 5/- net

Is the Divine or the Devil?

SAMPHIRE

By LADY SAMUEL GRANT

Crown 8vo. 3/6 net

SIR GALAHAD OF THE ARMY

HAMILTON DRUMMOND

Daily News: "A really vigorous and stirring romance." Nottingham Guardian: "A remarkably good novel."

A GREY LIFE

A Romance of Bath

By RITA

An Irish adventure who plays an important part in 'A Grey Life' is the male prototype of 'Rita's immortal' 'Pek', the Rak.

STANLEY PAUL & CO. 31, ESSEX STREET, LONDON

Descriptive Catalogue of 200 New Books will be sent gratis to any address in the World.

HODDER & STOUGHTON

SOME CAPITAL NOVELS JUST PUBLISHED.

E. W. HORNUNG'S

WITCHING HILL

In this new book the creator of "Raffles" returns to the field of his fame. "The laying of the ghost is perhaps the most ingenious incident in this lively book, which is advertised to thrill and mystify and justifies its advertisers."—Pall Mall Gazette. (6/-)

MRS. HUBERT BARCLAY'S

EAST OF THE SHADOWS

The best story the popular author of "Trevor Lordship" and "A Dream of Blue Roses" has ever written. A very charming idyll. (6/-)

PERCY BREBNER'S

THE LITTLE GREY SHOE

This new adventure story by the author of "Princess Maritza" is a very real success. "It is full of movement and colour and holds the attention from the first page to the last."—Scotsman. "Those who love a story of romance, love and high adventure should not miss 'The Little Grey Shoe.'"—Pall Mall Gazette. (6/-)

O. DOUGLAS'S

OLIVIA IN INDIA

For sheer high spirits and humour, for a keen but never ill-natured wit, for the most effective rapid sketches of Indian scenery and society—for sparkle, brightness, and humanity, read "Olivia in India." (6/-)

MARIAN BOWER'S

SKIPPER ANNE

This tale of Napoleon's Secret Service took a high place in our recent £1,000 Prize Novel Competition. "One would have thought it impossible to write an historical novel of the French Revolution period: but Miss Bower has done it. The book has the close fascination of a detective story and the romantic air of history."—Daily News. (6/-)

WONDERFUL SALES FOR TWO WONDERFUL NOVELS

35th THOUSAND

CORPORAL CAMERON

By RALPH CONNOR, the famous author of "The Sky Pilot." (6/-)

30th THOUSAND

THE LADY MARRIED

By the author of "THE LADY OF THE DECORATION." The altogether delightful companion volume to one of the most popular books ever written. (6/-)

From Ruman's Spring List.

THE EMPIRE OF INDIA

By SIR BAMPFYLDE FULLER, K.C.S.I.,
C.I.E., formerly Lieutenant-Governor of Eastern Bengal.

Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt top, with 26 full-page plate illustrations and map. 7/6 net. Uniform with other volumes in the "ALL RED" Series on AUSTRALIA, by the Hon. B. R. Wise; NEW ZEALAND, by Sir
Arthur P. Douglas, Bt.; CANADA, by W. L. Griffith; SOUTH AFRICA, by Basil Worsfold; and THE BRITISH WEST INDIES, by A. E. Aspinall.

SYMBOLISM OF ANIMALS AND BIRDS

REPRESENTED IN ENGLISH CHURCH ARCHITECTURE

By ARTHUR H. COLLINS, M.A. With 120 illustrations. 5/- net.

THE IMMOVABLE EAST

STUDIES OF THE PEOPLE & CUSTOMS OF PALESTINE

By PHILIP J. BALDENSPERGER. With Biographical Introduction by FREDERIC LEES. With 24 full-page plate illustrations and map. 7/6 net.

FLEET STREET in SEVEN CENTURIES.

Being a History of the Growth of London Beyond the Walls into the Western Liberty and of Fleet Street to our time. By WALTER GEORGE BELL. With a Foreword by Sir WILLIAM P. TRELOAR, Bart.
Forty-six illustrations. Demy 8vo, 620 pp. 15/- net.

WANDERINGS ON THE ITALIAN

RIVIERA. The Record of a Leisurely Tour in Liguria. By FREDERIC LEES. With Frontispiece in Colour, 60 Photographic Illustrations, and a Map.
Large crown 8vo. 7/6 net.

THE INNER LIFE of GEORGE ELIOT.

A Study of the Mental and Spiritual Development of the Novelist. By CHARLES GARDNER, M.A.
Crown 8vo. 5/- net.

IN OUR LADY'S PRAISE.

An Anthology of
Prose and Verse. By the Rev. E. HERMITAGE DAY, D.D., F.S.A. With Foreword by LORD HALIFAX, and a Photogravure Frontispiece.

Foolscap 8vo, leather, 3/- net; cloth, 2/- net.

THE ISLAND of BEAUTIFUL THINGS.

A Romance of the South. By WILL ALLEN
DROMGOOLE. With Coloured Illustrations. 6/-

READY IMMEDIATELY.

MRS. GASKELL: Haunts, Homes & Stories.

By Mrs. ELLIS H. CHADWICK. New and Cheaper Edition, revised with additions and some new illustrations.

Demy 8vo, about 40 illustrations, 5/- net.

Write for Spring List, post free, from

SIR ISAAC PITMAN & SONS, Ltd.,

1, Amen Corner, LONDON, E.C.

"THE BEST NEW NOVEL I have read in the Present Year."

CLEMENT K. SHORTER, in "The Sphere."

THE LURE OF CROONING WATER

By MARION HILL

Some early Opinions of this REMARKABLE NOVEL:

Times — "Georgette, an actress, scintillates in every page and is immensely alive."

World — "A book teeming with literary charm"

Chronicle — "We fully expect that the name of this novel during the months to come will be often in the mouths of the multitude"

Published by John Long, 8/- (5th Thousand).

JOHN LONG'S NEW NOVELS

6/- At all Libraries and Booksellers. 6/-

By ANNE WEAVER, Author of "The Compromising of Jane."

A MASQUERADE AND A MONASTERY

By ELLEN ADA SMITH, Author of "The Last Stronghold."

THE ONLY PRISON

By R. PENLEY, Author of "The Temptation of Nina,"

THE TURN OF THE TIDE.

By VIOLET TWEEDALE, Author of "Austin's Career," &c.

THE HOUSE OF THE OTHER WORLD

By J. S. FLETCHER, Author of "The Fine Air of Morning."

THE BARTENSTEIN CASE

The Times — "A very good story, ingenious, well-told, and exciting"

By G. YSTRIDDE-ORSHANSKI, Author of "An Exile's Daughter."

A TARTAR'S LOVE

Dundee Advertiser says — "Tolstoy himself could have written with no more convincing effect."

By F. DICKBERRY, Author of "The Storm of London."

STEPHEN ORMOND

Westminster Gazette — "An earnest, sincerely-written book."

By EDMUND BOSANQUET, Author of "A Society
Mother," &c.

CATCHING A CORONET

Yorkshire Post — "A wholesome story, much to be commended."

By STEPHEN FOREMAN, Author of "The Fen Dogs."

THE TERRIBLE CHOICE

Athenaeum — "There is art in the unusual style of Mr. Foreman. He keeps a seemingly unlimited stock of surprises up his sleeve, which he springs upon us with adroitness, and the climax is worked up to with vigour and subtlety."

By BEATRICE KELSTON, Author of "A Three-Cornered Duel."

SEEKERS EVERY ONE

Athenaeum — "This novel of to-day is an excellent piece of work."

The following 6/- Novels will be published during March. —

THE DECOY DUCK . . . . .	By a Peer
NATHALIA . . . . .	Fred Whishaw
A GIRL OF NO IMPORTANCE . . . . .	Olivia Ramsey
THE IMPENITENT PRAYER . . . . .	Amy J. Baker
UNQUENCHED FIRE . . . . .	Alice Gerstenberg
A SOUL IN SHADOW . . . . .	Elsie Carrier
THE MAN IN THE CAR . . . . .	Alan Raleigh
THE LITTLE MAISTER . . . . .	R. H. Forster
HOBSON'S CHOICE . . . . .	G. G. Chatterton

Messrs. JOHN LONG have just published the following important
New Works —

COMPOSERS, IN LOVE AND MARRIAGE

By J. CUTHBERT HADDEN. 12/6 net. (Illustrated)

KING RENÉ D'ANJOU AND HIS SEVEN QUEENS

By EDGCUMBE STALEY. 12/6 net. (Illustrated.)

LONDON: JOHN LONG LIMITED, 12, 13, 14, Norris St., HAYMARKET

Macmillan's New Books

Letters of Lord Acton to Mary, Daughter of the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone.

Edited with an Introductory Memoir by HERBERT PAUL. Illustrated. Second Edition with Additional Letters. 8vo. 10s. net.

The World.—"There are many shrewd judgments of men, as well as of affairs, in these attractive letters."

Clara Schumann. An Artist's Life.

Based on Material found in Diaries and Letters. By BERTHOLD LITZMANN. Translated and Abridged from the 4th Edition by Grace E. Hadow. With a Preface by Dr. W. H. Hadow. Illustrated. In 2 Vols. 8vo. 24s. net.

Of Six Mediæval Women, to which is added a Note on Mediæval Gardens.

By ALICE KEMP-WELCH. With Introduction and Illustrations. 8vo. 8s. 6d. net.

An Adventure. A New Edition, with Appendix and Maps. Extra Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net. Immediately

FIFTH THOUSAND AND NOW READY.

Foundations. A Statement of Christian Belief in Terms of Modern Thought by Seven Oxford Men—B. H. STREETER, R. BROOK, W. H. MOBERLY, R. G. PARSONS, A. E. J. RAWLINSON, N. S. TALBOT, W. TEMPLE. 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

MAURICE HEWLETT'S NEW BOOK.

Helen Redeemed, and other Poems.

By MAURICE HEWLETT. Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d. net.

A Necessity of Life, and other Stories.

By BETTY VAN DER GOES. With a Frontispiece. Extra Crown 8vo. 6s.

WORKS BY

HENRY JAMES

The Novels of HENRY JAMES. Edition de Luxe. 24 Vols. 8vo. 8s. 6d. net each.

- I. Roderick Hudson
- II. The American
- III. & IV. Portrait of a Lady
- V. & VI. Princess Casamassima
- VII. & VIII. The Tragic Muse
- IX. The Awkward Age
- X. The Spoils of Poynton; A London Life; The Chaperon
- XI. What Maisie Knew; In the Cage; The Pupil
- XII. The Aspern Papers; The Turn of the Screw; The Liar; The Two Faces
- XIII. The Reverberator; Madame de Mauves; A Passionate Pilgrim; and other Tales
- XIV. Lady Barbara; The Siege of London; An

- International Episode; and other Tales.
- XV. The Lesson of the Master; The Death of the Lion; The Next Time; and other Tales.
- XVI. The Author of Beltraffio; The Middle Years; Greville Fane; and other Tales.
- XVII. The Altar of the Dead; The Beast in the Jungle; The Birthplace; and other Tales.
- XVIII. Daisy Miller; Pandora; The Patagonia; and other Tales.
- XIX. & XX. The Wings of the Dove.
- XXI. & XXII. The Ambassadors.
- XXIII. & XXIV. The Golden Bowl

Novels and Tales. Pott 8vo. 2s. each vol.

The Portrait of a Lady. In three vols. The Siege of London. Madame de Mauves. In two vols.
The American. In two vols. The Madonna of the Future. A Washington Square. In one vol. Bundle of Letters. The Diary of a Man of Fifty. Eugene Pickering. Confidence.
The Europeans. In one vol. An International Episode. The Pension Beaurepas. The Point of View.

French Poets and Novelists. New edition. Globe 8vo. 4s. net.
Partial Portraits. Globe 8vo. 4s. net.
Daisy Miller; a Study. An International Episode. Four Meetings. Globe 8vo. Paper boards. 2s.
The Madonna of the Future, and other Tales. Globe 8vo. Paper boards. 2s.
The Princess Casamassima. a Novel. Globe 8vo. Paper boards. 2s.
Washington Square. The Pension Beaurepas. A Bundle of Letters. Globe 8vo. Paper boards. 2s.
Life of Nathaniel Hawthorne. Cr. 8vo. Library Edition. 2s. net. Popular Edition. 1s. 6d. Sewed. 1s. Fcap. 8vo. Pocket Edition. 1s. net. [English Men of Letters.]

MACMILLAN & CO., Ltd., LONDON.

Mr. HEINEMANN'S LIST

"THE ESSENTIAL BOOK OF THE WAR."—D. NEWS.

WITH the TURKS in THRACE

By E. Ashmead-Bartlett.

Royal 8vo. 10s. net.

DAILY TELEGRAPH: "A record of personal adventure that may challenge comparison with the most exciting of novels. It is doubtful if printed words could give one a clearer glimpse of the Turk in his weakness and in his strength than this vivid and moving book."

LOST IN THE ARCTIC

By CAPTAIN EJNAR MIKKELSEN. Illustrations, Map, &c. Crown 4to. 18s. net.

PAUL I. OF RUSSIA:

The Son of Catherine the Great. By K. WALISZEWSKI. Royal 8vo. 15s. net.

RECENT EVENTS & PRESENT POLICIES IN CHINA.

By J. O. P. BLAND. Royal 8vo. Illustrated. 16s. net.

THE POSITIVE EVOLUTION OF RELIGION.

By FREDERIC HARRISON, D.C.L. Demy 8vo. 8s. 6d. net.

IN THE SHADOW OF THE

BUSH. By P. AMAURY TALBOT. Illustrated. Demy 8vo. 18s. net.

THE CHILDHOOD OF

ANIMALS. By P. CHALMERS MITCHELL, F.R.S., Sec. of the Zoological Society. With Illustrations in Colour. Royal 8vo. 10s. net.

SIMPLICISSIMUS.

By HANS VON GRIMMELSHAUSEN. Special Edition, limited to 1,000 copies. Large crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

JESUS OF NAZARETH:

A Poetical Drama. By ALEXANDRA VON HERDER. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

THE LOEB CLASSICAL LIBRARY.

Five New Volumes are now ready. (1 & 2) Euripides. Vols. III. & IV. (3) Appian's Roman History, Vol. II. (4) Catullus, Tibullus, Pervigilium Veneris. (5) Lucian, Vol. I. Full particulars of the Loeb Library on application to Prospectus Dept. A.

E. F. BENSON'S

New Novel

"The Weaker Vessel." (6s.)

Fine New 6s. Novels

- MINNA - Karl Gjellerup
GUTTER BABIES (Illustrated by Lady Stanley.) Dorothea Slade
THE HIPPODROME - Rachel Hayward
FRONTIERS of the HEART Victor Margueritte
WHERE ARE YOU GOING TO? Elizabeth Robins
THE STORY OF S. COMPTON J. E. Patterson
A RUNAWAY RING - Mrs. Henry Dudeney
KING ERRANT - Flora A. Steel
MOLYNEUX OF MAYFAIR Duncan Schwann
ADNAM'S ORCHARD - Sarah Grand
BETWEEN TWO THIEVES - Richard Dehan
UNDER THE YOKE! (2nd Imp.) Ivan Vazoff

Completion of ROMAIN ROLLAND'S great 20th Century romance.

JOHN CHRISTOPHER.

VOL. I., DAWN AND MORNING; VOL. II., STORM AND STRESS; VOL. III., JOHN CHRISTOPHER IN PARIS; JUST OUT, VOL. IV., JOURNEY'S END.

WILLIAM HEINEMANN, 21, BEDFORD STREET, W.C.

The Bookman

"I am a Bookman."—James Russell Lowell.

No. 258. VOL. XLIII.
Subscription rate 11s. per annum post free.

MARCH, 1913.

PRICE SIXPENCE.
Published Monthly.

CONTENTS.

NEWS NOTES 289-293

THE BOOKMAN GALLERY—

Mrs. Stepney Rawson .. 294
Mrs. Henry Dudeney .. 295

THE BOOKSELLERS' DIARY 296

THE READER—

Henry James By DIXON
SCOTT .. .. 299
Dr. Macgregor. By C. W.
BOYD .. .. 306
Prize Competitions .. 309
Gray's Letters. By PRO-FESSOR SAINTSBURY .. 313

NEW BOOKS—

The Man of Conscience By
WALLER SICHEL .. 315
The Creed in Human Life. By JAMES MOFFATT, D.D.,
Litt D. .. .. 316
The War from Various Angles.
By PERCEVAL GIBBON .. 317

Philosophy at the Cross-Roads.

By M. P. WILLCOCKS .. 318
Wards of the State .. 319
Portraits and Speculations. By
RICHARD CURLE .. 320
Dickens and Reform. By
B. W. MATZ .. 320
Writ in Water. By A. E.
WAITE .. 321
Napoleon. By WALFORD D.
GREEN .. 322
William Cobbett. By F. E.
GREEN .. 324
Butler's Note-Books. By A.
ST. JOHN ADCOCK .. 326
The Chinese Republic. By
P. W. SERGEANT .. 327
The Apotheosis of Jujitsu. By
CLIVE HOLLAND .. 327
Loeb's Library. By T. W.
ALLEN .. 328
Some Recent Poets. By ED-WARD THOMAS .. 330

NOVEL NOTES—

The Debit Account—The Foundling—Swift Nick of
the North Road—Hilary's Career—Fortitude—The
Man who would not be King—Veiled Women—The Pearl Stringer—The Gate of To-morrow—John Scarlett .. 331-334

THE BOOKMAN'S TABLE—

The River Rhymers—Six Great Princesses—Cross Views—
The Lords of the Devil's
Paradise .. 334-338

NOTES ON NEW BOOKS 338

NOTICES.

All communications intended for the Editor must be addressed to the Editor of THE BOOKMAN, ST. PAUL'S HOUSE, WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

A preliminary letter of inquiry should be sent to the Editor before any manuscript is submitted for his consideration.

News Notes:

The April BOOKMAN will be a Spring Double Number, containing our usual Spring Supplement and a special article on G. F. Watts, by M. H. Spielmann, illustrated with portraits and with numerous reproductions of Watts's famous paintings. Among other important articles in this Number will be "Dante and the Mystics," by Dr. William Barry; "Swift's Correspondence," by Y. Y.; "Philippe-Egalite's Egena," by A. W. Evans; "The Influence of Baudelaire," by Holbrook Jackson; "The White, White North," by J. E. Patterson; "Of Dancers and Dancing," by George Sampson; "Patrick MacGill Poems," by J. H. Ingram; "Elton's English Literature," by Thomas Seccombe, etc.

£1,000 PRIZE NOVEL COMPETITION FOR COLONIAL AND INDIAN AUTHORS.

Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton announce another Thousand Pounds Prize Novel Competition. This time the Competition is reserved exclusively to Colonial and Indian or Anglo-Indian authors, the sum being divided as follows:

£250 will be awarded for the best novel sent in by a native or resident of the Dominion of Canada and Newfoundland; £250 for the best novel by a native or resident in the Commonwealth of Australia and New Zealand; £250 for the best novel by a native or resident of the Empire of India; and £250 for the best novel by a native or resident of British Africa and any other Colony or Dependency. The adjudicators will be: for Canada, Sir Gilbert Parker; for Australasia, Mr. Charles Garvice; for India, Mr. A. E. W. Mason; and for Africa, etc., Sir H. Rider Haggard. The rules of the Competition may be obtained post free on application to Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton, the latest date for delivery of MSS. being 31st March, 1914.

Two important volumes to be published almost immediately in Messrs. Dent's admirable "Channels of English Literature," series are "The English Novel," by Professor Saintsbury, and "English Lyric Poetry," by Mr. Ernest Rhys.

Mrs. Campbell Praed is one of the most popular of Australian authors. She is the eldest daughter of Thomas Lodge Murray Prior, who was for many years Postmaster-General of Queensland. In 1872 she married Mackworth Praed's nephew, Mr. Campbell Mackworth Praed, and, coming to England, commenced her literary career here in 1880, with "An Australian Heroine," the first of many books dealing wholly or in part with Australian life. She has now a long list of successful novels to her name, in addition to "The Right Honourable," and other works that she wrote in collaboration with the late Mr. Justin McCarthy. In 1902 she published an autobiography of her earlier days, under the title of "My Australian Girlhood." Some of Mrs. Praed's later books, such as "The Body of his Desire," deal with the occult, and in her new novel, "The Mystery Woman" (Cassell), she turns again to the wonders of the spirit world. She has long made her home at Kensington, but frequently spends the winter at Cannes, and we reproduce a snap-shot taken of her recently in the Californian woods there.

Mrs. Campbell Praed.

Photo by Hana Stud. os.

Miss Anne Warner.

We hear with much regret of the death of Miss Anne Warner, whose delightfully humorous books have an enormous public in America, and have, since Messrs. Gay & Hancock published "Susan Clegg and her Neighbours' Affairs," in 1906, made a very wide and increasing appeal to English readers. Perhaps the most popular of Miss Warner's novels with us has been "The Rejuvenation of Aunt Mary"; but she was never more spontaneously and shrewdly humorous than in her two brilliant travel books: "Seeing France with Uncle John," and "Seeing England with Uncle John."

Photo by J. Russell & Sons.

Mr. J. Ashby Sterry.

"The Foundling," which we review on another page, is Mr. Paul Trent's third novel. After the brilliant success of his second, "The Vow," Mr. Trent determined that its successor should not be hurriedly written, and his new book justifies the time and labour he has spent upon it. He confesses to an ambition to become an author ever since he won the prize for Latin and Greek verse at Cheltenham College, but circumstances compelled him to adopt the legal profession. Later, he passed several years in wandering about the world, and finally accepted an appointment on the West Coast of Africa. Whilst there his interest was aroused in the Congo question, and in due course, he made it

Photo by J. Russell &amp; Sons.

Mrs. Ellis H. Chadwick.

A new and revised edition of whose admirable biography, "Mrs. Gaskell: Homes, Haunts and Stories," is to be published this month by Sir Isaac Pitman & Sons.

the theme of his second novel, which has now run through many editions in England and America.

The Strand Magazine has secured the sole rights in this country of Captain Scott's personal description and photographs of his Expedition, and Commander Evans has recently cabled to them to the effect that Captain Scott left his diaries in complete form and that his photographic films have turned out excellent. Commander Evans will arrive in England with them at the end of April, and the full story of the discovery of the South Pole and the tragic ending of the journey will thereafter appear serially in the pages of the Strand.

Mrs. Ethel Talbot Scheffauer.
Author of "London Windows."

Mr. Heinemann is publishing shortly a translation by Mr. Herman Scheffauer of Rosa Mayreder's remarkable book, "The Woman Problem." Mr. Scheffauer has also completed a translation of

Photo by E. O. Hoppe.

Mr. Hugh Walpole.

Author of "Fortitude" (Martin Secker).

Miss Helen Wallace.

Heine's "Atta Troll," which is to be published in the autumn with colour illustrations by Mr. Willy Pogany. We are to have, too, this year a book of "Visions and Vanities," by Mrs. Scheffauer, a poet of fine achievement, who, as Ethel Talbot, is a well-known contributor to the magazines and best known as the author of "London Windows."

"Morning Glory," a new novel by Miss Helen Wallace, will be published this month by Messrs. Cassell. Miss Wallace is the daughter of the Rev. Alexander Wallace, D.D., who was a leading Glasgow clergyman and widely known throughout Scotland. Her first book, "To Pleasure Madame," was an historical romance, the outcome of a summer holiday in Guernsey. Miss Wallace is the author of ten other successful novels, all of which have been issued by the House of Cassell.

Shortly before he died, Major-General Sir Frederick Maurice had begun to prepare for publication a number of papers dealing with problems which had occupied his life. A selection of these is to be published by Mr. Edward Arnold, with a record of Sir Frederick's early life, the influence upon him of his father, Frederick Denison Maurice, his part in the small wars of the Victorian era, his work as a military historian and educationalist, and his efforts in the cause of national physical improvement. The book is edited by his son, Lt.-Col. F. Maurice, and is entitled "Sir Frederick Maurice: A Record of his Work and Opinions."

"Mr. Scott Craven has written a new play, "Little Tin Gods," which is in the hands of Mr. Malcom Watson, and will probably be produced this autumn, with Miss Evelyn D'Alroy in the principal part.

Mr. Eveleigh Nash is publishing in March, a continuation of Clare Jerrold's "Early Court of Queen Victoria," in the form of a description of "The Married Life of Queen Victoria," in which the characters both of the Queen and of Prince Albert are presented in the light of contemporary information rather than according to the conventional yet ideal descriptions usually accepted.

As we go to press news reaches us from America of the death of Joaquin Miller, and from Australia of the death of Louis Becke. Born in 1842, in whose "Charles Dickens: Social Reformer" (Chapman & Hall) is reviewed on page 302.

Mr. W. W. Crotch,

Mrs. Parry Truscott, whose "Hilary's Career" (Werner Laurie), is reviewed on page 112.

Indiana, Joaquin Miller grew up to a life of wandering and adventure. He fought in several Indian wars; was for a time a clerk in a lawyer's office; express messenger in Idaho gold-mining districts; then in 1897 he was caught up in the great gold rush and went to the Klondyke. He has since been settled in California establishing the ideal social community that he foreshadowed in "The Building of the City Beautiful" (1887). Since the appearance of his second book of poems in 1874, "Songs of the Sierras," he has been universally known as the Poet of the Sierras, and, at the end of the day, it is as a poet he will be remembered. Louis Becke led an even more adventurous and picturesque career; he roughed it among the traders of the Pacific islands for many years before, at the age of forty-five or so, he sat down to put his personal experiences into the brilliant series of South Sea stories which began so auspiciously with "By Reef and Palm," that was published by Mr. Fisher Unwin in 1894. It created no little sensation in its day, and good as some of his later volumes were—notably "Pacific Tales," and "His Native Wife"—it remains the best of his books.

There is an interesting article in the February issue of the Millgate Monthly, on "Carlyle's Bookplate and its Designer," by

Mr. Davidson Cook. The designer, Mr. Henry Thomas Wake, is still living, and now over eighty-two years of age. Mr. Cook came upon him in the village of Fritchley, in Derbyshire, where he keeps a second-hand book-shop—"a fine old Quaker,

Miss Rachel Swete Macnamara,

"The Friar of the Desert" has just been published by Mr. Herbert Jenkins lovable at sight, interesting withal, and himself the best book in his collection—a living book about books." The essay tells the story of how it happened that Mr. Wake designed the bookplate for Carlyle, and reproduces in facsimile two letters from the Sage on this subject and one from Mrs. Carlyle, with a facsimile of the first rough sketch of the plate, and a print of the finished article. The Carlyle letters are very characteristic, and Mr. Cook is to be congratulated both on his discovery and the delightful account he gives of it.

We are greatly indebted to Messrs. Macmillan and to Mr. Heinemann for much assistance with the illustrations to our article on Henry James; and particularly to Miss Anna Lee Merritt for permission to reproduce the admirable portrait she painted of Mr. James in 1886.

CARLYLE'S BOOKPLATE

THE ORIGINAL SKETCH BY
H. T. WAKE, AND DESCRIBED BY CARLYLE
IN HIS LETTER OF 24th NOV. 1853 AS

"THE FATHER OF THEM ALL"

AUTOGRAPH NOTE BY HENRY THOMAS WAKE

The above design is the one alluded to in Mr. Carlyle's Letter. D.D. 24/11/53.
Also the topic of Carlyle's
Letter dated 3rd Nov. 1853.

Sketch for Carlyle's Bookplate.

Reproduced by permission from The Millgate Monthly.

THE BOOKMAN GALLERY.

MRS. STEPNEY RAWSON.

IT is now twelve years since Mrs. Stepney Rawson leaped into sudden fame, during the memorable years of the opening of the Boer War as the author of "A Lady of the Regency," a book which ran into six editions. Since that time she has published successively fourteen volumes, and this in spite of heavy journalistic work till within the last few years. Yet it is no exaggeration to say that any one of these books would have sufficed to make a reputation. Few have brought to the task of analysing the pageant of life more thorough preparation than this novelist to whom so many sides of life appeal, and whose work Mr. Arnold Bennett, at the beginning of her career, characterised, in a review, as "sensitive, intense, courageous." A highly trained musician, with a rare gift for song, and an intimate knowledge of the musical world (revealed in rich measure in her recent novel "Splendid Zipporah"), Mrs. Rawson possesses a fine sense of history—to wit, her two vivid Elizabethan memoirs "Bess of Hardwick," and "Penelope Rich," and her Rye romances "The Apprentice," and "Tales of Rye Town,"—and an imaginative insight into nature which has been disciplined by art training and constantly reinforced, especially recently, by country life. Withal she has been drawn to the study of souls with the zeal of an ardent psychologist. It is these manifold sides of her character which have enabled her to break new ground in every fresh book, so that each of the fourteen stands as a separate facet reflecting colours from the lives of men and women in different climes and different ages. And each volume dips deep into the author's experience of life. It is no secret that her own early struggles in the realm of journalism are portrayed in her "Labourer's Comedy," which exhibits the married woman forced by circumstances into the position of a bread-winner, playing a man's part in a world as yet unaccustomed to take her claims to work and pay very seriously. A lighter romance "The Easy-go-Luckies," is a gentle satire on the gay, somewhat irresponsible life of those beautiful upper reaches of the Thames, which London society has long taken for its playground. Here was Mrs. Rawson's early home with her parents and a cluster of brothers and sisters, and here, after many years of hard work in London, she and her husband have settled. In that old English cottage bowered in roses, with broad vistas of the Berkshire downs stretching out beyond her "workshop," she now builds her radiant, clear-sighted romance. Those very Berkshire downs, with the broad humanity they enclose, form alike the subject of her previous novel "Happiness," and of her latest "The Three Anarchists."

Both indicate that the author is loth to depict a disloyal woman, or one so mean that some saving ray of pity does not at times illuminate her soul. For whether expressed through the medium of fiction or of history, Mrs. Rawson's message to her generation is inspired with belief in a form of nobility working its way out through all the coarser wrappings of human nature. It is the manifest intention of her books to strengthen and clarify the sense of the invisible and ideal by contact with reverses of every day life. Nothing is sacrificed to illusion. The ignoble and humiliating are set down as they occur, but the soul leaps forward to the sure home of its dreams.

In this well-known figure in English social life to-day, we have no recluse preaching detachment from a world despised; but an artist, joying in the beautiful in all its myriad manifestations, opening up new doors into a realm of delight through which the less fortunate may enter and find pasture.

Mrs. Stepney Rawson is the third daughter of the late Lieutenant-General Fife, R.E. Her husband is a son of the late Sir Rawson W. Rawson, C.B., K.C.M.G. (formerly Governor of the Bahamas, Windward Islands, etc.), is an Oxford football "blue," a distinguished man of science, and a skilled conductor of orchestra. She is at present at work upon a romance which will form a pendant to her "Enchanted Garden."

Mrs. Stepney Rawson.

MRS. HENRY DUDENEY.

A FEW years ago it was no uncommon thing to find the critics, condemning the pessimistic outlook of George Gissing and urging him to write more cheerfully. There is no use in that sort of criticism. An author of any native capacity does not write what he ought to, but what he can. Once or twice Gissing took the well-intentioned advice, and his less sombre stories are the poorest of his novels. If life is not always sad, neither is it always blissful, and there is no reason why fiction should look only on the sunny side of it. Art rightly takes the whole of life for its province, and whether he pictures the gracious or the grimmer aspects of it depends upon the experiences and the temperament of the artist. It has been said that the business of the novelist is to give pleasure, and that is true, but he may do so in more than one way. He may please you with the sheer charm of his story, the tenderness of his sentiment, the quaintness of his humour; but he may touch you to a yet finer enjoyment, despite the gloom of his narrative, by his stern truth to the life and character he is depicting and the subtle art with which he depicts them.

It is this latter pleasure, in the main, that one gains from the work of Mrs. Henry Dudenev. She is not so sombre as Gissing, and she leavens the gloom with more of humour, but her humour is largely satirical, and her satire is tinged with bitterness. Nevertheless, though her men and women are generally more or less unpleasant people and her tales unfold with the seamy side outward, she delights the judicious reader and holds his interest by the power of their realistic truthfulness and the knowledge and delicate skill with which her work is done.

And it is a little hard to explain why the darker phases of human character and experience should attract her so. "I hardly know why it is, but most of my novels have tragic endings," she admits, "perhaps it is because I am so happy myself. Perhaps it is because I try to paint life as I have seen it, and the ending of so many real stories seems to be naturally tragic. Ordinarily I take for the starting point of a novel some idea or some situation that has impressed me. For instance, I was led to write what I consider my best book, 'The Maternity of Harriott Wicken,' by the sight of an idiot child, a little girl, in the train. I have for long past kept a notebook and it is filled with sketches of people I have met with and observed, and if some of my characters are not ideal persons, I can only say that I draw them as faithfully as I can from life."

Mrs. Henry Dudenev.

Her best stories are of English country towns and villages. She has herself lived mostly in the country, either in Surrey, at Littlewick Meadow, Horsell, where "Folly Corner," "The Orchard Thief," "The Story of Susan," "The Maternity of Harriott Wicken," and some of her other books were written; or in Sussex, which is her favourite county, and almost the county of her birth, since she went to live there as a child. Sussex is the scene of the majority of her novels. In her latest, "The Runaway Ring," she describes the village of Angmering, in the middle of which is the place she has made her home—Pigeon House Farm, a seventeenth century flint-stone farmhouse standing between the South Downs and the sea. Local legend has it that the name of this house has nothing in common with pigeons, but is a corruption of the name of a Portuguese wool merchant, Pyjoun, who is known to have lived in Angmering in the thirteenth century. The massive stairway in the existing Pigeon House is supposed to have been taken from his house, which probably stood upon the site before the present one was built.

As a beginner, Mrs. Dudenev was first encouraged to write fiction by the late Sir Wemyss Reid, editor of the Rooms in Pigeon House Farm, Mrs. Dudenev's Home at Angmering, Sussex.

Speaker, and her early stories appeared in Messrs. Cassell's publications, Sir Wemyss Reid being also, at that time, Cassell's general manager. Her first book, "A Man with a Maid," after being rejected by divers publishers, was accepted by Mr. Heinemann for his Pioneer Series. Each time the book was returned to her, Mrs. Dudeney revised it, pulled it to pieces, and re-wrote it; so that before it was published it had been four times re-written. With a few exceptions, notably "Gossips' Green," and "The Shoulder Knot," which Messrs. Cassell issued, all Mrs. Dudeney's books have been published by the publisher of her first—Mr. Heinemann; which is something of a record. Most authors nowadays have nearly as many publishers as books to their names.

Since the appearance of "Folly Corner," in 1899, Mrs. Dudeney has been a frequent contributor of short stories to Harper's Magazine, and one is not surprised that she should say the short story appeals to her, as a form of expression, even more than the full-length novel, for the art of her books never lies in the invention of long intricate plots, but in the quick succession and naturalness of the incidents that make up the thread of her narrative and the cunning with which she uses them to bring out the weakness or strength, the vices, virtues, idiosyncrasies of her characters.

A conscientious, systematic worker, Mrs. Dudeney sits at her study table every morning from ten till one, never writing, but tapping her work straightway out on the typewriter, revising it afterwards, adding in marginal notes and interpolating improvements. Wherefore, as a rule, her typescript is not a thing of beauty. When a sheet is too much of a tangle of corrections and additions, to be easily legible she types it over again; but this seldom happens, for she invariably makes ample notes before she begins the book, and knows what she is going to say before she sits down to say it. Her plan is to have the end of her story clearly in view from the outset, to settle beforehand whether the principal characters are to die or be made happy, and in what way; and the movement of the tale is mapped out in her mind up to a certain distance; by the time that distance is covered, "I invariably find," she says, "that my characters have a trick of taking affairs into their own hands, and I have only to follow them and let them find their way for themselves to the end I had designed." We are less concerned with the method, however, than with its results, and its results have placed Mrs. Dudeney among the first of our living women novelists, and nothing but the drab, relentless realism of her themes and style prevent her from being also one of the most popular.

The Booksellers' Diary.

LIST OF FORTHCOMING BOOKS.

March 1st to April 1st, 1913.

Messrs. George Allen & Co., Ltd.

COV, REV. J. CHARLES—Cumberland and Westmorland (New Volume in "Conitue Churches" Series) 8s. 6d. net, pocket size.
KVLPE, PROFESSOR OSWALD—The Philosophy of the Present in Germany. Translated by M. L. and G. T. W. Patrick 3s. 6d. net.
MACDONALD, AMIC—St. George's Beowulf (New Volume in "Historical Plays" Series) 6d. net.
STERRFY, C. F.—In the Grip of Destiny 6s.
WEEKS, KENNETH—Five Unpractical Plays 3s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Appleton & Co.

BACON, J. C.—The Inheritance 6s.
BRUERE, H.—New City Government 6s. net.
CHAMBERS, R. W.—The Gay Rebellion 6s.
CHAPMAN, F. M.—Color Key to North American Birds 10s. 6d. net.
CLEVELAND, E. A.—Railroad Finance 10s. 6d. net.
EDDY, A. J.—The New Competition 7s. 6d. net.
ELWOOD, C. A.—Sociology in its Psychological Aspects 10s. 6d. net.
HYDE, G. M.—Newspaper Reporting and Correspondence 6s. net.
JONES, A.—Marcus Holbeach's Daughter 6s.
KLAPPER, F.—Principles of Educational Practice 7s. 6d. net.
LEMCKE, MRS. G.—Chafing Dish Recipes New Edition 2s. 6d. net.
LIGHTON, W. R.—Billy Fortune 6s.
LINCOLN, J. C.—The Rise of Roscoe Paine 6s.
McMASTER, J. B.—History of the United States Vol. 8 10s. 6d. net.
MEADE, E. S.—Corporation Finance 7s. 6d. net.
PHILLIPS, D. G.—George Hilda 6s.
PRATT, S. S.—Work of Wall Street 7s. 6d. net.
RIPLEY, ELIZA—Social Life in Old New Orleans 10s. 6d. net.
RITTENBERG, MAX—The Strange Cases of Dr. Wycherly 6s.
SLEMONS, J. M.—The Prospective Mother 6s. net.
SMITH, S. G.—Democracy and the Church 6s. net.
WEBSTER, H. K.—The Ghost Gulch 6s.
WHITMAN, R. B.—Gas Engine Principles 6s. net.
WILSON, J. H.—Under the Old Flag (2 vols.) 25s. net.
WOODROW, WILSON—The Black Pearl 6s.

Mr. Edward Arnold.

BROWNING, OSCAR—A General History of the World.
DAVIES, ELLEN C.—Utah Poultry Keeping 2s. 6d. net.
EVANS, C. S.—Nash and Some Others 6s.
GARROD, DR. A. E. (and Others)—Diseases of Children 30s. net.
LEWES, PROFESSOR V. and BRAMH, J. S. S.—Service Chemistry.
MACCUNN, JOHN, LL.D.—The Political Philosophy of Burke 4s. net.
MAURICE, LIEUT.-COL. J.—Sir Frederick Maurice: A Record of his Work and Opinions 10s. 6d. net.
SELBORNE, COUNTESS OF.—The Young Gardener 4d.

Messrs. J. W. Arrowsmith, Ltd.

MURDOVE, DR. C. D.—Breakdowns in Health. Pocket Edition with Picture Paper 2s. 6d. net, and Cheap Edition.
PHILLIPS, EDEN.—Johnny Fortnight 1s. net.

Messrs. Cassell & Co., Ltd.

HOCKING, JOSEPH.—The Jesuit 1s. net.
JEFFERY, H. J.—Rotary for All 4s. 6d. net.
JONES, BERNARD.—Cycle Repairing and Adjusting 1s. net.
JONES, BERNARD.—1000 Practical Receipts 1s. net.
KEIL, REV. J.—Everyday Life in the Holy Land 7s. 6d. net.

PRAED, MRS. CAMPBELL—The Mystery Woman 6s.
ROBERTS, REV. RICHARD—Jesus, Son of Man 1s. 6d. net.
ROGERS, F. HERON, A. M. M. and WATSON, GEORGE, W., M. I. M. F., M. I. A. F.—Motor Mechanics' Handbook 1s. net and 1s. 6d. net.
TERRISS, ELLALINE—Ellaline Terriss 1s. net.
THOMAS, H. H.—Garden Flowers as They Grow 5s. net.
WALLACE, HELEN—Morning Glory 6s.
WILLIAMSON, C. N. and A. M.—The Hidden House 1s. net.
WINTER, N. C.—Mexico and Her People of To-day 7s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Chapman & Hall.

AUTHOR OF "THE SURGEON'S LOG"—The Night Nurse 6s.
CLARK, REV. HENRY W.—The History of English Nonconformity Vol. II. 15s. net.
CRIBBLE, FRANCIS—The Tragedy of Isabella II 15s. net.
EYRE, A. MONTGOMERY—St. John's Wood 10s. 6d. net.
JERROLD, LAURENCE—The French and the English 7s. 6d. net.
MACMAHON, KILA—The Divine Folly 6s.
STAWELL, MRS. RUDOLPH (Edited by)—Memoirs of the Comte Roger de Damas 12s. 6d. net.
THURSTON, E. TEMPLE—The Open Window 6s.
THURSTON, FATHER M.—The Theology of the Roman Church 7s. 6d. net.

Messrs. T. & T. Clark.

ADAMS, REV. JOHN, B.D. (Editor)—The Man Among the Myths Further Volumes in the "Short Course" Series.
MARJORIBANKS, REV. THOMAS, B.D.—The Sevenfold I AM. Further Volumes in the "Short Course" Series.
STRAHAN, REV. JAMES (Author of "Hebrew Ideals")—The Book of Job Interpreted "Expository Times" Index Volume (I.-XX)
WHITELAW, REV. THOMAS, D.D.—Jehovah-Jesus

Messrs. J. Clarke & Co.

BYFORD, REV. T. C.—Peasants and Prophets: Baptist Promoters in Russia and South Eastern Europe New and Enlarged Edition 1s. 6d. net and 1s. net.
GIBBERD, VERNON—Life's Little Lessons: Addresses to Children 1s. 6d. net.
HOLBORN, REV. ALFRED, M.A.—Led by a Child. And other Sermons 2s. 6d. net.
HOWELLS, GEORGE, M.A., B.Litt.—The Soul of India: An Introduction to Hinduism 5s. net.
JONES, REV. J. PILESTON.—Until the Day Dawn 3s. 6d. net.
MARK, THISELTON, D.Lit., B.Sc.—For Childhood and Youth: Ideals of the Modern Sunday School 1s. 6d. net.
McEVOY, CUTHBERT, M.A.—The Great Embassy: Studies in the Growth of Christianity 21s. net.
M'INTYRE, REV. D. M.—Spirit and Power 2s. 6d. net.
WARSCHAUER, J., M.A., D.Phil.—The Way of Understanding: Studies in the Book of Proverbs.

Messrs. W. B. Clive & Sons.

BARRACLOUGH, A., M.A.—The Preliminary Arithmetic (for the Cambridge Preliminary Local Examination) 1s. 6d.
BARTLETT, F. C., M.A.—Logic Exercises 2s. 6d.
CHAYTON, H. J., M.A., and HARTOG, W. G., M.A.—Matriculation French Essays 1s. 6d.
GARDINER, L. J., M.A.—Intermediate French Reader 2s. 6d.
HARTOG, W. G., M.A.—Classified French Unseen 2s.
HARTOG, W. G., M.A.—Classified Passages for Translation into French 1s. 6d.
SHEPHERD, T. W., B.Sc.—The Qualitative Determination of Organic Compounds 6s. 6d.

Mr. A. C. Fifield.

- HAVERSTOCK, REV. A. H. (Foreword by Dr. Hermitage Day).—The Failure of the Church in the Village. 6d. net.
 HALL, DR. WINSLOW.—The Peacemaker. A Play. 1s. net.
 PICKERING, J. E.—The Call of the Mountains. Poems. 1s. net.
 ROSE, HENRY.—Henrik Ibsen: Poet, Mystic and Moralist. 2s. 6d. net.

Mr. Wm. Heinemann.

- AUTHOR OF "HE WHO PASSED."—The Life Mask. 6s.
 FILON, AUGUSTIN.—The Prince Imperial. 15s. net.
 GARDINER, E. A.—Introductory Science. 2s. 6d. net.
 LOW, IVY.—Glowing Pains.
 WRIOTHESLEY, WILLIAM.—The Ambassadors. 6s.

Messrs. Holden & Hardingham.

- CONWAY-GORDON, V. M.—The Chibacy of Maurice Kane. 6s.
 GRAVES, CLO ("RICHARD DEJIAN")—Maid in a Market Garden. Ninth and Cheaper Edition. Illustrated. 2s. net.
 HOLI IS, W. GERTRUDE.—Love's Victory. 6s.
 KENYON, EDITH C. ("The new Allen Raine")—The Winning of Gwenora. 6s.
 LETHBRIDGE, SYBIL CAMPBELL.—Love and My Lady. 6s.
 MANSFIELD, CHARLOTTE.—Gloria. A South African Girl. 6s.
 RHODES, KATHLYN.—The Straight Race. 6s.
 STACPOOLE, KENNY, LOUISA M.—Daffodil's Love Affairs. 6s.
 WOODROFFE, DANIEL.—The Beauty Shop. Cheap Edition. 1s. net.

Messrs. Hurst & Blackett, Ltd.

- BRADDON, M. E.—Dead Love Has Chains. 7d.
 D'HERMALLE, BARONNESS.—My Life in Jehanan. 12s. 6d. net.
 FJELDING-HALL, H.—The World Soul. 10s. 6d. net.
 HALT, CLIFFORD.—Introduction by WFLD-BLUNDELL, C. J.—To Menelik in a Motor Car. 12s. 6d. net.
 HICKEY, WILLIAM.—Memoirs of William Hickey. 12s. 6d. net.
 JEBLANC, MAURICK.—The Crystal Stopper. 6s.
 JEBLANC, WILLIAM.—The Price of Power. 6s.
 MCCARTHY, J. HUNTLY.—Calling the Tune. 6s.
 MCCARTHY, J. HUNTLY.—The Gorgeous Borgia. 7d.
 RUSSELL, DORA.—The Secret of the River. 6d.
 SAVI, E. W.—The Daughter-in-Law. 6s.
 SLADEN, DOUGLAS.—The Tragedy of the Pyramids. 6d.
 STOCKLEY, CYNTHIA.—The Claw. 1s. net.
 WHITBY, BEATRICE.—Mary Kenwick's Daughter. 7d.

Messrs. Hutchinson & Co.

- AUTHOR OF "ST. FILMS"—The Speckled Bird. 7d.
 BAILEY, H. C.—Colonel Stow. 7d.
 BARNES GRUNDY, MRS.—Patricia Plays a Part. 6s.
 BRADDON, M. E.—The Green Curtain. 6d.
 BURGIN, G. H.—Peggy the Pilgrim. 6d.
 BURGIN, G. H.—Fannula. 6d.
 CLARKE, ISABELLE.—By the Blue River. 6s.
 CONYERS DOROTHY.—The Arrival of Anthony. 1s. net.
 CROOKER, H. M.—In Old Madras. A Hidden Tragedy. 6s.
 DIVER, MAUD.—Lilamant. 1s. net.
 ELKAN, SOPHIE.—An Faded King. 2 vols. 24s. net.
 HAGGARD, H. RIDER.—The Way of the Spirit. 6d.
 HAMILTON, CROMO.—An Accidental Daughter. 6d.
 HICHENS, ROBERT.—A Spirit in Prison. 6d.
 HUDSON, W. H.—Adventures Among the Birds. 10s. 6d. net.
 HUDSON, EDGAR.—The Determined Twins. 6s.
 MALET, LUCAS.—Adrian Savage. 1s. net.
 MAXWELL, W. B.—Mrs. Thompson. 1s. net.
 MOORE, E. FRANKFORT.—Fanny's First Novel. 6s.
 PATTERSON, ANNIE W.—How to Listen to an Orchestra. 5s. net.
 PRYCE, RICHARD.—Christopher. 7d.
 RIVERS, HALLIE BRIMBLE.—Satan Sander. 6d.
 SERGEANT, PHILIP W.—Little Jennings and Fighting Dick Talbot. 2 vols. 24s. net.
 STACPOOLE, H. DE VERE.—The Order of Release. 1s. net.
 SWAN, ANNIE S.—Mrs. Keith Hamilton. 6d.
 TAYLOR, J. A.—The Tragedy of an Army. La Vendee in 1793. 16s. net.
 WHITE, PERCY.—Love and the Poor Sinner. 7d.

Messrs. T. C. & E. C. Jack.

- HERVEY, ARTHUR.—Meynert. "Masterpieces of Music" Series. 1s. 6d. net, per vol.
 INNES, A. D.—A History of the British Nation. Edition de Luxe. 7s. 6d. net.
 JACK, FLORENCE B.—The Art of Laundry Work. New Edition. 2s. net.
 MACKENZIE, SIR A. C.—Verdi. "Masterpieces of Music" Series. 1s. 6d. net, per vol.
 STRAUSS, RITA.—The Parents Book. 3s. 6d. net.

Mr. Herbert Jenkins.

- CONGREVE, MISTRESS, A. E.—The One Maid Book of Cookery. 2s. 6d. net.
 ROBERTSON, I. M. M. P.—The Babylonian Heresy: A Confutation. 2s. net.
 TURQUAN, JOSEPH.—A Great Coquette, Mme. Récamier and Her Salon. 12s. 6d. net.
 WATSON, WILLIAM.—The Nurse in Exile. Poems with an Address on "The Poet's Place in the Scheme of Life." 3s. 6d. net.
 WATSON, WILLIAM.—National Revival: A Restatement of Tory Principles With an Introduction by Lord Wiltoughby de Broke. 2s. 6d. net.

Mr. John Lane.

- BRENTWOOD, EVELYN (Author of "Hector Gracine")—Henry Kempton. A Novel. 6s.
 COLERIDGE, HON. STEPHEN.—Memoirs. 7s. 6d. net.
 CUNNING, E. D.—The Bodley Head Natural History. Vol. 1. With Illustrations by J. A. Shepherd. 3s. net, leather, 2s. net (cloth).
 GRAHAM, STEPHEN.—Changing Russia. 7s. 6d. net.
 LEITH, W. COMPTON.—Author of "Apologia Pro Fide."—Sirenen. 3s. 6d. net.
 TURRELL, CHARLES (Painted by).—Miniatures. 98 Reproductions in Color and Photogravure. Limited to 100 copies. £15 15s.
 VIERBIG, CLARA.—The Son of his Mother: Novel. Authorized Translation by H. Ranshauge. 6s.
 WINGFIELD-STRAFORD, ESMÉ (Fellow of King's College, Cambridge).—The History of English Patriotism. 2 vols. 1,100 pages. 25s. net.

Mr. T. Werner Laurie.

- BEACH, BELLE.—Riding and Driving for Women. 16s. net.
 BRAY, JOHN.—All About Dress. 6s.
 HYATT, STANLEY PORTAL.—Fallen Among Thieves. 1s.
 LOTI, PIERRE.—India. 7s. 6d. net.
 RAY, EDWARD.—Inland Golf. 5s. net.
 ROBINS, GERTRUDE.—Masks and Realities. 1s. net.

John Long, Ltd.

- BAKER, AMY J.—The Impenitent Prayer. 6s.
 BOOTHBY, GUY.—The Lady of the Island. 7d. net. (cloth).
 BY A JOURNALIST.—Bohemian Days in Fleet Street. 10s. 6d. net.
 BY A PEER.—The Decoy Duck. 6s.
 FORD, PENELOPE.—A Page in a Man's History. 6s.
 GOULD, NAT.—The Head Lad. Paper, 1s. net, cloth, 2s.
 GOULD, NAT.—The Roarer. Paper, 6d.

- MITFORD, BERTRAM.—The White Hand and the Black. 7d. net. (cloth).
 SMITH, ELLEN ADA.—The Only Prison. 6s.
 WEAVER, ANNE.—A Masquerade and a Monastery. 6s.
 WHISHAW, FRED.—Nathanael. 6s.

Messrs. Longmans, Green & Co.

- BARNES, R. GORELL.—Out of the Blue. A Novel.
 HARRY, REV. CHARLES ALFRED.—The First Principles of the Church. Essays and Notes.
 BIFSON, VERY REV. MONSIGNOR ROBERT HUGH.—Confessions of a Convert. 3s. 6d. net.
 BREWSTER, BERTRAM.—The Philosophy of Faith. An Enquiry.
 BONE, WOLFRINA A.—The Service of the Hand in the School. With 2 Coloured Plates and other Illustrations by D. B. Winter and M. Steen. 3s. net.
 BOORD, H. E.—A Soldier of the Cross. A Book for Recruits and others in the Service of the King of Kings.
 FINDLAY, ALEXANDER, M.A., Ph.D., D.Sc.—Osmotic Pressure.
 GOOCH, G. P.—History and Statistics in the Nineteenth Century.
 HPALE, T. M., K.C., M.P.—Sto. Writers. A page from the Conquest of Ulster. 10s. 6d. net.
 LOCKINGTON, WILLIAM J., S.I.—Bodily Health and Spiritual Vigour. A Book for Preachers and Teachers. With Illustrations. 2s. 6d. net.
 MANN, J. E. P., STEVENS, N. J. and CON, R. W. L.—The Real Democracy (First Essays of the Rota Club).
 MARKHAM, I. H., A.R.B.A., SATCHILL, HILBERIA, A. R. B. A., SIMPSON, PROFESSOR F. M., F.R.B.A., and others.—Building Construction. Vol. II. With Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net.
 MILLAIS, J. G., F.R.S.—British Diving Ducks. 2 vols. £12 12s. net.
 NEWMAN, JOHN HENRY CARDINAL.—Sermon Notes.
 WEBB, SIDNEY and BEATRICE.—The Story of the King's Highway. 7s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Lynwood & Co.

- ANDREWS, M. HENRIKER.—An Indian Mystery. 6s.
 BARLOW, HILARY.—The Mystery of Jeanne Marie. 6s.
 HUNGER, E. NEWTON.—The Fordington Twins. 6s.
 HIALES, ADA M. M.—Leslie. 6s.
 HOLLAND, CLIVE.—A Madonna of the Poor and Other Stories. 6s.
 HOLLAND, CLIVE.—My Japanese Wife. Maricle of the Latin Quarter. The Spell of Las. New Editions. Revised and Rewritten. Each 1s. net.
 KENNEDY, MISS H. E., and MICHELL, MISS CLARA.—The Elizabethan Voyagers and Other Poems. 1s. 6d. net.
 "SNOWDROP."—The Truth of the Matter. 1s. 6d.

The Manchester University Press.

- BOSANQUET, BERNARD, M.A., D.C.L.—The Distinction Between Mind and Its Objects. Adamson Lecture for 1913.
 CLASSEN, ERNEST, M.A.—Vowel Alteration in the Old Germanic Languages.
 COLLIGAN, REV. J. HAY, M.A.—The Arian Movement in England.
 DEHN, R. M. R. B. A.—The Cotton Industry in Germany.
 DUNLOP, ROBERT, M.A. (Edited by, with Historical Introduction and Notes).—Ireland Under the Commonwealth. Being a Selection of Documents Relating to the Government of Ireland from 1651 to 1690.
 FINDLAY, J. J. M.A., Ph.D. (Edited by).—Demonstration Schools Record. No. 2. The Pursuits of the Fielden School.
 GILL, CONRAD, M.A.—The Naval Mutinies of 1797.
 JACKFORTH, R. M.A.—The Authorship of the Platonic Epistles.
 KASTNER, I. E., M.A. (Edited by).—The Poems of William Drummond of Hawthornden.
 POWIKKE, F. M., M.A.—The Loss of Normandy (1189 to 1204). Studies in the History of the Angevin Empire.

Mr. Elkin Mathews.

- BARILEET, M.—The Raised Road. And other Poems. 1s. net.
 FISHER, A. HUGH.—Poems. Cloth, 1s. 6d. net, wrapper, 1s. net.
 GERARD, WILLIAM.—Piers Gaveston. A Prince's Favourite. A Drama. 3s. 6d. net.
 WEDMORE, FREDERICK.—Pages Assembled. Selections from the Writings Imaginative and Critical of. Cloth, 1s. 6d. net, wrapper, 1s. net.

Mr. Andrew Melrose.

- ANON.—Daphne in the Fatherland. 1s. net.
 HARNETT, ST. CLAIR.—The Chain of Or. 6s.
 KNOWLES, R. L.—The Attie Guest. 1s. net.
 MEICALE, CRANSTOWN.—Peacocks of the Stage. 10s. 6d. net.
 ROBERTS, W. J.—Mary Russell Mitford. Life and Friendships. 10s. 6d. net.
 SMITH, DAMPIL, E. M.—Ineffective Fires. 6s.
 WASHBURN, STANLEY.—Nogi. 3s. 6d. net.
 WASHBURN, STANLEY.—The Call of the Cable. 4s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Methuen & Co.

- BARING GOULD, S.—The Brown Squire. 7d. net.
 BROWNE, DOUGLAS G.—Christ and his Age. 3s. 6d. net.
 CROKER, B. M.—Angel. 7d. net.
 FRASER, ED.—The Soldiers whom Wellington Led. 5s. net.
 GIBBON, ED.—The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. Vol. VII. 10s. 6d. net.
 HALL, H. R.—Ancient History of the Near East. 15s. net.
 HART, BURNHAM.—The Golling Swing. 1s. net.
 HARPER, C. G.—The Auto-rail Road Book. Vol. IV. 7s. 6d. net.
 HYNE, C. J.—Prince Rupert the Buccaneer. 7d. net.
 MARSH, RICHARD.—If it Please You! 6s.
 METHLEY, A.—Change of Climate. 6s.
 PEMBERTON, MAX.—I Crown thee King. 7d. net.
 RAPPAPORT, DR. A. S.—Home Life in Russia. 10s. 6d. net.
 SOMMERVILLE, E. G., and ROSS, M.—Dan Russell the Fox. 1s. net.
 VICKERS, K. H.—England in the Later Middle Ages. 10s. 6d. net.
 WILDE, OSCAR.—Intentions. 1s. net.

Messrs. Mills & Boon.

- BUCKROSE, J. F.—Because of Jane. 6s.
 DUNN, ARCHIBALD.—Royal Spade. 2s. 6d. net.
 LONDON, JACK.—A Son of the Sun. 6s.
 LONDON, JACK.—When God Laughs. Cheap Edition. 1s. net.
 NETHERSOLE, S. C.—W. Sam. 6s.

Mr. John Murray.

- BROWN, P. HUME, LL.D., F.B.A. (Historiographer Royal for Scotland).—The Youth of Goethe.
 CLIFFORD, SIR HUGH, LL.M.G.—Malayan Monochrome. 6s.
 ELWIN, THE REV. F. F.—India and the Indians. With Illustrations.
 HARTOG, MARCUS, M.A., D.Sc.—Problems of Life and Reproduction. "Progressive Science" Series.
 JONES, ABEL, J. M.A., Ph.D., B.Sc.—Character in the Making.
 LOVE, COLONEL H. D.—Vestiges of Old Madras, 1640-1800. In 3 vols. and an Index. 36s. net.
 MCGORMICK, FREDERICK.—The Flowery Republic. With Illustrations.
 ROSS, F. H., M.R.C.S., LL.D.—Reduction of Domestic Flies. With Illustrations.
 WALLACE, HAROLD FRANK, F.R.G.S.—The Bug Game of Central and Western China. Being an Account of a Journey from Shanghai to London overland across the Gobi Desert. Illustrated.
 WILSON, CAPT. H. A.—A British Borderland. Experiences of Sport, Service and Settlement in British Equatoria. With Illustrations.

The Fountain at Nîmes.

From "A Little Tour in France," by Henry James (Helmemann).

Mr. Eveleigh Nash.

- ASKEW, ALICE and CLAUDE—Poison 3s. 6d. net.
 DE LA VILLENEUVE, F.—A Harem Romance 6s.
 FLEISCHMANN, HECTOR—The Emperor's Spy. A Napoleonic Novel 6s.
 HARTLEY, C. GASQUOINE (MRS. WALTER GALLICHAH)—The Truth About Woman 7s. 6d. net.
 HODGSON, WILLIAM HOPE—Carnacki the Ghost Finder 6s.
 JERROLD, CLARE—The Married Life of Queen Victoria. Illustrated 15s. net.
 MATURIN, MRS. FRED (MRS. CECIL PORCH)—Adventures Beyond the Zambesi of The O'Hareity, The Insular Miss, The Soldier Man and the Rebel Woman Illustrated 10s. 6d. net.
 ROBERTS, MORLEY—Gloomy Fanny, And Other Stories 6s.

Messrs. T. Nelson & Sons.

- BARING, HON. MAURICE—What I Saw in Russia 1s. net.
 BIRVINGHAM, GEORGE—The Simpkins Plot 7d. net.
 DUMAS, A.—Marguerite de Valois 6d. net.
 MOLIERE—Complete Works in 6 vols. 1s. each net.
 ROHFRTS, MORLEY—Salt of the Sea 7d. net.
 WATSON, DR. CHALMERS—The Books of Diet 2s. net.

Messrs. J. Nisbet & Co., Ltd.

- WRIGHT, H. C. SEPPINGS—Two Years Under the Crescent. A War Correspondent's Experiences with the Turks in Tripoli and Thraee. With Sketches Photographs and Coloured Drawings 10s. 6d. net.

Messrs. John Ouseley, Ltd.

- "BACHELOR"—Poems. Moods of the Moment 2s. 6d. net.
 BIRD, K. H., M.A.—Practical Physics for Beginners 1s. 6d. net.
 "CABOT"—Musings of a City Clerk 3s. 6d. net.
 CRAIG, ROBERT, M.A., D.D.—A History of Oratory in Parliament 10s. 6d. net.
 HASLETT, JOHN—The Shadow of Salvador 6s.
 JEANS, ALICE—Mingled Seed 6s.
 MONCKTON, G. F.—Long-card Dick 6s.
 POPHAM, R. BROOKS—Finger Prints to Animal Life 2s. 6d. net.
 PLUMMER, ALFRED, M.A., D.D.—The Humanity of Christ 3s. 6d. net.
 ROY, D. KINMOUNT—Landed Lives 6s.
 TIGHE, HARRY—A Watcher of Life 6s.
 "THORMANBY"—The Black Bean. A Mystery of the Turf 6s.

Mr. Frank Palmer.

- ADAMS, SAMUEL HOPKINS—Average Jones' Detective Story 6s.
 BOLAM, GEORGE—Wild Life in Wales 10s. 4d. net.
 CARTER, HUNTLY—The Theatre of Max Rembrandt 7s. 6d. net.
 FOWELL, FRANK, and PALMER, FRANK—Conorship in England Its History from the Fifteenth Century 7s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Stanley Paul & Co.

- ADAIR, CECIL—Gabriel's Garden 6s.
 "A.T.K."—The Economical Cookery Book 1s. net.
 HAGGARD, LIEUT.-COL. A. C. P.—Loth XI. Illustrated. 16s. net.
 KENEALY, ARABELLA—The Irresistible Mrs. Ferrers 2s. net.
 KENEALY, ARABELLA—The Woman Hunter 2s. net.
 LOUIS D'ROBERT—I'll be Last Gift 6s.
 MANSFIELD, ERNEST—Ralph Raymond. Illustrated. 6s.
 PEARCE, CHARLES E.—Polly Peachum. Illustrated. 16s. net.
 QUAY, WILLIAM LE.—Lying Lips 1s. net.
 RAWSON, MAUD STEPNEY—The Three Anachists 2s. net.
 SLADE, DOUGLAS—The Curse of the Nile 6s.
 STANTON, CORALIE, and HOSKEN, H.—Called to Judgment 6s.
 SUTCLIFFE HALLIWELL—The Strength of the Hills 6s.

Messrs. Kegan Paul, Trench & Co.

- BELL, H. T. MONTAGUE, B.A., and WOODHEAD, H. G. W.—China Year Book 10s. net.
 DURRAN, WM.—The Lawyer:—Our Old Man of the Sea. With Foreword by Sir Robert F. Fulton, M.A., LL.D. 7s. 6d. net.
 HAMILTON, C.—Technical School Organization and Teaching 2s. 6d. net.
 HAIG, ELIZABETH.—Floral Symbolism of the Great Masters 20 Plates. 6s. net.
 IVOR-PARRY, EDITH—In the Garden of Childhood. An Anthology in Prose and Verse. With Foreword by Katherine Tynan. 2s. 6d. and 3s. 6d. net.
 RUSSELL, H. PATRICK.—From Hussar to Priest. A Biography of Charles Rose Chase. 5 Portraits. With Preface by Rt. Rev. Mgr. Croke Robinson, M.A. 3s. net.

Sir Isaac Pitman & Son.

- BROWN, F. H., A.R.C.A.—Simple Pictorial Illustration. Over 20 full-page Coloured Plates and about 60 Black and White Illustrations. 4s. net.
 CHADWICK, MRS. ELLIS H.—Mrs. Gaskell: Haunts, Homes, and Stories. New and Cheaper Edition, Entirely Re-set and Revised. Illustrated. 5s. net.
 COLES, ARTHUR, A.C.I.S.—Company Accounts 3s. net.
 DAY, E. HERMITAGE.—The Ministry of the Church 2s. 6d. net.
 FRASEY, J. EATON.—Lessons in Composition (Book 1) 4d. paper, 5d. cloth.
 GLEN, RANDOLPH A.—Local Government Case Law. Vol. 3. 10s. net.
 GROVES, MRS.—A Little History of the Love of the Holy Eucharist 3s. 6d. net.
 HEAD, F. D.—Outlines of Company Law 1s. 6d. net.
 ORFORD, EDWIN J.—The Motherland 1s. 4d.
 "FINGLE"—Astonishing Anatomy Illustrated. 1s. net.

Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons.

- BASCOM, JOHN—Sermons and Addresses.
 BASCOM, JOHN—Things Learned by Living.
 BURNETT, FRANCES HODGSON—My Robin 1s. net.
 CAMPBELL, HELEN—Household Economics. 2nd Edition. 6s. net.
 CONE, ADOLPH.—Montaigne's Essays 3s. net.
 HOURWICH, L. A.—Immigration and Labour.
 JORDAN, HUMPHREY—A Patchwork Comedy 6s.
 LICHFIELD, GRACE DENIO—The Burning Question 6s.
 PAGE, CURTIS HIDDEN (Translated into English Verse by)—Moliere's Misanthropes 3s. net.
 RABELAIS—Gargantua and Pantagruel 5s. net.
 SCHWARZ, HERBERT F. (Editor)—Alphonsus, Emperor of Germany.
 THASDALE, SARAH—Helen of Troy and Other Poems. 2nd Edition. 5s. net.

Messrs. Alston Rivers, Ltd.

- LEGGE, MARGARET.—The Price of Stephen Bonyngre 6s.
 MOORE, LESLIE—Aunt Olive in Bohemia 6s.
 SMITH, MRS. ISABEL.—Nevertheless 6s.

Messrs. G. Routledge & Sons.

- BRADFORD, REV. E. E., D.D. (Exeter College, Oxon).—Passing the Love of Women and Other Poems.
 BULKELEY, HENRY J., and BULKELEY, JOHN PIERSON—Poems and Verse By Father and Son 2s. 6d. net.
 HALFORD, F. M.—Dry-Fly Man's Handbook 21s. net. Edition de Luxe, 63s. net.

Mr. Robert Scott.

- CALDECOTT, REV. W. SHAW—Synthetic Studies in Scripture 2s. 6d. and 3s. net.
 FLEMING, REV. W. K.—Mysticism in Christianity 5s. net.
 HANCOCK, REV. B. M.—Free Boundmen. Studies in the Spiritual Life 2s. net.
 OTTLEY, REV. CANON R. L.—The Rule of Life and Love 4s. net.
 SHETTLÉ, REV. G. T.—Them Which Sleep in Jesus 1s. 6d. net.
 VENN PILCHER, REV. C.—The Passion Hymns of Ireland 2s. net.
 WILSON, REV. F. R.—The Supreme Service Addresses to Men 1s. 6d. net.

The Walter Scott Publishing Co., Ltd.

- BITHELL, JETHRO—Life and Writings of Maurice Maeterlinck 1s. net.
 BOWLES, FRED G.—A Little Rosary of Song 1s. net.
 COOPER, REV. A. N. ("The Walking Parson")—Tales of My Tramps 1s. net.
 CROSS, VICTORIA—Six Chapters of a Man's Life. Cheap Edition 1s. net.
 MIDDLETON, A. SAFRONI—Bush and Sea Rhymes. New Edition. 2s. 6d. net.
 NEWMAN, JOHN HENRY CARDINAL—Apologia Pro Vita Sua. 2 vols. 1s. net each.
 WATSON, KATHLEEN—Litanies of Life 2s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Sidgwick & Jackson.

- CANNAN, GILBERT—Four Plays 2s. 6d. net.
 FERNALD, C. B.—The Married Woman. 1 play. 3s. 6d. net.
 Lyrics From Elizabethan Dramatists. Reprints. 1s. net each.
 Lyrics From Elizabethan Song Books. Reprints. 1s. net each.
 MAYOR, F. M.—The Third Miss Symonds. With an Introduction by John Massfield. 6d. net.
 REXO, MARTIN ANDERSON.—Pelle, the Conquerer. Translated from the Danish Novel. 6s.
 PLOWMAN, MAY.—First Poems 2s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Skeffington & Son.

- KNOWLES, ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL.—Adventures in the Alps. Illustrated. 3s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co.

- WARD, MRS. HUMPHREY.—The Mating of Lydia 6s.

Mr. T. Fisher Unwin.

- GOLDRING, DOUGLAS—Dream Cities 4s. 6d. net.
 GLIZES, ALBERT, and METZINGER, JEAN—Cubism 5s. net.
 HANNAH, IAN C.—The Berwick and Lothian Coasts 6s. net.
 HORSLEY, REV. CANON.—How Criminals are Made and Prevented: a Retrospect of Forty Years 7s. 6d. net.
 LE, BON, GUSTAVE.—The Psychology of Revolution 10s. 6d. net.
 LYNE, R. N.—Mozambique: Its Agricultural Development 12s. 6d. net.
 SCULLY, W. C.—Reminiscences of a South African Pioneer 10s. 6d. net.
 WEDDERBURN, SIR WILLIAM (Bart.).—Allan Octavian Hume, C.B. 3s. net.

Messrs. Ward, Lock & Co., Ltd.

- APPLIN, ARTHUR.—Love Conquers All Things 6s.
 ASKEW, A. & C.—The Golden Girl 6s.
 BINDLOSS, HAROLD.—Hawtreys's Deputy 1s. net.
 FORMAN, JUSTUS M.—Soul of Gold 7d. net.
 HOCKING, JOSEPH C.—God and Mammon 6d.
 LEIGHTON, MARIE C.—Deep Waters 6d.
 LE QUESUX, WILLIAM.—Sign of the Stranger 2s. net.
 PUNSHON, E. R.—Hidden Lives 6s.
 TRACY, LOUIS.—Wheel o' Fortune 7d. net.

THE READER.

HENRY JAMES.

BY DIXON SCOTT.

FIRST of all, I must take down that title. It makes a banner altogether too bold. A book might maintain it—a fat, four-square book; but a bit of an article built in a corner out of a wretched dole of three-thousand-odd words must never attempt to uphold it, must never pretend it can say anything adequate about the work of the man who is certainly the greatest of all living artists (yes, painters and poets swept in)—at once the most profuse and precise, the most affluent and exquisite—the completed mass* of whose creative work hangs before us now like the cloud of a cathedral—actually equipped, too, in the shape of the new prolonged passages of exterior comment and self-criticism, with its cathedral-like approaches, ambulatories, cloisters, where the arriving reader may positively pace to and fro with the writer—the late visitor with the old master-mason—raising his eyes reverently to the finished achievement of which the latter lingeringly, wonderfully, talks. Why, to make a mere ground-plan of these outer courts alone a hem as elaborate as lace—would take far more than one's three-thousand dull dots. All they can offer, poor things, is to patter down some single aisle—praying, as they meekly trot, that it may lead towards the centre, perhaps even (as the critics in "The Figure in the Carpet" hoped) to the very axis of the whole. For "there's a particular thing in my work that I've written my books most for. It's the thing that nobody has ever perceived or mentioned, and yet it's the very heart of the whole." So declared (in that fable of "The Figure") the much misunderstood master, Vereker the novelist, "awfully clever, awfully deep," whose own twenty books smiled enigmatically down on the agitated brows of their adorers.

"It hangs there as concrete as a bird in a cage, as a bait on a hook, as a piece of cheese in a mouse-trap. It's the idea without which I wouldn't have given a straw for the whole job. It's the finest, fullest intention of the lot, and the application of it has been a triumph of patience, of ingenuity. I ought to leave that to somebody else to say; but that nobody else does say it is precisely what we're talking about. It stretches from book to book, and everything else plays comparatively over the surface of it. The order, the form, the texture of my books will perhaps some day constitute for the initiated a complete representation of it."

* The reference here is to the "First Collected Edition of the Novels and Tales of Henry James"—Vols. I.-XXIV., 8s. 6d. net each (Macmillan & Co., Ltd.)—and to the new, long, ruminative Prefaces with which these volumes are enriched.

And "so," he adds, "it's naturally the thing for the critic to look for. It strikes me even as the thing for the critic to find." The hapless critic addressed (baffled being), though he peers and probes patiently enough, never does find it: that is the tragedy and the tale. But we, coming later, may be luckier. For there is now no manner of doubt whose those volumes really were. In the cloister Mr. James has confessed it. "It ever I was aware of ground and matter for a significant fable," he says drily (in his Preface to Vol. XV.), "I was aware of it" here." The words send a thrill through the approaching three-thousand. They have only to discover "the bird in the cage, the bait on the hook"—and their little job is done. Sesame is only three syllables. They might surely manage to write that between them. The hobbling old verger who couldn't conceivably sketch you the smallest scrap of his Cathedral can still manage to carry its key.

And verily—loitering for a last time between aisle and ambulatory, straying anew through these charged, beloved books—something (it seemed to me) did suddenly sing out, and go ringing and winging from entrance to altar, up to clerestory from choir, leaving in its wake a string of lasting echoes, like a bird kindling tiny points of flame. It sounds absurd—but that was the sensation. There in an instant the essential design flashed up simplified—a lucid pattern piercing all the traceries—as plain as the plan of a house. And it kindled the place doubly: it gave it the queereast air of home. For this common chord and impulse, running through everything, was nothing less than a happy humility:—it was of Mr. James's simplicity—of his innocence, eagerness, honesty—of his monkish love (above all) for things lowly and neglected, that the bright responses spoke as they sprang. It might not be his "finest, fullest intention"—but it was full enough, and immensely it was fine;—and it did "govern every line" as Vereker vowed it would—it had "chosen every comma, every word." The staggering thing was one's failure to perceive it long before—that, and one's perception that still, outside the walls, all such talk of reverence, innocence, eagerness would seem the mere self-conscious capers of cheap cleverness. "Henry James simple?"—it sounds such two-a-penny paradox. "Henry James humble?"—worse and worse. Recondite—fastidious—super-subtle—exquisite—"awfully clever and awfully deep"—these are so clearly the qualities reflected in all the mirrors that hold his reputation: qualities pointed to complacently by the superior, gruffly resented by the gross. How came this distortion? Was it humanly possible? What could make so many mirrors twist the truth?

Henry James

From "Roderick Hudson," The Novels and Tales of Henry James Vol. I (Macmillan).

Well, I seemed to see that too; and it was the queerest sight of all. Just a little bit, of course, it was the result of our way of lazily relying on reflectors instead of staring straight and hard at the roof—exactly like the fatigued souls you see in the Sistine thankfully accepting little looking-glasses from the guides, into which you can certainly look as you loiter, but which make Michelangelo's right left and his left right. But there was something far profounder than this. The mad tergiversation was mainly the tragic result—tragic because quite inevitable—of a wild piece of interior treachery—a trick played on Mr. James by his medium. It was caused by a process which perverted its own avowed aims—a process which made simplicity seek the side of her arch-enemy, and "The Dove" appear a very serpent, and a fresh-hearted adoration for the common home-spun of life seem a philandering with gold-leaf and luxury. It was a supreme example of technical mutiny: it is the most thrilling case of the kind in recent letters. And—I want my three-thousand to trace its twists. Set out in full, scene by scene, it would make a wonderful tale: a perfect sequel, in art, to that "Figure in the Carpet" of which it is, in life, the precursor. But a rough scenario may have virtue. It is not, after all, for its own effectiveness that one tells the tale—it is for the effect it has on tales already told. It burnishes "The Golden Bowl," lends new wonder to "The Wings of the Dove." Lacking this clue you may indeed drink deep enjoyment—delighting in the colour and the spaciousness and the bursts of music, the remote clear groups and shining celebrants—but it is a pleasure as incomplete as our poor Protestant delight in the great churches of the continent. You miss the scheme and the scale—the rationale of the ritual—you miss above all the eager care for humanity, the desire to render intimate aid. To see these things you must realise that it was a sweet affection for the earth that set the whole edifice soaring and that all this pomp and splendour is at heart a protest against pride.

So that it is with no idea of being just frightfully original and all that—it is simply out of a decent desire to be useful—that one now hauls down that heading—gives it an added humility—and runs it up again as

"THE HUMILITY OF HENRY JAMES."

Now the cleanest way of catching up this Ariadne-clue is to turn at once to the very earliest of his tales—the earliest, at all events, of those that find a place in the finished scheme of his Works. It is forty years, all but, since "A Passionate Pilgrim," first appeared—it is more than forty since it was written—and yet so clearly had Mr. James already perceived his true task, so firmly has he held to his course, that the story still stands as the perfect porch to his work—an epitome as well as a prelude. Its title is the best brief definition of Mr. James the artist. "A Passionate Pilgrim" is just the name one would choose for that other fine story, of which these twenty-four books are single chapters, and in which Mr. James plays the part of chief character.

Mr. Henry James's House at Rye.

The tale itself will be widely remembered: with its bright objective charm, and its purple velvet "curtain," it has always been one of the pieces that even rugged anti-Jacobites have been able to allow themselves, without loss of caste, to enjoy. Poor Clement Searle, a toil-weary American, comes, fine and faded, at the close of his life, to the England he has dreamed of all his days; and surveys it with the famished delight of an heir coming home after exile. He has nothing but his "nice tastes, fine sympathies and sentiments"; apart from that he "doesn't pay five cents in the dollar"; but he offers his sharpened senses, made the more sensitive by fasting, to all the great traditional features of the consolatory Anglo-Saxon scene. He prowls about London—visits Hampton Court—wanders deep into the shires—seeks lastly the supreme sacredness of Oxford: the "action" of the tale—its love-affair and phantom—is scarcely more than a piece of delicate clock-work to keep his impressions softly circling, a cycle of familiar English hours; and the episodes that ring, with gradually deepening note, are but the due chimes, silvery or golden, to point and punctuate their passing.

"The country-side, in the full warm rains of the last of April, had burst into sudden perfect spring. The dark walls of the hedgerows had turned into blooming screens, the sodden verdure of lawn and meadow been washed over with a lighter brush. We went forth without loss of time for a long walk on the great grassy hills, smooth arrested central billows of some primitive upheaval, from the summit of which you find half England unrolled at your feet. A dozen broad counties, within the scope of your vision, commingle their green exhalations. Closely beneath us lay the dark rich hedgy flats and the copse-chequered slopes, white with the blossom of apples. At widely opposite points of the expanse two great towers of cathedrals rose sharply out of a reddish blur of habitation, taking the mild English light."

Again:

"Passing through the small oblique streets in which the long, grey battered public face of the colleges seems to watch jealously for sounds that may break upon the stillness of study, you feel it the most dignified and most educated of cities. . . . Directly after our arrival my friend and I wandered forth in the luminous early dusk. We reached the bridge that underspans the walls of Magdalen and saw the eight-spired tower, delicately fluted and embossed, rise in temperate beauty—the perfect prose of Gothic—wooing the eyes to the sky that was slowly drained of day."

Once more:

"The sky never was empty and never idle; the clouds were continually at play for our benefit. Over against us, from our station on the hills, we saw them piled and dissolved, condensed and shifted, blotting the blue with sullen rain-spots, stretching, breeze-fretted, into dappled fields of grey, bursting into an explosion of light or melting into a drizzle of silver."

And the task performed by the tale is indeed that of a dial—a memento—not mori—but of life; a delicate

By St. Peter's (Rome).

From "Daisy Miller, and other Tales." The Novels and Tales of Henry James, Vol. 19 (Macmillan).

admonitor reminding us of our myriad overlooked opportunities. Watching Searle tinger with such passionate envy all the old objects—from the very carpets on the floors of our inns ("into which the waiter in his lonely revolutions had trodden so many massive soot-flakes and drops of overflowing beer that the glowing looms of Smyrna would have failed to know them") to our silver

The Luxembourg Gardens.

From "The Ambassadors." The Novels and Tales of Henry James, Vol. 22 (Macmillan).

ceilings of "breeze-fretted" sky, we waken to a sudden consciousness of the wonderful wealth of our home. We realize our amazing good luck. The book is an exquisite inventory—a catalogue, especially, of the things we have seen so often that we had forgotten they were there. Poor Searle never came into his kingdom—but he made us his heirs none the less. Worn out by the very passion that made him so perceptive, he dies, a little crazed, unadmitted. But he had done his job very beautifully. He endured the toil of the pilgrimage. We get the grail.

* * * * *

Not an "i" need be dotted nor an angle adjusted to make that the perfect symbol of what followed. It announces Mr. James's task—it exactly illustrates the special method he invented—it even physically foreshadows the uncanny danger that was to haunt and chill it like a ghost. The range shifts, the focus alters: the landscapes become landscapes with figures—the figures turn into portraits: in "The Portrait of a Lady" Europe has become a kind of tapestry, hanging behind the figure of Isabel like the map in that portrait of Vermeer's. But the effect of this adjustment was but to bring the eye the closer to the little universals, the things of daily life: the lineaments of desire and distress, the homely gestures of joy—an even triter stuff than fields and clouds. And for the purpose of noting these qualities, reminding us of their romance, there were always called in characters who were kinsfolk of Searle—as full of "fine tastes" and eager senses—people of "The Finer Grain"—"The Better Sort." And, finally, for the privilege of rendering this service to the reader, they all had to pay a price as dreadful as that exacted from poor Searle: they have all paid for it with health or with life or with the joys of success, with one or other of life's normal satisfactions. Doomed to sterility, invariably frustrate, they may seem to us like a new Order of abnegants, undergoing strange penances, suffering for the sake of the world.

Recall them to your memory. Let them troop past in turn. Roderick Hudson—Daisy Miller, the youngest and the blithest, yet both paying for their ardour with their lives, killed exactly by the fine force of their vitality. Isabel Archer—Isabel Osmond, supreme in the pale sisterhood, her tragedy in the altered name: giving joy and taking sorrow, turned to marble resignation and mute grief by the refracted beams of her own first radiance. Ralph Touchett—Madame Merle, Madame de Cintré, doubly a renunciant, and Newman, refusing even his revenge. Little Hyacinth Robinson, rarest of suicides, slain by the echo of his own ideal, by the fall of the arrow he had let fly at the stars: near to Narcissus in more than name. Stuart Straith and Mrs. Harvey, Marcher and May Bartram, Neil Paraday, Dencombe, Morris Gedge—all the foiled multiplied people of "The Better Sort,"—eager artists and authors, too fine for their places, used and then left, their wings bruised by the rough shoulders of the world. The crushed watcher in "The Cage"—the crushed teacher in "The Pupil"—the ebbing wraith of the pupil himself. The four figures in "The Golden Bowl"—suffering and frustrate in exact proportion to their fineness. And then, last and loveliest, in "The Wings of the Dove,"* Milly Theale, with her deep malady, the perfect type of all these condamnés—panting for life, because she must die, draining as much of its essence as she may with lips as feverish as poor Searle's. "Tous condamnés à mort avec des sursis indéfinis," they do indeed seize their chance of "expanding that interval, of getting as many pulsations as possible into the time." That is exactly why they are condemned. Those pulsations are our pleasure. They give their lives indeed: they give them to us. They die that we may live more completely.

Of the magnificence of the gift, of the beauty it has brought us, I mean to speak in a moment. But what must be pointed out first—it is the next length in our skein—is the absolute inevitability of this martyrdom, this strange sacrificial etiolation. And by that I do not merely mean that Mr. James is himself one of "the finer grain," and that his characters are the moons that reflect his own characteristic perceptions back upon us; or that his deepest instincts (always sternly Puritan) see the world as a place where the fine souls always suffer. It is something much more concrete and technical than that, and at the same time immensely more bizarre. For this fantastic fate was the result of three things—all of them aiming at the very contrary: (1) of Mr. James's respect for normality; (2) of his respect for his reader; (3) of his deep delight in the little joys of the world, in the free treasures that strew it without number. By one of the prettiest, wickedest tricks Art ever played on a priest of hers, the very prayers that implored simplicity and sanity became the agents that invoked strangeness and fear and the fitting of questionable shapes.

The way of it was this.

* * * * *

"The novel is history. That is the only general description we may give to it." "The air of reality (solidity of specification) seems to me to be the supreme virtue of the novel—the merit on which all its other merits helplessly and submissively depend." "The only reason for the novel's existence is that it does attempt to represent life." "The supreme faculty of the novelist is a capacity for receiving straight impressions." He must strive to be "one of those people upon whom nothing is lost."

These are Mr. James's first principles, his Credo and credentials. He announced them thirty years ago. (They appear in an essay called "the Art of Fiction"—at once his profession of faith and of his faith in his profession—which he wrote as a protest against Besant's

* Mr. James's own comment upon Milly Theale is well worth quoting here—if only for the sake of its curious resemblance to that famous "pulsation" passage of Pater's. "'The Wings of the Dove,'" he says in his Preface to that book, "represents to my memory a very old motive; I can scarce remember the time when the situation on which this long-drawn fiction mainly rests was not vividly present to me. The idea, reduced to its essence, is that of a young person conscious of a great capacity for life, but early stricken and doomed, condemned to die under short respite, while ~~so~~ enamoured of the world; aware, moreover, of the condemnation, and passionately desiring to 'put in' before extinction as many of the finer vibrations as possible." The reader's memory may also be invited to travel back, for the sake of noting an exactly equivalent case, to the first book of "The Portrait of a Lady," written thirty years before, where Ralph Touchett's sense for life, his capacity for serving us as cicerone, is made perfect by the same dire process. "He said to himself that his hour was in sight, and that it behoved him to keep his eyes upon it, but that it was also open to him to spend the interval as agreeably as might be consistent with such pre-occupation. With the prospect of losing them, the simple use of his faculties became an exquisite pleasure; it seemed to him that the delights of observation had never been suspected."

bourgeois views of it—and which drew, in its turn, "A Humble Remonstrance," from young Stevenson—an elegant request for gore.) They are his first principles, and his last. The new Prefaces repeat and expand them. Now watch where they logically lead. The novel is him in. It is to cancel his confidence with your own. The author in person must never intrude. The characters must live their own lives, make their explanations unaided—their ability to do so indeed being the very proof of the validity of their conception. Their reality,

*Reproduced by kind permission of the artist
Photo by Fredk. Hollyes.*

From a portrait painted by Miss Anna Lee Merritt about 1856.

Henry James.

history. It is not a mere game of make-believe. From any hint of fictitiousness, accordingly, any touch that might shake the reader's confidence, the story must scrupulously refrain. There must be no Thackerayan asides (for instance) nor any of those genial betrayals of which Trollope was so fond, in which the artist owns up that the whole thing is ventriloquism and the characters merely his dolls. To take the reader into your confidence in that way is to admit that you are taking that is to say, depends altogether on their power to realise. If their self-consciousness is weak they will tend to grow shadowy. To give them solidity, you must screw up their awareness. And thus, so far as the Jacobean stage is concerned, this faculty for being intensely aware of their environment is their very principle of life.

Now apply to this position those companion resolutions: the resolve to respect and mirror the modesty ceili of human nature ; the resolve to reveal the treasure of con: the humble and bring out the romance of the familiar.

We Instantly, that state of keen consciousness has to be exc tightened up terrifically. Only uncommon eyes—the eyes we of a Touchett or a Searle—can see the common things the of life with any vividness : it takes the palate of an ma epicure to appreciate the flavour of dry bread. Set pas among smashes and crashes—tiger-hunts, earthquakes, cra. pirates and doubloons—Mr. James's characters might tifu. have managed to observe Rule I. (that rule of self-the awareness), and still remain pretty normal and sound :

even a stockbroker could take fairly clear impression from a tomahawk. But to feel with intensity more sual things than tomahawks requires a character pro-
Not tionately unusual ;—and in that invincible see-saw—make tion down, temperament up—you get the central ann the cement that has eternally teased the spiritual balance spe of Mr. James's art. It forms the capital letter of his sh Tale. In order to accomplish his democratic task he had to breed a race of rare aristocrats. In order to make his reader see and understand the excellence of the normal human scene he had to usher him into a recondite world of studios and salons and hushed leisure, where the faculty of observation is cultured like an orchid and every influence that might coarsen it is quelled.

* * * * *

And the reader as he tiptoed in might well feel disturbed. Very strange it is, even a little terrifying, to see the subtle ways in which this hush has reacted on the inhabitants. The people who move here display the blanched signs of seclusion ; almost they seem a like the subjects of some ominous experiment, caged “ in a crystal bell, sensitised by subtle arts, refined de. away to the naked nerve. Regard the men. To price ap their fingers quick and fine, they are prohibited from have all p they must do nothing that will interrupt their of suc al task of apprehension : they are all artists, writers,
D. convalescents—consumptives (like Touchett)—dilettanti
s (like Gabriel Nash)—quivering creatures who are either st observers by profession or else in a state of starved susceptibility. Even when virility has to be admitted, for the sake of dramatic contrast, it is always in the shape of workers whose work is done : men like Newman, Caspar
Goodwood, Mr. Vervey—all compelled to qualify for admission to these salons, to justify their presence in these studios, by devoting the results of the work that made them strong to the feminine task of making themselves fine. But mainly it is a world of women. Already enfranchised, already fastidious, supremely self-aware—specialists already in the arts of observation and the subtler sorts of calculation—they offered Mr. James exactly the material he required, and their figures are the most active in his scene. Yet even they had to suffer, to be specialised still further, and the process left a poison in their blood. They are all strangely sterile. They bear no children. The very penalty that punishes too close breeding in real life has visited this imaginary race:

Each of them, like Milly Theale, is “ the last exquisite flower of a dying stock.” They are “ finished ” in both senses of the word : final as well as fine.

And this effect of finality is not only physical. It is involved in the very tissues of their attitude towards life —is indeed the conditioning quality of their characters.
For posterity is but a kind of postponement : the idea of a future makes procrastination proper ;—and the essence of Mr. James's contract with these people is that they shall extort the very utmost from the present—pack To-day to bursting with “ pulsations.” The hushed room in which they dwell is therefore the last of a suite : it has no doorway leading out into new lives.
One of his books is called “ Terminations,”* and the title would do for them all. Their last sentences are always sentences of death. As in the great, grim devastating dramas of the ancients, the descent of the curtain at the close seems scarcely needful : there is nothing left to conceal. All has been cancelled out and settled up : only the lights remain unextinguished. In the merciless justice of these audits, in this cold refusal to allow debts to stand over and Fate to be fobbed off with promissory notes, we may perhaps discern the pressure, once more, of Mr. James's essential Puritanism—a grim New England delight in (1) a defiant honesty of book-keeping, an insistent production of all the vouchers that prove the integrity of every act and scene, and in (2) moral warnings and arraignments, reminders of the implacable accountancy of life.
But it is the exquisite avidity of his creatures that gives these impulses their opportunity. It is their very joy in life that makes their days all Days of Judgment.

For their acute consciousness of the present cuts through to the past behind.
Their “ historic sense ” is keen, and it registers messages
as faint as sighs.
The most familiar things exhale them, sometimes dreadfully : forgotten
graves, long turned to gardens, keep giving up their dead. Louisa Pallant is the living

Portland Place.

presence of her mother's buried selfishness. It is her father's blood in her veins, even more than her recoil from his hands, that carries Kate Croy into the dubious labyrinth that leads, at last (in "The Wings of the Dove"), to the strangest crime yet committed in our literature. Parental relics are the talismans in "The Tragic Muse": the tale is the fight between Nick Dormer and their spells. In "The Portrait of a Lady," by a refinement rarely noticed, it is the clinging touch of Osmond's daughter, who is the living symbol of the wrong which the innocence of Isabel has to expiate, that prevents the latter from escaping from her doom. Everywhere the past thrills and populates the air. We see the stage with clairvoyant eyes. There is a constant resurrection of dead deeds.

And of more than deeds. . . . Uncannier than anything we have noted yet, I think, is the grisly phenomenon we come to now: the fact that actual apparitions, visible phantoms—not mere metaphors but horrid actual semblances of people dead and grieving—are constantly being invoked in secret in these high, bright, super-civilised Jacobean abodes, with their air of supreme polish and discretion.

"I heard the great clock in the little parlour below strike twelve, one, half-past one. Just as the vibration of this last stroke was dying on the air the door of communication with Searle's room was flung open and my companion stood on the threshold, pale as a corpse, shining like a phantom against the darkness behind him. 'Look well at me!' he intensely gasped 'touch me, embrace me, well revere me! You see a man who has seen a ghost!'"

That crazed cry of Searle's, heard in the very porch, echoes through them all. It is a phantom (foretold in the first chapter of the book) that summons Isabel Archer to Ralph's death-bed (in the last). The hero of "Sir Edmund Orme" is a spectre. "The Way It Came" is woefully, wonderfully haunted. An apparition baffles the actors in "The Real Thing." In "The Turn of the Screw," the hideous spectres of the dead Quint and his drab return to prey still further on the little children whom they had corrupted when alive. . . . It is an obsession that the surrounding urbanity has served somehow to conceal: but which that urbanity really makes the more amazing. It is a symptom as startling as that harsh cry of Searle's—and it means the breaking of an unbearable tension. The overstrung nerves of these people—stretched to catch the faintest pulsation and to proclaim its presence in music—have broken with the scream of snapped harp-strings. It is a kind of hysteria induced by the hush. Shut in with their sensations, forced forever to watch the play of impalpable motives, they have lost the boundary between the imagined and the real; and ideas take living faces and grope dreadfully about their rooms. Almost it might seem that they, or their creator, had tampered with forbidden keys and opened the unpermitted door. . . .

But there is another and less darkling explanation. These grisly apparitors are essentially (I feel), the sign of sanity and rude health: messengers, not of death but of life. They are the results of a kind of belliousness on the author's part—a protest against his own principles; a singular splendid wicked shout of heaven and unrestrained roar of pure relief. It is the case of fidgets, not of phantoms—restive muscles not weak nerves—and it joins with many another case of covert violence in these books to prove that the boy in Mr. James is still alive. For although it is never noticed or mentioned (having been most craftily screened), the air of invincible decorum presented by these books masks a tremendous amount of thorough-going melodrama. From Daisy Miller's adultery to the Verver's elaborate adultery—from little Hyacinth's suicide to "the low insurance job," in "The Dove"; in the lies of "The Liar" and the maniacal outburst of his wife; in the case of coldly furious infanticide in "The Author of Beltraffio":—wherever you turn, once your eyes are awake to it, the shaggy face of violence looks out. And I like it. I find it gentle, reassuring. It is a concession claimed by the simpler side of Mr. James: his one week-day in a year of solid Sundays. And doubly therefore does it stand as another symptom of the quality of democratic sympathy which is the heart of his whole work. Democratic enough in itself (goodness knows) it is also exactly the backlash and consequence of the tension he created in his equally democratic desire to register honourably the little things of daily life. Too perfect a humility makes Hamlets of us all. And it is the Hamlets of the world who see ghosts. . . .

Photo by Elliott & Fry.

Mr. Henry James
(1890).

Time! "Ghosts" is my three-thousand-and-oddth word. And there is so much yet left to say. We have seen indeed how his very eagerness and devotion led him into remote and dubious ways. But there

ceili cons
We exc we the ma pas cra:
tifu:
the p<sup>a</sup>

fr
s
Not make v ann<sup>the</sup> spe<sup>of M</sup>
sh Tale.
i to h
s r i l

Mr. Henry James in his Study.
(About 1900.)

ought further to be shown (an oddly charming sight) the way the self-same qualities of eagerness and sympathy worked to save what they had half destroyed. That beautiful outer urbanity, which concealed their excesses so perfectly, was one of their achievements. They enabled his prose to absorb so many qualities, so many kinds of epithets and images, that it could make the most extravagant gestures as it moved and yet maintain price as air of bland composure. It is the most "universal" have all p most republican—prose in our literature—com-of sur of more elements than any other, deriving from Dr. sources more varied, maintaining its health and balance by an intricate system of counterpoise and cross fertilisation. If the style is the man, as people keep on saying, then Mr. James's humility could be triumphantly proved by simply analysing a series of his sentences. Incessantly on the one hand, they are dowering the smallest acts, facts, or features, with great spreading pinions of imagery.

As often, on the other, they are expressing the subtlest apprehensions in terms domestic, idiomatic, colloquial—using a sort of celestial slang. And the result of this intermarrying is prose of a superb strength and suppleness, a prose probably unsurpassed since Shakespeare's—and able, at its highest moments of passion, when it is aflame with a beauty greater than even that borne by most self-avowed poetry, to maintain the serene carriage of the estate to which it belongs, and deprecate any suggestion of a ceremony.

But to speak of that properly would require quotation, and already I am overdrawn. Persuade THE BOOKMAN to dole me out another thousand or so and I will take up the tale another month. And go on to show that the legendary difficulty of his later work is really the result of a greater ease, and that the quality that terrifies the reader there is the result of an increased hospitality, and now—but basta!

DR. MACGREGOR.*

By C. W. BOYD.

THEY go, the old familiar faces, the big people of a man's boyhood. In one compartment of life—and some of us have lived perforce our lives in compartments—two such faces passed out of sight, not out of memory, on the same November day two years ago: Professor Flint, one of the last in the golden line of Scottish theologians; and the Very Rev. James Macgregor, Royal Chaplain in three reigns, and mighty orator. Compared with names like these the present Moderator of the General Assembly of the Church of * "Life and Letters of the Rev. James Macgregor, D.D., Minister of St. Cuthbert's Parish, Edinburgh, one of His Majesty's Chaplains." By the Lady Frances Balfour. 12s. net. (Hodder and Stoughton.)

Scotland, Dr. Marcus Dill—who worthily represents the tradition of Dr. Robert Lee, Principal Tulloch, and Principal Story—Dr. Dill and his designed successor, Dr. Wallace Williamson, are but youngsters. In the reviewer's mind is the Church of his Fathers, in his own Father's day; he looks back on a throng of grave and reverend figures. And Dr Macgregor is the last of them.

"For about fifty years the Chrysostom of Scottish preachers," so his beloved friend and old assistant, Dr. Fleming of St. Columba's, hits off Macgregor's place among his contemporaries. Anywhere in Scotland the mere rumour of his coming to preach, to speak, or lecture, would stir men's minds in advance, and besiege the place of meeting. "Where are all these people going?" asked Dean Stanley of a working man, when, on his way to St. John's Episcopal Church in Princes Street, Edinburgh, he saw the black tide flow past its doors. "To hear Macgregor," was the answer.

It was a tiny man, with the head of a Titan, a beard like Homer's, and a voice of thunder. As "wee Macgregor of the Tron," he first and early made his mark, impressing himself on the imagination wherever he came. Thus early he was a character, and legend—mainly untrue—accumulated round the little body and the tremendous gifts. A character he remained, bearing with him, near or far, an electric atmosphere to which men, in multitudes or individually, from the Queen and the Prime Minister down to the cab-driver and further, must equally submit. As a preacher Dean Stanley placed Dr. Macgregor below Principal Caird of Glasgow, but before Canon Liddon. Another critic almost as eminent pronounced him "equal with Liddon, but before Magee" (Archbishop of York), "longo intervallo." "There are not many more outstanding men to-day," says his biographer, "than one who said that 'neither Caird, Guthrie, Macleod, Liddon, Wilberforce, nor Magee, was equal to the best of Macgregor.'" If the personage quoted was the late Duke of Argyll he knew something about it, for there were few finer orators than himself. But it may be permissible to quote yet another, but a living, authority. In an English country house the other day Mr. Balfour was being questioned about the great orators of his recollection. Mr. Gladstone, John Bright, and the others usually put top, were named. "And Dr. Macgregor?" asked a compatriot. "Oh, Dr. Macgregor, as of course, one must rank him with the greatest."

But it is with the orator as with his poor relation—that thing of temperament divorced from intellect, as Henley called him—the actor. The voice ceases, the electric light goes out, and unless, which is rare, the orator has had that secondary gift of epigram or cunning phrase in the degree which we call style, actum est de the orator. "Into the night go one and all." Hence the justice and propriety of this biography. Lady Frances Balfour is a true daughter of a Race which, whatever else you may say of it—and the rest of Scotland may be roughly divided according as it views the Campbells—has never wanted for brains and character and a strong sense of its identity with the Scottish people and with the Scottish national religion. Now to the House of Argyll "Dr. Hamish" bore an adopted clansman's loyalty. There an intimacy opened and embraced him when his own hearth was tragically desolate. "None of you will ever know what you were in my life at that time," he wrote, near the end, to one of the Inverary children of those days. It is another of them who here has beautifully kept faith with early friendship and association. For we owe it to Lady Frances Balfour that even an alien reader must realise how it was that Macgregor mattered so much to all who knew him, and on what foundations of humanity and experience his lighthouse arose.

First must be put his Faith. With everything —you would say—to try him, excepting the gift of his vitality: physical disability, for he was in a measure deformed; narrow means and hard times besetting the Perthshire farm, beautiful for situation, in which he was born and bred; his "sorrowful youth," as he himself described it, "a heart long seared in very sorrow;" he seems never to have suffered a doubt in himself or in anybody else. It was the same when the perfect happiness of his home was shattered, and in one year he lost his first wife, whose beautiful face looks out or us (on p. 172), his two girls, and his mother. One does not care to transcribe the simple and moving words which he speaks of himself as able "not only calmly but thankfully" to think of his loss; but it is all summed up in the quotation, "Though He slay me, yet will trust Him." The most sceptical of persons watching the man's heart in his letters—which alone justify <sup>com</sup>lar biography—and in fragments of his reported <sup>lar</sup> serious must perceive that he was singularly armed. <sup>he was</sup> he was have hard words said of them, and we think on the whole with justice, and that eloquence has injured <sup>the</sup> world as much as it has helped it. This orator in his sincerity was white-hot. And next must be put his amazing vitality and therewith his sympathy. The first was not preserved without a certain amount of care: old friends will remember that after any special effort his plan, given a spare hour, was to go to bed; and, said he, "You mustn't merely lie down, you must take off your things and get inside." Even so, he undertook and carried out tasks which would have left most people in a week of like experience exhausted neurasthenics, and, as the "live wire," which an American visitor called him, went through life, with all its duties, trials, and pleasures, filled with the joy of it, overwhelmed with interest in everything <sup>and</sup> everybody, giving or rather hurling himself with hands at every one who needed him. It is clear <sup>that</sup> that though he read widely and was a born linguist he could not be called a scholar; and a theologian in a systematic sense, Dr. Fleming tells the reviewer, he was not. His literary work is not <sup>—you could not call him</sup> a man of letters. Yet few are the masters of English prose that "come off" more notably in descriptions

The Approach to Como.

From "Italian Hours" by Henry James. (Heinemann).

ceilings of natural scenery. Even in his Glasgow lodgings he is recreated when he catches a view from a back window of "the glittering peaks of the everlasting hills . . . I think Ben Lomond is visible, crested and crowned with that brightest coronet, the pure virgin snow." We have no accounts of far-off places much better than Macgregor's pictures of Palestine, and of the great North West which the Governor-General's chaplain perceived with the eyes of prophecy abundantly fulfilled since. Yet these are not better than the perpetual thumb-nail sketches on every other page of his correspondence, and perpetual on his lips. It is vain to wish that Dr. Macgregor had put himself to school and trained and found expression in work of permanent literary

Not value. It was his to spend all that he had on the moment without thought of posthumous fame—on friendship for the lowly and the great, in sympathy, consolation, exhortation, reproof. Thence, Tale. Only as we can put it, came his influence and to secret. That was his mark all through: at Paisley, where, as a mere lad, he was minister of the High church and already a marked man: in the quiet country charge of Monimail: in the now vanished Tron church at Glasgow. There he became, after the Scottish usage, assistant and successor to the aged Rev. Dr. Boyd, who, as Lady Frances says, "had the most ungrudging delight in the new life which Macgregor infused into a somewhat chill and uphill atmosphere. A very cordial relation between old and young, in the biographer's words," this was, "leaving nothing but happy memories behind it." Nearly thirty years later Dr. Macgregor, not without tears, revived these days for one of his old senior's descendants, painting with exquisite touches the features and character of one dead before his editor was born, and solemnly averring the value of his bond of the Gaelic and of Highland blood, since the have all pedigree of the Tron, though of West Country name of surname and ancestry, was Perthshire born and bred, "had two hundred years of the Highlander in him." Dr. Boyd died in June, 1865, in his eightieth year, and Macgregor was left alone in the charge till 1868, when he passed to the Tron Church, Edinburgh, where his influence strengthened and his genius was generally recognised.

Then in 1873 came St. Cuthbert's, and as Dr. Macgregor of St. Cuthbert's he was known for nearly forty years. The record of that time in Lady Frances Balfour's pages is triumphant and happy though the old wounds were there. But early in 1892 an old friend wrote to him "that he was thankful the fire was again to be lighted on his hearth," and in his second marriage Dr. Macgregor found understanding and sympathy, and a happiness which lasted to his end in 1910. The later years of St. Cuthbert's time must be followed in the biographer's setting. One side may be mentioned. "The Church in danger" is no cry of the hour in Scotland of to-day when the two great Churches grow together; but twenty years ago the Church of Scotland was face to face with possible disestablishment and disendowment. Then indeed Dr. Macgregor blazed like the Burning Bush, which is the emblem of his Church, but like that, was not consumed; only the heather went on fire. Disestablishment was not, because the Scottish people would not have it.

Perhaps it may be permitted in conclusion to quote from an unpublished early impression left by Dr. Macgregor in old days on the mind of one of the sons of one of his oldest friends. For this, too, illustrates the man, as we think the biographer will admit, although, in the nature of things, it plainly could not have entered verbally into her text.

"I cannot tell you when I first saw Dr. Macgregor. Probably I heard him before I saw him; for he comes up out of childhood as something inseparable from one's earliest memories like the voice of the wind at St. Andrews, or the voice of the North Sea. Anyhow, he was there; lying about us in our infancy (like Heaven in Wordsworth's poem), almost truculently cordial, and of a roaring kindness, lifting up my youngest brother and myself like terriers, and swinging us. Probably he came over for the Fast Day, a period marked in my brother's mind and mine as one when the house was mysteriously crowded with black coats, and when, as one of my brothers added, it 'smelt of sherry.' It was of Dr. Macgregor in those days that old Tom Morris that 'wale of auld men' said to my father, 'he gars the rafters of the auld Kirk ring.' He was otherwise described as 'a' fleein' aboot.' At these vanished festivals of the church I recall Dr. Wallace, afterwards editor of the Scotsman and later M.P., Dr. Watson of Dundee, Dr. Leishman, Dr. Burns of Glasgow Cathedral (and dear Mrs. Burns, the good fairy of us children), but, first and foremost, your Doctor Hamish.

"He used to arrive—this was a later observation—wrapped in innumerable coats and plaids, from which my father was some time in unwinding him. Then restoratives—very appropriate to the climate, and the journey, and the man—were usually applied. There was a legend of his once arriving visibly the worse for the old crossing in the steamer, long, long before Forth Bridge days. Soup, sherry, and other things were suggested. None of these was received with rapture. Then my dear mother proposed to exhibit very strong hot whisky and water. He gazed at her as at one inspired, and with awful conviction exclaimed, 'You're a good—Christian—woman!'

"The rest is not silence, far from it, but a benevolent roaring—for us children, a part of the scheme of things; it rings round one's recollection of childhood, but definite memories evade one, only an episode or two emerges from the mist. I remember Dr. Macgregor picking up a Hebrew Bible, and reading to my brother and myself with immense dramatic effect. I remember his picking up a volume of English—Ruskin, I found out subsequently—and in the same manner rolling off some magnificent verbal thunder. That was a child's first sense of the splendour of English prose. I remember that suddenly, in the midst of monologue, or dialogue, Dr. Macgregor would pull out a watch and rush upstairs and lie down. The habit of 'lying down'—a thing which only one's mother did, and that only when there was thunder about—seemed part of the mysterious endowment of orators.

"Of his sermons I best recollect one delivered, not at St. Andrew's, but in Fettes College Chapel. He began extraordinarily quietly, having himself infinitely well in hand. In a little the familiar thunder and lightning broke over us. I can feel again the extraordinary hush of the boys in that beautiful chapel, and see again the intent, mesmerised look of one's English masters.

"Later, when I had done with school, and was grown up (say twenty-one), and at home during one of his visits, I had a chance to observe Dr. Macgregor from the advanced standpoint of a mature person who was in statu pupilaris to Mr. Henley (that other great natural force), and had 'sat under' Henry Irving and others who shared Dr. Macgregor's magical 'way' with their fellow-men. He had come to deliver some lecture or address probably to the divinity students at St. Mary's College; but anyhow dinner was late, or was replaced, for his convenience, by supper some time after nine o'clock. There were present besides Dr. Macgregor, just my father and mother, my sister, then home like myself on a visit, and myself. I know not what time we arose, but I know that we sat interminably hanging on Macgregor's words. It struck me then 'this is splendid; this is better than Irving, oh! better than anybody, probably as good as Salvini; but it's of their kind. If I ran over to the Alick B—s (which the Lang's had that winter) what would HE (the great Andrew, idol of one's youth and always) make of all this? Probably not much!'

"What I meant to convey to myself was 'this is temperament, is genius; but isn't it chiefly temperament not intellect?' Yet even when he talked of books in what to me, a bookish lad, in the extreme precocity of youth and of the Scots Observer persuasion, seemed a somewhat jejune and Philistine fashion, Dr. Macgregor was still splendid. One ceased to figure to one's self or to care what Mr. Lang would have thought of these fireworks.

"I remember how he called a spade a spade. He spoke of the inconvenience of giving evidence in the Scottish Law Courts. I asked: 'What took you there, Sir?' 'It was a damned blackguardly case, my dear,' the Doctor equably rejoined, in a shattering aside.

"His mood, I remember, became more emotional as the evening wore on. I remember my sister whispering to me in baseless admonition, 'You are drinking too much.' I said, answering, 'You shut up. I do but wait upon our honoured guest. He is splendid. Attend to every syllable.' Collegiate charges were mentioned. Dr. Macgregor said that they were 'either a blessing or a curse,' and mentioned, as well he might, that his own colleague, Dr. William Williamson, was splendid. And he was splendid for a few moments upon Dr. Williamson. Then regarding my father—pale and clear-cut, beside him, an abstemious figure—'And what of your case, dear-r friend?' His dear friend said (and with truth) that he was blessed indeed in Dr. A—-. 'Then,' said Macgregor, with a tremendous intonation, 'Bless God upon your knees for it.' I said solemnly, 'Hear, hear,' and exchanged with Dr. Macgregor a holy look. The Doctor extended his right hand and pointed at me. There was a moment's silence, and he said with conviction: 'That's the young Christian.' My sister (who with my mother was now on the verge of apoplexy) aimed at me a vicious kick under the table. Presently, dear Dr. Macgregor dismissed the congregation. 'Away,' he said, 'to your dear, dear beds. This good lad will sit up with me and take his smoke.' Late into the night sat the two Christians pledging one another and their cause.

"Next day Dr. Macgregor and I went for a walk. He told me stories of his old professors; he spoke to me standing still, with wonderful gestures, of the grandfather I had never seen. One figure in the ancient city he said he missed—old Professor Jackson, a survival of an earlier educational Scotland. 'It was a regular part of coming here,' he said. 'Once during each visit Principal Shairp your father and I used to walk down South Street, past the door of one of those beautiful old houses in the most beautiful of streets, knock, and be admitted, pass through the old house into an old garden, and behold a summer-house, and in it, seated at a table, an old, tall, tall figure in a sort of cassock, with a velvet skull on its head, looking for all the world like the ghost of an old mediæval monk. And Shairp would say: "Stipular magnum opus?"' And the old man would say 'curious the magnum opus.' And presently we would come he was And your father would say "Wonderful man!" the has been writing at his work for fifty years, and to knowledge, he has only written one sentence, but then what a sentence: "Theology is everything, and everything is theology."'

"On our way home from our walk, in the crystal weather, by the Cathedral, the Battery, with its view across the Bay to the Forfar coast, and the Sidlaws beyond, and nearer the vast sweep of sands and links behind them—I remember Dr. Macgregor rushing up to a party of Edinburgh golfers who had come over for the day and shaking them by the hand to the number of fifteen, and introducing me to each of them. They were national school masters, I understood. 'Always do that,' he said, 'be human always with people.' And even in these disjointed notes your orator Hanish is surely human."

A great orator, profoundly a human being, this 'little body with a mighty heart.'

"THE BOOKMAN" PRIZE COMPETITIONS.

MARCH, 1913.

Answers to these competitions (each on a separate sheet bearing the name and address of the sender) should be forwarded not later than the 15th of the month to

"The Prize Page," THE BOOKMAN, Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton, Warwick Square, E.C.

The date fixed above for sending in answers does not apply to Competitors resident abroad, except in the case of competitions Nos. 1 and 3; answers from Foreign or Colonial readers for competitions 2, 4 and 5 (the subjects of these being the same each month) will be admissible to the first competitions that are adjudicated upon after the date of their receipt.

Each competitor may send in any number of attempts, provided each attempt is written on a separate sheet of paper.

I.—A PRIZE OF ONE GUINEA is offered for the best original ballad in not more than forty-eight lines.

II.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best quotation from English verse applicable to any review or the name of any author or book appearing in this number of THE BOOKMAN. Preference will be given to quotations of a humorous nature.

III.—A PRIZE OF THREE NEW BOOKS is offered for the best original photograph illustrating the title of any recent book.

IV.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best review in not more than one hundred words of any recently published book. Competitors should give the names of Authors and Publishers at head of their reviews.

V.—A copy of THE BOOKMAN will be sent post free for twelve months to the sender of the best suggestion for THE BOOKMAN Competitions. The Editor reserves the right to use any suggestion submitted.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT:
TWENTY-ONE GUINEAS PRIZE POEM COMPETITION.

A First Prize of Five Guineas and a Second Prize of Two Guineas will be given for the best and second best original Lyric.

Not a First Prize of Five Guineas and a Second Prize of Two Guineas will be given for the best and second best original sonnet on Shakespeare, Milton, Chaucer, Keats, Burns, Scott, Byron, Wordsworth, Wellington, Tale. Giudstone, Disraeli, Darwin, or any other famous man.

A First Prize of Five Guineas and a Second Prize of Two Guineas will be given for the best and second best original humorous poem in not more than forty lines.

All Poems should be addressed to the Editor, and should reach the offices of THE BOOKMAN, St. Paul's House, Warwick Square, London, E.C., not later than the first post on the 2nd June next, if sent from any part of the British Isles, and by the 1st July if from the Colonies, India, or elsewhere abroad. Envelopes should be marked Twenty-one Guineas Competition.

The name and address of the competitor must be written on each MS., and will be published in the event of a Prize being awarded to him. Any competitor who wishes to do so may add a pseudonym, to be used instead of his own if his poem is printed but does not receive a prize.

The awards will be announced in THE BOOKMAN for June next, and in addition to the winning poems a large selection of the best of the others sent in will be published in a Special Supplement to that Number.

RESULTS OF COMPETITIONS FOR FEBRUARY.

I.—The PRIZE OF ONE GUINEA for the best original Ballad is awarded to Miss Winifred A. Cook, of Little Longstone, Reservoir Road, Prenton, Birkenhead, Cheshire, for the following:

LOVE AND DEATH.
A BALLAD.

Brush out my wayward hair to-night, Jeannette,
Twilight has fallen, long the sun has set;
Out in the meads the dew is lying wet;
This is an hour that he will not forget;
Brush out my hair, Jeannette!
(O, dark as night is Adrienne's hair of jet,
That slips through the silver comb of the pale Jeannette;
O, swift dies all the glow of the wounded sky,
As the moments fly.)

Coil high my hair, in massive fold on fold,
And thread it through with ornaments of gold,
Lest for love's eyes its beauty seem too cold.
Look out, Jeannette, across the misty wold,
Do you naught behold?
(O, there is silence over all the park,
The chaffinch, and the linnet and the lark,
Have flown to their silent nests in the woods to hide,
And the moments glide.)

Robe me, Jeannette, in gown of 'broidered white,
Girdled with gems, as dewdrops glittering bright;
For I would fain be lovely in his sight.
Hark! Is there never a sound on the breathless night
Of a foam-flecked steed? Search you the dim moon-light
For a dauntless knight!
(O, 'tis the startled deer through the phantom shade,
Or the silly sheep, of the moonlight all afraid;
There is no other sound o'er the darkening grass,
As the moments pass.)

The hour grows overlate; the moon has risen
High in the purple mysteries of heaven;
'Tis time to kneel, and have our sins forgiven.
Lean out—but once Jeannette—for the hour's eleven,
And long, long past the magic hour of even,
When love is given.
(O, blanched as snowdrifts in a desert place,
White as a winter cloud is Adrienne's face;
For one by one her hopes—as stars in the sky—
Grow pale, and die.)

Unbind my wayward hair again, Jeannette,
The dark out-weareth, soon the moon will set;
Into the park speeds never a rider yet;
This is an hour I never may forget,
For in my soul 'tis love and death have met:
Unbind my hair, Jeannette.
(O, out in the shadow of night, with never a moan,
Who is it lying so white on the moors alone?
What is that silent spirit that passeth by,
With no sound, nor cry?)

Winifred A. Cook.

We select for printing:

THE BALLAD OF FAIR MARGARET.

The kings of the sea they loved her,
The kings of the earth bowed low,
And the kings of the air they wooed her
With thunder and fire and snow.
But it's neither kings nor princes
Shall marry Margaret,
For I wooed her in the Springtime
And my heart is throbbing yet.

The kings of the sea they crowned her
With corals aons old,
They robed her in sun-beamed foam flakes
And sate her on thrones of gold.
But it's neither kings nor princes
Shall marry Margaret
For she loved me in the summer
And my heart is thrilling yet.

The kings of the earth they brought her
The blossoms of early Spring,
The songs of the thrush at evening
And down from the owl's wing.
But it's neither kings nor princes
Shall marry Margaret,
For she languished in the Autumn
And my heart is aching yet.

The kings of the air they wrought her
A robe of rainbow hue.
They veiled her with mists of morning
And decked her with pearls of dew.
But it's neither kings nor princes
Shall marry Margaret,
For she died on a Winter even
And my heart is bleeding yet!

(Alice W. Linford, 17, Linden Road, South Tottenham, N.)

A BALLAD OF BURIAL.

My Lady sat in her lonely bower,
(Little hath love but the end of mirth)
Silent she sat full many an hour,
Her hair hung down in a golden shower;
(And the span of life hath tears for girth!)

Her face was wan as a frozen sea:
Her lids were hot as coals might be,
'Neath which her eyes stared wofully.

My Lady heard in the court below
The fall of feet in the crackling snow—
The priests and mourners sad and slow.

They bore me by on draped bier,
While throbbing through me sharp and clear
My Lady's heart I seemed to hear.

They set me down among the dead,
With candles twain at feet and head,
And pallid shroud upon me spread.

My Lady came unseen, unheard,
But I felt her soul like a maddened bird
Fluttering round as the flamelight stirred.
The graven tombs our bodies keep,
(Little hath love but the end of mirth)
But her soul is sunk in slumber deep
Till God shall break the tranced sleep:
(And the span of life hath tears for girth!)

(Norman Davidge Gullick, 6, Chantry Road, Clifton.)

Several competitors have omitted to notice that this first Prize offered last month was for a Ballad, and have sent Lyrics, which we are transferring to the Special Twenty-one Guineas Poem Prize Competition, particulars of which appear on the preceding page. We specially commend the Ballads sent in by A. S. Barnard (Walsall), Florence Bagster (Kendal), Gladys Monshall (Aberystwyth), T. P. Findlay (Kirkcaldy), A. H. Lyat (Sandgate), Vera F. Carter (Worthing), Miss V. E. Horley (Harrow), R. H. Kipling (Devonport), Edmund Harold (Putney), B. R. M. Hetherington (Carlisle), Noel D. Braithwaite (Ashton-under-Lyne), A. W. Jay (Devonport), E. F. Seymour (Kilburn), Martin Andrew (South Shields), Alex. S. Brinton McClellan (Edinburgh), Will Loudon (Dunfermline), D. M. Kernode (Tasmania), Stanley Simpson (Birkenhead), Margaret McDonnell (Glasgow), Miss J. A. Jenkins (Birmingham), E. Summers (Dukinfield), R. B. Ince (Jarus Brook), M. E. P., Rev. F. Hern (Rowlands Castle), Violet Gillespie (Forest Hill), Miss G. M. Northcott (West Kirby), Ivan Adair (Rathmine), J. C. Church (Castleford), W. M. Lodge (Upper Norwood), Editha L. Blackley (Finchley), Marjorie C. Barnard (London, S.W.), Miss C. Hawley (Elland), Enoch Daniels (Newcastle), Constance Goodwin (Clapham), Miss M. D. Baynes (Teignmouth), G. W. Turner (Burnley), Chas. Parkin (Felling-on-Tyne), E. G. Potter (Birmingham), Jas. S. Kellock (Hornsey), Bertha Koln (London, W.C.), Mrs. A. E. Wise (Leicester), M. A. Newman (Framlingham), Rev. E. C. Lansdown (S. Woodford), Ethel Tudge (Cricklewood), Irene Rathbone (Liverpool), Jennie Park (Hornsey), Mary B. Whiting (Ramsgate), G. M. Hennings (St. Albans), Mrs. C. P. F. Ferrier (Glasgow), Lilly Salisbury (Norwich), Robert Bruce (Southampton), Arthur S. Wilshire (Dalston), B. Vickery (Bradford), Gladys D. Hill (Sunderland), H. R. Smith (Newcastle-on-Tyne), Agnes E. M. Baker (W. Hampstead), Violet D. Chapman (Burnham), Edward Gleave (St. Helens), Norman Boothroyd (Batley), Edward Griffiths (Liverpool), Kitty L. Lyon (Wimbledon), J. E. Jones (Cardiff), W. S. Chesterfield (London, W.), Andrew J. Caird (Edinburgh), Doris Dean (Bromley), E. F. Parr (Clifton), Wallace Davies (Preston), Miss Jean Wilson (Bristol), G. Lenorne (Bingley), G. R. Hamilton (Kensington), G. G. Jackson (Northampton), Ethel Goodwin (Clapham), W. H. Usher (Sohull), Grace M. Measham (Jesmond), A. Clarke (High Wycombe), Irene Wintle (Liverpool), P. J. Frawley (Birkenhead), M. G. Alexander (Maida Vale), M. J. Collett (Cheltenham), E. H. Towler (Hale), Sidney C. Isaacs (London, S.E.), M. Molyneux (Torquay), Ellen L. Clutterbuck (Burnley), Gertrude Pitt (Hampstead), Rose M. Lomas (Newbury), R. W. King (Catford), Leonard J. Shrubsall (London, S.W.), Thos. Lanyear (Anerley), Evelyn Emily Iffe (Plumstead), J. D. C. Monfries (Putney), Rupert Hodgetts (Brierley Hill), Tristram.

II.—The PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best quotation is awarded to Mrs. F. Warner, of 3, Convent Terrace, Swansea, for the following:

RETURN OF THE PETTICOAT. BY WARWICK DEEFING.
(Cassell.)

"'Tis a consummation Devoutly to be wish'd."

SHAKESPEARE—Hamlet.

We also select for printing:

FANNY'S FIRST NOVEL. BY F. FRANKFORT MOORE.
(Hitchinson.)

"The play's the thing."

SHAKESPEARE—Hamlet.

(Charles Powell, 290, Oxford Road, Manchester.)

Mr. Henry James.

A caricature by Mr. Max Beerbohm (about 1890).

THE WOMAN MOVEMENT. BY ELLEN KEY. (Putnam's.)
"Welcome, ladies! to the cell."

S. T. COLERIDGE—Songs of the Pixies.
(W. McC. Miller, Straidarran House, Co. Londonderry.)

I WILL REPAY. BY BARONESS ORCZY.

(Hodder & Stoughton)

"To-morrow or the next day."

Oranges and Lemons

(Margery Finch, 54, Sheffield Road, Fratton, Portsmouth)

THE STRANGER IN THE HOUSE. BY ANTHONY DYLL
TON. (Werner Laurie)

"Don't look so 'ard, for I 'aven't no card."

R. KIPLING—Back to the Army Again.

(Miss Evelyn M. Abbott, The Croft, Old Malton, York)

UNDER THE YOKE BY IVAN VAZOFF (Heinemann)

"His wife, of course, went with him too"

W. S. GILBERT—Tab Ballads.

(Beatrice Craig, Craigdanagh, Stradarran, Co. Derry, Ireland)

III.—This Prize is divided and we award Two New Books to the Rev. J. A. Stokes Little, The West Manse, Fraserburgh, and Two New Books to Mr. C. Eric Staddon, of Studley Road, Luton, for the following:

LETTER OF ADVICE TO A YOUNG POET.
I.

You have something to say? Speak! You fancy you have to say something? Silence!

Diligently take your temperature. Every subject is poetic which one has caloric to fuse to run it into moulds of beauty, but don't mistake your parlour fire for an electric furnace.

Live that is, learn from everyday experiences. Never seek emotional adventures: they come—more than any genius can use. Life it is, which is the great adventure.

Shun conventionality—the soul goes cold in others' lendings.

Shun singularity—be a man, not a disease.

Speak only what you know, but develop soul-antennae to guide you through the heart's dark caverns.

You are brought down to the abyss? Snatch gold from the fires, diamonds from the slime, joy from affliction, sympathy from suffering.

Be a man and therefore a little child: so shall God whisper you in the ear.

REV. J. A. STOKES LITTLE.

II.

ceili Get to the heart of Things. It is Life you must seek, in all con its beauty, depth and wonder. Aspire! Live nobly, and you will We Think nobly.

ex Get close to God and man; linger in Nature's garden, probing her secrets.

we Face boldly the mystery of your own day, but write for all time. Concentrate; do not imitate. Be yourself, dwelling only the to learn, among the giants of yesterday. Strive always to your ma best.

pas Be studious of form; master it—for it is your servant. Be sincere and not too prodigal of words. Often strength lies in cra restraint, and suggestion is above expression. Remember fancy is not imagination, nor sentiment, passion.

tifu Love, observe, reflect, and you will understand—opening your heart in sympathy to all men and things—speaking, once and the ever, your message of God and of life and death.

P.S.—Be wary of print and praise!

C. ERIC STADDON.

Not We specially commend the letters received from Miss Lewis (Edinburgh), Raymond Taunton (Coventry), make S. Chesterfield (London, W.), Rev. F. Hern (Row-ann's Castle), Miss C. M. Walkerdine (London, S.W.), spe of Anne Goodwin (Clapham), Norah E. Goodbody sb Tale; Co.), R. H. Kipling (Devonport), M. Andrew
i to John Shields, E. F. Seymour (Kilburn), Margaret e Donnell (Glasgow), H. Caby (Fordham), E. Summers
e Jukinfeld), Miss Norcott (West Kirby), Ethel M. Corke
i (Norwich), S. J. Morrison (Barrow-in-Furness), Norman i Palethorpe (Norwich), Alice Wise (Leicester), Rev. E. C.
Lansdown (S. Woodford), L. H. Corke (Heaton Moor),
Elizabeth K. Packard (Southall), M. T. Craig (Bradford),
A. Lee, Junior (Southport), Chas. Parkin (Felling-on-Tyne), C. A. Bayley (Bangor), M. E. A. Phipps (York), Evelyn M. Abbott (Old Malton), Moira Carew (Kingston),
Joseph Smith (Leeds), W. Jevons (Dalston), E. Rinnon;
Doris Dean (Burnley), E. A. Pearson (Fleet), Gwendolen
D. Harold (High Barnet), D. Forster (Swansea), Miss
F. Briggs (Crownhill), Frances A. S. Holbrow (Maidstone),
Miss Lewis (Edinburgh), E. H. Towler (Hale), P. J.
Frowley (Birkenhead), Lawrence Tarr (Wanstead),
Ernest A. Fuller (Greenwich), Thos. Law (Holytown),

St. Paul's, from the Thames.

From "English Hours," by Henry James (Heinemann).

Frank Brebuer, Junior (Aberdeen), Mrs. Stuart C. Low (Blairgowrie), R. S. Pollard (Pontefract), J. D. Malcom (Bacup).

IV.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best Review in not more than a hundred words is awarded to Miss Irene Pollock Lalonde, of 14, Forester Road, Bath, for the following:

COME RACK! COME ROPE! By R. H. BENSON.
(Hutchinson.)

This book is the work of a true literary artist and a real historian. It tells of the persecution of the Roman Catholics by Elizabeth, and though written by a priest, the most bigoted Protestant must be stirred to deep sympathy with the sufferers. Mr. Benson has here created some of the most beautiful characters in fiction. Marjorie, the heroine, is a glorious conception; Robin is a fine portrait of a loyal priest. The author has made a living being of Mary Queen of Scots, full of appeal and sorrow. The book abounds in fine descriptive passages, vivid and moving.

We also select for printing:

AMONG FAMOUS BOOKS. By JOHN KELMAN, D.D.
(Hodder & Stoughton.)

This is decidedly a book to read, a book to study, and a book on which to found a course of reading. "The general theme," as the author tells us, is "that constant struggle between paganism and idealism which is the deepest fact in the life of man, and whose story provides . . . the matter of all vital literature." Famous books of the classical age, the sixteenth century, and modern times are dealt with. Spiritual fervour, like a refreshing invigorating stream, courses through the pages. Wide reading, marked literary ability, and a genial style stamp the book from cover to cover.

(George Brown, "Brookfield," Darvel, Ayrshire.)

THE BRONTES. By MISS FLORA MASSON. "The People's Books," 6d. (T. C. & E. C. Jack.)

A more readable book would be difficult to find. The Brontes exercise a perennial fascination over imaginative and thoughtful minds. The pathos of their lives, the triumph of their genius, and the glory of the moors around Haworth, are pictured with a charm and vividness that make the book altogether delightful. It is full of knowledge and understanding. All the salient facts are given, with an accuracy combined with a condensed fullness truly admirable.

Its fine critical judgment, high tone and illumination are most praiseworthy. Could the Brontes be conscious of this latest appreciation they would rejoice indeed.

(R. H. Kipling, 62, Alcester Street, Devonport.)

WHERE ARE YOU GOING TO . . . ? By ELIZABETH ROBINS. (Heinemann.)

This novel deals, in an outspoken though never crude way, with one of the darkest blots of civilization—the "White Slave Traffic." Two charming country girls go to visit a London aunt whom they have never seen and by a very ingenious and by no means impossible plot they are lured to an infamous house. The elder sister is helped to escape, but the lovable Betty is never seen again. In the end the sister finds peace, thinking Betty dead, and the book closes on the dominant note of faith that—"in mortal ill is the seed of immortal good."

(Ethel Tudge, 49, St. Paul's Avenue, Cricklewood, N.W.)

Good reviews were also sent in by the following: M. Molyneux (Torquay), M. A. Newman (Framlingham), D. Burchell Friend (Burgess Hill), Ernest F. Seymour (Kilburn, N.W.), M. M. Maclean (Glasgow, W.), Pamela Mary Hinkson (Shankhill, Co. Dublin), Miss Bradshaw-Isherwood (Colchester), J. D. Irene Waugh (Toddington, Bedfordshire), Sybil Waller (London, S.W.), Miss Van der Pant (Highgate, N.), M. Whitaker (Dewsbury), N. Ramani (Chepauk, Madras), Enid Fletcher (Nottingham), Lucy G. Chamberlain (Llandudno), Miss L. Mugford (South Norwood Hill), Anon (Park Street, Chatteris), Georgine Ellis Hargreaves (London, S.W.), Anon. (Casa Francesca, Bordighera), K. S. Jackson (Streat-ham), Marjorie C. Barnard (London, S.W.), N. Raghunathan (Chepauk Gardens, Madras), James A. Richards (Tenby), Margaret Y. Craig (Bradford), V.—THE PRIZE OF ONE YEAR'S SUBSCRIPTION TO "THE BOOKMAN" is awarded to Miss Jane Purcell, of Turbotston, Coole, Westmeath.

* GRAY'S LETTERS.*

BY PROFESSOR GEORGE SAINTSBURY.

THE death of the editor of these most welcome and interesting volumes, just before the publication of the last of them, is greatly to be regretted, for he has left no more accurate and indefatigable scholar of his class behind, and he was one of those of whom all who know them speak well, without, apparently, any of the unspoken drawbacks sometimes associated with that phrase. But, on the other hand, he had the advantage, not always vouchsafed, of having finished his work, after executing it in such a fashion that (putting the chance of new discoveries of MSS. aside) it will be a very long time indeed before it requires re-doing.

That the actual doing was needful can, as one steadily reads or re-reads through the result of it, hardly be denied. Gray's letters have been long admitted to be all but—if not actually—of the best in English; and they have not wanted for editors of credit and renown. But inauspicious stars of various kinds have yoked against them. Gray, who "never spoke out," still less ever intended to "write out" in such a fashion. It is as certain that he never dreamt of his letters being published as that his friend-enemy-friend, counterpart, and in a manner commentator, Horace Walpole, very frequently and deliberately dreamed of such a thing. Either he or his copyist constantly omitted dates; and, as he hardly wrote to anybody who was not a very intimate friend, he made endless references and allusions which are by no means easy to interpret with precision. But these internal difficulties are as nothing to the external. Mason, his first editor, is one of those persons whose posthumous unreadableness has been a blessing to them, and whose contemporary toleration by other persons greater than themselves has somehow helped to smuggle them through with posterity. Although it is almost impossible that anyone should really know Mason's works and deeds without feeling contempt for him and them, he has seldom had his deserts in the way of blame, and has sometimes had much more than his deserts in the way of praise or "letting off." Even Mr. Tovey, though he supplies us with a good measure of the facts, and occasionally says something sarcastic about them, does not, in the excellent Gallicism, "tell Mason his fact" as he might have done. Now this covetous, spiteful, envious sciolist-poetaster-toady, whose own verse is customarily twaddle and bombast, sometimes seasoned with now vapid venom, gave, in the editio princeps of such of Gray's letters as he published, one of the worst existing specimens of the lax editorial ideas of the time and of his own particular and personal defects. A lecture on the Art of Garbling could hardly take a better text than Mason's dealings with Gray.

Nor did what escaped the hands of "Skroddles" (as Gray called him, with his own particular mixture of affection and contempt) always fare much better. In a large proportion of instances we have only copies, and those admittedly copies which, sometimes with the best intentions, have been doctored; while for a long time the letters actually printed were scattered about in different publications. There is no necessity here to discuss either the good deeds or the shortcomings of Mitford and of Mr. Gosse. It is quite sufficient to say that they left plenty for Mr. Tovey to do; and that in what must have been some thirty years' labour (for his first volume, which had taken a long time to prepare, appeared in 1893) he did it. Whether he would not have been better advised if he had simply done it without any but ceremonious notice of his predecessors is another question. The present writer, after finding plenty of fault, and having had plenty of fault found with him in such cases, is of a more deliberate opinion that the most perfect way of editing is to take the advice of Prior in another matter—to be "a little blind (while duly correcting them)" in the predecessors' faults, to be very kind to their merits, and, for the rest, to "clap your padlock" on your own tongue and pen.

But these things are shallows and miseries. What is important is that Mr. Tovey has given us (with a body of annotation which probably no other man except Mr. Austin Dobson could have rivalled) the amplest and most accurate text yet provided of a set of documents not easy to parallel in literary interest. He himself refers, in prefacing the reprint of his first volume, to a dictum of some reviewer that he had tried to "set back the clock" by holding a different view of Gray from that put forth by Mr. Arnold. That somebody should have said this need not surprise us, for it formulates a not uncommon, though a hopelessly wrong, view of criticism. It is only a "clock" of this, in the sense that the (though at longer intervals) always come round again to the same places: there is none in the sense that they ever tell any absolute or irreparable time. The criticism is a nunc stans, in that every critical utterance is the result at the moment of three factors—the critic, the criticised, the temperament, nature, knowledge, and the circumstances in which the two come together. It cannot antedate or be antiquated by any other conjunction of the kind unless, which is practically impossible, this conjunction could take place with facts indistinguishable from its own. And if this could take place, the result would not be a difference but a repetition.

However, we need not talk critical metaphysics, even though they be certain truths. Mr. Tovey, once more, has provided us with every facility for judging one of the most curious, complicated, and to some extent enigmatical, characters in our literary history. On one point, that on which the reviewer above mentioned was writing, he is certainly right and Mr. Arnold was quite wrong. The time and the milieu do not account for Gray's comparative sterility, not merely in poetry, but in accomplished work of any kind. He would probably—by no means certainly—have done more critical work than he did if he had lived a century later; and a great gain that would have been. But it is very doubtful whether he would have written any more poetry; by no means certain that, if he had, that poetry would have been different in character, and at least possible that he might have written none at all. "If I do not write much," said he himself, "it is because I cannot." Indeed, had he lived a hundred years later, from the most probably adjusted horoscope it seems likely that he would have become a Professor very early, but of course not a sinecure professor, of some things historical, literary or scientific, and would have spent the rest of his life perpetually polishing, supplementing, and supporting with fresh research, sets of lectures, which he would never have published at all, and which would have been found after his death as mostly scraps of notes.

* "The Letters of Thomas Gray." Edited by D. C. Tovey. In three volumes. (London: G. Bell & Sons.)

That there was "a bad side of human nature" in it may be allowed without any of the injustice of its application of the phrase to Biddy in "Great Expectations." He had some, and indeed several, of the worst qualities which the age-long injustice of man has agreed to call feminine. He was, it is to be feared, of a spiteful, and more than a little "tenacious," "Tale," as the fashioned folk said. Although we do not know the whole truth about the Walpole quarrel, from what we do know Walpole cuts not only a better but (which one might hardly expect) a manlier figure than Gray. In that hasty Hegira from Peterhouse to Pembroke, where the "tub of water" plays a more furiously contested part than the "glass" of that element, a little earlier in politics and later in drama—the "Petrenchians" showed themselves, no doubt, as undergraduates too often do, rowdy cubs. But a male old maid, occupying a set of rooms on the same staircase, in an anomalous position as neither "man" nor "don," and known to have an almost monomaniacal dread of fire and a touchiness also almost akin to mania, is really too tempting an opportunity even for undergraduates who are not exceptionally "or cubbish." There is no need to multiply instances; they are known to every one who has read the popular "life" of Gray. That he was, on the other hand, singularly affectionate to his few actual friends is at once to be granted; and if he was not wholly free from intellectual vanity, or at least Pharisaical, he at least seems to have managed to steer clear of the much less pardonable intellectual arrogance which disgraced many great men of letters and not a few

On one point, however, of his intellectual, if not of his moral, character these letters throw light which has never—though some attempts have been made to do it—been thoroughly collected, focussed and analysed. It may be said without rashness, on the evidence they contain, that Gray might have been, and even in embryo or specimen was, one of the very greatest critics in English literary history. It is exceedingly doubtful—this, at least, has often been seen and put—whether his criticism did not get in the way of his own poetry. When we see the endless pains and the sleepless acumen which he wastes on buck-washing, or, as he himself more gracefully puts it, "hoeing," Mason's flimsy or blowzy rhetoric, and his tinsel or fustian conceits, one can understand the years that were spent on "Odicles" like the "Elegy" and the "Bard" and the "Progress of Poesy," and can see pretty clearly that this critical meticulousness probably caused the actual abortion of much more, and not impossibly harmed what was actually produced, by communicating to it an air of apparatus, a smell of the lamp. There are people who, putting the "Elegy" aside as an unique windfall of the "middle" Muses, wrought to its masterly actuality enough, and not too much, prefer to everything else that Gray has written the "Cat" piece and the unfinished "Vicissitude" ode. Now, on the first Gray seems (for him) to have spent very little trouble, and the other he seems to have left, jotted and in a pocket-book, for twenty years before his death.

It is, however, with his criticism (almost wholly contained in these volumes), rather than with his poetry, that this article is chiefly intended to deal. Mr. Tovey, seldom severe on his author, is perhaps so here, for he more than hints that Gray's critical faculty dwindled off. Had the fact been so, it would have been an almost unique exception to a practically universal rule; but Mr. Tovey's remark is based almost solely on the again meticulous objections to Beattie's "Minstrel." They are, indeed, not so happy as the earlier ones of the same kind on Mason. But it must be remembered, first, that they were written in the very last stage of Gray's life, when his physical powers were rapidly breaking; and, secondly, that Beattie, though a much less offensive person than Mason, was not a much better poet, and was a mere acquaintance, not an intimate friend. Selections of Gray's critical dicta have already been made, and might be largely increased, which prove him to have had a really extraordinary critical genius; and a detailed examination of his attitude to Macpherson and to Chatterton (which might, at first sight, seem dangerous to this conclusion) would in the long run only support it.

It may, however, be conceded that as Gray never "spoke out" and seldom "wrote out," so he was deficient in the power, or at least the habit, of "thinking out." Compare, for instance, his politics with those of his opposite, and in a sense enemy, Johnson. The question is not in the least, to any reasonable person, whether Gray was "right" in being a Whig, or Johnson in being a Tory. But no clear-eyed judge, whatever his own principles, can fail to see that Johnson's Toryism, right or wrong, was based on principle; and it is very difficult to discover any principle at all in Gray's Whiggism. There is not the slightest trace in him of Collins's sincere, though rather visionary and "literary," Republicanism. One looks in vain for even a symptom of any convinced reverence for the Blessed Revolution. Of sympathy for the people, anticipated cognition of the Rights of Man, or anything of the kind, there is not a vestige. He found himself, in a strong party time, by pure accident a party Whig, and a Whig he remained. But these things were never real to him.

Nothing, indeed, seems to have been real to him except his friends and his books, and latterly his "prospects"; and—beyond all these three, though powerfully assisted by all the prospects and some of the books—a vague, sometimes mistaken, more frequently correct, view, backwards and forwards, of the great Romantic revolution that once had come and again was coming on the world. The well-known story of his startling Nicholls by addressing him personally at the door with his own line:

Hence! avaunt! 'tis holy ground, speaks Gray as well as anything. He knew that there was "holy ground"; but he thought that, as a rule, people were not worthy to tread on it, and he was not quite sure of his own footing there. Personally, it may not be impertinent to say that he gains by a re-perusal of these letters. As in the case of Queen Elizabeth, there has been some scandal about Mr. Gray, and well-meaning, though injudicious, persons have not improved it by destroying or withholding parts of his correspondence as "shocking." Here, as cannot be done in the case of his intellectual character, we may credit his morality with the excuse of "the time," and bother no more about it. That he could be, and was, a good and sincere friend to men, women and children the Wharton letters are sufficient and ample proof; that he had a quaint, dry, only very seldom sharp, humour the whole correspondence tells; that he was a scholar, in the best sense of the term, everything concurs to show. Add to this that he wrote, if a small amount of our poetry, an astonishing proportion of that which hits the public and escapes the hits of critics, as very little poetry does, and we may certainly risk changing the tense of the tag with a Quis vituperabit?

New Books.

THE MAN OF CONSCIENCE.*

In the vast assembly-room, so to speak, of the eighteenth century we may hear announced the names of types keenly impressed on its life and literature. We watch the guests as they walk in. There is the "Man of Sentiment" (and, of course, the woman), the "Man of Honour," the "Man of Sensibility." William Windham was that rarer presence, the "Man of Conscience." But his conscience was hardly normal. What a curious compound it was, how whimsically mixed with other elements, the letters comprised in these two volumes would alone serve to show. The portraits, too, combining fiery eyes with hesitating lips, well hint the contrasts. Windham could be odd without being imaginative, acute without being original, and chivalrous without being romantic. Indeed, except in this vital matter of his conscience, his famous eccentricities seem to lie rather on the surface. But never was a conscience so off the lines or chameleon; it eclipsed Launcelot Gobbo's. It refined, and perpetually it really meant vacillation. At his début it led him to choose a career which did not fascinate him, and, again, to give up his budding secretaryship to Lord Northampton on the plea of ill-health in Ireland. Politically, it led him to start in the Coalition of those incompatibles, Fox and North. Yet it led him, as years proceeded, to start in his lot successively with Pitt, whom he grew to respect, and Fox, whom he can never have liked—in a word, with Mont Blanc and Mount Etna. It led him to take up with Cobbett, to whom he addressed a characteristic letter of self-reproach and self-excuse when "All the Talents" included him in its posts of patronage. For conscience he worshipped those old igs, who, in the Duke of Portland's phrase, were "England's natural aristocracy," while he detested their new off-shoots who befriended (or abetted) the French Revolution. Yet, for conscience, too, he rejoined them when tempered by the Grenville. For conscience he resented Pitt's recoil from a crusade for royalty in France, and for conscience, again, he abominated the bare talk of any truce with Napoleon. They called him "Peter the Hermit," a fanatic for the Bourbons. Nor should it be forgotten that in all these respects his conscience was Burke, whom he idolised, and whose influence possessed him. To crown all, for conscience he retired from the stage, though we gain glimpses of his eagerness (doubtless also from conscience) to return. His conscience drove him alternately into the compromise and into zeal. He was an honest casuist—as Disraeli once called Mr. Gladstone, "a Jesuit of the closet, sincerely devout."

Outside politics, it was conscience that dictated his sermonising remonstrance with his friend Cholmondeley for not marrying the charming "Cecy" Forrester, whom for ~~years~~ he himself wedded. And this singular years afterwards ~~he~~ took the adventurous effusion he penned just before he ~~took~~ step of a flight in Sadler's balloon, as, in like manner, he was afterwards to take the adventurous step of remaining in the trenches before the besieged Valenciennes. From a conscientious theory of courage he found as much delight in bull-baiters or bruisers as he did, less prosaically, in dubbing himself Mrs. Crewe's "Redde Crosse Knight." Was not Mrs. Crewe Burke's champion? Conscience led him alike up into the air and along the ground. It kept him often a saint, occasionally a prig, and constantly, though scarcely on a big scale, a hero. Indeed, there were moments when his conscience seems petty, as when on "principle" he refused his homage to the dead Pitt.

Sometimes he contracted with his conscience, and sometimes he coquetted with it, but it was an invalid, and always he coddled it. The habit was congenital, but it also belonged to his early association with Dr. Johnson, the scene of whose death-bed is here so touchingly and intimately rendered. Johnson schooled young men to

A. Hecks, pinast.

J. Young, scul.

* "The Windham Papers: The Life and Correspondence of the Rt. Hon. William Windham, 1750-1810, and et." With an Introduction by the Rt. Hon. Earl of Rosebery, K.G., K.T. In 2 Vols. 32s. net. (Herbert Jenkins, Limited.)

Charles James Fox
From "Materials, the Papers" (Herbert Jenkins service can of the war-con. document. Official reports lead the "examining" life, to survey themselves in a moral looking-glass and to keep diaries. Windham kept one of the longest, if not one of the minutest, in existence. He became his own Boswell.

"I know," wrote his old friend Elliot in 1793, "that you resolve almost all questions of conduct, small as well as great, into questions of duty. And, if you sometimes hesitate when others would see no room for doubt, it is in a great degree because you are more anxious, and the chance of being wrong is more uneasy to you than almost any man I have ever known." That is a shrewd judgment, but a shrewder was to follow when the arch-hesitator at length took the plunge of being married to his "Cecy" at an age when marriage was unusual. "He will not now," said Elliot, bluntly, "be dodging with the world and playing at whoop with all his friends." In these two pronouncements may be summed up the perplexity both in and about Windham—and the complexity also. But there is another and an earlier sentence from the pen of Burke which gives the secret of his social spell: "A mind," he says, "formed for generosity and friendship." Nobody had more friends than Windham, and nobody better deserved them. He loved society, not company—a usual distinction. Burke loved him, and lavished all the fire of his nature on their sympathetic intercourse. Two things burnt themselves into Burke as his days—and his day—declined. The one was the Warren Hastings who had escaped, and the other the French Revolution that had succeeded. He spared neither (and the latter, rightly) one spark of his Promethean flame. In reading their correspondence Windham's part reduces itself by comparison into a mere official libretto to the music of Burke's high indignation. None the less there is good writing in Windham's rather monotonous letters, though not enough to explain the effects both of his unstudied converse and his set oratory—"Stellas inter luna minores," as Johnson termed him on the threshold of his career. Just as Burke reads better than, apparently, he sounded, Windham must have sounded better than, generally, he reads. At any rate he could enthrall Mrs. Crewe, and Mrs. Crewe had been enthralled by the fresh genius of Sheridan. Great wit has been ascribed to Windham, but not the best specimens are recorded in this collection. The best, to my mind and knowledge, finds no place there. When the Warren Hastings trial was dividing parties, and the Whigs were espousing the cause of the reckless heir to the throne, "I had rather," urged Windham, "be drowned in the river Ganges than wrecked off the coast of Wales." As years and conduct severed him and Sheridan it may be recalled how sweetly Windham spoke in his diary of Sheridan's charm when they met once again in Hampstead and at Mrs. Crewe's.* When he had once decided that his duty was to bury the hatchet nobody could raise a

On one point and artistic over it than Windham. his moral character the audience—though these pages do ne more elegant than any attempts which had been among the school of the School for Scandal.

The story is long, and striking are the personages. Windham was born for literary leisure, but his Norfolk home lined him to represent Norwich after a short experience he ways of Dublin Castle. He joined the Whigs and Burke who did the thinking for them. Then came all the fatal sequels and severances of the French upheaval. Windham's letter on Marie Antoinette's doom is perhaps the very best of the long series. Those events sent him, as well as all moderate Whigs, out of the fold into Pitt's Camp. The Coalition was ejected. Pitt won the day, and ruled for nigh eighteen years. For some years Windham was his war-secretary and had much to do with the ill-starred Quiberon expedition. Junctions between Pitt and Fox were tried, but every attempt failed; nor was it till Napoleon's predominance evoked Sheridan's patriotism, that Windham could reapproach any of his ancient allies. Fox and Pitt died; and after Portland's resignation and Percival's end, the Grenvilles thought to have won. Luckily they were foiled. As Byron was to sing in retrospect:

"Where are the Grevilles: out as usual: where My friends the Whigs—exactly where they were."

The letters in these volumes from Pitt and Fox are unenlightening. But Burke's and, years later, Cobbett's are the reverse. Though far asunder as the poles in diction and cultivation, their outlook, strangely enough, is not unlike. These are the two impressive personalities—if we except Johnson—in these pages. There are many others. Malone, the discursive; the unruffled Duke of Portland—and of his party; Grey, "the boy who tossed his head so high"; that perennial pedant, Dr. Parr, and a weird but interesting French émigré who fled to America and discoursed about "the United States." Hazlitt, too, sends Windham a prospectus of his third inflated rehearsal for literature. We hear of Boswell's death, and it may comfort some to whom Madame D'Arblay's purring self-conscientiousness is annoying to know that Windham, who knew her set, refers to her as "Madame D'Arblay or whatever the name is." We meet Dr. French Laurence, too, the talented friend of Sheridan and contributor to the Rolliad. But the commentator does not always supply details.

Windham haunted Bath, and Bath haunted him, as it did so many of his compeers. Writing thence, poor fellow, after he had given up politics, he sighs to Mrs. Crewe on the day that Parliament reassembled that he feels "just like an old dragoon-horse at the sound of a trumpet."

His last illness was caused by a deed of self-sacrifice, and his last actions were to spare his "Cecy" even the knowledge of his state. The work under review is perhaps more a "mémoire-à-servir" than a reanimation, nor will Windham ever survive as a magnetic force. But as a great talent and a good man, without ever being goody, he will surely endure in the picture-gallery of his age. If we could but hear his voice we should feel more of a charm that enchanted his generation.

WALTER SICHEL.

THE CREED IN HUMAN LIFE.*

This is not a discussion of the place of creeds in human life, nor an historical survey of the effect of creeds. It is, as the sub-title explains, "a devotional commentary for everyday use." The author has had the idea of taking up successively the clauses of the Apostles' Creed, and illustrating its spiritual value in a series of chapters, each of which contains copious extracts, woven together, from religious writers, or from general literature. This is done in a comely book with good margins. It is pleasant to read, and the author is probably correct in surmising that a number of devout people will welcome such an aid. It is not easy to be original in giving form to devotional literature. The popular shapes into which it is thrown are fairly stereotyped by this time. But the writer of this manual has managed to strike out a fresh line; he has evidently read widely, and the impression made by the book, if read slowly, is decidedly good. Naturally, it is not a volume which is to be criticised from the strict dogmatic or technical point of view. Otherwise, one would require to demur to a remark on p. 9:

"That the Apostles framed this as it stands may be reasonably questioned; that it 'voices the confessions of Sts. Peter, Paul, Bartholomew and Thomas' cannot for a moment be impugned."

This is not exactly how a historian would express himself. Again there are some misprints or misquotations, which might be corrected in another edition. Thus, Clough did not say, "It gratifies my soul to know that though I perish truth is so!" What he wrote was: "It fortifies my soul." Which is a very different thing. Father Tyrell's name appears throughout with one "r,"—which is a small matter, but these are the trifles that are apt to annoy careful people even when they are in quest of devotional stimulus. Apart from such details, however, the book is carefully and deftly compiled. "The first chapter on the virgin-birth is entitled, "On the Wings of a Dove"; that on the Holy Ghost, "The Breath of God"; that on the forgiveness of sins, "All That Debt." The author shows an equal dexterity in combining his quotations, which are sufficiently catholic. W. D. Howells stands next to McChyne on one page, Shakespeare and S. Rutherford are side by side on another. But his own comments and reflections are not to be passed over. A fair specimen is afforded by his remarks on p. 341 :

* "The Creed in Human Life: A Devotional Commentary for Everyday Use." By Maurice Clare. 6s. net. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

"A thoughtful man once remarked to me that he never read those sentences of the Litany in the English Prayer Book without inwardly shuddering at the battle of principalities and powers arrayed against him—those five sentences beginning 'From all evil and mischief,' in which spiritual dangers came about one like bees. Always, he said, he was reminded of the incident of Rorke's Drift, where the Englishmen (Chard and Bromhead, if I mistake not) held their desperate position hour by hour and inch by inch, against the yelling, rapacious, implacable onslaught of innumerable enemies avid for their blood. It seemed, to all human seeming, a hopeless case . . . yet rescue came at the eleventh hour."

Or again, this comment on p. 215 :

"To be given another chance—that, in plain English, is the meaning of the Resurrection for us, now in this present life—for it hath promise of the life that now is. To be raised from lethal torpor, stimulated from a moribund coma, to something new and eloquent of a golden future. To turn over a new leaf, and let the old pages be put away and forgotten."

The chief criticism which might be passed on the volume is perhaps that the writer has sometimes put too little of himself into its pages. Sometimes he could have said what he has chosen to seek in a quotation, and sometimes, it must be confessed, the quotations are neither quite relevant nor necessary. Thus, for example, the ironical phrase of Omar Khayyám, "He knows about it all—He knows. He knows," is cited to illustrate the text that our "Father knoweth what things we have need of, before we ask Him." Still, such lapses are not frequent, and in the main the difficult task of the compiler has been managed in such a way as to make for edification.

JAMES MOFFATT, D.D., Litt D.

THE WAR FROM VARIOUS ANGLES.*

The Balkan War continues. At the time of writing, the Chataldja lines are still intact and Adrianople holds her own; but books upon the war already begin to multiply, dealing with that phase of the campaign which ended with the peace negotiations in London. Of the three which lie before me, only one offers actual pictures of warfare, as seen by a man who accompanied troops in the field, the other two attempt a more general survey of the operations in the manner of the historian rather than in that of the war-correspondent. It is, of course, an admirable manner, but it has the defect that it deals with the large contours and salencies of events, and almost of necessity omits the details of which they are made up. It fails to satisfy the very human appetite for news, which, at its best, is only history with the chill off. When matters so recent as Kirk Kilisse and Lule Burgas are in question, few save military experts are likely to be content with—"The 2nd Division was to occupy the districts of Tamras and Kirdjali," and so forth. It tells us nothing and it may not even be true. Lieutenant Wagner, who offers his new-made reputation to examination in "With the Victorious Bulgarians" (Constable), might, we feel, do better than this.

* "With the Conquered Turk." By Lionel James, 2s. net (Nelson.)—"The Balkan War Drama." By a Special Correspondent, 3s. 6d. net. (Melrose.)—"With the Victorious Bulgarians." By Lieutenant Wagner, 7s. 6d. net. (Constable.)

Arrival of King Ferdinand at Mustapha Pasha.
From "With the Victorious Bulgarians" (Constable).

Major Lionel James, the distinguished war-correspondent of The Times, adopts the other method. He was fortunate in being accredited to the Turkish Army, whose arrangements for the control and supervision of correspondents early broke down, leaving the newspaper men to their own devices. He covered a great deal of country, and saw more fighting than most, and it is a record of his own experiences and observations which he presents in "With the Conquered Turk" (Nelson).

"It does not," he says, "profess to be a history of the Balkan War, or even a comprehensive account of the Turkish operations throughout Macedonia. It is really only a narrative of the Turkish campaign in Thrace, as far as it was possible for one single correspondent to follow it, and to furnish his newspaper with a consecutive narrative."

Major James, with his companions, arrived by train from Constantinople at Seidler in time to see the arrival of the terrified peasants who were fleeing from the neighbourhood of Kirk Kilisse after the Turkish reverse there and to meet a train crowded with panic-stricken soldiers. He broke away from his official keepers in time to witness the chief part of the great battle of Lule Burgas, passing on his way the men who had been beaten at Yenidje. A convoy of wounded was a sight that horrified him.

"The condition of the poor fellows in the wagons was terrible. They were heaped upon each other. Out of the debris of what had been half-a-dozen men a reeking face pushed itself above the side of the cart—a great bloody socket where once there had been an eye—and the swollen lips imploring mercy."

"The car was scarcely clear of the sick convoy when it ran into another concourse of men—all robust and strong: it was a great rabble of soldiers, many of whom were without means. The men were totally disorganised, and were making their way south without any attempt at military formation."

He viewed the essential movements of the battle of Lule Burgas, and witnessed the retirement of Ahmed Abouk's corps from its advanced position. These were men of another kind to those he had met in flight. As they moved out of their trenches and marched rearward the Bulgarian gunners commenced a heavy shrapnel fire at them.

"The whole armament seemed to be turned into a Hades by the whip-like crackling of this devilish instrument of war. Let the Bulgarian gunners burst their shrapnel never so rapidly, never so accurately, they were unable to make those Turkish troops move one pulse more quickly than if their retirement were a parade operation."

He also saw much of the struggle when the Turks had at last been driven back behind the Chataldja lines. His narrative, brisk and personal, allows the reader to see as it were over his shoulder the current of the great events of which he chronicles incidents. He has a sporting zest in his work which he succeeds in communicating, and his story is always vivid and simple. Major James holds that the Bulgarian censorship has wrecked for ever the idea, dear to the generals, that an official news service can supply the place of the war-correspondent. Official reports are unreliable; often they proved badly false; and only in a small country like Bulgaria can they be forced upon an obedient public in lieu of actual news.

The author of "The Balkan War Drama" (Melrose) disclaims in his preface any pretensions to write "a classic account" of the war. His object is to state the conditions under which the war became first possible and then inevitable, to show, in broad outline, the course it took and its effects, so far as they are visible. His qualifications for the task consist in a clear vision of the general facts of the situation, sound local knowledge, discrimination in the use of officially-supplied information, and a certain impartiality which enables him to criticise Servians, Bulgarians and Turks alike. He condemns severely, and with justice, King Ferdinand's device to give to a political and racial struggle the colour of a holy war of the Cross against the Crescent. "The world has not been created for the special benefit of the Balkan confederation," and such action as this may have unforeseen effects upon the affairs of powers like England and France, whose Moslem subjects number many millions. It undoubtedly embittered the struggle in Turkey. In Mustafa Pasha, the Moslem civilians fled before the oncoming Bulgarian Army, and Christians chalked crosses on their doors as a safeguard against looting. At the flight from Uskub all Ottoman Christians painted crosses on their caps to proclaim their religion, counting on it to save their lives. "This," says the author, "it undoubtedly did in most cases." There is reference, too, to General Zivkovitch, "who had the reputation of being the most savage officer in the Servian Army." This crusader against the Crescent operated in Albania. "It is significant that he has sent back no prisoners, and that one learnt in conversation with Servian officers that none were expected." Nobody pretends that the Turk, on his side, has been guiltless of acts of atrocity; but it is well to realise that in this war, which began as a war of liberation, flamed thence into a crusade, and is finishing as an enterprise of territorial expansion, inhuman cruelty is not a character of one side more than of the other.

Lieutenant Wagner, the correspondent of the Reichspost, comes to judgment with a disappointing book. The author of the despatch in the Daily Mail of November 2nd has much to explain, and in a chapter devoted to explanations he explains exactly nothing. In that despatch, cabled from Starasagora on October 31st, he related how he had just returned from three days "at the front," how his poor horse could hardly move another step, and how he had not had his clothes off for three nights, and went on to describe the great battle which stretched between Lule Burgas and Bunar Hissar. In "With the Victorious Bulgarians" (Constable), there is nothing of all this; the long account of the battle contains no word that could convey that Lieutenant Wagner was ever within a hundred miles of it. In point of mere fact, he never was. The facsimile telegram, which he publishes, shows that on October 30th he was at Lubimetz, where he admits he arrived, not on a weary horse, but by train.

His book is a curious production. Despite many inaccuracies and many claims to authority, which are ill-founded, it does contrive in a large vague way to show the war, the changing shape of it, and some glimpses of what Major James calls the "mire of diplomacy" that fouled the feet of the allies. He bombards a town that never was bombarded—and that is strange, for anyone was free to visit Kirk Kilisse. He kills off nearly half the Bulgarian cavalry; he makes divisions of troops jump about the map in the strangest fashion; he even publishes a map which places the Bulgarian Second Army that army which kept us all before Adrianople till our hearts broke—just outside Chataldja. But the general view is there. It is his theory that the modern war-correspondent has no business to see too much fighting; it distorts his vision of the war as a whole. He "cannot do better than place himself directly or indirectly in close relation with those quarters where, in the regular course of the service, full reports of the engagements and movements that have, taken place are received, and where he can also obtain a general idea of operations that are contemplated or are actually in progress." Yes, that is the place for the war-correspondent, without a doubt; but there is no such place. Therefore, his business is to work as Major James worked, to use such knowledge of war as he has, to judge the trend of events as best he can, to see actualities for himself over as wide an area as his means of transport and facilities for telegraphing permit. His only alternative is to accept and transcribe official reports. But perhaps that is what Lieutenant Wagner means.

PERCEVAL GIBBON.

PHILOSOPHY AT THE CROSS-ROADS.*

The mind of Vernon Lee has always dwelt on the narrow dividing line between aesthetics and philosophy: she is as much at home in the mysticism of the "Divine Comedy" as in the Sistine Chapel. But in her new book, "Vital Lies," she plunges straight into the depths of the sea of logic, her objective being Professor William James and his pragmatist followers whom she finds to be guilty of a mental heresy that bids fair, if allowed to persist, to overthrow the structure of thought in religion, philosophy, and practical life.

Put in a nutshell, her charge against the new Pragmatists is that, instead of merely acknowledging, as Plato did centuries ago and Ibsen but yesterday, that the fallacies and delusions of humanity have constantly served a useful purpose in its upward march, Professor James roundly asserts that to be useful is to be true, and that whatever is useful to man is always true, thus altogether dethroning from its seat that Ideal Truth which has been, of all the divinities served by the race, the one great supreme objective of its intellectual worship. For instance, Professor James would argue that, since ancestor-worship undoubtedly served a useful purpose at one time in preserving the younger generation, ancestor survival must therefore be true. And Truth Vernon Lee defines with delightful exactitude as that which does not care a button what you think of it, which, in short, goes on "being" with supreme disregard of your opinions. Thus, out of the simple idea at the base of Pragmatism, viz., that it is wise to test every principle by its "cash value in experience" Professor James has constructed the two theories of Will-to-Believe and Will-to-Make-Others-Believe, building, of course, on the proven fact in psychology that mankind not only has always woven a web of sophistry in order to satisfy its desires, but also possesses almost unlimited powers of hypnotising itself into belief. It is this latter power in fact which philosophers have always combated and advertisers exploited. Here, for the first time, we have from philosophers like William James and Mr. Schiller the statement, or rather the implication, that mankind's age-long search for Truth is itself a fallacy, and that since we cannot hope to know truth absolute we should be wiser to identify the true with the useful. Truth is, for Professor James, not that which persists whatever man may think of it, but is instead, like Aphrodite, a thing "born of a foaming sea of desires." Opinion is therefore to be identified with truth.

Perhaps the most amazing thing about this theory of Truth as promulgated by the author of "Varieties of Religious Experience" is the calmness with which it has been received. For truth to external fact is the aim of science, as truth to idea is the object of philosophy, in either case not truth as gauged by its usefulness or non-usefulness to humanity but as expressing law. For all the ages since thought began this has been man's attitude to the seen and the unseen. And although he has often shrunk back from the face of truth, he has always returned once more to contemplate it, terrors and all. True it is that he has constantly cherished delusions, has often moved upwards buoyed by a lie, but always on condition that when once the delusion is seen to be delusion, he shall cast it off.

* "Vital Lies." By Vernon Lee. 2 Vols. 10s. net. (John Lane.)

And therein lies the point of attack for the author of "Vital Lies," who declares most justly that a hope is no longer a hope when known to be false, nor can a lie deceive when it is known to be a lie. The Will-to-Believe implies therefore, hypnotism, mental sleight of hand self-practised. More than that, she has no difficulty in showing that if the experience of the religious mystic is not caused by any answer coming from the soul of the universe to man's cry then, even though we call ecstasy the gift of the Spirit, it is born of passion and excitement, and is no more worthy of respect than the elation due to alcohol or ether. So, too, of course, does Professor James see the "evidence" of mysticism, yet he would deliberately encourage it, even after its origin is confessed, as a pleasure. For mental life is thus to be reduced to a search for anodynes or intoxicants. Much ancient as well as modern practice is undoubtedly based on this fallacy of taking opinion for truth, merely because it is comforting. But then it is done with the eyes shut, not open.

Perhaps the most effective part of "Vital Lies" is its analysis of the modernist position in the Church of Rome as illustrated by the mental attitude of Father Tyrrell. Vernon Lee shows how that most truth-loving personality went all the way with the destructive work of modern history and science in regard to the origins of the Christian religion, how it went further than many Liberal Protestants, but stopped short suddenly at the view of the Sacraments which alleges that here, and nowhere else, the Divinity answers to the call of His creature. Life, in fact, to Father Tyrrell would have been impossible without this article of belief: therefore his need created his faith, thus exemplifying the terrible power of this Will-to-Believe in the life of religion. It is, however, from the anthropologist, Professor Crawley, that is derived the most startling instance of the Will-to-Make-Others-Believe. For although Professor Crawley believes that he has proved, to his own satisfaction at any rate, that all the dogmas of religion are derived from the practices of savage races whereby they protected themselves from evil spirits, he yet advocates the teaching of the Church Catechism as a panacea for the growth of Socialism. According to this line of thought, it is right for the teachers of the people to teach, not what they themselves believe, but what it is supposed will counteract evil tendencies in the people themselves. Finally by a combination of the Will-to-Make-Others-Believe what is good for them, we find M. Sorel actually advocating that Syndicalism and the Myth of the General Strike should be preached, simply because the General Strike is a logical impossibility which can never take place. And the teachers of it know this to be the case: they are advised to teach it everywhere simply because the belief in it will lead the proletariat to a passionate devotion to their order which would never be roused by anything short of a myth.

In "Vital Lies" we are, in fact, face to face with a problem which has for long been disturbing the minds of practical thinkers, namely, must we return to what was always the practice of the ancient churches, the use of an esoteric, as well as an exoteric, profession of faith? And if we do this, in philosophy, in politics, and in religion, how are we to deal with that inevitable sense of hypocrisy which must arise in the minds of teachers trained in the school of later Christianity when they are asked to preach, not what they believe, but what they are told is good for the people? No question could be more important than this, for many signs there are to show that philosophy, at any rate, is indeed at the Cross Roads. "Vital Lies" then deals with a danger that, as it seems to us, strikes at the very root of mental integrity in all branches of intellectual work, a danger the more likely to mislead because it comes from the hands of such men as Professor William James and M. Bergson. As a work of literature it is not always easy to read since it disintegrates false reasoning by close analysis rather than by frontal attack, but it is often fascinating and nearly always compelling in its logic. Nor can it be described as anything but clear and masterly in its summing-up, which runs thus:

"'Vital Lies' are among the devices with which the Gods, possibly blind (perhaps because their eyes are unlike ours), shape us and our destinies out of the material of our own desires and powers. But 'Vital Lies' are not articles of common or domestic utility, to be made by Man for Man's own using, still less things which men can discuss, and of which they can lend one another the pattern!"

We commend the book to the attention of all serious thinkers, for it is one which cannot safely be neglected.

M. P. WILLCOCKS

WARDS OF THE STATE.*

All that Mr. Tighe Hopkins writes on prisons and their inmates we receive with respect and read with attention. Indeed, Mr. Hopkins writes so well that attention is inevitable, so keenly is our interest aroused. In the present volume we have the fruit of wide reading on the literature of prisons the writings of ex-prisoners, and ex-prison governors, blue books, and other official documents, all have been closely studied by the author—and of equally wide and sympathetic observation. Not content with imparting a knowledge of prison life as extensive and peculiar as Mr. Weller's knowledge of London, and with appealing to the better sense of mankind against the follies and cruelties still practised in many a gaol, Mr. Hopkins points out where improvements have been made, and the prospect of still greater changes for the better in penal administration.

In the main "Wards of the State" is concerned with the effects of imprisonment upon the prisoner, and chiefly in Great Britain. But conditions in America come in for a good deal of notice, and half-a-dozen chapters—under the general title "Preventive" discuss fingerprints, the importance of microscope and camera in the detection of crime, Professor Munsterberg's "Psychology and Crime," police dogs, and jiu-jitsu. The great mass of evidence produced by Mr. Hopkins to show "the flagrant utility" of penal servitude as a punishment will probably convince all who have not yet come to that conclusion. For "the testimony against the existing system" comes "occasionally from the judge who passes sentence," from medical officers and chaplains, from unpaid visitors, from Parliamentary reports, and "from every intelligent prisoner who has the ability and the courage to tell us in print what his life as a convict was like and what this life did for him." It is not only that imprisonment itself is "a school of crime," so that an ex-prisoner can declare:

"I do not think I should be overstretching the mark if I said that ninety-nine out of every hundred convicted criminal prisoners leave the prison at the end of their sentence far worse men than when they first entered prison," while another, "the * "Wards of the State: an Unofficial View of Prison and the Prisoner." By Tighe Hopkins. 10s. 6d. net. (Herbert & Daniel.

Mr. Tighe Hopkins.

Author of "Wards of the State" (Herbert & Daniel).

last survivor of the famous gang of forgers who a generation ago succeeded in obtaining £250,000 from the Bank of England," can write :

"The only lesson I learned in prison was submission. The punishment I got I deserved, and I have no complaint to make of any personal injustice. It is the system that is at fault, inasmuch as it punishes without helping a fallen man to regain his self-respect. Many young men who go into prison for one ship are ruined morally within a short time of entering prison. The evil companionship, the degradation of the life, and the shipwreck of all future hopes work the mischief."

But for those dependent on the prisoner, left, in too many cases, practically destitute only to choose between crime and starvation when the prison gate has closed on the bread-winner, imprisonment will also bring ruin. "There may seem at the moment no other way to avoid famishing" than drifting, and drifting in this case is commonly ruin.

Mr. Hopkins dealing with the case of the woman prisoner is emphatic on the assistance given to the cause of prison reform by the suffragist prisoners. He notes that a medical woman Inspector of Prisons was only appointed after the revelations of the suffrage prisoners in 1908-9. "Next there will be a doctor of the sex, and for the sex, in all prisons in which women are confined? At the last we may expect to see a lady on the Prison Commission."

That "the prisons of the women are every whit as useless and as hurtful as the prisons of the men" is one "among many other things we have learned from the suffragettes."

On the "Futility of Flogging," and the "Inequality of Sentences" there are excellent chapters, and the old delusion that garrotting in London was put down by flogging is once more exposed by Mr. Hopkins, two Home Secretaries, Mr. Asquith, and the late Lord Ridley, confirming the fact that "garrotting was put down, without resort to the lash, by a fearless administration of existing criminal law."

From the horrors of the past, the dull and evil stupidities of the present, we may turn to the "new horizons" for prisoners and law-breakers, sighted by penal reformers and the humaner of us. But the reader must learn of these horizons, and of many other items of the prison world in the book, "Wards of the State," itself.

J. C.

PORTRAITS AND SPECULATIONS.*

Mr. Ransome, well-known already by his books on Poe and Wilde, has here collected together nine essays on writers and on matters of literary interest. The first essay is one which recently appeared in The English Review—"Art for Life's Sake." This is a long and somewhat heavy discussion on the real function of art. Mr. Ransome appears to be equally opposed to the two cries of "art for morality's sake" and "art for art's sake." His position is best summarised in his own words.—

"The theory of art for art's sake left its holders at a loss before the question: 'Is no man greater than another, if his works are beautiful, if he is an equally skilful artist?' They knew that he was, but their theory could not tell them why, and they had to take refuge in cynicism. The theory of art for 'morality's' sake was no more satisfying. It suggested that the greatest artist was he who preached the most good, and so left its holders in speechless difficulty before a comparison of Rossetti and Dr. Watts. The theory of art for life's sake has a clear answer, and offers a valid test. That man is the greatest artist who makes us the most profoundly conscious of life. Shakespeare is set above Herrick, who was a better technician, and Leonardo above Murillo, who painted more devotional subjects, on grounds with which men, neither as artists nor as moralists, need quarrel."

The next essay is "Aloysius Bertrand: a Romantic of 1830." Bertrand's is a very small figure in the history of French literature and his chief claim to memory is the fact that his book "Gaspard de la Nuit" is, in some ways, the model on which Baudelaire founded his "Petits Poèmes en Prose." Sainte Beuve wrote on Bertrand and Hugo admired his work, so that he has never lacked a certain amount of solid recognition.

This essay is followed by one on the Retrospection of François Coppée—a light trifle on the melancholy French dreamer who died a few years since.

Then comes one on Nietzsche—a very different type of man. This is a long study that does not seem to shed too much light on its subject. It is curiously difficult to find out what Mr. Ransome does really mean in this paper—his attitude inclines to the negative. But it may, no doubt, be of interest to professed and ardent followers of the philosopher.

Next we have an essay on Walter Pater, which, in its turn also, cannot be called very illuminating. It is rather an analysis of Pater's method and ideas than a criticism upon their value. Mr. Ransome has caught something of his subject's elusive wordiness—a wordiness not less wordy because it is full of sonorous periods.

Then we have an article on Remy de Gourmont—a living Frenchman whose book "Une Nuit au Luxembourg" created almost a sensation when published recently in a translation over here.

Next follows a charming paper on the Japanese poet Yone Noguchi, whose works, as those of another Japanese Yoshio Markino, are published in English. Mr. Ransome has a hearty admiration for his Japanese friend, and announces it boldly. No chance of mistaking his intention in this instance.

And finally, there is an essay entitled, "Kinetic and Potential Speech"—a suggestive essay that would have been of more value had it been put in simpler language. It comes practically to this, that "kinetic speech" is, say, a poem is that which gives the actual meaning, whilst "potential speech" is that which gives the deep, poetical emotion. Listen to Mr. Ransome:—

"We shall find that the nearer poetry approaches to kinetic speech, the more easily is it apprehended by the multitude. Kinetic speech secures its effects by the presentation of facts, situations and stories, which are stuff not so fine as to slip through the coarse meshes of the general understanding. This explains the immediate and wide popularity of such poets as Longfellow, Scott, and Macaulay. Because prose, as a rule, depends more nearly on its kinetic than on its potential utterance, it is, as a rule, the more widely read. When, as in the hands of some nineteenth century writers, it emphasizes the potential element of speech, it correspondingly narrows its public."

Here we shall leave Mr. Ransome. His book is tinged too persistently with the sedate dreariness of a critic who takes himself very seriously. But, on the other hand, it is well written and full of judgments which, if not brilliant, are at least intelligent.

RICHARD CURLE.

DICKENS AND REFORM.*

One might very well be justified in assuming that all phases of the life and writings of Charles Dickens had been thoroughly and adequately investigated and expounded. Of the multifarious articles or the numerous books he has inspired, his social teachings have, perhaps, supplied the text as often as, if not more often, than any other. Yet, until Mr. W. Walter Crotch published "Charles Dickens: Social Reformer," no serious attempt had been made to treat the subject comprehensively or with any degree of finality.

Hitherto the study of Dickens's teachings in this direction had been confined to his humanitarian leanings in his novels, which have invariably left a loop-hole for the sceptical to assert that the views of certain fictitious creations need only be taken as such and not as the honest outpourings of a great man's mind; but the student of Dickens's writings to-day has abundant data and reasons for knowing that the reverse is the case. The novelist's minor writings collected and published during his lifetime, his published letters, and Forster's biography, were not always studied as carefully as they warrant, whilst the recently discovered articles and sketches he contributed to periodical literature, containing as they do his real convictions, constitute material enough to give him rank as one of our greatest reformers and a prophet of no mean order.

* "Portraits and Speculations." By Arthur Ransome. 7s. 6d. net. (Macmillan.)

▼* "Charles Dickens: Social Reformer: The Social Teaching of England's Great Novelist." By W. Walter Crotch. 7s. 6d. net. (Chapman & Hall.)

To estimate this phase of Dickens in its truest and most conscientious manner all this mass of evidence had to be sifted, sorted, arranged in proper sequence, and set up as a concrete monument to his honour. This is what Mr. Crotch has done, and done so honestly, so thoroughly, that scarcely aught else is left to be said on the subject. Such a book was sorely needed. A book, as he says, not to interpret Dickens in this respect, but a book wherein Dickens interprets himself. "Buried in his multitude of novels, drifting through his ephemeral articles for daily and weekly newspapers, are teachings, political and social, which," he says in his preface "I found possessed an appropriateness and significance for even present times. I have sought not to make a book by collecting the teachings indiscriminately, but rather by gathering together in orderly array the arguments duect from Dickens which should illustrate my theory and prove his case." His richest mine has been the little-known "Miscellaneous Papers," which he has woven into their proper place in Dickens's scheme for the amelioration of the ills and wrongs of the people, for which he made his novels the chief vehicle. Such a book craved to be written, and Mr. Crotch has written it, and written it in a manner that merits the greatest praise.

He first deals in general terms with the formative influences of the novelist's early life: the environment in which he worked as a drudge in the old Hungerford Market, his companionship of poverty there and in his home, the effect the life in the Marshalsea Prison had on the boy's mind, and how it all remained engrained in his brain as something wrong to be righted. It taught him the one great truth he so insistently expounded in his books "that it is the poor who are most generous and helpful to the poor; and that they who have experienced the pain of poverty alone can justly comprehend its pangs." Out of all this early life he laid the foundation for all he sought to teach regarding the social relationship between man and man, and did not rest until he had proved that "conviction, were it ever so excellent, is worthless till it convert itself into conduct." As Mr. Crotch puts it, "he regarded his feelings of love for the poor as units in this army of human freedom, and he did expend those feelings in appropriate deeds . . . that those feelings which prompted the demands that social sores should be healed were the direct and obvious outcome of his early environment and experience."

Mr. Crotch then proceeds to elaborate Dickens's instinct for reform. He points out that we are realising it is an unnatural divorce to separate the highest attributes of our humanity from the science of human well-being, and that Dickens, with nothing but his intuitive sympathies, stumbled across the very fact which Ruskin made the basis of his scheme of industrial physiology, namely, that the motive power of man's labour is man's soul. Mr. Crotch quotes Dickens's speech, made in Birmingham in 1869, wherein he said: "My faith in the people governing is, on the whole, infinitesimal; my faith in the people governed is, on the whole, illimitable," a phrase which has been a stumbling block to many, and misconstrued by others who desired to make it serve a different end. Mr. Crotch interprets it as meaning "not that it was good to be governed in the narrow sense in which the word is used, but that Dickens had the profoundest belief that, in spite of the yoke of class government, the people, that great mass of toiling, sinning, erring people, would yet work out their own salvation."

"Dickens was not," says Mr. Crotch, "the exponent of any particular theory of general constructive reform; whilst his teaching was limited to emphasizing the necessity for better sanitation and housing and education, and denouncing the evil of landlordism, the Poor Law, the prison system, gambling, usury, war, slavery, child-labour, sweating and other particular social defects, he yet became the prose-prophet of the cause of social reform itself, and the firm upholder of that which alone is the assurance of its ultimate success, namely, our equality in the primary and fundamental instincts of faith and love and duty. Only from such an equality can just political and social institutions rise and take shape."

Mr. Crotch then devotes a chapter to Dickens's interpretation of childhood, showing how the instinctive grip of boyhood never left the novelist throughout his life, and how "the facts of life had been beaten into his young soul when he was of an age at which most men of letters are leading careless, happy, untroubled lives at school." It might almost be said of Dickens that he discovered children; their care was his care; to him they were not ornaments merely on the one hand or a nuisance on the other. They were a part of life, and their needs required as much legislation as their parents'. Yet it is only to-day that we find his teachings in this respect bearing fruit. Throughout all his novels and stories the child is paramount, and how Dickens advocated reforms on their behalf, and how he had their welfare at heart always, is known to all who read his books. Mr. Crotch is well advised in emphasizing this fact at the outset, and this particular chapter of his book makes illuminating reading at the present moment.

What Dickens did for reform through his novels need not be insisted upon at length here. The Poor Law, imprisonment for debt, iniquitous schools, gambling, copyright laws, sordid nursing, disregard of the human spirit towards the poor, education, the law's fantastic delays, the circumlocution office and red tape, all these things and others will come readily to the mind of even the casual reader of his books. Mr. Crotch traverses the whole array in chapter after chapter, bringing together the evidence from those novels, with his own stimulating comments by way of explanation or emphasis, clearly showing how Dickens drew attention to the necessity of reform in various directions, and how many of the reforms were brought about by his strenuous pen through the medium of those novels, speeches and letters. But he does what none else has done before: he interpolates the views Dickens expressed in his journalistic writings, not merely as a corollary of what he advocated in his novels, but as evidence that Dickens's mission was substantial and real.

What Mr. Crotch has to say himself is of the utmost value to the reader, and proves him to be not only a true student of reform but a great Dickensian too. His book will be the standard one on the subject, for it is the most enlightened treatise on a phase of the great genius of Dickens that has been published for years.

B. W. MATZ.

WRIT IN WATER.*

The Lord Verulam—Francis Bacon—and the Rosicrucian Society, their complete independence notwithstanding, looked alike for a new birth of time. For the one it was the governing motive of his written work, and he allegorized thereon in the "New Atlantis"; the others drew strange symbolism from an unknown star in Serpentarius. Perhaps, more especially in the first case, the desired epoch was to be that of regenerated science and philosophy; the Rosicrucians expected an imputed old and immemorial wisdom to rise again above the horizon of intellectual life, when all things would assume therein a new and glorious vesture. Each in their way might have said: "We have seen His star in the East, and have come to adore Him." The present day is expectant, like the late sixteenth and the early seventeenth centuries; many new lights fall upon coming events, and not a few upon the old inaugurations. With the second concern in view, Mr. Harold Bayley, who has knowledge after his own manner, has followed his "New Light on the Renaissance" by two other captivating volumes, dealing with the same subjects. Their appeal, as before, does not at all lie within the validity of his views; they will be not of less interest and entertainment to some who, like myself, are very far from looking at certain events of history, certain landmarks of religion and literature, through his enchanted glasses, than to the few—if there be any—who can accept his construction of facts.

* "The Lost Language of Symbolism: An Inquiry into the Origin of Certain Letters, Words, Names, Fairy-Tales, Folk-Lore, and Mythologies." By Harold Bayley. 2 Vols. 25s. net. (Williams & Norgate.)

It may seem outside the issues, but Mr. Bayley's advantage is the possession of what appears to my own untutored mind as a great knowledge of the marks used by late and early manufacturers of paper in Europe, including France more especially, and it is of this—but, concurrently, also of printing and printers' marks—that he gave us in his first book a sort of informal history. He acknowledges, however, some indebtedness to the vast collection of Briquet, which appeared in 1907, filling four folio volumes, entitled "Les Filigranes," being an historical dictionary of water-marks, with over 16,000 facsimiles. After what manner the particulars which Mr. Bayley has ingarnered offer to his own mind—(a) new light on the Renaissance; and (b) an attempt to recover the lost language of symbolism—constitutes his thesis at large, and his views can be summarised shortly, with justice, I think, to himself, and with clearness for a reader's purpose. As his first publication seems an introduction to the second, or as they cover practically the same ground, it is difficult to deal with the one in the absence of reference to the other, and I shall draw something from both. Mr. Bayley affirms that the heretical sects of Southern France were the cradle of European paper-making, and for some centuries were also the centre of this industry. From the year 1282 onward, the water-marks on paper were traditional emblems of Provence, but the same designs came to be employed all over Europe and were, therefore, in his opinion, carried by Provençal refugees. He affirms further that mediæval craftsmen of various kinds were adepts in the art of symbolism; that hence it is not surprising if marks on paper should exhibit elaborate intention of an allegorical kind; and that, as a fact, they speak a hidden language. They are not of imagination or fantasy; they are not of the extravagant and even brutal humour which characterised some mediæval carvings in stone. Ordinary symbolism speaks also this language—as witness the Cross and the Pentagram—and folk-lore has a tongue of gold for those who understand its message. By the masters and craftsmen of Southern France it seems to have been in daily use, and it formed part of a planned conspiracy which was maturing for centuries.

It was the conspiracy of several sects, and if I speak of them generically as Albigensian, it is only in the sense that the greater may stand for the whole, seeing that the whole had one spirit, whatever the distinction in their tenets. The Albigenses for Mr. Bayley were primitive Christians, but they believed—or so he reports—in an evil principle which created matter, and they held further that human souls are imprisoned by a catastrophe in cages of flesh. In the virginal conception of Christ and the Resurrection they did not, in his opinion, believe. I mention these points to illustrate what passes in some quarters for pure and primitive Christian doctrine. I am not otherwise concerned with questions of theological appeal and value; but Mr. Bayley should be aware, like myself, that these things are the drift and scattermeal of early Gnosticism; that they have been attributed to Albigenses chiefly on the authority of their enemies he does not seem to recognise. However this may be, and whether such doctrines are arch-heresy or highest mystic truth, if there be real evidence that any Albigensian conspiracy transformed, or sought to transform, intellectual Europe—though fire and sword had well-nigh extinguished the sects—our author has accomplished much more than either of his titles suggest, and more, perhaps, than he imagines. Unfortunately, when the evidence comes to be weighed, it will be found that he has proved nothing but the futility of his case.

Illustrations of Mr. Bayley's method of demonstration may be scheduled as follows: (1) The Albigenses were, according to his records, called the good people; among early papermakers there were names such as Bon, Bona-mour, Sauveur; therefore these persons were Albigenses. (2) The French town now known as Dieulouard, and once a centre of paper-making, was originally Dieu le garde; it was, therefore, an Albigensian colony. (3) A pseudo-Masonic reverie states that the Third Crusade covered a scheme to erect at Jerusalem a Metropolitan Church as a rival to that of Rome. Everyone knows that this is fraudulent fable, but among early paper-marks there is a globe surmounted by a cross, and it proves that Albigenses were parties to the alleged plot. (4) It was apparently a tenet of the sect that their only sword must be that of the spirit; a sword in one of the emblems is surmounted by a fleur de lys, and this is the sword of the spirit, or the doctrine typified. (5) An extended hand bears the inscription FOY, and it refers to the traditional faith of the sects. (7) The unicorn is an emblem of purity; it is found in paper-marks; it is an Albigensian symbol, because the Albigenses were good. (8) The Albigenses regarded Jacob's Ladder as a symbol of virtue and aspiration; I do not find the authority, but a ladder is another paper-mark, and is, therefore, from a factory of the sect. (9) A Gothic R poised on something which stands for a hill signifies Regeneratio. (10) Lastly, the appearance of a pope in a water-mark not only confirms what is deduced from the recurrence of the rose as an emblem—namely, that the Albigenses formed themselves into a kind of secret society—but shows that the sect had a hidden church governed by an occult hierarchy.

These evidences, as it seems to me, speak for themselves, and when on the authority of writers now forgotten, whose demonstrations were similar to his own, Mr. Bayley states that the Graal books were Scriptures of the Albigensian Church, when he identifies every vessel in water-marks with the sacred cup and every hill with Mont Salvatch, if not with the hill of Zion, it is difficult to think of any method more arbitrary. When, however, he discourses of Masonry, its horizon and antiquity, even he should be aware that he does not know his subject, and has no titles. My conclusion is that he has given us two entertaining works, but they are written in a hopeless cause. It is the entertainment of the last in particular which has saved it from dismissal in much shorter terms. I think also that his chapters on Cinderella and on the Night of Fire are more than merely interesting; but he should not have written on the Tree of Life with the stock of knowledge at his command. The volumes are beautifully produced and amply illustrated.

A. E. WAITE.

NAPOLEON.*

The two latest books on Napoleon enable the reader to study his amazing character and career as a whole and at the same time to follow step by step, in extraordinary detail, the campaign of 1813, which showed his ambition unchecked by the Russian failure, but his genius at the commencement of its decline. To those who love military history Mr. Loraine Petre's book will give great delight; it is full, exact and plain in its statements, the result obviously of much industry and careful study, and with its excellent series of maps and plans makes it possible to follow clearly a very complicated campaign. Dr. Holland Rose's lectures give by far the most comprehensive and vivid presentation in English of Napoleon's character; he is, of course a great expert on the history of the period and his knowledge of the enormous literature on Napoleon supplies him with the most apt and decisive illustrations and proofs of all that he advances on the genius and personality which are the wonder of the modern world. Comparing his book with the brilliant sketch by Sir John Seeley it is evident that we know much more and ought much more clearly to understand the man whose glory equals if it does not exceed that of all other men of war and the State. Yet those who know most, and Dr. Rose among them, are again and again puzzled to find any formula that expounds his character, any argument that explains the miracles he wrought.

* The Personality of Napoleon: the Lowell Lectures delivered at Boston in 1912; by J. Holland Rose, Litt.D. 5s. net. (Bell.)
Napoleon's Last Campaign in Germany, 1813. By F. Loraine Petre. With 17 Maps and Plans. 12s. 6d. net. (John Lane.)

Seeley declared that he had no ideas peculiar to himself, only a talent for using and converting into force the ideas of his time. Emerson quaintly diagnosed him as "no gentleman," and depicted him as the sublimated genius of the middle-class. Dr. Rose wisely says that it is futile to sum up Napoleon in any one category. "As the elemental in man appeals to our love of romance, the personality of Napoleon will ever be a challenge to more strenuous activity, to greater concentration of purpose, to a defiance of the impossible." Yet this elemental man was broken in the end against the commonplace verities of morality, defeated by no genius superior to his own, but conquered by the humdrum peoples of Europe. In the end he forgot his own maxims as to the need for "hard dry calculation," he allowed infatuation to eclipse the brightness of that reasoning faculty which had been the chief instrument of his greatness, and failed to perceive the strength of that new spirit of nationality which was to bring his Empire to ruin. In his greatest period Napoleon had a mind that was matchless in its power over detail, a quality which he attributed to his mathematical training, but in his later campaigns he grew neglectful of those minor arrangements which he himself declared to be all important in war. Moreover his habit of arranging everything himself, his "centralised system of command," led his subordinates to hesitate and distrust themselves if they had not been given exact instructions. Both these points are well illustrated by Mr. Petre.

Napoleon is the nearest approach to the Superman with whom mankind has had to deal and his career illustrates the benefits and inconveniences that would attend the advent of that much desired personage. He really regarded himself as superior to all laws. Morality, he declared, was not intended for the class of men to which he belonged. He said of some writer, "he speaks of me as if I were a person! I am not a person, I am a thing!" His personal energy was tremendous, like our own Henry II, he was never still, but gave his orders rapidly pacing up and down the room. "I can tire out my legs, but I can never tire out my power of work." He cared nothing about the grosser sensual pleasures; great fortune, luxury and pomp were only means, not ends. "My personal property was glory and fame." He was furious with his brother Jerome when he left his ship "for the sake of a wretched woman." His own attitude towards women was cold and despotic; they were a pleasant distraction at times, but they were never allowed to interfere. From one to whom he said: "Madame, I do not like women meddling with politics," he received the reply "You are right, General, but in a country where their heads are cut off, they naturally want to know why." Dr. Rose says that at the Revolution, Women began to assert their rights; but their conduct displayed far more vehemence than wisdom. . . . They made no effective protest against the scandalous facilities for divorce which crept in under the cloak of liberty; and Napoleon, incisively commenting on the conduct of their sex during the Revolution, had some excuse for saying that in the interests of order they had to be repressed and put back in the old ruts. The history of the feminist movement at that time needs to be studied, for its follies entailed a grievous set-back to the cause of social progress.

Yet Napoleon never failed in his devotion to his mother. Madame Mère never could believe that the glories of her son would last and she persisted in saving money for the future years of leanness which she predicted. She was the only person who dared to remonstrate with the Emperor when he cheated at cards!

Napoleon believed as profoundly as Henry VIII in the unity of the State, but for the omniscience of Parliament he substituted the omniscience of himself. Efficiency was the first law of his nature and he believed instinctively in good government. One by one he took up all the problems that have proved most difficult to statesmen and in each department he attempted a complete solution. "After long reflection I am convinced that for the settlement of affairs one man alone is needed, and that man can be none other than Bonaparte." He completely centralised all local government, deprived the Central Assemblies of all real power, erected a new order of nobility, codified the laws in so simple a language that "for the first time in human society the poor and unlettered had the chance of knowing what the laws were," organised a national system of secondary schools controlled by the Government, with the University of France at its head, built great roads constructed 1,200 miles of canals, and encouraged commerce by bounties and protection. "He sought to develop France and her vassal States by splendid enterprises, the aim being to make his Empire a self-sufficing unit, able to do without the sugar of the West Indies, or the silks and dyes of the East, and thus give the law to its rivals. So far as human energy and perseverance could achieve the task, he succeeded; and important industries, notably that of the sugar beet-root, attested the resourcefulness which he evoked." All this original and profoundly influential political work proceeded side by side with gigantic conquests. He returns from Austerlitz and founds a University.

Nothing is more characteristic of Napoleon than his attitude towards religion. Dr. Rose quotes a most illuminating statement:

My policy consists in governing men as the greatest number wish to be governed. That I think is the way of recognizing the sovereignty of the people. By becoming a Catholic I have ended the Vendean War; by becoming a Moslem I gained a footing in Egypt; by becoming Ultramontane I won over public opinion in Italy. If I governed Jews, I would rebuild the temple of Solomon.

In nothing had the Revolution more completely failed than in its political treatment of religion, which began with the Declaration of Rights and ended in crude persecution; in nothing was Napoleon more immediately successful

Cobbett the Recruit.

"... as I shot up into a hobble-dehoy, I took to driving the plow for the benefit of mankind, which was always my prime object. Hearing that the Church Warden was after me, I determined to become a Hero, and secretly quitting my agricultural pursuits and Sukey Stubbs—volunteered as a Private Soldier into the 51st Regiment, commanded by that tried Patriot and Martyre Lord Edwd. Fitzgerald—and embarked for the Plantations."—Vide My Own Memoires in the Political Register for 1809.

From a caricature by Gillray.

From "Life and Letters of William Cobbett in England and America," by Lewis Melville (John Lane).

Cobbett's Birthplace, at Farnham.

Thursley, where Cobbett frequently stayed.

Photos by F. E. Green.

Cobbett's Oak, at Telford.

than in his Concordat with the Pope, which healed the schism and immensely increased his personal power by giving him the legitimate nomination of the bishops. His own view of the agreement is stated with his own incomparable terseness: the First Consul will nominate fifty bishops, whom the Pope will institute. They will appoint the curés, and the State will give them all salaries. The Pope shall confirm the sale of Church property, and give his blessing to the Republic. "We shall have Salvum fac rem Gallicam chanted at mass. People may call me a Papist if they like. I am nothing. I was a Mohammedan in Egypt; I shall be a Catholic in France for the sake of the people." But when Napoleon in the height of his Imperial glory quarrelled with the Pope and imprisoned him he found that the ancient controversy between the spiritual and temporal powers was by no means solved by his adroit bargain. The persecuted Pope became a very formidable personage, and despised religion inflicted a serious injury on the Superman's power. And in the end it was the genius-lacking English who were too strong, too persistent for their great enemy, so that our people never had the opportunity of welcoming him as he was confident they desired to do, and those "independent republics of England and Ireland" which he meditated never sprang into existence at his word.

WALFORD D. GREEN.

WILLIAM COBBETT.*

How was it that this son of a peasant farmer became a master of English prose? How was it that he came to achieve a style lucid, easy, virile, and unaffected, yet carrying with it an air of great distinction?

He began to learn grammar when a private soldier garrisoned at Halifax, in Nova Scotia, at the age of twenty-two. His pay was sixpence a day: "The edge of my berth, or that of the guard-bed was my seat to study in; my knapsack was my bookcase; a bit of board lying on my lap was my writing table; and the task did not demand anything like a year of my life. I had no money to purchase candle or oil; in winter time it was rarely that I could get any evening light, but that of a fire, and only my turn even of that. . . . To buy a pen or a sheet of paper I was compelled to forego some portion of food, though in a state of half starvation . . . and I had to read and to write amidst the talking, laughing, singing, whistling, and brawling of at least half a score of the most thoughtless of men."

This private, who soon rose to be sergeant, was indeed a man of grim determination and terrific industry. In an age when to be a soldier was to be a drunken brawler, Cobbett never touched any intoxicating liquors during the whole time he served. His library seemed to have consisted of Lowth's "Grammar," Isaac Watts's "Logic," "the rhetoric of some fellow I have forgotten," a book on geometry, and the Duke of York's "Military Exercises and Evolutions."

He was filled with the egotism of a self-educated man, but as Mr. Melville remarks in an introductory chapter, touched with clever, Puck-like criticisms, "his egotism was not offensive because there was no affectation." That captious critic Hazlett wrote of him, "his egotism is full of individuality and has room for very little vanity in it. We feel delighted, rub our hands and draw our chair to the fire, when we come to a passage of this sort; we know it will be something new and good, manly and simple, not the same insipid story of self over again." Cobbett congratulated himself that he had escaped from becoming "as great a fool, as inefficient a mortal, as any of those frivolous idiots that are turned out from Winchester and Westminster Schools, or from any of those dens of dunces called colleges and universities."

* "The Life and Letters of William Cobbett in England and America." By Lewis Melville. With 32 Illustrations. 2 Vols. 32s. net. (John Lane.)

But how was it that Cobbett managed to escape from the pedantry of the self-educated man who sets up as schoolmaster to every living being? He seems to have plucked the bones and sinews out of some syntax, and made from them a living masterpiece! When he sat down to write, he wrote like one talking to a friend in a gale of wind. He spoke and wrote as no one ever spoke or wrote before.

We know that with his intensely English nature Cobbett repudiated all claims to genius which he seems to have regarded as something lower than industry. But was there not, after all, a streak of genius in Cobbett? How can we otherwise account for that daring psychological insight of his which brought him immediate fame in republican Philadelphia, when he filled his shop window with the portraits of unpopular monarchs? Who but one who had the eye of a literary genius could see wretched girls working in fields as "ragged as colts and as pale as ashes?" Who but a genius with a colossal ignorance of philosophical writings could have written in a book on grammar: "It is the mind that lives; and the length of life ought to be measured by the number and importance of our ideas, and not by the number of our days"?

Yet I think Cobbett owed something to that chance purchase of a little book for threepence when he adventurously tramped from Farnham to Kew at the age of eleven to seek a job in that gardener's paradise. He had sixpence-halfpenny in his pocket when he started, and the threepence he paid for "The Tale of a Tub," the title of which attracted him in a bookseller's window, robbed him not only of his supper, but also of his last penny. From Swift, Cobbett must have caught the trick of the invective loaded with irony. He tells us himself how he carried about "The Tale of a Tub" wherever he went, until he "lost it in a box that fell overboard in the Bay of Fundy in North America," and that "the loss gave me greater pain than I have since felt in losing thousands of pounds."

Though Cobbett wielded his pen like a bludgeon, there was no confusion about his strokes, no riot of pummeling which could become an incoherent storm of words. Though it often fell on the wrong head every blow was distinct and well timed.

He showed, however, even greater genius in mastering the difficult art of living well than in writing well. That is what is borne in upon us from reading these entertaining letters.

Hurstbourne Tarrant, overlooking The Rookery, where Cobbett stayed and wrote many of his "Rural Rides."

The Rookery at Uphusband, where Cobbett used to stay with his friend Blount, who would leave a plate of pork and bread (for any passing tramp) on the top of the broad wall.

Photos by F. E. Green.

The Winterslow Hut, in which Hazlett was living and writing when Cobbett rode by.

It was inconceivable that Cobbett could long remain the friend of a Prime Minister, who, we learn from the Hammonds' book "The Village Labourer," confessed to the House of Commons when he dropped his Reform of the Poor Law Bill, that he knew nothing about the rural poor of England. It was when Cobbett left the "great wen" behind him, with its futile politics of "high life" and mounted his horse on his rural rides, that he became the St. George of the English labourer and entered into his kingdom.

Mr. Melville has done literature and history a service in showing how a Royal personage might write undecorated, lucid, forcible English when the writing is dictated by a Cobbett. Those letters written by Cobbett and signed by Queen Caroline to her most august relations are entertaining reading. We would that we had a few more letters written by Cobbett's daughter, Anne, who was not only a sturdy champion, but also an apt, literary pupil of her father. When Anne writes to her brother of how Queen Caroline said after Cobbett left her presence: "'Well, now, if that is Mr. C. no wonder such fine writing comes from him. He is the finest man I have seen since I came to England. Aye, aye, if there be only a few such men as that to stand by me I shall not care for the Lords.' All of which the Govr. says is nothing more than bare justice, for he says he saw no man there anything to compare to himself; you know the gentleman has by no means a contemptible notion of his person."

It is in the picture they give us of Cobbett as a husband and father that these letters are most illuminating. The truculent bludgeoner in public stands out in these pages, conspicuously different to so many a man of genius, as a loyal and tender husband and father. This man, who could subdue an entirely hostile House of Commons by his dominating personality never apparently gave an order to his children. He influenced by precept and reward, and they repaid him by loyalty and comradeship in managing his business affairs after he had been swindled by man after man, as well as ruined by the Government. It was Leslie Stephens who said: "The domestic Cobbett was invariably charming."

The excellent reproductions of Gillray's caricatures add to the value of these volumes.

I cannot close this review without pointing to Cobbett's extraordinary achievements as a literary pamphleteer. I attribute his great success to his courageous, direct, human appeal. He never flinched from making personal attacks when combating some evil thing, some vicious system—even when faced with a sentence of two years' imprisonment.

F. E. GREEN.

BUTLER'S NOTE-BOOKS.*

I will not begin by referring to Samuel Butler as a one-book author; partly because I do not wish to put his enthusiastic followers to the trouble of denying it, as they always do; chiefly because I do not think he is a one-book author, for the one book that is universally granted to him is "Erewhon," and I confess I could never understand how anyone can for a moment rank "Erewhon" above that masterly study of modern life—that great novel "The Way of All Flesh." If Butler is a one-book author, that is his book; but so far as I am concerned, he shall have four, "Life and Habit," being his third, and this volume compiled from his note-books the fourth. And that is a large allowance. Nearly all authors write far too much; they will not or cannot leave off when they have said everything they have to say—they must needs go on repeating themselves, and at the end of the day you find even the greatest of them is whittled down to half a dozen volumes at most, and the happiest and oftenest read live compactly in one or two.

* "The Note-Books of Samuel Butler." Selections arranged and Edited by Henry Festing Jones. With Photogravure Portrait. 6s. net. (Fifield.)

Butler's fame has been a slow growth, but his niche in the Temple is secure, and if it is in a dim corner one cannot but see that the sunlight is slowly travelling his way. I am glad of his "Note-Books," because they epitomise much of his philosophy; they give you the roots and germ of "Erewhon," and of some of those lesser books of his that you will never read again. More than that, they are a revelation of himself; they offer all sorts of intimate glimpses of him; his everyday life, his friends, his thoughts about himself, his work, and his critics. His failure, in the commercial sense of the word, calls for no sympathy. He had a sense of humour that saved him from over-valuing either the applause or the censures of a very fallible world; he had always the consolations of a private income, and he was sustained by a fixed confidence in the enduring quality of his work. He published at his own expense, because, he says, he could not be bothered with hunting round for a publisher and being continually rejected; and he prepared a table showing that only one of his books yielded him any profit, and that was "Erewhon," and that his total loss on them amounted to nearly eight hundred pounds. To this must be added, he remarks, his book on Shakespeare's Sonnets, "in respect of which I have had no account as yet, but am over a hundred pounds out of pocket by it so far—little of which, I fear, is ever likely to come back." Here are a few of his notes on this phase of his experience:

"When I am dead, do not let people say of me that I suffered from misrepresentation and neglect. I was neglected and misrepresented; very likely not half so much as I supposed but, nevertheless, to some extent neglected and misrepresented. I growl at this sometimes but, if the question were seriously put to me whether I would go on as I am, or become famous in my lifetime, I have no hesitation about which I should prefer. I would willingly pay the few hundred pounds which the neglect of all my works costs me in order to be let alone and not plagued by the people who would come round me if I were known. The probability is I shall remain after my death as obscure as I am now; if this be so, the obscurity will, no doubt, be merited, and if not, my books will work not only as well without my having been known in my lifetime, but a great deal better; my follies and blunders will the better escape notice to the enhancing of the value of anything that may be found in my books. . . .

"Shall I be remembered after death? I sometimes think and hope so. But I trust I may not be found out (if ever I am found out, and if I ought to be found out at all) before my death. It would bother me very much, and I should be much happier and better as I am [1880].

"P.S.—This note I leave unaltered. I am glad to see I had so much sense thirteen years ago. What I thought then I think now, only with greater confidence and confirmation. [1893]. . . .

"I believe my reputation stands well with the best people. Granted that it makes no noise, but I have not been willing to take the pains necessary to achieve what may be called guinea-pig review success, because, although I have been in financial difficulties, I did not seriously need success from a money point of view, and because I hated the kind of people I should have had to court and kow-tow to if I went in for that sort of thing. . . . A man cannot be said to have failed because he did not get what he did not try for. What I did try for I believe I have got as fully as any reasonable man can expect, and I have every hope that I shall get it still more both so long as I live and after I am dead."

There is something fine and stimulating in this frank self-confidence. He is as frank and individual in all his notes. He had an almost fierce dislike of Tennyson and Thackeray, and seems to have held Bunyan and Dickens rather cheaply; but his adoration of Handel and Shakespeare was boundless. Art, literature, music, science, religion, morality, the common affairs of common life, the mysteries of the seen and the unseen worlds—he had brooded over all things from his individual standpoint, and his thoughts and opinions are shrewd and penetrating and often wonderfully illuminating. I like the little rough sketches he makes of his association with Clifford's Inn, and that neighbourhood; his sketches and anecdotes are admirable and full of his own quiet, dry, satirical, ironical humour; but all his obiter dicta are full of it too. I had marked a score or two of these latter for quotation, but my space is exhausted, and I shall have to send you to the book for them, and could not send you to any book of recent years that contains more wisdom, more wit, or a larger, saner philosophy of life crowded into four hundred pages, without a dull page to them all. It has so taken me that I am going to take heart of grace and proclaim that if ever I had to reduce Butler to two books they should be this one and "The Way of All Flesh"—his disciples might think and say of me as they would, it is "Erewhon" that should go overboard.

One must add a word of gratitude to Mr. Festing Jones for his preface, concerning the writing of these "Note-Books," and for the care and skilfulness with which he has selected the notes and arranged them according to their subjects.

A. ST. JOHN ADCOCK.

THE CHINESE REPUBLIC AND ITS FUTURE.*

In the course of his Diary, recently published in the columns of the Observer, Li Hung-chang, after a visit to the slums of London, remarks:

"The more I see and learn of the lower classes of people in Europe, the greater is my love and pity for the miserable poor of my own country, for by comparison the latter are less vicious."

Mr. Bland, previously known to the public in this country as part author of a book on Li Hung-chang's great mistress, the Empress Tzu Hsi, in his new work strikingly endorses Li's opinion. He finds "the patient, philosophical sons of Han," so often and so heavily afflicted by misfortune, a most lovable race.

"If affliction is good for the soul," he says, "the Chinese soul has received its full share of good—but, whatever the origin of its excellence, we need no better proof of the inherent moral qualities and social virtues of the Chinese than the fact that the Europeans who have lived amongst them speak of them with affection and leave them with sincere regret. . . . The European resident instinctively recognises in the Chinese outlook upon life, even amongst the humblest of the population, certain elemental virtues which have been lost in the hurry of our modern civilisation."

It is these humble ones—"the stupid people," in the phrase of the Chinese literati—who have, unconsciously, given to the newly-established Republic of China an appearance of stability and strength. The Revolution has come, has swept away all the old landmarks, and has (nominally at least) created a new world on the mainland of Eastern Asia. "The stupid people" have acquiesced, and their acquiescence has been taken by the majority of spectators of the Revolution to mean that they are in sympathy with the aims of the Young China party and delight in liberty, equality and fraternity, including all the twentieth century interpretations of that famous motto. Fond delusion! The Chinese masses, now as before, earnestly desire peaceful government, under which to live out their sober, strenuous lives and solve the problem of combining great race-fecundity and limited means of subsistence. Manchu "Sons of Heaven" and Republican presidents are nothing to them, and the less they hear of either the better they will like it. The good ruler, in their eyes, is he who, while maintaining good order, interferes with them least.

"The Manchu dynasty had doubtless exhausted its mandate to the Dragon Throne, like the Mings before it. It had to be replaced, for the general health of China. Dr. Sun Yat-sen and his friends, full of Western, and particularly of American, ideas, have deposed the Manchus and set up what bears a remarkable likeness to Utopia. They have done so amid the applause of those whose teachings they have imbibed, and of countless more whose Western pride is flattered by the thought that the East is a pupil of the West. The Chinese Republic has therefore received the blessing of the civilised world, in the common (though arrogant) acceptance of the term.

Mr Bland, however, is not one of those who greet China's Revolution with cheers. He sees in Sun Yat-sen a hopeless visionary, and in the handiwork of him and his associates a fatal disregard of Chinese traditions and needs. Worse still, he finds in the Young China party as much self-seeking, greed, and corruption as in the old mandarins. There are honest men in the ranks, but they are destitute of the Idea which makes for regeneration. Instead they have imperfectly learnt the ideas of others, and have imposed them on their fellow countrymen. "If history teaches that the man comes with the hour, it teaches also that the hour comes not by accident, but only after long years of preparation." In this case there has been no such preparation. Therefore Young China will pass, to give place to something more suitable to the Chinese character; unless foreign aggression first takes advantage of the situation to cut China up, as many of the outside nations have been so long desiring to do. A strong man could save the country. Is President Yuan Shi-kai the man? Up to now he has consented to work with Young China, for he is a masterly opportunist. But to redeem his native land he must sweep the party away, and with it a great deal of its achievements. Mr. Bland would like to see him make himself monarch, if—and this he seems inclined to believe—he has sufficient force of character. If not he, then someone else must arise, who with a firm hand will bring back what was good in the old traditions, secure the dissemination of what is good in the new theories, and suppress the anarchy which, under cover of the Revolution, has spread itself over the land. Otherwise, China's fate is sealed.

* "Recent Events and Present Policies in China." By J. O. P. Bland. Illustrated. 16s. net. (Heinemann.)

Mr. Bland's work was badly needed, to correct the false ideas prevalent in the West about the Chinese Republic. His view of the situation is clear and sane, and to the present writer seems indisputably true. There is much more in the book than it is possible to allude to in a brief notice, but its chief value lies in the exposition of the argument sketched above. In its form there is something to be desired, but the author apologises for such defects as are due to the previous appearance of part of the material in newspapers and magazines. He might, however, have removed the cross-headings, which are more suited to journalism than to a volume. But it would be ungrateful to cavil when we have presented to us so sound and thoughtful a piece of work as Mr. Bland's.

PHILIP W. SERGLANT.

THE APOTHEOSIS OF JUJUTSU.*

The words at the head of this review of Mr. A. J. Harrison's deeply interesting and informative book exactly (though not perhaps fully) describe it. That the Jujutsu (incorrectly known here as the Jujitsu) method of fighting or defending oneself is a valuable one, no one who reads Mr. Harrison's book will have any doubt, but he very early points out that its virtues and efficiency have been greatly over-rated, and that it is absurd to suppose, as has been asserted, that an average Japanese policeman is so complete a master of this art that he can "push over a brawny English or American jack-tar with his little finger." In his early chapters the author gives a really interesting exposition of this science and its inner meaning, from the feudal times, when the members of the samurai class were, owing to the frankly sedentary habits of the vast mass of the people, the repositories of the manly arts and almost without exception exponents of judo, archery, fencing, and other physical exercises. They constituted in fact the "fighting spirit of Japan." It would appear, however, that the devotion of the samurai to physical exercise was not sufficient to keep the race at a satisfactory state of physical efficiency, and in his second chapter Mr. Harrison quotes extensively from an article in a Tokyo newspaper, in which the defects and shortcomings of the race and the physical deterioration are pointed out and the possible causes examined into with some detail. There is little doubt but that the Japanese have, until quite recently, been inclined to place too much faith in the ancient methods of physical culture, and to attach too much importance to mere formalities. We have an amusing instance of this latter characteristic in connection with Mr. Harrison's visits to a daikyuba or archery range. Here he learnt something of the elaborate rules which govern the use of the bow in Japan. How to hold the latter, how to draw it, how the arrow should be fitted, etc. But, much to the disgust of the proprietor and of the Japanese habitués, a friend and fellow-journalist, who transgressed every canon of archery and outraged every principle, went on scoring bull's-eyes, whilst his Japanese competitors, who shot with the utmost grace and kept to the elaborate rules, could not find the centre.

* "The Fighting Spirit of Japan" By E. J. Harrison Illustrated. 12s. 6d. net. (T. Fisher Unwin.)

All through the book an impression is left upon the mind of the reader that till, at all events, recent years the fighting spirit of Japan travelled upon very conventional and hard and fast lines, and that the people lacked initiative to a remarkable degree. But, the spirit, largely one of fatalistic self-sacrifice, and inbred patriotism, derived traditionally through the gods themselves, was ever present to prepare them for the great awakening which took place a decade or so ago.

Regarding forms of outdoor exercise and the introduction into Japan of Western sports and pastimes, the author has much to say that is of particular interest. Swimming, though much practised and taught in schools, is not at that state of perfection one would assume from accounts of swimming feats and records broken appearing from time to time in the native press. Physical culture, however, on broader Western lines is making some headway in even the girls' schools nowadays. And properly followed up with the adoption of different views regarding attire and other hygienic matters, should, Mr. Harrison thinks, have a good effect in putting a curb on race decay.

One illuminating explanation of the state of Japanese roads, which are, of course, notoriously bad, we must quote. It is representative of the keenness of Mr. Harrison's observation, and the thoroughness with which he has mastered his subject. He ascribes the indifference of the Japanese to good roads to the wearing of the géta or high wooden clogs, which keep both the feet and clothing up out of the mud, and of the waraji or straw sandals, which from their cheapness can be cast aside without compunction. There is also the practice of slipping off the footgear when entering a house, which makes the Japanese more indifferent to mud than one imagines would be otherwise the case, considering the love of spotless cleanliness in the house which is a distinguishing Japanese characteristic.

Mr. Harrison goes very thoroughly into the inner mysteries and science of judo, fencing, wrestling and sword-dancing, and has something interesting to say upon all of these subjects. He gives a vivid account of the two-handed sword play, for which the samurai of the past and professors of the present time are famous.

It is impossible, of course, within the limits of this review to go into the very interesting examination of the exact position in the fighting spirit of the race occupied by the "yogi," or occult operator, who undoubtedly holds an important position in Japanese esoteric belief. Nor can one quote from the amusing and valuable chapter upon "Some Superstitions and Occult Practices," in which Mr. Harrison tells us he was able, on more than one occasion, to expose the absolutely fraudulent methods of the priests in their dealings with the common people. The chapters devoted to "The Cult of Cold Steel," "The Sock and Buskin," dealing with the theatre and actors, and that upon "The Eternal Feminine," have all interested us deeply. We are glad to find Mr. Harrison agrees with most that has been written by thoughtful and impartial people regarding the charm of the Japanese girl, her womanliness, and her possession of graces which are nowadays being rigorously uprooted by her Western sisters to their own detriment, as we think, and to the sincere regret of those who hold womanhood in high esteem. He says, "in my opinion, the Japanese woman is in many respects the chief glory of the nation." Though we do not find ourselves able to endorse Mr. Harrison's opinions in every regard, we thank him for an able, entertaining, and informative volume. We hope that it will reach another edition, so that an index, which would be of great service, may be added.

CLIVE HOLLAND.

LOEB'S LIBRARY.*

translation is a pastime or a torment to the translator, according to his disposition; to the reader its value depends upon the extent to which the translator is master of his own language. This gift does not necessarily,

* "Sophocles" with an English translation by F. Storr, B.A. vol. 1
"Apollonius Rhodius," with an English translation by R. C. Seaton, M.A.

"Appian's Roman History," with an English translation by Horace White M.A., LL.D. vol. 1.

"The Greek Bucolic Poets," with an English translation by J. M. Edmonds, M.A.

Cicero, Letters to Atticus; with an English translation by E. O. Winstedt, M.A. vol. 1. 7s. each.

Japanese ladies and child, showing shimada style of coiffure.

From "The Fighting Spirit of Japan" (Fisher Unwin).

or even usually, go with learning. The rusty pen, worn with marking the passage and exscribing the gloss, has, alas, little skill to collect living words in the vulgar tongue of the scholar. In the five volumes which are the last output of the Loeb Series, learning is more conspicuous than skill in words. Mr. Storr's attempt to render Sophocles in blank verse and rhymed odal measures is the most ambitious of these undertakings. Considerable courage is implied in attacking a play so sublime as the "Antigone," and to the scholar so hackneyed, and a subject like Sophocles, all but extinguished by Sir Richard Jebb—and whatever exceptions there may be to be made to Mr. Storr's style, it must be freely admitted that he has done better by his author than the confectioner's English of the Cambridge edition. Mr. Storr's blank verse is a stiff, educated sort of fabric, unmodulated and hard, and his vocabulary is ordinary without being plain:

"Then thou mayst ease thy conscience on that score.
Listen, and I'll convince thee that no man
Hath scot or lot in the prophetic art.
Here is the proof in brief. An oracle
Once came to Laius (I will not say
'Twas from the Delphic God himself, but from His ministers) declaring he was doomed
To perish by the hand of his own son."

We are now accustomed to better than this. It is legitimate to doubt if Mr. Gilbert Murray's version of Euripides is a faithful picture of the original, but he has habituated us to look for one thing in verse renderings of ancient drama, and that is beauty. This is not discernible in Mr. Storr's lines. And however passable his dialogue is, his choruses miss fire. The wayfaring man, the person of small fortune who cannot appreciate the original, must not be allowed to suppose that

"Who is he by voice immortal named from Pythia's rocky cell, Doer of foul deeds of bloodshed, horror that no tongue can tell?
A foot for flight he needs
Fleeter than storm-swift steeds,
For on his heels doth follow,
Armed with the lightnings of his sire, Apollo.
Like sleuth-hounds, too,
The fates pursue"

is anything like Sophocles. Still, if the wayfarer cuts the lyrics, and reads Mr. Storr's blank verse quickly, he will get the frisson of the "Oedipus Tyrannus." The glories of Sophocles' art will be hidden from him, but he will gain what the Greeks considered the essential part of a play. Mr. Storr is the brother of Dr. Way, and the late Mr. Morshhead.

In choosing Mr. Seaton to translate Apollonius Rhodius' "Argonautica," the editors have enlisted the principal authority. Mr. Seaton, as his Oxford text shows, knows all about Apollonius, and his version is far from inadequate. The most obvious criticism that it occurs to make is that the translation is too direct and simple for the late-flowering art of the Alexandrian. The original might be any other author in the epic manner. It takes more going about and a more artful and a corrupter English to render Apollonius' staple of uniform antiquarianism and his interludes of elaborately beautiful similes and florid psychology of love.

The version of Appian by Mr. Horace White, who is an American, revised by Mr. J. D. Denniston, is completely satisfactory. Appian has no style. If Dionysius of Halicarnassus had known him he would have included him in his styleless limbo, along with Polybius and Phylarchus. He has as much and as little as Dion Cassius or Herodian, and rather more than Plutarch. He gains under Mr. White's hands. On the other hand, the history is valuable, and makes one of the more useful volumes of the series. All is as it should be.

Mr. Edmonds' version of Theocritus, and the other Bucolics, is the most important effort in these five volumes, and deserves every recognition. The writer has an original conception of his theme, and gives us a Theocritus entirely unlike the renderings to which we are accustomed. The novelty of his method is that he has separated the narrative part of the original from the songs, the pieces performed in competition. The former he has put into prose, the rest into verse. This distinction is a real one, and goes to help the reader. The prose Mr. Edmonds has chosen is a kind of Elizabethan clown's lingo, and recalls the staccato medium in which Shakespeare's rustics exchange ideas. Mr. Edmonds manages it with much skill and vigour. His verse, as he says, is "the common ballad-metre written long." Of this I quote I. 64 (ἄρχετε βουκολικὰς Μοῖσαι φίλαι ἄρχετ' ἀοιδᾶς).

"Country-song, sing country-song, sweet Muses.
'Tis Thyrsis sings of Etna, and a rare sweet voice hath he,
Where were ye Nymphs when Daphnis pined? ye Nymphs, O
where were ye?
Was it Peneius' pretty vale or Pindus' glens? 'Twas never Arapus flood nor Etna's pike, nor Acis' holy river
Country-song, sing country-song, sweet Muses.
When Daphnis died the foxes wailed and the wolves they wailed full sore,
The lion from the greenwood wept when Daphnis was no more,
and X. 26 (βομβύκα χαρίεσσα),

Bombyca fair to other folk you may a Gypsy be.
Sunburnt and lean they call you, you're honeyflowers to me,
Of flowers the violet's dark, and dark the lettered flag-flower tall,
But when there's nosegays making they choose them first of all.
Dame Goat pursues the clover, Gray Wolf doth goat pursue,
Sir Stork pursues the plough; and I—O! I am wild for you"

And as an average specimen of his prose, IV. 44:

BATTUS.

"Up with you, ye calves; up the hill! They are at the green of those olives, the varlets."

CORYDON.

"Hey up, Snowdrop! hey up Good body! to the hill wi' ye! Art thou deaf? 'Fore Pan I'll presently come thee an evil end if thou stay there. Look ye there: back she comes again.
Would there were but a hurl-bat in my hand! I had had at thee.

BATTUS

Ceres save thee, Corydon; see here! It had at me as thou saidst the word, this thorn, here under my ankle And how deep the spindle-thorns go! A plague o' thy heifer! It all came o' my gaping after her."

Mr. Edmonds' reader will not waste his time, and he will admire Mr. Edmonds' skill. At the same time he will ask himself if this is really Theocritus. With all the translator's daring, learning, freedom and speed, does he convey by his English what the Hellenist obtains from the Greek? Two things seem wanting in this ingenious and subtle rendering—melody and beauty. Theocritus is in verse—suave, broad, regular verse, and half his charm is in his measure, his vowels, and the ricks of the bucolic hexameter. He is not quaint, not folklorish; he is passionate and flowing. Mr. Edmonds' prose, for all that it is pungent and racy, is the translation of something else. He is closer to fact than Theocritus is. Theocritus' clowns are not real clowns; they are not, indeed, the detestable, non-existent rustics of the later pastoral, but they are glassed over by a stream of melody and colour. They have no "mark you's," nor apostrophied prepositions. The atmosphere which Mr. Edmonds professes he intends to raise is indeed raised, but it is not Theocritean, it is literary-Elizabethan, jerky and quaint. The verse does not fall exactly under this criticism, much of it is charming, and so vigorous as to carry its own justification, but it is more the lisping Elizabethan pastoral than the small epos, and here and there, if Mr. Edmonds does not mind plain statements, lapses like the Elizabethan into doggerel. No, with all his skill and learning, the translator does not make us forget his predecessors. "Thou'rt come dear heart, thou'rt come, after two days and nights, albeit one will turn a lover gray," sends us to Mr. Hallard's musical rendering of ἡλυθες ὦ φίλε κοῦρε, and it is the music, in original or translation, that we cannot do without. In the prose we do not forget Andrew Lang. After all, there is much Theocritus in Clough, and English hexameters or some long rhymed lines might have done the narrative, and lyrics, but less familiar and simple, the songs. I do not quite understand Mr. Edmonds' choice of a medium, he should have told us more about it in his preface. Harking back to origins, perhaps, has something to do with it, and he seems to me too clever and particular, herein resembling Walter Headlam, whose English verse was unsuccessful from too great knowledge. It should be said that Mr. Edmonds gives an apparatus criticism of real value, and a text containing many of his own conjectures. He ought to produce an edition.

Mr. Winstedt brings up the rear with a red volume, containing a portion of Cicero's "Letters to Atticus." These he has turned into genial, fluent English, which is excellent reading. Mr. Winstedt, whose name is already imperishably carved on the stele of philological fame, may be congratulated on his loisirs de fonctionnaire. The question to be raised in the matter is of the period of English into which M. T. C.'s correspondence should go, how much later than Walpole it should be brought down. Mr. Winstedt seems to have struck the right note on the whole. Possibly a prolonged search might detect some expressions of questionable grace; I seem to have caught one case of "he wrote me that;" but perhaps a literary statesman, if there are any, would say so to-day.

The volumes are of a convenient size, and the paper tolerable. The Greek type is too large for the page, and in consequence is disagreeably crowded.

T. W. ALLEN.

SOME RECENT POETS.

Whether it is or is not a compliment to publish all the poems, except the dramas, of the chief of living poets, at as low a price as if he were a classic, by a happy chance something more than a compliment is simultaneously paid by the dedication to him, on the part of editor and poets, of an anthology of Georgian Poetry. The poets are Messrs. Abercrombie, Bottomley, Brooke, Chesterton, W. H. Davies, de la Mare, Drinkwater, Flecker, Gibson, D. H. Lawrence, Masefield, Monro, Sturge Moore, Ronald Ross, Sargant, Stephens, and R. C. Trevelyan; and if only Mr. de la Mare among the number bears any obvious relationship to Mr. Bridges, the dedication is the more remarkable, as showing from how many different young men—dwelling in how different a world from that of "I love all beauteous things" and "I have loved flowers that fade"—his loveliness, his purity and his originality command homage.

"Georgian Poetry" contains "beauteous things." It includes for example long poems by Messrs. Abercrombie, Davies, Masefield, Sturge Moore, and James Stephens. It includes the two most impressive of Mr. Gordon Bottomley's recent poems, five remarkable pieces by Mr. Rupert Brooke, and five representative poems from Mr. de la Mare's "Listeners." Altogether it is a brilliant selection from the poetry of 1911 and 1912. But it is less and more than that. It excludes many poems because it aims at showing what young men are typical and promising, what elder men notably reflect the spirit of the moment. Nobody not jaded by excess of poetry or starved for lack of it, will fail to see that there is such a spirit when he meets it thus concentrated. Compare it with a similar book of poetry from 1901 and 1902 and its novelty is apparent. There is, by the way, no anthology of 1901 and 1902, but if it is now too late to make one, it is to be hoped that similar volumes will henceforward be compiled decennially or even quinquennially. If they find editors as generous and impartial

"The Poetical Works of Robert Bridges," excluding the Eight Dramas. 2s. (Oxford University Press)

"Georgian Poetry, 1911-1912" (The Poetry Bookshop, 35, Devonshire Street, Theobald's Road, W.C.)

"Deborah: A Play in Three Acts." By Lascelles Abercrombie. 2s. 6d. net. (Lane.)

"Immanence." By Evelyn Underhill. 4s. 6d. net. (Dent.)

"Poems." By Lucy Masterman. 3s. 6d. net. (John Lane.)

"Streets: A Book of London Verses." By Douglas Goldring. 2s. 6d. net. (Max Goschen.)

"The Venturers and other Poems." By Vivian Locke Ellis. 1s. net. (21, York Buildings, Adelphi)

as "E.M." they will, like this Georgian anthology, be valuable and delightful.

Was there ten years ago such vividness—or such hectic and excited striving after vividness—as in Mr. Abercrombie? In his new play—where he redresses the long-troubled balance by putting into the mouths of fishermen such poetry as used to be held too good for any but kings—a man speaks of a plague thus:

"The whole earth's peoples have been fiercely caught Like torn small papers in a wind, in this Great powerful ailing."

Another speaks of a sailor:

"With the ribs of his breast crusht like a trodden hamper, Lying three days cramped in a boat, and he for ever groaning."

Ten years ago Mr. Chesterton was consoling and praising the ass by recalling the day when Christ rode one into Jerusalem. To-day Mr. Rupert Brooke sincerely and (so far as an unbewitched landsman can judge) powerfully endeavours to sympathise with a fish and its "dark ecstasies" where:

"Those silent waters weave for him
A fluctuant mutable world and dim,
Where wavering masses bulge and gape . . ."

Ten years ago Mr. Gordon Bottomley was not picturing the end of the world and the building of Babel in blank verse like the quintessence of G. W. Stevens' prose. Ten years ago nobody knew that Mr. W. H. Davies was a poet, not even himself. But then he is a fortunate accident that might have happened at any time, but did not. Ten years ago the surviving Yellow Book men would have been pleased with Mr. D. H. Lawrence's subject, enraged with his indifference to their execution. Nor would they alone have been enraged, and not only Mr. Lawrence would have given offence. They would have contracted a chill from so much eagerness both to come at truth and to avoid the appearance of insincerity, the fidelity to crudest fact in Messrs. Abercrombie, Gibson and Masefield, the fidelity to airiest fancy in Mr. de la Mare, and to remotest intuition or guessing in Mr. Brooke, the mixture everywhere of what they would have called realism and extravagance. They could not have endured the simplicity of Mr. Abercrombie's "Deborah" as here:

"Is it only a small thing to you, this That once was David's? . . ."

or the violent subtlety of his "Sale of St. Thomas," as here:

"Gigantic thirst grieving our mouths with dust,
Scattering up against our breathing salt
Of blown dried dung, till the taste eat like fires
Of a wild vinegar into our sheathed marrows . . ."

The anthology does not include all that is typical, or all that is best. It excludes women altogether, and therefore tells us nothing of Miss Underhill's spiritual and definitely mystic lyric, of which her new book gives many perfect examples: nor in any case could it have included anything from Mrs. C. F. G. Masterman's first book, so gravely, courageously and widely sympathetic, so graceful and finished in a variety of metrical forms. Still more serious omissions are the names of Messrs. Douglas Goldring and Vivian Locke Ellis. Mr. Goldring was perhaps not impossible ten years ago. His book consists of experiments in capturing the soul, or one of the souls, of twenty or thirty London streets. In some he speaks of his own feeling towards them; in others he speaks for them as if he were an inhabitant. His methods vary almost as much as his streets, from the downright to the romantic, but he is invariably interesting, often brilliant.

Mr. Ellis published his first book eight years ago, and though he deserved a place for every possible reason in "Georgian Poetry," he would have stood well apart from most of his companions, except Messrs. Davies and de la Mare. He is conscious that the fates have confused him with mortal questionings—the sonnet, "In Cornwall," in which he says so, is not his best, but is a good example of his more purely reflective work:

"I envy him whose genius, like the call
And tyrannous voice of ocean on thy coast
At turn of tide, doth summon and enthrall
In strange eye-service; him it pleases most

To dwell in thy cloud-palaces and trace
The paths of the white wind upon the shore,
And the fast-flowing shadows on the face
Of glittering seas; I envy him the more
When inland calm his spirit captivates,
And all the store of human days is hid
In pictured fields. Me the erroneous fates
Confuse with mortal questionings, and bid
Still stand, in presence of the unlifting lid
Of Reason's dawn, and at his cloudy gates."

• But in spite of this admission his task is to sing and not, like many of his contemporaries, to preach, whether against preachers or not. He has already ripened a sweet grave style, and several of the poems in this volume are perfect enchantments. The only other example for which there is room shows him at the opposite extreme of lightness:

"Come early, cuckoo, patient bird,
And on thy three-stringed viol strum;
Come early, cuckoo; thou art heard,
And no man doubts that spring hath come;
Tune thy two strings and break the third.

"Come seldom, cuckoo, welcome guest
Who wear'st thy welcome out too soon;
Usurper of the small bird's nest,
Thou art well paid for thy one tune,
Now get thee gone, thou weariest."

Mr. Ellis writes of England, of love and death, and Nature, nearly always with his original, powerful and mysterious combination of gravity and sweetness, but without monotony. He stands apart, as Mr. Bridges has always done, with a loveliness and originality as distinct as his

EDWARD THOMAS

Novel Notes.

THE DEBIT ACCOUNT. By Oliver Onions. 6s. (Martin Secker)

Those who were fortunate enough to read "In Accordance with the Evidence" will be more than prepared for the grey, dry style of the present sequel. It is the manner of the "low tone," of the "secessionist" painter, of the rebel against the old narrative convention. There is not a sentimental lapse, a primary colour, a touch of the obvious, in the book, and hardly a smooth or flowing sentence. "The Debit Account," therefore, if Mr. Onions will excuse the pun, is all to his credit. He has emulated the method of the Japanese soldier; he has learned "to do without." He has introduced us to a company of characters who make not a single appeal to our admiration or our affections. There is not one of the group, in fact, that we would particularly care to know in real life; and to do them and the author justice, they none of them seem to make a bid for this kind of interest. They are intent, as he is, on working out a story with a plan, and they succeed. At least they carry us through three hundred pages of the cleverest tale of suspense we have met for many years, and the author's method is to let his readers into the secret and to burke a disclosure at the finish with a postscript of tragedy. Part of the cleverness of the arrangement is to put the grim revelation in the mouth of a merely minor personage, and leave the real instrument of fate a passive and sympathetic listener. And this touch of wilfulness is so logical to the scheme that the reader never resents it for a moment. The vindication of the process Mr. Onions has adopted is that once you have read the first few pages you cannot escape the rest of the book. It forces you to read in spite of its conscious and intentional limitations. The action remains in North and West London, and in the most prosy quarters at that—simply the fringe of Hampstead Heath and the portions of Lower Regent Street, with a midnight jaunt round Chelsea on a dismal night—that is all. But that midnight jaunt in the rain is as powerful a scene as anything in modern London fiction outside Gissing or "Number 5

Photo by Wheeler, Weymouth

Mr. Paul Trent.

John Street." It puts a murderer at the mercy of a betrayed woman, and beyond the reluctant avowal that she loves him, her lips are sealed. But she warns him that sooner or later he must make his wife a sharer in the secret, and the rest of the story is a battle against unwillingness and all sorts of hostile forces. To indicate the plot in plainer terms would be to steal a march upon the author and his readers and the readers of this novel should be legion, all spellbound and all grateful. We wonder how many of them will note one curious and uncharacteristic slip—where Miriam Levey, a Jewess of the Jews, asks Jeffries and his wife to call her by her "Christian" name!

THE FOUNDLING. By Paul Trent. 6s. (Ward, Lock.)

John Strand derives his surname from the fact that his foster father's story is to the effect that he was found as a baby in that thoroughfare. As a matter of fact, however, the foster father did not tell the truth on this point, which was destined to be one of considerable importance to John. The foundling had a good education, and, being interested in politics, eventually he became a Member of Parliament—a Labour Member—and a very brilliant one at that. It was then that he fell under the spell of Lady Cora Southwold, niece of the Prime Minister, to whose government the support of John and the Labour Party was an essential. But, unfortunately, the Prime Minister was not a straight man, and he allowed private affairs to become mingled with politics in a manner that can hardly have been for the good of the country. At first John bested him merely by force of honesty, but later things got very complicated indeed. How this came about and why, the reader will prefer that we should not tell, for the plot of "The Foundling" is the strong point of the book. It is, in fact, a very ingenious and well-told story, and its improbabilities are deftly smoothed over. It is also thoroughly good reading, and its love-interests are both numerous and romantic. Mr. Paul Trent writes in a pleasant and effective manner, and he may be congratulated upon a sound piece of work.

SWIFT NICK OF THE NORTH ROAD. By George Edgar. 6s. (Mills & Boon.)

Mr. Edgar writes with a running pen, but with a frank desire to entertain; and we have nothing but praise for this truly dashing narrative of adventure in the days of the second Charles, with its rooks and pigeons of high and low degree, its gaming dens, its look-and-do sword play, its dicing captains, roués, gallant lovers, courageous maidens, and its canting crew, depicted here with a touch that reminds one of the facility of Bulwer Lytton. Nicholas Nevinston loses a fortune in the night-house of one Isaacs in Covent Garden, accuses his opponent of foul play, pinks him in the Green Park, is outlawed from the Argyle Rooms, turns the tables on the foppish Beau Morris, takes to "the road," outwits the scheming Sir Ladbroke Drake and his creature Captain Barclay, is instrumental in nipping in the bud a plot against "Old Rowley," claims and secures the clemency of the pleasure-loving monarch, wins the hand of the beautiful Peggy Sheldon, and "lives happy ever after." Tribute must be paid to the research that has gone to the making up of the historical background, and to the neatly drawn character-sketches of Charles II. and Shaftesbury; but the story is the thing, and this is thoroughly enjoyable.

HILARY'S CAREER. By Parry Truscott. 6s. (Werner Laurie.)

Stella, the aristocratic, quietly conventional wife of John Martyn, publisher and editor of a monthly magazine called Martyn's Review, has set her heart on her only son, Hilary, going into the Navy—as most of the men in her high-born family have done. The boy himself is keenly set on the sea too. John Martyn, suddenly determines that the boy shall be trained to become the future editor of his Review. John is a good fellow, but has not the aristocratic breeding of his wife or son; he is set in a rougher mould. The affection between the husband and wife, their difference in manners, ideas, and temperaments is very cleverly portrayed. The author's skill in character drawing is undeniably great. The battle between Stella and John to decide their son's future career is begun; they talk the matter over many times, but neither will give way. Stella knows the boy is born to be a sailor and fights hard to give him the open sea life that he asks for; while John maintains that the boy can be made to take to anything, and insists that the publishing and editorial work which he has worked so hard to make successful shall be carried on by his son. The unfairness of the law which gives the father the right to decide such matters is vividly illustrated. Then the author gives a neat and totally unexpected turn to the situation. John is obliged to disclose to Stella that long before he met her—about twenty years ago—he married another woman, who turned out to be a really bad lot and ran away from him after a couple of months. Later he had had news and proofs of her death; these turn out to be false—he has just heard that she is alive. She does not want anything to do with him; only wants money. Poor John is fearfully upset, and Stella can scarcely realise things at first; but by and by she begins to see the new position, when she finds that John is still immovable over Hilary's career. She realises that if she leaves John she is entitled by law to take Hilary with her, as the marriage is not legal, and to give him the wish of his heart. But she shrinks with all her quiet, conventional, proud nature from the open scandal, and is tempted to let things drift. The story is powerfully written, and grips the reader from first to last.

FORTITUDE. By Hugh Walpole. 6s. (Martin Secker.)

Mr. Hugh Walpole's novel is concerned with one Peter Westcott, born at Scaw House in Cornwall. His father is a brutal man, the son of a brutal man, and the theme of the book is Peter's fight against an evil inheritance and what Frederick Niven has expressively described as the "monkey in man." Mr. Walpole introduces us to Peter as a little boy, afraid of his father, but resolved to face the inevitable punishment of staying out late in order to be with his fisherman friend, Stephen Brant. "Tisn't life that matters! 'Tis the courage you bring to it," says an old villager at "The Bending Mule," where we first meet Peter, and through all the discipline of life which he has to undergo this dictum recurs to him. Scaw House in Cornwall is very cleverly painted in as a dark background, and, though little is said of it, the suggestion of something evil and oppressive is cunningly conveyed. It has a similarity to Tulkinghorn's house and the sinister Roman figure on the ceiling. From Scaw House and its associations Peter must flee, and he goes to London to fight poverty with his pen in company with Stephen Brant. In London he writes a book modelled on his own experiences, and wins instant recognition. But an unhappy marriage and the loss of his baby boy affects his work, and it suffers in consequence. And then Scaw House calls him, the beast in him bids him return, and he goes back to find Norah Monogue, his unrecognised good angel, on her death bed. In a finely-wrought passage she bids him return to London. "Go back to be battered—never mind what happens to your body—any one can stand that. There's London waiting for you, there's life and adventure and hardship. There are people to be helped." And he makes the great decision, and Scaw House and its shadows pass away for ever. Peter is only thirty when we leave him. We await the sequel with interest, but meanwhile Mr. Walpole takes his place among the modern novelists who count. "Fortitude" is an exceedingly clever book; not "enjoyable," but powerful and stimulating.

THE MAN WHO WOULD NOT BE KING. By Sidney Dark. 6s. (Lane.)

In spite of its author's disclaimer, Mr. Sidney Dark's novel is one with a purpose. Although he may not have meant to do so, Mr. Dark is right in finding that it expresses the "case for the common natural man." "For years," he says, "I have been impressed by the disgusting tyranny, ever growing more grinding, exercised by politicians, philanthropists, social reformers, and other virtuous persons, over the lives of the great mass of everyday men and women who are bored by politics (except at elections), have no desire whatever to be reformed, and merely desire to live and love and have a good time." It is the modern striving after efficiency—not happiness—with which Mr. Dark quarrels. "The great truth is that very few of us have the slightest desire to be efficient. . . . We will not allow ourselves to believe that 'life is earnest, life is real.' We prefer to believe that it is thrilling and amusing and magical. We drop the bone for the shadow—but we find the shadow delightful." All this is illustrated by the career of Fenimore Slavington. That gentleman is a member—unworthy, but still a member—of the great Slavington family, which has amassed an enormous fortune over the making of peptonised soup, and has built a model factory and a model town. Fenimore is happily idle on an allowance of £500 a year when the last member of the working part of the family dies and leaves him the business if he will undertake it. After some hesitation he does, and he remains in charge of it for about a year. During that time a good deal happens both to Fenimore and to the model town of Slavingtonville, but it would not be fair to the author to give away the exact manner in which his hero nuddles the business and finds his own happiness. "The Man Who Would not be King," is not only witty and amusing, not only a good story; it contains half-a-dozen well-drawn characters, and, for the reader, some very genuine edification administered in an easily palatable manner.

VEILED WOMEN. By Marmaduke Pickthall. 6s. (Eveleigh Nash.)

Mr. Pickthall's new book is topical, but well above the topical novel of the day. At a moment when the whole world is watching the Turk fighting with his back to the wall of his old domain, the author of "Said the Fisherman" sets before us the Muslim philosophy of life. At a moment when in the West the status of women is a subject of general comment, he supplies an intimate view of the

From CONSTABLE'S List.

THE LETTERS OF A POST-IMPRESSIONIST

By Vincent Van Gogh
With an Introduction by A. M. TUDOVICI Illustrated from Van Gogh's Works 7s. 6d. net

KANT AND SPENCER: A Critical Exposition

Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net By Borden Parker Bowne

A REGISTER OF NATIONAL BIBLIOGRAPHY

(Compiled by W. F. Courtney, M.A.)
Vol III. Demy 8vo, 18s. net
Vols I and II already published Price 81s. 6d. net the two

THE HOLY CHRISTIAN CHURCH

Crown 8vo, 6s. net By R. M. Johnston

AMERICAN HISTORY AND ITS GEOGRAPHIC CONDITIONS

By Ellen Churchill Semple
Maps. Demy 8vo 12s. 6d. net Just published
Times — Her two works occupy the highest rank in recent geographical literature. Miss Semple is one of the most distinguished authorities on anthropogeography.

THE INFLUENCES OF GEOGRAPHIC ENVIRONMENT

On the Basis of Ratzel's System of Anthropogeography With 21 Maps 18s. net

OUTLINES OF EVOLUTIONARY BIOLOGY

By Arthur Dendy, D.Sc., F.R.S.
Second Edition Illustrated 12s. 6d. net

THE TASK OF SOCIAL HYGIENE

Large crown 8vo 8s. 6d. net By Havelock Ellis

THE LAWS OF SUPPLY AND DEMAND

By George Binney Dibbles M.A.
10s. 6d. net
The Fellow of All Souls College, Oxford
With special reference to their Influence on Overproduction and Unemployment Demy 8vo 7s. 6d. net

MODERN BIOGRAPHIES.

Short Biographies of Men and Women 1s. net each NEW VOLUME

W. E. HENLEY

Previously Issued

LAFCADIO HEARN

By Edward Thomas

J. M. SYNGE

By Francis Bickley

MAHOMMED

Author of 'Asia and Europe' 1s. net

Constable's New 6/- Fiction.

SURI RAM (Indian Revolutionist)

A Transcript from Life. 1907-1910
"Who was the unknown author of 'Suri Ram' in the first place? There can be no question that he is singularly well equipped for the difficult task which he has essayed in this powerful and engrossing study of the psychology of Indian unrest. The result is a book of engaging interest." The Spectator

KEREN OF LOWBOLE

A new novel by the Author of 'Success', 'The Good Comed', etc.
By Una L. Silberrad

THE SECRET OF THE CLAN

A new novel by the Author of 'Country Neighbours', 'The Story of Inverna', etc.
By Alice Brown

ISRAEL KALISCH (An Epic of Anarchy)

A new volume by the Author of 'Loaves and Fishes', 'Plots', etc.
By Bernard Capes

BAG AND BAGGAGE

A new Novel by the Author of 'A Circuit Rider's Wife', 'Love and Husband', etc.
By Corra Harris

THE RECORDING ANGEL

A new novel by the Author of 'Jewel', 'The Opened Shutters', etc.
By Clara Louise Burnham

THE INNER FLAME

A novel by the Author of 'The Long Roll', 'The Old Dominion', etc.
By Mary Johnston

GRASS FIRING

A novel by the Author of 'Captain Desmond, V.C.', 'Candids in the Wind', etc.
By Maud Diver

THE HERO OF HERAT

A Novel by the Author of 'Mardi of the Moors', 'The Pursuit of Mr. Laval', etc.
By R. E. Verande

THE JUNE LADY

A novel by the Author of 'Old Harbour', etc.
By W. J. Hopkins

CONCERNING SALLY

By W. J. Hopkins

CONSTABLE & CO., Ltd., Publishers, London: 10, Orange St., W.C.

FROM MESSRS. BELL'S LIST.

Volume IV. now Ready.

The Correspondence of Jonathan Swift.

Edited by F. FLRINGTON BALL, Litt D. With an Introduction by the Right Rev the BISHOP of OSSORY. To be completed in 6 vols. Vols I, II, III, and IV now ready. Vol. V. in the press. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net each

Volume IV. now Ready.

The Works of Francis Beaumont and John Fletcher.

Variorum Edition. Under the General Editorship of A. H. BULLEN. To be completed in 12 vols. Vols. I, II and III previously published 10s. 6d. net per volume

The Letters of Thomas Gray.

Including the Correspondence of Gray and Mason.

Edited by the Rev D. C. TOVEY, M.A. Vol III, with Copious Index, just published. Vols I and II also ready 3s. 6d. per volume.

"The letters are transcribed with scrupulous care that the latest edition must surely supersede all others and they are annotated with the sympathy and scholarship which alone can elucidate many allusions prompted by Gray's wide reading and quick memory. Gray's letters are the wisest and wittiest of their kind and you cannot do better than read them again in Mr. Tovey's scholarly and entertaining edition." Spectator

London: G. BELL & SONS, Ltd.,
Portugal Street, Kingway, W.C.

1913 New Spring Books 1913

DANTE AND THE MYSTICS

By H. G. GARDNER, M.A. Demy 8vo 7/6 net

Daily News — "A deep and sympathetic student both of Dante and the medieval mystics, he brings to this inquiry the rare combination of qualities that it demands, vision and scholarship and that extreme delicacy of touch which makes possible and orderly marshalling and presentation of almost intangible things whilst avoiding the two great dangers of such an enterprise."

CHAUCEER

By EMILE LEGOUIS

Translated by L. LAITAVOIN

Bookman — "Learned and full, yet lucid and well proportioned, it leaves us with a most satisfactory impression of thoroughness and balance, the writer's touch is as light as it is sure, and precision of statement is combined with felicity of expression."

DANTE AND AQUINAS

By Rev P. H. WICKSTEAD Litt D. 8vo 8/- net
Aims at giving the student a connected idea of the general Theological and Philosophical background of the Comedy

WINDS OF DOCTRINE

By Prof G. SANTAYANA Small demy 8vo, 8/- net

Channels of English Literature

Edited by OLIPHANT SKEATON, M.A.

A series designed to trace the genesis and evolution of the various departments of English literature and English thought

English Philosophers and Schools of Philosophy

By Prof. JAMES SETH, M.A.

ENGLISH EPIC AND HEROIC POETRY

By Prof. W. MACNEILE DIXON, M.A., University Glasgow

ENGLISH LYRIC POETRY

By ERNEST REYS, M.A.

THE ENGLISH NOVEL

By Prof. GEORGE SAINTSBURY, LL.D.

University of Edinburgh
A Prospectus relating to any of the above Books will be sent immediately upon receipt of a postcard

J. M. DENT & SONS, LTD.
25, ALDINE HOUSE, BEDFORD STREET, W.C.

daily life and outlook of the women of the East and their old-world solidarity. And he carries us away from the strife of comparatively local factions into the atmosphere which surrounds the ultimate destiny of man. "Veiled Women" is an essay in psychology that demands from the reader sympathy akin to that the author has ungrudgingly bestowed upon his theme. Owing little to the glamour of style—references to local colour only occur incidentally, those unforgettable "blue nights alive with stars" are but casually mentioned—the book has been written with meticulous care. It will give perhaps a rude shock to some; its realism is caustic. In it the superficial will probably see no more than a vivid story of a very ordinary Englishwoman who comes to Cairo in the days of Ismail, a fugitive from a life of hired hypocrisy, is engaged as governess in a Muslim family of repute, embraces the Muslim faith, marries the son of her employer, tries to return to Europe, and, finally, through her very striving after the religion she had discarded, reaches at last "the living heart of El Islâm. In self-annihilation there was peace." All through Barakah ("a God-send") compares but ill with those with whom she has cast in her lot; but the best part of her nature is drawn out by the infinite and unexpected kindness of her husband's people, that kindness which won her, as to a harbour of refuge, in the days of her adversity and loneliness. Muhammad Pasha Sâlih, in his courtesy, his courage, his dignity, his essential chivalry, is drawn with masterly skill. Haunting also are the studies of his wives: the secluded, dutiful Murjânâh Khânûm and the passionate, generous Fitnah Khânûm. Yûsuf, the young husband, is no bad son of his father, if on a lower level. True to immemorial tradition, as to life, is the portrait of the old gossip Umm ed-Dahak, typical of the weeds of Sudanese witchcraft that have found favouring soil within the harfms of upper-class Egyptian life. By introducing a visit to Paris—perhaps on other counts the weakest part of the book—Mr. Pickthall contrives to emphasise the conflicting views of East and West, depicted in the main narrative. We see, too, the working of such factors as the French novel upon the Oriental mind. Politics are not allowed to intrude unnecessarily, but there is a good word for Arabi. It will be gathered that the webs of interest are varied, but the work derives its appeal and its vitality from its penetrating psychology, its keen analysis of character under the influences of environment. And its conclusion is on the fatalistic note: "Whither?"

THE PEARL STRINGER. By Peggy Webling. 6s. (Methuen.)

Miss Peggy Webling has written a story of life and love and passion with the quiet, uneventful existence of a little pearl-stringer as its background. The characters are natural and interesting; the vivacious Rose Leonard, with her love of dress and her intense weariness of the monotonous life she is obliged to lead in her poor surroundings, strikes a vivid contrast to Nannie Mordaunt, the contented little pearl-stringer, dwelling in a world of her own fancy, and sitting from day to day, year to year, in the dull room, threading pearls for her living. Rose Leonard passes through the glittering pathways of romance, finding at last a true happiness in the love of an old friend; a light comes into Nan Mordaunt's life when Henry Rostron discovers her, and spends his time watching her at her work and talking to her; but her quiet little love story has a tragic end. Throughout the book Nan is a pathetic figure, calling forth the sympathy of all by her gentleness and courage. It is a very charming romance of real life, that is none the less real because it is touched with the light and colour of romance.

THE GATE OF TO-MORROW. By Norman McKeown. 8s. (Cassell.)

Surely there never was a quartette of miners more diverse in temperament yet more harmonious in their common life than Peter, Hoppy, Owen, and Matthew, who discover gold in the hills of the Wallaby, and whose dreams of what wealth will bring them are rudely shattered by the incursion into their midst of a woman fugitive, Margot. Margot, whose real name appears to be Susie, is received into the camp and wins the affections of its oddly assorted members. She tells fairy tales about her past, and so far believes them herself that she weeps over their poignancy. But the influences of her newly-found friends and of her new surroundings, generally work a subtle change in her character, and through tragedy, precipitated by the arrival of a creature called Harry Lee, with whom she had lived, till in a fit of passion she had shot him, and fled into the hills away from Urabah, she discovers the remnants of her real womanhood and—"The Gate of To-morrow." It is a simple but cleverly written story, and commercial travellers, who seem in modern fiction to have taken the place of the wicked baronet of a former epoch, are to be commiserated upon their representative, Harry Lee.

Photo by Richard Brown, Liverpool.

Mr. Norman McKeown.

JOHN SCARLETT. By Donald Maclean. 6s. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

"John Scarlett" is one of those welcome novels which leave their readers infected with the author's enthusiasm. It is an Australian story, and after reading it you feel you have just had a stimulating talk with one who is righteously and rightly proud of Australia and anxious to do his best to uplift its toilers. In his new novel Mr. Donald Maclean demonstrates in a strikingly convincing manner the value of the work done by such institutions as the Y.M.C.A. in setting up healthy counter-attractions to the "two-up schools" and drinking shanties of a navvies' camp on the railroad. John Scarlett, the man who is commissioned (by an error) to open up a social tent in the heart of an extravagant camp of this nature, is apparently the last man in the world to tackle such a task. A weedy, sandy-haired

MESSRS. CASSELL have just Published
John Foster Fraser's Latest Work

Panama and What it Means

By John Foster Fraser.

With over 47 Plates, a Map and a Plan.

To write a book Mr. Fraser paid a special visit to the Canal zone and brought back with him a mass of information, which, treated as Mr. Fraser treats it, will probably prove the book upon the subject of The Panama Canal and What it Means to the world at large. The book will be found exceedingly interesting as an exposition of the sociological and economic phases of the construction of what is probably the greatest engineering feat of modern times.

Just ready at all Booksellers.

Extra Crown 8vo. Cloth gilt. 6/-

THREE NEW NATURE BOOKS

Trees and How They Grow By G. CLARKE NUTTALL, B.Sc. With 134 Photographs by the Author and 15 Autochromes by H. ESSENHIGH CORKE, F.R.P.S., F.R.H.S. Large Crown 8vo, 192 pages, Cloth gilt, 6/- net. With the aid of Mrs. Nuttall's text and her beautiful series of Photographs it is possible for anyone to identify at any season of the year the more common trees to be found in Great Britain.

Garden Flowers as They Grow Photographed in Colour direct from Nature, by H. ESSENHIGH CORKE, F.R.P.S., F.R.H.S. With descriptive text by H. H. THOMAS. With 20 Lumiere Plates, Extra F'scap 4to, Cloth gilt, 5/- net. Mr H. H. Thomas, Editor of "The Gardener," contributes a commentary on each flower portrayed which will be found useful to the practical gardener and of the greatest interest to the garden lover, to both of whom the book has a powerful appeal.

Wild Flowers as They Grow (Series V.) Photographed in Colour direct from Nature, by H. ESSENHIGH CORKE, F.R.P.S., F.R.H.S. With descriptive text by G. CLARKE NUTTALL, B.Sc. With 25 Lumiere Plates. F'scap 4to 5/- net. No preface is required to announce a further addition to a series which has established itself so well in public favour as the pioneer volumes of successful colour photograph compilations.

NEW AND FORTHCOMING 6s. FICTION

CHILD OF STORM

H. Rider Haggard

THE GATE OF TO-MORROW Norman McKeown

RED HARVEST

Newman Flower

Author of "The Soul Market."

A MASTER OF DECEPTION

Richard Marsh

LOVE'S SOLDIER

Olive Christian Mackirdy

THE DRUG SLAVE

Mary Lake

WHITE MOTLEY

Max Pemberton

THE MYSTERY WOMAN Mrs. Campbell Praed

CASSELL & CO., LTD., LA BELLE SAUVAGE, LONDON, E.C.

Spring Books 1913

The History of Oratory in Parliament.

ROBERT CRAIG, M.A., D.D. Demy 8vo 10/6 net.
 This is a Book destined to take its place as the standard authority on oratory, and will fill a niche hitherto unoccupied. [Ready in March]

The Philosophy of Nietzsche. G. CHAP

II RION III. Ph.D. 7/6 net. 'Really excellent'—Times. 'An able exposition'—Times. 'A plain, straightforward exposition'—The Standard. 'Deserves attention'—Nation.

The Humanity of Christ, and Other

Sermons. ALFRED PIERCE, D.D. 3/6 net

The Literary Year Book. Edited by BASIL

STEWART 6/- net. 'An indispensable book of reference for authors and journalists'—Daily Graphic.

TWO OPEN-AIR BOOKS.

The Rollings of a Mossless Stone. PERCY J. NAISH 8/- net. 'We can imagine no more pleasant companion than this cheery book'—Evening Standard. 'Written always with a catching animation, the book cannot but prove enjoyable'—Scotsman.

The Dash for Winter Sports. Capt. H. M. MAITLAND. With 10 Illustrations by ALFRED TATE. Cloth 2/6 net. Paper 1/- net. 'Those who have tasted the joys of Winter Sports will laugh—the volume is one to recommend'—Sportsman.

NEW NOVELS (8/-) as under now ready:

The Shadow of Salvador. JOHN HASLETTE (Author of "Diamond Route," &c.)

The Black Bean. THOR MANBY (Author of "Romance of the Road," &c.)

Little Grey Girl. MARY OFENSHAW (Author of "The Lower Pays," &c.)

Linked Lives. D. KINMOY NI ROY.

Mingled Seed. ALICE JEANS (Author of "The Rajah's Wife," &c.)

Top-eared Dick. G. I. MONCKTON.

A Watcher of Life. HARRY TIGHE (Author of "Intellectual Maria," &c.)

Love in the Florida. HELLN MAYES.

Sussex Iron. Lewis Lubk (Author of "Sussex," &c.)

The Nom de Plume. I. A. GIBBS.

Feigning or Folly. ANNIE V. DUTTON (Author of "Love Without Wings," &c.)

From an Umbrian City. BENSON HAYES.

HEATH, CRANTON & OUSELEY, Limited, 6 Fleet Lane, LONDON, E.C.

TO AUTHORS. The best offers for original MSS. are secured by THE SURREY LITERARY AGENCY. Novels, Short Stories, and Articles read and placed. Beginners' work a speciality. Write for free prospectus to "Locksley," Presburg Road, New Malden, Surrey.

INFANT BIBLE READER.

By Mrs. NATHANIEL L. COHEN, with coloured Illustrations by Louise Jacobs. Price 1/6.

WERTHEIMER, LEA & CO., Clifton House, Worship Street, and 46 & 47, London Wall, London, E.C.

The aim of the book is to make children familiar with the beautiful stories of the Bible and to give them some knowledge of the eternal truths of human life and character.

TYPEWRITING.—MSS. of every description copied accurately and promptly 9d. 1,000 words postage inclusive). Testimonials from Authors, &c.

Miss JACOBS, 18, Statham Grove,

Clissold Park, N.

(Kindly note change of Address).

TO VIOLIN LOVERS.

A Joannes Baptista Guadagnini VIOLIN. Fine tone and splendid preservation. Authenticity guaranteed. For particulars, apply B.A. Box 909, Bookman Office, St. Paul's House, Warwick Sq., London, E.C.

bank-clerk, with pale blue eyes and a weak mouth, he starts on his uninviting mission in fear and trembling. The story of how he "made good," in the navvies' camp, and thereby incidentally stumbled into Heaven, is a strong and inspiring piece of work and one that will add greatly to the reputation of the author of "The Man from Curdie's River."

The Bookman's Table.

THE RIVER RHYMER. By J. Ashby-Sterry. 3s. 6d. net. (Ham-Smith.)

It was a good idea to devote a whole book of verse to the Thames; at first sight the subject seems to lend itself better to this than to the prose of Mr. Belloc. In these pages we find all manner of rhyming, almost as various as is the river—on the surface. We suppose that even in the polluted parts there is a clear flow of water far underneath the surface; and so it is with Mr. Ashby-Sterry. The prevailing sentiment is amiability. Matthew Arnold's great eastern river does not beguile him, and he is not what one would call philosophic. Perhaps the Swinburnian metres are a little irritating, but the good intention is so apparent that we turn to what may be on the next page. It is extraordinary, when one comes to think of it, how variously one could celebrate this famous river, and we welcome the modest banjo of Mr. Ashby-Sterry into the orchestra.

O Pangbourne is pleasant in glad summer-time,
And Streatley and Goring are worthy of rhyme . . .

Of course they are. Mr. Ashby-Sterry's summer-time is "glad"—but he is no stickler for conventions: in the same set of verses we find the line: "But still the two maidens tramp girfully on," and we salute the adverb on its first appearance in polite society. Later on we come across a really gorgeous rhyme with "atmosphere," namely "fat must fear," and we notice several allusions to the "boundless brain," both of author and prospective reader. Nevertheless we are exhorted to be idle, to drift on the stream and therefore the verses are rightly, in the main, slight, inviting, easy-going. When Mr. Ashby-Sterry celebrates the Dec, he will perhaps assume a mood more strenuous, more bracing. As it is his adventures do not make the blood run much faster; there is, for example, the girl at Bolney Ferry, whose lips were like a cherry, who had a dog called Jerry, whose laugh was merry and who plied a wherry. In the "Harz-Reise" this adventure would have produced a more pointed and more memorable poem, but we are sure that Mr. Ashby-Sterry was a much better person for that young person to meet than Heine would have been. He has a pleasant, airy fancy, and is at his best in such a vivid little word picture as this:

Sluice-house, dyke, dam and such,
Grass expanse, over much,
Give it an aspect Dutch—
Simply entrancing!
Widening to greet the sea,
Just here the Thames might be Part of the Zuyder Zee—
Gleaming and glancing.

SIX GREAT PRINCESSES. By the Count de Soissons. 10s. 6d. net. (Holden & Hardingham.)

Holding that modern democracy is unjust "towards the glorious deeds of the nobility," the Count de Soissons presents this account of the lives and characters of the six daughters of the Duc d'Orleans as a piece of "not only interesting but instructive reading," which he seems to hope may counteract the influence of certain Puritanical writers, who do not scruple, it appears, to falsify historical facts in order "to please the ignorant crowd." It was a queer set of heroines to choose for such a purpose. The Regent's eldest daughter, the Duchesse de Berry, according to the author's own showing, was notorious for her gluttony and extravagance, and he candidly quotes Saint Simon's testimony that she was "low to the last degree of indecency." The second daughter, who became a nun at the age of seventeen, and promptly ousted her superior to reign in her stead as Abbess of Chelles, in the intervals between her fits of rigorous austerity turned the bare parlours of her Abbey into salons upholstered with silk brocade, gave suppers and concerts and dramatic performances, manufactured fireworks on the premises, and went about carrying a pistol, which she frequently fired off to frighten her nuns. The third daughter was so undesirable a familiar that her family thought of nothing but getting her married and out of the country as early as possible. The fourth was equally unendurable alike to her own family in France and to her husband's family in Spain. The fifth did nothing of note, and died from measles at the age of twenty. And of the sixth, who was married to the Prince de Conti at the age of fifteen, we are told little more than that she quarrelled with her husband and was compelled to separate from him. The mother of these by no means charming young ladies was an even worse specimen of the ancienne noblesse, for we are told that she was incorrigibly lazy, a gluttonous eater, and in the habit of getting "as drunk as a bell-ringer three or four times a week." Surely the most "Puritanical" of democrats could hardly have framed a more damaging indictment.

CROSS VIEWS. By Wilfrid S. Jackson 5s. net. (John Lane)

It is no use saying that a sense of humour is essential to the good essayist, because Bacon had none (and some people who imagine he wrote the works of the creator of Falstaff seem to have caught his complaint); but as a general thing a sense of humour is a gift that the essayist is always the better for having; and Mr. Wilfrid Jackson has it, and uses it to excellent purpose in his "Cross Views." He has also a shrewd leaven of common sense and sympathy, and understanding enough to enable him to dissent good-naturedly from opinions that do not square with his own. In "John Bull" he can realise the faults and weaknesses of his countrymen without failing to appreciate their admirable qualities; in "Woman" and in "Marriage and Divorce" he handles the case for the feminists thoughtfully, yet with a delightfully quaint play of wit and whimsicality that tickles the enemy of the cause even while it laughs him out of court. There are charming things in "Town and Country" and in "Also a Garden"; much of reflection, sentiment and irony in "Over the Fire," "Appearances," "The Man of the World," and everywhere that blessed boon of humour to lend pungency to an argument, keep its satire free from spleenful bitterness, and

Madame de Montespan.

From "Six Great Princesses," by the Count de Soissons (Holding & Hardingham).

Globe-Wernicke 'Elastic' Bookcase

Always Complete, But Never Finished.

You can extend this Bookcase horizontally or vertically.

The ordinary bookcase is seldom very satisfactory. It soon becomes too small, so that as new books are added they are either placed in a confused heap or jammed tightly together. The open bookshelf is equally unsatisfactory for it leaves the books exposed to dust and damage. The best and most satisfactory bookcase you can buy is a Globe-Wernicke "Elastic" Bookcase.

This bookcase is built up of Units. You can procure just as many Units as you need and add more as required. These can be set up in various ways to suit the accommodation of the room, and at every stage you will have a complete bookcase. Later on, if you wish to rearrange the Units, you can do so without taking out the books inside, as each Unit is self-contained and is provided with its own dust proof glass door.

See Booklet No. 14 B for illustrations and full particulars.

The Globe-Wernicke Co.

Office and Luggage Furnishers

44 HOLBORN VIADUCT, LONDON, E.C.
88 VICTORIA STREET, S.W.
88 BISHOPSGATE, E.C.

Packing Free. Orders of £2 Carriage Paid to any Goods Station in the British Isles.

This illustration shows the units arranged to pleasingly occupy what might otherwise be an elegant corner of a room. The Bookcase (as shown) consists of six Book units two Base units and two Top units.

If you see a man

shaking or coaxing his Fountain Pen before it will write you know he isn't using a Waterman's Ideal. Waterman's Ideal requires no shaking. It writes the instant it touches the paper. Isn't that the kind of Pen to own?

Of Stationers and Jewellers everywhere. Booklet free from I. C. HARDMUTH
Ltd. 4th Floor, House Kingsway London (New York 171 Broadway)

Waterman's
Ideal
Fountain Pen

Waterman's
Ideal
Fountain Pen

Just Published.

CRITICAL REVIEWS RELATING CHIEFLY TO SCOTLAND.

BY DAVID HAY
FLEMING, LL.D.

Author of "The Reformation in Scotland," "Mary Queen of Scots," etc.

12s. net.

HODDER & STOUGHTON, PUBLISHERS, LONDON, E.C.

Photo by Loua Connell, St. John's Wood.

Miss Annie V. Dutton.

"Lot Barrow" (Secker) we review on another page, is the third daughter of Wilfrid and Alice Meynell. She published, in 1910, "Martha Vine," and in 1911 "Cross-in-Hand Farm," and has written introductions to George Eliot's work, for the Regent Library and the Oxford University Press. The first appearance of Miss Meynell's name in literature happened when Francis Thompson published his poem "The Making of Viola."

"Feigning or Folly" is the title of a new novel by Miss Annie V. Dutton that Messrs. Heath, Granton & Ouseley are publishing. Miss Dutton's last book, "Love without Wings," met with considerable success, various critics comparing her work, for delicacy of characterization and brilliancy of dialogue, to that of Jane Austen and Mrs. Gaskell.

Photo by Mullins, Ryde.

Mrs. Lewis Leeds.

whose clever novel, "Mr. Massiter," was recently published by Messrs. Lynwood & Co.

Photo by Chas. B. Wilson, Wolland, Ontario.

Miss Adeline M. Teskey,

the well known Canadian writer, whose new book, "Candlelight Days," has just been published by Messrs. Cassell.

No living writer knows London better than Mr. Wilfred Whitten, or is more sensitive to its charm. He has written much, both of the London of our own day, and of the days that are no more. Last year he compiled for Messrs. Jack two large volumes of "London Stories," and now in "A Londoner's London," which Messrs. Methuen are publishing, he has written a book that deals with London as he has known it, and with those of its associations that have appealed especially to himself. The Londoner's London, as he remarks in his preface, is not the measureless town of the guide-books; it is much smaller: "it is the sum of his own tracks in the maze, the town in which, by hap, he has most often eaten his bread, and thought his thoughts." So he gives you chapters on "The Veils of Yesterday"; "The City Man's City"; "A Walk through Everyman's London"; "The Street of the Ready Writer"—which, of course, is Fleet Street—and wherever he takes you you may be sure of finding him the very best of cicerones.

Photo by F. O. Hopps.

Mr. Wilfred Whitten

Mr. Frank A. Mumby in his cabbage-patch at Finchley.

Mr. Frank A. Mumby's new book, "The Youth of Henry VIII." (Constable), is a companion volume to "The Girlhood of Queen Elizabeth," which he published last year. Mr. Mumby is one of the ablest and most successful writers of popular history; his work is the result of first-hand research, and is distinguished by literary qualities to which the average popular history makes little or no claim. His earlier books include an admirable and curiously interesting "Romance of Bookselling" from the earliest times to the present century; and an

Mr. J. E. Patterson on tramp with his Labrador dog, "Bosun."

"Anthology of Letters of Literary Men," containing some five hundred letters illustrative of the history of English Literature. In his new book, as in "The Girlhood of Queen Elizabeth," Mr. Mumby draws largely on contemporary letters, always the best, most intimate and most interesting sources of history.

Mr. J. E. Patterson has recently been on a tramp across Wales to Cardiff, and is writing a book on this and earlier pilgrimages he has made in Essex, Suffolk, Monmouthshire, Herefordshire, and elsewhere.

For much valuable assistance with the illustrations to our article on G. F. Watts we are greatly indebted to the kindness of Mrs. M. S. Watts and Messrs. Macmillan.

THE BOOKMAN GALLERY.

MR. R. AUSTIN FREEMAN.

SIXTEEN years ago I sent to Dr. A. Conan Doyle a copy of a little book in which I had used some of his Sherlock Holmes matter to illustrate certain points in psychology. In acknowledging the volume he told me that I took the stories too seriously, and that all he aimed at in writing them was to present his readers with "plausible yarns." It is possible for the general public, and perhaps even for the critic, to take detective stories too seriously, but with the writer of such stories it is different. He cannot be too serious in his work. However low his genre may rank in the public estimation it is not for him to take a light view of his work. Nothing alienates the public more readily than a suspicion that an author is writing with his tongue in his cheek. He may have as modest an opinion of his merits as he pleases, and he may even admit that he does not regard his kind of writing as the highest class of literature; but in the actual doing of his work he must make his readers feel that he at any rate thinks it worth while.

In his preface to one of his detective books, "The Red Thumb Mark," Mr. R. Austin Freeman adopts quite the attitude of the maker of "plausible yarns." It was written, he tells us, with "no purpose other than that of affording entertainment to such readers as are interested in problems of crime and their solutions; and the story itself differs in no respect from others of its class, excepting in that an effort has been made to keep within the probabilities of ordinary life, both in the characters and in the incidents." Few readers realise how much is implied in the apparently simple ideal of a "plausible yarn." There must be, to begin with, a vast background of accurate knowledge, but the knowledge must not be obtruded upon the attention of the reader. It is not sufficient that a certain incident is possible, or even that it actually happened, it must be such as to appear probable to the reader. Aristotle's view of the relative merits of the possible and the probable is as true to-day as it was when the "Poetics" was the book of the Year. Mr. Freeman obviously realises all this. He gives evidence of an unusually well-stored mind, he is master of many subjects, has read deeply and travelled widely. His is evidently a mind with a bias towards accuracy. To suit his purpose he sometimes takes certain liberties with facts, but his conscience is tender on the subject. If it is necessary to assume "a screw-pile lighthouse on the Girdler Sand in place of the light vessel," he is careful to note this, elsewhere than in the story itself, "to forestall criticism and save readers the trouble of writing to point out the error."

It appears that Mr. Freeman's critics do not all appreciate this love of accuracy and this endeavour to secure probability. In the preface to his recently published "The Mystery of 31 New Inn," he tells us that one of his critics maintained that these things were "of no consequence so long as the story was amusing." Mr. Freeman's illustrative defence is not very happy, consisting as it does in showing that a particularly complicated method of orientation described in the story was actually used by himself in Ashanti. The critic would probably reply that the reader is not at all concerned about the actual use of the method, so long as it is intelligible and does not carry an obvious contradiction. The whole principle of the "plausible yarn," is here in question, the issue being practically the same as that raised in the various current discussions on artistic realism. The laws of perspective may show that a particular circular window that is open in a picture could never fit into the circular casement to which it belongs. What does it matter? ask critics of a certain school. The blunder is an offence to those who know perspective, but to the great majority of spectators it makes no difference. It would appear then that the degree of accuracy exacted from an artist, whether graphic or literary, must be determined by the knowledge of the persons to whom the artist appeals. Thus in stories of this class nothing must be introduced that is inconsistent with the ordinary experience of the average reader, or that is inconsistent with anything that appears in the story itself. This may be regarded as the minimum of accuracy necessary for successful work. On the other hand there cannot be an excess of accuracy, though there may well be an excessive display of accuracy. The author must not protest too much, but must, by successfully standing the criticism based on the reader's actual experience, win his confidence and thus let the question of accuracy drop out of consciousness altogether. It is here that Mr. Freeman is conspicuously successful. The ordinary reader is made to feel that he is in the hands of a man who is an authority on the subjects he is dealing with, and has a great deal of knowledge in reserve. Even the critical reader sees few traces of that shameless use of commonplace books of reference that marks journeyman work in mystery stories. Mr. Freeman draws from his store of knowledge, he does not usually hunt up knowledge ad hoc. It is true that one can sometimes reconstruct the origin of the plot. For example it is easy to imagine Mr. Freeman turning up some of his old biological note-books or text-books, and glancing at a diagram of the unique oval-shaped blood corpuscle of the camel—obviously an infallible guide in a maze of evidence from blood stains. But his use of this basal fact is so skilful that the mechanical nature of the construction is completely hidden. While we follow the story of "The Old Lag," we feel that we are reading of real men and women, though a cold-blooded critic might point out that they are all set in motion by the memory of a note or a drawing in an old college book.

As to narration, Mr. Freeman has, in three out of the four Thorndyke volumes, adopted the first personal presentation in that "second-fiddle" form typified in Dr. Watson of the Sherlock Holmes memoirs; in "The Eye of Osiris," indeed, the narrator has to play even third fiddle. The purpose of this intermediary between the public and the really great man is no doubt to interpolate that amount of obscurity that is necessary to prevent the reader getting too soon on the right scent. The method necessarily condemns the intermediary to a somewhat humiliating grade of stupidity. The Dr. Jervis of these volumes is certainly not so dull as Dr. Watson, for his creator has had the advantage of Sir Conan Doyle's experience, and makes his secondary character much more of an active partner in the detection of crime. But, after all, Jervis is as inferior to Thorndyke as Watson was to Holmes. It must be acknowledged, however, that Jervis stands out more as an individual than does Watson. Indeed, one of the strong points of Mr. Freeman is the power he has of drawing real characters; by no means a common mark of writers of such ingenuity in plot construction.

Three of the four books in which Dr. John Thorndyke is the central character are written in the orthodox way. They are intrinsically of very great interest, and, indeed, stand out as conspicuously above the ordinary story of this type. They are the work of a master in this somewhat difficult craft. The fourth volume, however, "The Singing Bone," has all the attractions of an experiment in literary form. It is apparent that Mr. Freeman has been worried in his other books, as his readers must necessarily be, by the necessity of continually keeping back certain bits of information that might precipitate the dénouement, so he put to himself the question whether it would not be possible to write a detective story in which author and reader could play with the cards on the table. Accordingly, he set about writing the same story twice over—first from the point of view of the criminal, and then from the point of view of the detective. A by-product of this method is the elimination of the first personal form. The volume contains five such duplicated stories, and the result cannot be regarded as altogether successful. Were it not for Mr. Freeman's extraordinary power of telling a story the volume might have been a dismal failure. As it is, the author by a tour de force carries the reader right through the book, partly from sheer interest in the incidents, and partly from the interest in Thorndyke's methods.* The objection to this duplicate method, which Mr. Freeman claims to have been justified by its success, is that it emphasises the purely logical aspects of the different cases. It is not so much a series of stories as a set of exercises. A teacher might be tempted to use them as problems in applied logic. This logical interest is no doubt prominent in the other books, notably in the summing up at the symposium at the end of "The Eye of Osiris," but in the short stories it is deliberately brought forward as the chief matter. Nothing but the author's remarkable skill in character delineation and graphic narrative could save the stories from being regarded as technical studies, such as find a suitable place in a course on forensic medicine.

Indeed, the whole position of Mr. Freeman depends upon the class of readers to whom he appeals. His work is certainly beyond the range of the ordinary devourer of "sleuth" novels. He makes very great demands on the attention of his readers. To read these books intelligently implies a definite exercise in the use of Mill's Canons of Inductive Logic, and the books might form a very practical means of testing the student's mastery of these canons. A very obvious and natural criticism of the stories is that they are too clever: they ask too much of the reader. But, unlike some clever writers, Mr. Freeman is clever enough to carry off his cleverness. His exposition is so clear, his arrangement of events so methodical, that the reader is led along with the minimum amount of effort consistent with a very definite exercise of the reason. Stupid and lazy readers may be warned off, but the ordinary intelligent reader may rely upon having from Mr. Freeman a course in mental gymnastics conducted under the pleasantest conditions.

Mr. R. Austin Freeman.

I have carefully avoided even suggesting the plot of these stories, for in work of this kind it is manifestly unfair to stale the interest by suggesting the development. But it is not giving away any secret to say that one marked characteristic of Mr. Freeman's plots is that they justify themselves. In most mystery stories there is little difficulty in stating the mystery. As a rule, books of this kind have quite a piquant beginning. The failure comes later, when the mystery has to be unravelled. A great deal is usually left to the imagination of the reader, and not a little is entirely unexplained. Mr. Freeman leaves no such tangled threads. Everything is worked out with the greatest clearness and thoroughness. Where occasional obscurity occurs, as in the exposition of the principles of detection by finger-marks, the blame is thrown upon one of the characters: the author in his own person is eminently lucid. I have been so much interested in Mr. Freeman's method that I am acting a little against my own inclination when I urge upon him in his future work to subordinate his logical demonstrations to the human interest that he has been so successful in maintaining in his longer books.

JOHN ADAMS.

The Booksellers' Diary.

LIST OF FORTHCOMING BOOKS.

April 1st to May 1st, 1913.

Messrs. George Allen & Co., Ltd.

CABET, J.—I. Abbé Gustave Morel. Translated by Rev. E. Dredge. 5s. net.
 ENDENDIJK, PROFESSOR J.—Third Dutch Reader and Writer "Parallel Grammar" Series. 2s.
 GAULTIER, PAUL.—The Meaning of Art. Translated by H. and E. Baldwin. With 12 full page illustrations. 5s. net.
 HARRIS, MISS S. M.—Dust of the World. A Novel. 6s.
 MACKENZIE, COL. R. H.—The Trafalgar Roll. 5s. net.
 WYLLY, COL. H. (Editor)—Sherwood Foresters' Annual, 1913. Illustrated. 1s. net, paper, 2s. net, cloth.

Messrs. J. W. Arrowsmith, Ltd.

BARNES-GRUNDY, MRS. MABEL. Two in a Tent and Jane (Originally published under the title of "A Thames Camp") 1s. net.
 BETHAM EDWARDS, MISS. Pearl. 1s. net.

Messrs. A. & C. Black.

ADAMS, MRS. HUGH, and BROWNE, EDITH A. (Editors)—The Social Guide for 1913. 2s. 6d. net.
 BROWNE, EDITH A. Panama (Peeps at Many Lands). 1s. 6d. net.
 HALL, REV. CHARLES A.—Pond Life (Peeps at Nature). 1s. 6d. net.
 HERBERT, DR. S.—First Principles of Evolution. 7s. 6d. net.
 HOME, GORDON.—The Great Western Railway. 1s. 6d. net.
 JOHNSON, A. F. (Editor)—Heath Robinson (Brush, Pen and Pencil Series).
 JOHNSTON, R. W., M.D.—Text Book of Midwifery. 10s. 6d. net.
 LIBERTY, SIR A. I.—A Day in London. 7s. 6d. net.
 MACDONALD, LADY.—Reminiscences of Diplomatic Life. 7s. 6d. net.
 MALCOLMSON, A. M., M.D.—The Laws of Health for Schools. 1s. 6d.
 NISBET, JOHN.—Diagon (Artist's Sketch Book Series). 1s. net.
 SOMMERVILLE, FRANKFORT.—The Spirit of Paris. 7s. 6d. net.
 SYM, WILLIAM GLOUCESTER, M.D.—Diseases and Injuries of the Eye. 7s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Chatto & Windus.

JONES, CECIL DUNCAN.—The Everlasting Search: A Novel. 6s.
 WOOD, T. MARTIN.—George Du Maurier, the Satirist of the Victorians. Illustrated. 7s. 6d. net.

Messrs. James Clarke & Co.

GIBBERD, VERNON.—Life's Little Lessons: Addresses to Children. 1s. 6d. net.
 HOLBORN, REV. ALFRED.—Led by a Child: and other Sermons. 2s. 6d. net.
 JONES, REV. J. PULESTON, M.A.—Until the Day Dawn: The New Testament Basis for a Doctrine of Inspiration. 3s. 6d. net.
 MARK, THISFLTON, D.Lit., B.Sc.—For Childhood and Youth: Ideals of the Modern Sunday School. 1s. 6d. net.
 McEVoy, REV. CUTHBERT, M.A.—The Great Embassy: Studies in the Growth of Christianity. 1s. net.
 M'INTYRE, REV. D. M.—Spirit and Power. 2s. 6d. net.
 WARSCHAUER, REV. J., M.A., D.Phil.—The Way of Understanding: Studies in the Book of Proverbs. 4s. 6d. net.

Messrs. W. B. Clive & Sons.

ALICROFT Horace, Odes II and IV. 2s. 6d.
 BARLOW, C. W. C., M.A., B.Sc.—Mathematical Physics, Vol. 1. Magnetism and Electricity.
 BARRACLOUGH, A., M.A.—Preliminary Arithmetic. 1s. 6d. (With Answers, 6s. 6d.)
 FRY, G. C., M.Sc.—Junior Geography of North America. 8d.
 FRY, G. C., M.Sc.—Senior Geography of Asia. 1s.
 FRY, G. C., M.Sc.—Senior Geography of North America. 1s.
 WALKER, T., M.A., and RICHARDS, J. F., M.A.—St. Luke's Gospel. 1s. 6d.

Messrs. Constable & Co., Ltd.

BAHRITT, IRVING.—The Masters of Modern French Criticism. 7s. 6d. net.
 BELLOC, HILAIRE.—The Stone Street. Illustrated by William Hyde. 7s. 6d. net.
 CALLAGHAN, STELLA (Author of "The Little Green Gate")—Vision. 6s.
 "CARADOC"—A City of the Plain. 6s.
 CORNFORD, L. COLT.—W. E. Henky. (In Constable's Series of Modern Biographies.) 1s. net.
 ELLIOTT, SIMON B.—The Important Timber Trees of the United States: A Manual of Practical Forestry. 10s. 6d. net.
 ELLIOTT, SIMON B.—The Laurenses. 6s.
 FOX, JOHN (Author of "Little Shepherd of Kingdom Come," etc.)—The Heart of the Hills. 6s.
 HARGRAVE, JNO.—Lonecraft. Fully Illustrated. (A Book for the Boy Scouts). Paper, 1s. net, Cloth gilt, 2s. net.
 LOWFELL, AMY.—A Dome of Many-Coloured Glass. Poems. About 3s. 6d. net.
 MUMFORD, JAS. G., M.D. (Lecturer on Surgery in Harvard University.)—A Doctor's Table Talk. 4s. net.

Prize photograph by Miss E. A. Pearson, illustrating "The Lure of Crooning Water" (John Long).
 See Prize Competition pages.

Messrs. William Blackwood & Sons.

CRAWFORD, ALEXANDER.—The Alias. 6s.
 DIVER, MAUD.—Sunna, and other Stories. 6s.
 DURAND, THE RIGHT HON. SIR MORTIMER, G.C.M.G., K.C.S.I., K.C.I.E.—Life of the Right Hon. Sir Alfred Lyall, K.C.B., G.C.I.E. 10s. net.
 KYNNESELEY, F. M. SNEYD.—Tom Vron. A Novel. 6s.
 MAIR, VERY REV. WILLIAM, D.D.—The Confession of Faith, the Catechisms, the Directory for Public Worship and the Form of Presbyterian Church Government. 2s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Cassell & Co., Ltd.

BUSHELL, N. KEITH.—Australia for the Emigrant. 1s. net.
 Cassell's Complete Shakespeare. 5s. net.
 DEEPIG, WARWICK.—House of Spies. 6s.
 DWYER, J. F.—The White Waterfall. 6s.
 EDGE, SPENCER.—Makers of Ware. 7s.
 HOCKING, SII AS K.—A Woman's Love. 3s. 6d.
 NUTTALL and CORKE.—Wild Flowers as They Grow. 5s. net.
 PEMBERTON, MAX.—Red Morn. 1s. net.
 TESKEY, A. M.—Candlelight Days. 6s.

Messrs. Chapman & Hall.

BROWN, VINCENT.—Consider This Man. 6s.
 CULLUM, RIDGWELL.—The Brooding Wild. 2s. net.
 EYRE, A. MONTGOMERY.—A History of St. John's Wood. 12s. 6d. net.
 GRIBBLE, FRANCIS.—The Tragedy of Isabella II. 25s. net.
 HOWARD, KEBLE.—London Voices. 6s.
 HOWARD, KEBLE.—The Smiths of Surbiton. 2s. net.
 JAMES, WINIFRED.—The Mulberry Tree. 7s. 6d. net.
 PUGH, EDWIN.—Punch and Judy. 6s.
 THOMAS, GILBERT.—The Wayside Altar. 2s. 6d. net.
 THURSTON, E. TEMPLE.—The Open Window. 6s.

Prize photograph by F. C. Davis, illustrating "Gutter Babies" (Heinemann)
 See Prize Competition pages.

POLLARD, HUGH B. C.—A Busy Time in Mexico. Full Illustrated. 8s. 6d. net.
 PHILLIPS, LADY (Author of "South African Recollections.")—A Friendly German: Why Not? 2s. 6d. net.
 SOULIE, GEORGE—Strange Stories from the Lodge of Leisures. Translated from the Chinese. 3s. 6d. net.
 STEGMANN, MARY G.—Ibranca Capella 10s. 6d. net.
 THOMAS, EDWARD.—The Icknield Way. Illustrated. 7s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Headley Bros.

CROSFIELD, HELEN G.—Margaret Fox of Swarthmoor Hall 3s. 6d. net
 JONES, RUFUS M., M.A., LL.D.—A Dynamic Faith. New Edition. 1s. net
 LOWRY, MARY.—The Story of Hellast and its Surroundings 7s. 6d. net
 MALBY, REGINALD A., F.R.P.S., F.R.H.S.—With Camera and Rucksack in the Oberland and Valais 7s. 6d. net
 MOSS, DR. C. F. A.—A Pioneer in Madagascar: Joseph Pearce of the L.M.S. 3s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Heath, Cranton &amp; Ouseley, Ltd.

CRAIG, ROBERT, M.A., D.D.—History of Oratory in Parliament 10s. 6d. net
 DE VEER, W. LL.D.—A Benedict's Escape. 1s. net.
 DUTTON, ANNIE V.—Feigning or Folly 6s.
 FRANKISIL, H. M.A., M.B.—In Culiffe: Investigator. 6s.
 HASLETTE, JOHN.—Shadow of Salvador 6s.
 HAYES, BENSON.—From an Umbrian City. 2s. net.
 MONKTON, G. F.—Top-eared Duck 6s.
 MORRIS, MARY HUSBAND.—The Bastard. 6s.
 NAISH, PERCY L.—Chestnuts, Hot and Cold 1s. net.
 ROY, D. KINMOUNT.—Linked Lives 6s.
 STEWART, BASIL, M.A.—The Lecture Year Book. 3s. 6d. net.
 "THORMANTH"—The Black Beam. 6s.
 TIGHE, HARRY.—A Watcher of Life 6s.

Mr. Wm. Heinemann.

BERNARD, J. D.—The Goshawks. 6s.
 PILON, AUGUSTIN.—Life of the Prince Imperial 15s. net.
 GOETHE.—Wilhelm Meister's Theatrical Mission 6s.
 LANGER, ANGELA.—Rue and Rose 6s.
 STOPES, DR. MARIE C.—Japanese Dramas 5s. net
 VON HUFEN, BARONESS.—Mr. Drummond's Vocation Cheap Edition 1s. net
 WRIOHESLEY, WILLIAM.—The Ambassadors. 6s.

Messrs. Hodder &amp; Stoughton.

BARR, ROBERT.—A Woman in a Thousand 6s.
 BARR, ROBERT, and CRANT, STEPHEN.—The O'Ruddy 6d.
 BRAMB, CHARLOTTE.—Helen Rabbitt's Marriage 6d.
 COMSTOCK, S.—Pioneers 6s.
 CONNOR, RALPH.—The Doctor of Crows Nest 1s.
 FREEMAN, R. AUSTIN.—Singing Bone 6d.
 GARVICE, CHARLES.—Flame 1s. 6d.
 GARVICE, CHARLES.—In Cupid's Chams 7d.
 GARVICE, CHARLES.—Love in a Square 6d.
 GARVICE, CHARLES.—Nance 7d.
 GARVICE, CHARLES.—Queen Kate 3s. 6d.
 HAGGARD, H. RIDER.—She 7d.
 HENNESSEY, DAVID.—The Bush Track 1s.
 HENNESSEY, DAVID.—The Dishonourable 1s.
 HENNESSEY, DAVID.—The Outlaw (1000 Prize Novel) 6s.
 HUNGERFORD, MRS.—Phyllis 6d.
 HUNGERFORD, MRS.—Undercurrents 6d.
 LACEY, AMY W.—The Blue Wolf 6s.
 LANCASTER, G. B.—The Law Bringers 6s.
 LE QUEN, WILLIAM.—Great Court Scandal 6d.
 LYALL, DAVID.—Ships of My Desire 6d.
 MUNGER, DELL H.—The Wind Before the Dawn. 6s.
 ORCZY, BARONESS.—Bean Brocade 1s.
 ORCZY, BARONESS.—By the God's Beloved 1s.
 ORCZY, BARONESS.—I Will Repay 1s.
 ORCZY, BARONESS.—The Emperor's Cuckoo 1s.
 PEMBERTON, MAX.—Mid the Thick Arrows 7d.
 "Q"—Fort Amity 6d.
 SHELDON, C. M.—A Builder of Ships. 6s.
 SHERMAN, CHARLES.—He Comes Up Smiling 1s.
 SNEDEKER, CAROLINE D.—The Spartan 6s.
 TARKINGTON, BOOTH.—The Two Vampires 1s.
 WEBSTER, JEAN.—Laddy Long Legs 6s.
 WHITE, LAW, DAVID.—Little Ham of Peter Wells. 6s.
 WHITE, STEWART EDWARD.—The Riverman 6d.
 WILLIAMSON, MRS. C. N.—The Barnstormers. 7d.

Messrs. Holden &amp; Hardingham.

ADAM, H. L.—Police Work from Within 6s.
 BARTER, PROFESSOR.—Beautiful Handwriting Eleventh Edition 6d.
 BARTER, PROFESSOR.—Book Keeping Without a Master. Eleventh Edition 6d.
 BARTER, PROFESSOR.—How to Speak Correctly Twelfth Edition 6d.
 BARTER, PROFESSOR.—The Art of Memory. A Wonderful Memory and How to Obtain it. Twenty first Edition 6d.
 "BUCHAN LANDOR."—The Mystic of Plague 2s. net.
 BULLEN, FRANK T.—A Bounty Boy. New Edition. 2s. net.
 BYNG, HON. MRS. JULIAN.—Anne 6s.
 CROKER, MRS. B. M.—Jungle Tales. 7d. net.
 GRAVES, CLO ("Richard Dehan")—Maud in a Market Garden. 2s. net.
 HUSLAM, PERCY L.—The North Sea Peril 1s.
 HUME, FERGUS.—The Isle of Fantasy 6d.
 KENYON, EDITH C. ("The new Allen Rame")—The Winning of Gwenora. 6s.
 KENYON, EDITH C. ("The new Allen Rame")—The Winning of Mifanwy. Second Edition 6s.
 LETHBRIDGE, SYBIL CAMPBELL.—Love and My Lady. 6s.
 LETHBRIDGE, SYBIL CAMPBELL.—The Shoreless Sea Fourth Edition 6d.
 MACDONALD, JULIA.—While the Musc Lasts 6s.
 MANSFIELD, CHARLOTTE.—Gloria. A South African Girl. 6s.
 MANSFIELD, CHARLOTTE.—Love and a Woman. Third Edition. 1s. net.
 MARRYAT, FLORENCE.—Facing the Footlights 6d.
 MCKENZIE, COLONEL.—British Orchids With Coloured Plates 5s. net.
 MCKENZIE, COLONEL.—How to Know the Wild Flowers Without the Aid of Science. Illustrated. 2s. 6d.
 NEWTE, HORACE W. C.—The Red Rosette 1s. net.
 NEWTE, HORACE W. C.—The Wife Fourth Edition. 6d.
 PRATT, AMBROSE.—The Real South Africa South Africa Unveiled. 10s. 6d. net.
 RHODES, KATHLYN.—The Straight Race 6s.
 RHODES, KATHLYN.—The Wax Image New Edition. 6s.
 RUSSELL, W. CLARK.—The Golden Hope 6d.
 STANTON, CORALIE, and HOSKEN, HEATH.—Tears of Desire 6d.
 STRINDBERG, A. (Translated from)—Advent. A Play. 1s. net.
 WIFE OF A MORMON ELDER, THE.—Escaped from the Mormons. 6d.

Messrs. Hurst &amp; Blackett, Ltd.

BRADDON, M. E.—Dead Love Has Chalus. 7d.
 GRAVEN, FRISCILLA.—Circus's Daughter. 6s.
 D'HERMALLE, BARONESS.—My Life in Teheran. 12s. 6d. net.

FIELDING-HALL, H.—The World Soul 10s. 6d. net.
 HICKEY, WILLIAM.—Memoirs of William Hickey 12s. 6d. net.
 LEHLAND, MAURICE.—The Crystal Stopper 6s.
 LEQUEUX, WILLIAM.—The Price of Power 6s.
 MCCARTHY, JUSTIN HUNTLY.—Calling the Tune 6s.
 SAVI, E. W.—The Daughter in Law 6s.
 STOCKLEY, CYNTHIA.—The Claw 1s. net.
 WHITBY, BEATRICE.—Mary Fenwick's Daughter. 7d.

Messrs. Hutchinson &amp; Co.

AUTHOR OF "ST. ELMO"—The Speckled Bird 7d.
 BAILLY, H. C.—Colonel Stow 7d.
 BANCROFT, F.—Tham Brandon 6s.
 BENSON, ROBERT HUGH.—The Coward 1s. net.
 BENSON, ROBERT HUGH.—Some Average Men 6s.
 BRADDON, M. E.—The Green Curtain 6d.
 BURGIN, G. B.—Famela 6d.
 CONYERS, DOROTHY.—For Henri and Navarre 6d.
 CONYERS, DOROTHY.—The Arrival of Antony 1s. net.
 CROKER, B. M.—In Old Madras 6s.
 FLKAN, SOPHIE.—An I-sided King Gustav Adolph IV. of Sweden Edited and Translated by M. F. Koch 2 vols. 1s. net.
 HAMILTON, COSMO.—An Accidental Daughter 6d.
 HARLAND, HENRY.—The Royal End 6d.
 HICHENS, ROBERT.—A Spirit in Prison 6d.
 HUDSON, W. H.—Adventures Among the Birds 10s. 6d. net.
 HUTTEN, BARONESS VON.—Kingshead 7d.
 HUTTEN, BARONESS VON.—Sharrow 1s. net.
 JEPSON, EDGAR.—The Determined Twins 6s.
 MALET, LUCAS.—Adrian Savage 1s. net.
 MAXWELL, W. B.—Mrs. Thompson 1s. net.
 MOREAU, PHIL. ABIL.—A Day in the Moon. Translated by A. Hillier Afteridge 6s.
 PATTERSON, ANNIL W. Mus. Doc., B.A.—How to Listen to an Orchestra. 5s. net.
 REYNOLDS, MRS. FRID.—A Quicker Woom 7d.
 "RITA"—Gretchen 6d.
 SCHUMACHER, HENRY.—Nelson's Last Love 6s.
 TAYLOR, I. A.—The Tragedy of an Army La Vendée in 1793 6s. net.

Messrs. Jarrold &amp; Sons.

MORTON, LAURENCE.—Sanctuary. 5s. 6d. net.

Mr. Herbert Jenkins.

BUCHAN, MAUD.—White Witch A Novel 6s.
 "CHITRO"—When Were You Born? The Character told, tendencies Explained the Future Indicated 2s. 6d. net.
 DLWAR, GEORGE A. B.—Wild Birds Through the Year Illustrated 5s. net.
 JOHN, EDMUND.—The Flute of Soudouy. Poems With an Introduction by Stephen Phillips. 3s. 6d. net.
 MONTAGU, VIOLETTE M.—The Abbe Edgeworth and His Friends Illustrated. 12s. 6d. net.
 RE KITT, ARTHUR COMPTON, M.A., LL.D.—William Morris, Poet Craftsman—Social Reformer A Study in Personality Illustrated 7s. 6d. net.
 TURQUAN, JOSEPH.—A Great Coquette Mme. Recamier and Her Salon. Illustrated 12s. 6d. net.
 WATSON, WILLIAM.—The Muse in Exile Poems with an Address on "The Poet's Place in the Scheme of Life" 3s. 6d. net.

Mr. T. Werner Laurie.

BEACH, BELLE.—Riding and Driving for Women 16s. net.
 BROOM, H. A.—The Log of a Rolling Stone. 12s. 6d. net.
 EDWARDS, GEORGE WHARTON.—Marken and Its People 10s. 6d. net.
 HAULTAIN, ARNOLD.—The Correspondence of Goldwin Smith. 16s. net.
 RAY, EDWARD.—Inland Golf 5s. net.

Messrs. John Long, Ltd.

AUTHOR OF "IMPROPER PRUE"—The Price of Possession. 1s. net paper.
 BOSANQUET, EDMUND.—A Society Mother 1s. net paper.
 BROCK, MRS. BLANCHE ADELAIDE.—Fire Fantasies. A Volume of Verse. 2s. 6d. net.
 CARRIER, ELSIE.—A Soul in Shadow: Novel 6s.
 CHATTERTON, G. G.—Holston's Choice: Novel 6s.
 FORD, PENELOPE.—A Page in a Man's History Novel 6s.
 FRASER, MRS. HUGH.—The Stolen Piper. 7d. net cloth.
 GERSTENBERG, ALICE.—Unquenched Fire. Novel 6s.
 HODGKINS, J. MARRIOTT.—Cyrus A Fabulous Tragedy in Prologue and Four Acts 2s. 6d. net.
 MATHERS, HELEN.—A Man of To Day 7d. net cloth.
 WARREN, ADRIAN.—Looms of Silence A Volume of Verse 2s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Longmans, Green &amp; Co.

BARRY, REV. CHARLES ALFRED, M.A. (Vicar of Clifford)—The First Principles of the Church Essays and Notes.
 BERTINSHAW, T. H.—Longmans' Modern French Course With 44 Illustrations of French Life by Dorothy M. Payne Pupils' Edition, 1s. 6d. net. Teachers' Edition, 2s. net.
 BREWSTER, BIRKRAM.—The Philosophy of Faith an Enquiry.
 GOULD, F. J.—Moral Instruction its Theory and Practice.

Photograph by Ernest S. Heron, illustrating "The Lure of Crooning Water" (John Long).

See Prize Competition pages.

HERRING-SHAW, A., and NEWSOME, H. F. V.—Modern Sanitary Engineering and Plumbers' Work, Progressive Scale Drawings of Current Practice. Vols. I. and II.
MANN, J. E. F., SIEVERS, N. J., and COX, R. W. T.—The Real Democracy (First Essays of the Rota Club)
NEWMAN, JOHN HENRY, CARDINAL.—Sermon Notes.

Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston & Co.

CURTAIN, JEREMIAH.—Myths of the Modocs. 12s 6d net
MUNNIK, G. G.—Major Greville, V.C.: A Tale of the Great Boer War. 6s
WEDGEWOOD, JOSIAH C., M.P.—Staffordshire Pottery and its History. Fully Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Lynwood & Co.

HARLOW, MISS HILARE.—The Mystery of Jeanne Marie. 6s.
BUNGEY, EDGAR NEWTON.—The Fordington Twins. A Novel. 6s.
CLOSE, EVELYNE.—The Harvest. Cheap Edition. 1s net.
HALES, A. G.—Angel Jim. New and Revised Edition, with new Design. 6d.
HALES, A. G.—M'Glusky. New and Revised Edition, with new Design. 6d.
HALES, MISS ADA M. M.—Leslie. 6s.
HOLLAND, CLIVE.—A Madonna of the Poor, and other Stories. 6s.
HOLLAND, CLIVE.—Marcelle of the Latin Quarter. Entirely New and Revised Edition, rewritten. 1s net.
HOLLAND, CLIVE.—My Japanese Wife. 420th thousand Entirely New and Revised Edition, rewritten. 1s net.
HOLLAND, CLIVE.—The Spell of Iss. Entirely New and Revised Edition, rewritten. 1s net.
HOPKINS, R. THURSTON.—Oscar Wilde: A Study. 2nd Edition. Revised and Enlarged. 2s. 6d. net.
LEITH, MRS. DISNEY.—Lachlan's Widow. (A Sequel to "A Black Martinmas.") 6s.
MICHELL, MISS CLARA, and KENNEDY, MISS H. E.—The Elizabethan Voyagers, and Other Poems. 1s 6d net.
MÜGGE, HILFRIED.—Arrows of Defence: Sonnets and Other Poems. 2s net.
PEERESS, A.—The Searchlight on the Throne: Reminiscences of an Ex-Ambassador. Cheap Edition. 2s net.
PEERESS, A.—The Shadow on the Purple: Recollections of an Ex Attaché. Cheap Edition. 1s net.
SCOTT, WINIFRED MAY.—The Serpent: A Tale of the Chiltern Hills. Cheap Edition. 1s net.
STOCK, RALPH.—The Recipe for Rubber: A Ligon Romance. With Illustrations by Norman Lindsay. Cheap Edition. 2s net.

Messrs. Maclellan & Sons.

STORY, J. L.—Mrs. Story's Later Reminiscences. 17s 6d. net.
STORY, J. L.—The Chronicle of Laverstoke, 1272-1446. Translated, with Notes, by the Right Hon. Sir Herbert Maxwell, Bart. With Introduction by The Rev. James Wilson, D.D. With several Illustrations. Fine Paper Edition, 42s net, Ordinary Edition, 27s. net.

Mr. Andrew Melrose.

BORDEAUX, HENRI.—The Woollen Dress (La Robe de Laine). Translated from the French. 7s 6d net.
FIRTH, ANDREW.—The Toll of the River. 6s.
SCHMALZ, F. M.—Monk of Solitude. 6s.
WILK, IRA S., M.S., M.D.—Sex Education. 2s 6d. net.

Messrs. Methuen & Co.

ARMSTRONG, SIR WALTER.—St. Thomas Lawrence. "Classics of Art." 21s net.
HELLOX, HILAIRE.—Hills and the Sea. 1s net.
CONRAD, JOSEPH.—The Mirror of the Sea. New Edition. 5s.
COX, J. (HARLES, J. L. D., F.S.A.—Rambles in Kent. 6s.
DESMOND, G. G.—The Ring of Nature. 5s net.
DRY, WAKELING.—Northamptonshire "Little Guide." New Edition. 2s. 6d. net.
GIBBON, ED.—Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. Vol. VII. Edited by J. B. Bury. 10s 6d net.
HUGHES, C. F.—Early English Water Colour. "Little Books on Art." 2s 6d net.
JEVONS, F. B. D.—Personality. 2s 6d net.
MACDONALD, MRS. B. G.—Maternity Nursing. 4s 6d net.
MITFORD, BERTRAM.—Sign of the Spider. 7d net.
RAPPOPORT, DR. A. S.—Home Life in Russia. 10s 6d net.
TOWNSEND, R. B.—Lone Pine. 7d net.
VICKERS, K. H., M.A.—England in the Later Middle Ages. Oman's History of England. 10s 6d net.
WHITTEN, WILFRED (Jack O' London).—A Londoners' London. 6s.
WYLLARDE, DOLF.—The Unofficial Honey-moon. 1s net.

Messrs. Mills & Boon.

ANNESLEY, MAUDE.—Sphinx and the Labyrinth. 6s.
ARMSTRONG, CECIL F.—Century of Actresses. 10s. 6d. net.
BECKETT, ARTHUR.—Wonderful World. Cheap Edition. 6s.
BRANDT, JOHANNA.—The Petticoat Commando. 6s.
CLOUSTON, J. STORER.—His First Offence. Cheap Edition. 1s net.
JEPSON, EDGAR.—Pollywooly. Cheap Edition. 1s net.
MACKELLAR, DOROTHEA.—Outlaw's Luck. 6s.
NORTH, WILLIAM.—Dog Lover's Companion. 2s. 6d. net.
SUTHERLAND, JOAN.—Hidden Road. 6s.
VAIZEY, MRS. G. DE HORNE.—An Unknown Lover. 6s.

Mr. John Murray.

BROWN, P. HUMIE.—The Youth of Goethe.
EDGUMBE, RICHARD.—Diary of Frances, Lady Shelley, 1817-1871. Continuation and Conclusion. With Illustrations. 10s 6d. net.
JARVIS, W. H. P.—The Great Gold Rush. A Tale of the Klondike. 6s.
LAWRENCE, C. E.—The Arnold Lip. 6s.
LOVE, COLONEL H. D.—Vestiges of Old Madras, 1640-1800. In 3 Vols., and an Index. 36s net. Not sold separately.
MANATT, J. IRVING, Ph.D., J.L.L.—African Days, and other Sojourns and Studies in the Isles of Greece.
McCORMACK, FREDERICK.—The Flowery Republic. With Illustrations.
NEUMAN, B. PAUL.—Open Sesame. 6s.
ROSS, E. H., M.R.C.S., L.R.C.P.—The Reduction of Domestic Flies. With Illustrations.

Messrs. T. Nelson & Sons.

CORNISH, C. J.—Wild England of To-day. 1s net.
HARLAND, H.—My Friend Prospero. 7d net.
M'LEOD, NORMAN.—The Old Lieutenant and His Son. 6d. net.
MORRISON, A.—A Child of the Jago. 7d net.

Mr. David Nutt.

HLFASE, L.—The Emancipation of Englishwomen. 3s. 6d net.
GREGORY, P.—Old World Ballads. 2s. 6d net.
GREEN, THE REV. TYRRELL.—La Rochelle.
HALE, W.—Plantations and Fields. Probable price, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; paper, 1s net.
HENNESSY, M.—The Coming Phase in Religion. Probable price, 5s net.
HOOPER, W.—The Englishwoman's Legal Guide. Probable price, 3s. 6d. net.
TROTT, R.—A Boy's Will. 1s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Stanley Paul & Co.

ANDOM, R.—Neighbours of Mine. 2s net.
EVERETT-GREEN, E.—A Will in a Well. 6d.
FLOWERDEW, HERBERT.—The Second Elopement. 6d.
HAGGARD, LIEUT.-COL. A.C.P., D.S.O.—Louis XI. and Charles the Bold. 16s net.
MAGNAY, SIR WILLIAM.—The Fruits of Indiscretion. 6s.
MAGNAY, SIR WILLIAM.—The Long Hand. 6d.
MARSHALL, ARCHIBALD.—The Honour of the Clintons. 6s.
"RITA."—Corinna. 6d.
SUTCLIFFE, HALLIWELL.—The Strength of the Hills. 6s.
WODNII, GABRIELLE.—Brineta at Brighton. 6s.
WYNNE, MAY.—Honour's Fetters. 6d.
WYNNE, MAY.—The Red Fleur-de-Lys. 1s net.

Sir Isaac Pitman & Son.

BOULGER, DEMETRIUS E.—Holland of the Dutch. About 30 Full-page Plate-illustrations. 6s net.
CHADWICK, MRS. ELLIS H.—Mrs Gaskell: Haunts, Homes, and Stories. New and Cheaper Edition with Additions and some New Illustrations. 3s illustrations. 5s net.
CROSFIELD, ALBERT W. E.—Case and Freight Costs. 1s net.
DAVIS, ANNIE.—The Junker Woman Secretary. 1s net.
GLEN, RANDOLPH A., M.A., L.C.B.—Local Government Case Law. Vol III. 10s net.
HEAD, F. D. B.A.—Outlines of Company Law. 1s. 6d net.
JOHNSON, G.—Book-Keeping and Accountancy Problems. 2s 6d net.
JOHNSON, G.—Manufacturing Book-Keeping and Costs. 3s. 6d net.
PALMER, REV. A. SMYTH, D.D.—The Samson-Saga. With Illustrations. 1s net.
POLEY, ARTHUR P., B.A., LL.B.—Federal Systems of the United States and the British Empire. 12s 6d net.
RAYNES, ANNIE, A.C.—Helping Mother. A Course of Thirty Lessons on Home-Training for the Little Ones. 1s. 3d net.
WYNDHAM, H. SANE, and L'EPINE, GEOFFREY.—Who's Who in Music. Cloth, 6s net, leather 8s 6d net.

The Fleming H. Revell Co.

BURRELL, DAVID JAMES, D.D., LL.D.—The Sermon: Its Construction and Delivery. 5s net.
CARROLL, B. H., D.D.—Evangelistic Sermons. 1s 6d net.
DIXON, A. C. (Author of "Heaven and Earth")—Milk and Meat. 2s. 6d. net.
LUZZI, GIOVANNI, D.D.—The Struggle for Christian Truth in Italy. 5s net.
M'LFAN, ARCHIBALD.—Epoch Makers of Modern Missions. Illustrated. 3s 6d net.
MYERS, REV. COURTLAND, D.D. (Author of "Real Prayer.")—Making a Life: A Guide to Right Living. 2s 6d net.

Messrs. Alston Rivers, Ltd.

SMITH, ISABEL. Nevertheless. 6s.

Messrs. Sands & Co.

"ANON"—St. Gilbert of Sempringham (Vol. VI of the Notre Dame Lives of the Saints). Illustrated. 3s 6d net.
GREY, GRAHAM H.—Hindrances to Conversion. With Introduction by R. H. Benson. 6d.
MAXWELL-SCOTT, HON. MRS.—St. Francis de Sales and her Friends. 3s. 6d. net.

The Walter Scott Publishing Co., Ltd.

BITHILL, ILIHRO, M.A.—Life and Writings of Maurice Maeterlinck (Great Writings). 1s net.
COOPER, REV. A. N. ("The Walking Parson")—Tales of My Trumps. 1s net.
MIDDLETON, A. SFRONI.—Bush and Sea Rhymes, etc. Enlarged Edition. 2s 6d net.
NEWMAN, CARDINAL JOHN HENRY.—Apologia Pro Vita Sua (Scott Library). 2 vols. 1s net each.

Mr. Martin Secker.

"ANONYMOUS"—The Will and the Power. 6s.
BOITOMF, PHYLLIS.—The Common Chord. 6s.
MACKENZIE, COMPTON.—Carnival Cover Design by Norman Wilkinson. 1s net.
WATT, L. M.—The House of Sand. 6s.

Messrs. Sidgwick & Jackson.

PERRIS, H. S.—Pax Britannica: A Study of the History of British Pacification. 5s net.
POEL, WILLIAM.—Shakespeare in the Theatre. 5s net.
SIDGWICK, ETHEL.—Succession: A Comedy of the Generations (A Sequel to "Promise") 6s.

Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co.

DE LA PASTURE, MRS. HENRY (LADY CLIFFORD)—Michael Ferrys. 6s.
HARDCASTLE, MARJORY.—Halfpenny Alley. 6s.

Mr. T. Fisher Unwin.

GOLDRING, DOUGLAS.—Dream Cities. 8s. 6d net.
GLEIZES, ALBERT, and METZINGER, JEAN.—Cubism. 5s net.
HANNAH, JAN C.—The Warwick and Lothian Coasts. 6s net.
LE BON, GUSTAVE.—The Psychology of Revolution. 10s. 6d. net.
LYNE, R. N.—Mozambique: Its Agricultural Development. 12s. 6d. net.
MEEK, A. S.—A Naturalist in Cannibal-Land. Introduction by the Hon. Walter Rothschild. 15s net.
WEDDERBURN, SIR WILLIAM.—Allan Octavian Hume, C.B. 5s net.

Messrs. Ward, Lock & Co., Ltd.

COOHBOLD, R.—Freston Tower. 6d.
FORMAN, JUSTUS M.—Court of the Angels. 2s net.
HILL, HEADON.—My Lord the Felon. 6d.
HOCKING, JOSEPH.—The Scarlet Woman. 2s net.
HUME, FERGUS.—Red Money. 6d.
LE QUEUX, WILLIAM.—Mysteries. 6s.
LITTLESTONE, GILBERT.—The Palm Stone. 6s.
MARCHMONT, A. W.—Under the Black Eagle. 6s.
MITFORD, BERTRAM.—Averno. 6s.
MOBERLY, L. G.—Angela's Marriage. 6d.
OPPENHEIM, E. PHILIPS.—The Peer and the Woman. 1s net.
"RITA."—Darby and Joan. 7d net.
RUSSELL, LINDSAY.—Souls in Pawn. 6s.
WALLACE, EDGAR.—Private Selby. 6d.
WHITE, FRED M.—Jim Crowshaw's Mary. 6d.
WHITE, FRED M.—The Slave of Silence. 7d net.

Messrs. Wells Gardner, Darton & Co.

ACLAND, THE HON. LADY.—Plain Words to Mothers. Outline Addresses for Speakers. 1s.
LONDON, THE BISHOP OF.—The Gospel of the Miraculous: Addresses Delivered During the Lent (1913) Mission. 1s net, and 2s. 6d. net.
REDMAYNE, P. Y.—The Gull Between: A Novel. 6s.

THE READER.

GEORGE FREDERIC WATTS, R.A.*

BY M. H. SPIELMANN.

"HERE is no heroic poem in the world," said Carlyle—whom Watts painted thrice and knew so well—"but is at bottom a biography, the life of a man." I know of no biography, written in our day, which comes nearer to being an heroic poem than this biography of G. F. Watts, R.A., composed by Mrs. Watts. As a rule, we resent biographies by the wives of the departed. They commonly give us no more than half the man—usually, though not always, the better half through either bias or ignorance. But there are noteworthy exceptions. Mrs. Watts is endowed with a highly-cultivated mind, an intellect of no common order, controlled by judgment, tact and taste, and capable of rising to a spirituality that placed her in communion with that of her husband, and enabled her to appreciate to the full the rather ethereal and rarified atmosphere in which moved Watts and the great figures of the world with whom he commingled. And withal there is a tenderness and womanly sympathy pervading her pages that touch an exquisite note—a note vibrating in curious harmony with what there was (and that was a good deal) of the womanly in Watts's nature.

I may say at once that for twenty years and more I was honoured with the friendship of the artist; by word and by correspondence he frequently enlarged to me on his views of Life and Art, and many a time unconsciously revealed to me the beauty not only of his opinions and his acts, but of his inner character. I was, therefore, ready to proceed on the understanding that I should write a biography. But I recognized that none so well as Mrs. Watts could draw for the world the spiritual side of him who was a thinker even more, perhaps, than he was a painter, and depict the heart and mind and soul that inspired his Art. Her decision has been triumphantly justified, for she has given us such a portrait of him as he would have wished to be painted; and as I look upon it I recognize in it the man whose gentle yet forceful personality impressed itself on all who came into intelligent contact with himself or with his Art; who hated publicity and yet could not avoid challenging it, and whose dominating principles of patriotism, love, and progress, made painful assault on his native modesty. A Crusader with a sensitively retiring disposition has not an easy life.

Mrs. Watts, herself an artist, has the literary gift. So, too, had Watts, though he would often deplore that he was inarticulate. It was not that, it was merely that from want of practice, and still more from a high sense of literary nicety and exigency, he was not as fluent as he would have liked to be. On one occasion he wrote to me suggesting that I should persuade artists to write at length on their own Art, and not leave the duty wholly to the critics. "When Mr. Knowles," he said, "urged me formerly to give him something for the Nineteenth, I replied: 'You can get anything I would say much better put by any number of men'; to which he answered: 'I want in my magazine to have men speaking who know practically what they are talking about, no matter what the literary style may be.' And he was quite right." It reminded me of what Millais told me, that when, in answer to Thackeray's invitation for a contribution to the Cornhill he replied that he couldn't even write English, the great Titmarsh drily retorted: "I've half-a-dozen damn

Photo by Emery Walker.

G. F. Watts (1862-64).
(Painted by himself.)

(Tate Gallery.)

* "George Frederic Watts," Vols. I and II, "The Annals of an Artist's Life." By M. S. Watts. Vol. III., "His Writings," 31s. 6d. (Macmillan.)

fools in my office who can write English!" Whether in his aphorisms on Art, his views on artistic methods and procedure, his essay on Benjamin Robert Haydon, in his articles on the Art of to-day (which, at my entreaty, he wrote for the Magazine of Art), and contributions to one or two other publications—all here republished in the third volume—we have proof in Watts of a true literary style allied to clearness of vision, and trenchant, yet subtle, expression. This is a side of his talent of special interest, I imagine, to the readers of THE BOOKMAN. It has, too, the psychological interest that Watts declined to dissociate Painting from Literature; with Michael Angelo and Alfred Stevens he would say: "I know only ONE Art."

I could not but dissent from his assumption of literary inability when he wrote: "My only wish is to be of use, not to be a scribbler for the pleasure of seeing myself in print. I think I have something to say, but know very well that I lack the gift to say it with any effect or credit. Therefore you may always use or reject anything I write without risk of my feeling vexed."

Now Mrs. Watts, of set purpose, stops short after

J. M. Rooke, R.W.S., ph.

The Studio at Little Holland House, Melbury Road.

From "The Life of G. F. Watts," by Mrs. M. S. Watts (Macmillan).

giving her picture of the man, complete as far as it goes, perfect and fascinating. She intentionally, and with innate good taste, refrains from criticising him as an artist. That she leaves to others—and others' criticisms she practically passes over in silence. But she tells us of his life and adventure, of his struggles and efforts, of his health that so hampered his efforts, of his career, his friends, of his prodigious social success and of the great who admired and adulated and petted him, and of the small whom he helped, encouraged, and stimulated. She puts down his opinions, elaborates them, embroiders them with anecdote, and makes us sigh that the ideal and intellectual world that he inhabited, in a sense created for himself, is denied to the likes of us who must be content to grope our way on a far lower plane. Watts used to say that the mark of a great poet was that he infused something of himself into his readers, and raised them, for a time, to his own level at his side. Even so this book makes us feel the relative earthiness of our surroundings and our life, and reveals the secret of the impression made by his Art upon the people, even upon the lowliest.

Frederick L. Griggs, del.

Old Little Holland House from the North-east.

From "The Life of G. F. Watts," by Mrs. M. S. Watts (Macmillan).

Although his early education had severely suffered through lack of health, Watts became an exceptionally well-read man who absorbed all the best literature and wisely neglected the indifferent. To thoughtful authors he devoted his attention; pure letters, history, philosophy, criticism, poetry and the like—these formed his main reading. It followed, therefore, that the noble scheme he had planned from the beginning of his career to paint England's greatest men for a gift to the nation—should embrace a score and more of writers. One of the earliest of his literary portraits was a posthumous representation of Jeremy Bentham, done, curiously enough, from a wax portrait and the jurist's garments. He painted no fewer than six portraits of Tennyson, and Swinburne, William Morris, and Browning. When the last named died Watts wrote to me: "He had a most artistic sensibility, and was an accomplished musician. That, I think, always implies, when found with other intellectual faculties, a fine sense in Art. I always found him very appreciative of my own aspirations and intentions; but I think his views of Art will be clearly seen in his writings. His death is a sad blow to us who knew him, being unexpected. Although so well on in years, he was so strong and vigorous. 'A life too short for friendship, not for

Photo by Christopher Liu

G. F. Watts at work on the statue of Lord Tennyson, August, 1903.

From "The Life of G. F. Watts," by Mrs. M. S. Watts (Macmillan)

days, Guizot and Thiers, and in his later life, Mr. Austin Dobson. Strangely enough, he never painted Ruskin, whom, in a letter I have seen, he addressed with warm affection as "Dear old friend Master, and best teacher." He had told me that, such had been their relations all his life long, so profoundly did he venerate the Seer of fame!" [This reminds me of a curious view, then widely held, but which I was surprised to find entertained by Mr. William Rossetti, when I met him about that time. "It must be a great loss," he said, "to the Jewish community." It appears that he, and, indeed, the whole circle, had believed that Browning was a Jew, and that his name had been Brunning! and I had difficulty in divesting him of his notion.]

Among Watts's other literary sitters were Carlyle, Lecky, Max Müller, and John Stuart Mill; George Meredith, and the other "Meredith"—"Owen" (Lord Lytton, 1884). Dante Rossetti and Matthew Arnold; Motley and Leslie Stephen, Jowett and Sir Richard Burton; Milman and Sir Henry Taylor, in his early

Photo by George Andrews.

"Limnerslease" on the South side.

From "The Life of G. F. Watts," by Mrs. M. S. Watts (Macmillan).

By permission of Fredk. Hollys.

The Wounded Heron.
By G. F. Watts.

Coniston, that he would have felt paralyzed as soon as he had taken brush in hand. Yet not long afterwards he arranged to paint a portrait; then Ruskin became ill and could not come to town, and when at last Watts had engaged a railway carriage to travel to Coniston "an attack of the old enemy" balked him in his intention, and the two men met never again. Watts had written to Mrs. Severn, at the time of Ruskin's illness: "Tell him, with my most real affection, that no day passes on which I do not think of him . . . tell him that the more I read him, and I do this often, the more I feel how great a teacher he is, not only in Art, but many other questions. . . . My wife and I read him constantly, always with renewed enjoyment, and, I hope and believe, with profit. I shall never see him again, I fear. It ever he is well enough to care for what I may say, tell him that no one is more deeply grateful to him for his teaching and for his splendid contribution to the National honour."

What a portrait he might have made! For it was the thought that there was in a man, in greater measure even than the character in the face, that inspired him to his most brilliant efforts. "Brilliant" is, perhaps, hardly the word, for Watts disliked mere brilliancy; he aimed at and valued only the higher quality that tells with quiet insistence, and which reasserts itself with gentle force and compulsion long after the admiration that brilliancy inspires has died away or has wearied the spectator. "In each case," he wrote to me, now seven and twenty years ago, "I desire to avoid sudden appeal by sensational interest or surprising dexterity. I should wish the influence to be quiet and lasting, and you can understand how much I wish to avoid the slightest appearance of swagger or dogmatism in what I say."

Yet with all his passion for literature, Watts rarely painted illustrations of literary pages, as was a common practice in his day. In his earlier years he produced a few, no doubt—in "Britomart" (from the "Faërie Queen"), "Fata Morgana" (from Bojardo's "Orlando Innamorato"), "Paolo and Francesca" (in some respects his masterpiece), and, illustrative in a measure only, "Orpheus and Eurydice," "Ariadne in Naxos," and a few others. But these did not exactly illustrate the stories; rather were they painted commentaries inspired by the poetic idea. So, too, the beautiful "Endymion," of which the artist wrote to me: "My picture means more than the subject implies. I am not always painting parables, though I like doing that best, and was pleased the other day by someone saying to my wife that I had my finger on the pulse of the age. I love the old poetry and myths, but in my work use them only as vehicles by which to suggest 'the thoughts that arise in me'—excepting, as in the present instance, for the purpose of experiment in colour or practice of some change of method. The picture is not a new design, and is worked out rather as a recreation than for any other purpose."

So in his "parables" and didactic pictures, the literary element is evident (and to some critics, therefore, an offence), but they are, at least, literature worked out in colour, composition, and rhythm, and based upon true art principles. Mrs. Watts illustrates this admirably in her tale of how the second version of "Love and Death" was brought to fruition. "If the impression to be conveyed by his picture was of greater importance than usual, every line, and the character of every line, of the various parts was pondered over, sometimes during many years." She tells how "owing to some subtle changes in line and tone, the figure of Death had neither the weight nor the slow movement he desired to give it. So day after day he thought and toiled, and I saw each fold of the garment deliberately reconsidered, a hair's-breadth of line or a breath of colour making the difference that a pause or an accentuated word would make in speaking. For instance, by raising the hand and outstretched arm a less judicial and severe impression was conveyed, and by this slight alteration the action changed from 'I shall' to the more tender 'I am compelled.' " She then proceeds to give technical details of supreme interest and value to a painter, but unnecessary to be recounted here.

Eng. H. Bourne.

King Alfred inciting the Anglo-Saxons to repel the Invasion of the Danes, A.D. 876.

From the picture by G. F. Watts in the New Palace of Westminster.

Unlike many artists of less calibre, Watts resented neither criticism nor fault-finding, though he doubted the value of any that was not deliberately considered. He would beg me to "pick holes" in his work, and would brook no compliments, in spite of their sincerity, unless he felt them justified. When his first picture of Eve ("And she shall be called Woman"—a work of symbolical import) was exhibited, he wrote. "My Academy picture, of course, cannot be more of a success than the Book of Job would be if published in modern times as the work of a modern writer. I beg you will not consider yourself bound, if you notice it, to praise. It is wholly out of place on the Academy walls. I should like to have it criticised in the Elgin Room of the British Museum, while the two first books of 'Paradise Lost' were read and Beethoven's 'Moonlight Sonata' played meanwhile. Some remarks in the Pall Mall, not ill-natured, but not intended to be particularly complimentary, are very flattering. They imply that it is visionary—and this I would have." The personification of dignity and of generosity (which, allied to his charm of personality constituted him one of the most engaging and delightful of men), Watts was not naturally disposed, sensitive as he was, to take offence; far from being impatient, even of direct attack, he would weigh carefully any condemnation in order to discover what solid ground might exist in it.

"A critic," he wrote to me on another occasion, "has called me 'a belated Old Master,' and I think that explains my work very well. I never studied the old masters or made a copy in my life, but I am conscious of seeing with eyes constituted in the same manner, so I am not a representative of modern Art."

Yet Watts was intensely modern in his fight for progress and reform in Art and Literature, and even the Poet-Impressionists might find aphorisms in his "Thoughts on Art" that might be misused as mottoes to excuse their misconceptions, if not their antics. He desired constant advance in both Art and Religion: it was inevitable, he said, that they should follow the hands of the clock.

But it was not his liberalism that led "Signor" (as his intimates invariably called him) to decline on two occasions the dignity of baronetcy which was offered to him. Indeed, he approved of well-deserved distinctions. Especially was he delighted when Tennyson was raised to the peerage. "The best head of Lord Tennyson," he said, in a letter written in 1890, "I have been asked to lend to the Society of British Artists. It is the one in the peer's robes, and is for my National series. The robes I think important, as marking a distinctly historical event, the first

By permission of Fredk. Hollyer.

Life's Illusions.
By G. F. Watts.

By permission of Fredk. Hollyer.

Fata Morgana.
By G. F. Watts.

in which a man was ever raised to that dignity for literary eminence alone. I do not profess to judge whether the distinction is one most applicable to the kind of eminence achieved, but while it is held to be the highest that can be bestowed I should like to see given for what is best, even for personal character, 'life peerages.' I think there is some idea that I object to distinctions of the kind. That is a mistake; I think them fine things if worthily achieved, or worthily borne. 'Noblesse oblige' is a splendid motto." Therefore, while he refused an hereditary honour which, indeed, he had no son to inherit, he accepted, amid the plaudits of the world, the Order of Merit when that highest distinction of all was first instituted.

Watts's religious thought forms one of the most engaging expositions of the book. His ideas, Mrs. Watts informs us, were found to be identical with those of Tennyson, as he discovered during his conversations with the poet. His breadth of view hardly admitted of further expansion; for him passive religion that begins

Photo by A. Rischgitt.

(Liverpool Gallery.)

Cupid Asleep.

By G. F. Watts.

and ends in "simple Faith" was of little worth, just as for him "Art for Art's sake" was a barren doctrine. Purposeful Reverence, active Love, and self-sacrifice for others and for the cause of Humanity, were the only tenets, and indispensable. "You must not speak to me of my 'theology,'" he said to me once, when I had let fall the word; "it should rather be called religious philosophy. I do not admit that Reason can be banished at the behest of Belief. I might illustrate my meaning, when such a contention is advanced, by holding up one hand and ticking off on my fingers 'Faith,' 'Veneration,' and so on; but those fingers cannot effectively grasp till the thumb, 'Reason,' completes the grip." He believed that there is something mysterious—the spirit of a great Creator—in all living things, and most of all in man as the greatest, dowered with the highest brain-power and intellect. "It may shock you," he said, in words he afterwards modified, "but I feel that one creed is as good

By permission of Fredk. Hollyer.

The Childhood of Zeus.

By G. F. Watts.

Orpheus and Eurydice.
By G. F. Watts.

as another, and that Nature—Divinity—Humanity are to me almost convertible terms." I printed these words in an article in the Nineteenth Century, and a few days later he wrote to me :

"I am surprised to find myself speaking so loosely as entirely to misrepresent my attitude of mind, which is one of great reverence for the general opinion in serious matters ; and though not rigidly orthodox, I cannot possibly confound the brutal creed of the Carthaginians, the worship of Moloch, or the fierce cult of Odin, with the creed of modern times, which, in its purity, inculcates Love and Universal Brotherhood (however little acted upon), or even with the mild self-effacement of the creed enforced by Buddha. Neither Darwin nor Huxley would have done so. . . . The majority of people believing me to be entirely indifferent to religious principles (not at all true) would consider my efforts even ~~an~~ ethical suggestion hypocritical, and many of my friends—for example, Mr. Gladstone—will be much pained. . . . I think you will understand that in addition to the unpleasant impression many of my friends will have, I feel grieved, if for no other reason than that I used expressions that imply so little consideration for the general conviction of the age." This letter is characteristic of that almost womanly tenderness and kindness on which Mrs. Watts insists as one of the distinctive traits of a singularly beautiful nature.

So, setting aside dogmas and doctrine, he painted not Religion but Righteousness ; not the Devil, but Sin ; and except in an early fresco ("Christ in Glory"), he never sought to represent the Creator or the Holy Trinity. Even Death itself was not the skeleton of Albert Dürer or the dancing bones of Holbein—not Death the Destroyer of Everyman, but Death the Kindly Messenger, the Angel of Rest. Watts seems to have painted, as it were, the words of Michael Angelo : "If life be a pleasure so death should be, for it is given to us by the same Master" ; wherefore he figures almost as a sort of Fra Angelico without the profession of implicit dogmatic faith—as a painter not of religion, but of profoundly reverent emotion and ethical passion.

His ethical compositions were, in Watts's opinion, by far the most valuable part of his life's work ; it is a theme Mrs. Watts develops very beautifully in this fascinating book. Nearly thirty years since the artist wrote to me : "I wonder whether you have perceived the distinctions I have spoken of as made by me in my designs—where I have taken Reality, as in the portraits ; where Types, as in 'Orpheus and Eurydice' ; and where Symbols, as in the abstractions. I do not care about remarks or criticisms on my works as pictures, but I care a good deal about the mental and intellectual qualities, because these are not much considered in modern art." Historical pictures were for him but costume-pictures, "highly interesting archaeologically," he wrote, "but hardly capable of awakening in the spectator any intellectual activity." [Which is exactly what the wicked critics have been saying lately about the art of Alma-Tadema, to the infuriation of Sir William Richmond.] "The gist of the whole is," he added, in reference to his own work, "that these efforts of mine arise from a desire to supply what I feel to be much wanted ; not didactic Art but Art suggestive of considerations belonging to our higher natures. The pictures may be no more than hieroglyphics, but I want them to stimulate young artists to conscious effort in noble directions." And his contention is repeated that Art should stand beside Literature on the intellectual plane :

"I do not deny that beautiful technique is sufficient to constitute an extremely valuable achievement, but it can never alone place a work of Art on the level of the highest effort in Poetry, and by that it should stand." And again : "I cannot subscribe to the opinion uttered by Sir Coutts Lindsay at the dinner given to him, that Art is not a religious cult and has nothing to do with it ! This opinion, which seems to have been received with complete approbation, is widely shared by artists and lovers of Art, would make any approach to the greatness of former production impossible. The claim of Art to an equal place with Poetry must be upheld by some, and I hope a band of artists will always be found to fight for this with pencil or with pen." "My object, as you know, is to suggest the character of the thought of the age, not the material conditions." These extracts from private letters, a few among very many, illustrate the current of the Master's thought, maintained with tenacity from the earliest years of his career to the latest—the fount of his inspiration and of his achievement.

My space is filled, but I have, I hope, conveyed some idea of the great artist's attitude towards Literature, and in these supplemental notes added just a little to the fine tribute which Mrs. Watts has raised to her husband's immortal memory. No one endowed with any imagination and love of Art should miss this book. It is thoroughly well done, and the plates, it should be added, though too few in number, are of singular technical excellence.

---

G. F. WATTS AT COMPTON.

By CHARLES T. BATEMAN (Author of "G. F. Watts, R.A.")

MR. ANDREW HITCHENS, a friend for many years both of Mr. G. F. Watts and Lord Tennyson, introduced the artist to the locality where he afterwards made his home and where he spent some of his happiest years. "Limnerslease"—that is the apt name he gave his house—is situated just below the southern side of the Hog's Back, a well known ridge of the North Downs rising sharply from the town of Guildford, and is delightful for situation, being on the borders of Compton, one of the most charming villages in Surrey. Not a stone's throw from the gates is the shady, sandy track frequented by Chaucer's pilgrims in their journey from Winchester to Canterbury and close by is one of the finest specimens of an Elizabethan manor house in Loseley Park which has remained in the family of the More-Molyneux for several generations.

The charm of the home, however, consists in the fact that it was designed for the work of two artistic souls who were one in their appreciation of the gospel that art can be applied as a teacher of great truths. Both the artist and his wife carried out this principle at Compton. The visitor found Mrs. Watts busy with her village classes in which she trained the men and women of Compton in artistic expression, whilst the "Signor," as all his friends called him, undertook day by day the completion of great symbolical studies for presentation to the nation. During the last fifteen years of his life he only accepted one commission for a fee and this amounted to one thousand guineas which he placed entirely at the disposal of the Home Arts and Industries Association. Mrs. Watts was practically the founder of this society which originated with the idea of bringing art within the surroundings of the common people, and he was keenly interested in its welfare.

His studio at "Limnerslease" was large and lofty, and opened out, at the distance of only a few steps, from the living rooms, and here you usually discovered Mr. Watts, busy even when he had passed his eightieth year with the large canvases that yet remained unfinished. He told me on one occasion that for many years he found the early morning a good time for painting. In the summer he usually occupied his studio at five o'clock and worked throughout the hours before noon except for a brief rest. I once asked him how he accommodated himself to these early hours, and he confessed that by sleeping on a plank bed when a young man he had triumphed over nature. There was a Spartan simplicity of manner and habit throughout his closing life that gave point to his determination to utilize the morning.

Though he discussed his pictures with some reticence—more from temperament than dislike to talk—he was at times most illuminating in commenting on his subjects. Death presented to him no terrors. That fact supplies the reason for its constant introduction into his pictures. From his conversations one realised that whilst regarding it as inevitable he looked beyond its portals into a brighter and happier sphere. "I want to teach people to think of Death," he used to say, "as the nurse who comes to put the children to bed in the joyful anticipation that they will awake to the sunshine and the flowers." Now and again he received letters from sorrowing people, mourning the loss of friends, who had derived comfort from these studies, and the fact gave him great encouragement. His mention of such incidents showed keen delight in the knowledge that his artistic interpretations had appealed to the hearts of those in distress.

At his Compton studio he possessed a large number of portraits of celebrities in all ranks of life. Thus, for instance, hanging close together were Lord Rosebery, Mr. John Burns and Mr. Cecil Rhodes. These had all given him sittings and spent several hours in his studio. With each he had been on terms of intimacy and like all true artists had endeavoured to discover the real man behind the outward presentation. Two of these sitters are now living, whilst Mr. Watts has himself passed away, and it would not be fair to recall his telling comments, but he had estimated both their qualities and their weaknesses. Yet with all his keen discrimination of character and the high standard he set for himself, he never uttered a bitter or unfair criticism of anyone.

Pursuing his work day by day at "Limnerslease" he yet found time, with his wife, to enter into the life of the village. They enjoyed the society of a wide circle of friends in the neighbourhood, but probably one of his greatest pleasures was the creation of a

By permission of Fredk. Hollyer. Love and Death.
By G. F. Watts.

By permission of Fredk. Hollyer. Love and Life.
By G. F. Watts.

colony of art workers in Compton who gave their leisure to prepare the decorations and fittings for the graveyard chapel. On winter evenings Mrs. Watts held classes at "Limnerslease" where the villagers of all ranks, from the squire to the blacksmith, were taught to mould and bake the bricks and symbolic reliefs. Mr. Watts used to disclaim any credit for the excellent work that was effected, but whilst it is true that he did not take an active share in the building, he contributed the whole of the cost. Those who have visited the village burial ground will appreciate the genius that fostered Mrs. Watts's altruistic purpose.

Grave and dignified as the "Signor" always appeared in public life, you could not, even with a stretch of imagination, associate him with a suspicion of Bohemianism. But he possessed a quiet fund of humour which enabled him to enter into the spirit of the pastimes of the young people of the neighbourhood. On such occasions he unbended, and one recognized a man who delighted in clean and healthy sport.

Many pilgrims to-day journey to Compton to visit the beautiful resting place of the great artist and to inspect the Watts' gallery that he established in the picturesque Surrey village. He has many memorials elsewhere, but his gracious manners and kindly ways endeared him to his neighbours, who will cherish his memory on account of these associations for many years.

THE MASTERS OF DANTE.*

BY DR. WILLIAM BARRY.

I TURN on a brilliant March morning from these pages of Mr. Gardner's with reluctance, and would sooner read than write about them; for they hold a great * "Dante and the Mystics" By Edmund G. Gardner, Barlow Lecturer on Dante in the University of London, etc. (J. M. Dent & Sons) charm in their blending of many deep, ancient thoughts with our Tuscan's incomparable style, here quoted abundantly. We, who have tasted the pleasure that lies in other volumes by this English commentator on Dante, may look for the exact learning, the clear Italian

By permission of Fredk. Hollyer.

Endymion.
By G. F. Watts.

air, the pieties and courtesies which give his work its distinction, with a sure hope to find them again. And so we do. But he has taken up a bold enterprise. It is nothing else than to transpose into a northern key, and thus make intelligible to audiences like those at the London University, that "inarticulate music" of the Paradiso which Carlyle, for instance, could not follow. The music enchants all ears capable of apprehending Italian rhythms, but its meaning has, with only rare exceptions, escaped English minds. Oxford, even, which prided itself on its acquaintance with dead Greek poets who were very hard to construe, as Pindar and Æschylus, knew little until of late that was religiously akin to the "Divina Commedia." Dr. Moore has thrown a ray upon these dark places for Oxonians; and for London Mr. Wicksteed, Mr. Warren Vernon, Mr. Gardner himself, are serving as light-bearers. Prosit to all of them!

Still, as I count the names of those whom I designate "masters of Dante"—and that in religion—I cannot but feel curious touching the fate which will attend on lectures so foreign to our Puritan, Agnostic, indifferent, idle literary public as these. How many,

By permission of Fredk. Hollyer.

Paolo and Francesca.
By G. F. Watts.

By permission of Fredk. Hollyer.

The Rider on the White Horse
By G. F. Watts.

I wonder, not having the fear of examination before their eyes, will bravely feed their spirits on St. Augustine, Denis the Areopagite, Plotinus, the Victorines, St. Thomas Aquinas, Joachim of Flora, the two Mechthilds of Magdeburg and Hackeborn—all for the sake of understanding the Dantean philosophy? Let me not be mistaken. Most of this I did myself in old and delightful days; like other students of the English College in Rome, I have my pleasant associations there and elsewhere, among the Latin Hills and wandering over the Campagna with Dante the mystic, the disciple of Aquinas, who sang to heavenly cadences the fair and terrible things which we believed. But, then, St. Augustine, the Areopagite, and the "Angelic Doctor," from whom we were learning our creed took us beyond literature. It was not for the sole worship of beautiful or vivid expression, not to gain some æsthetic thrill, that we lingered on the slopes of Tusculum and Monte Albano, the divine poem in our hands. Perhaps I shall fail to make my meaning clear; in substance, however, it has been violently uttered by Carlyle, when he hurled from him with scorn the mere "literary idea" that Dante composed "fiction," and that his angels, saints, demons—nay, his whole supernatural world—had served him only as “machinery.” To him the world that he pictured was real, “bodied in fixed certainty of scientific shape,” as our Catholic dogma to us. Hence, in Carlyle’s judgment, the vision which Dante saw has proved to be “the most remarkable of modern books.” Do not, I say, forget this verdict, spoken by a Scottish Cameronian, who adored Goethe, hated Catholicism, and was the foremost man of letters in Britain during his long life. Carlyle’s bolt, truly delivered, hits the mark.

No fiction, but the sincerest of poems, deep from the heart. We must call its ground reality—seen, grasped, loved, brooded over, until Florence and Italy, with such eternal lights showing through them, appeared as what to a believer they in fact are, gates of Heaven and Hell. This, their transcendent significance, Dante caught, or, rather, it was burnt into him by dolorous trials, by sin, remorse, exile, poverty, loneliness, as the spirit made it known, with the high teachers from of old to expound it in their tongues of fire. Did he learn it by hearsay only—not by experience? He has left a word in prose, the “Letter” to Can Grande of Verona, which, if genuine—and I think it so—claims that, as our commentator affirms, “for the crowning vision or ecstasy of the Paradiso,” this Tuscan poet had more than hearsay and invention to stay him up. Under some form, be it what it might, Dante had passed through an ineffable spiritual crisis, resembling the exaltation of which mystic writers—Richard of St. Victor, St. Bernard, and St. Augustine, whom he quoted in his own defence—had given an account. He, too, like St. Paul, had been caught up to the Third Heaven, and heard secret words which it is not lawful (because not truly possible) for man to utter. Of these words the Paradiso furnishes a reminiscence and an echo. The whole poem leads up to them; its many stages, along the abyss of eternal hatred, by the ascents of the Mount of Purification, from star to star, until the Empyrean is attained, the vision fulfilled, are preparations as in a noviciate for the life now to be dedicated to the Highest.

His master, indeed, whom he chose before all others, was Virgil, as in the line which Milton translates, “Thou art my father, thou my author, thou.” From Virgil he took, but wrought over again in the flame of his Tuscan genius, the style which brought him renown. Yet he chose the poet of the “Æneid” for reasons other than his stately and most moving hexameters. The Sixth Book of an epic, at once Italian, Roman, hieratic, sang of a pilgrimage from this world to the next, across the River of Death, down into Hades, and onward to Elysium. Here the Florentine found, as in prophecy, the whole scheme on which he spent his years—the imperial, vicegerent of God, Rome’s mission from the hidden powers, Italy’s greatness—a subject embracing religion and history, which had the secret significance we term mystical, and without it never would it have entitled Virgil to be called “magician” as well as the bard of Cæsar. These things are not dwelt on in our schools, where the literary values of grammar and form outweigh the religious. And it is

By permission of Fredk. Holler

Death Crowning Innocence.
By G. F. Watts

far from easy for an English Puritan, nay, for anyone who is not a Catholic born and bred, to enter into the soul of that devout Paganism. Dante could pierce through these veils; hence the mingling in his creation of old myths and strange classic monsters—of Furies, Minotaurs, Geryons, and their like—with Christian imagery. On an endless theme I will but say now so much as this: we Catholics, inheriting from the South a keen sense of antiquity, not dead and gone, but possessed by us in living traditions, in ceremonial of great beauty, and in the very words we use from day to day, feel at home with Virgil not otherwise than the poet felt who both imitated and surpassed him.

Virgil the magician, Aristotle the philosopher: tothese Alighieri looked for inspiration to his chanting, for wisdom or the light of life when he meditated on the volume of God's works. All this, indeed, Mr. Gardner supposes well known to his listening circle. They are not, however, likely to have explored the vast fields of St. Augustine, or the "Sum of Theology" by Aquinas, who himself quotes the so-called Areopagite with a deference on which falls no shadow of doubt. Help must be given them, and with a deft manipulation of passages which will strike their minds as things rare, exquisite, profound, always lighting up some swift procession of verse where the terza rima has hitherto swept by in a cloud. Two points may be noted. The vision that is first shown by means of symbols and corresponding situations along the nine spheres, to be made perfect at last in the highest Heaven, is due to a divine supernatural radiance, known to mystics as the "light of glory." We do not refuse to say with our author, who founds himself on Augustine, that it is the "vision of the intelligible world" figured by "that great Platonist" of Alexandria, Plotinus. It is, even more importantly for our present aim, the vision which St. Paul has touched with a master's pencil in his Second to the Corinthians. Readers now will not expect of me to discourse about such hidden things amid the dust and street-cries of journalism. And my other point is yet more delicate. If, with Mr. Gardner, we define mystic knowledge to be the "science of love," its mere name cannot but daunt us. Either we must speak to the initiate—who will smile at our conceit and ignorance—or to the crowd—which, as a crowd, is always profane except when kindled by enthusiasm. Even the mystic, writing that which adepts will read, is constantly falling into the allusive allegorical manner that screens the too ardent blaze. Our present volume, addressing the intellect rather than the "deep heart," is restrained; one might go so far as to call it a discourse to the passer-by, who will never cross the temple doorstone. Perhaps it becomes more intimate when the life and death of St. Francis, which Dante has versified from Bonaventura—not from Celano, nor from Brother Leo—gives an historical setting to the doctrine of love and poverty. That is a fine chapter.

Staying thus outside the veil, we might talk a little of books and authors—how the Greek Plotinus, the Roman African Augustine, the Irish Richard of St. Victor, the German Mechthild, agree with Francis, Aquinas, Dante, in the science of divine things; and how the unique poem has drawn them all into its sphere

By permission of Fredk. Hollyer

Time, Death and Judgment.

By G. F. Watts.

of light, music and harmonious movement round the source of their desire. Commentary on the Paradiso from this point is rather beginning than exhausted. Mr. Gardner promises a long wished-for monograph on Joachim of Flora and the "Eternal Gospel." I hope we shall have the pleasure of seeing it in good time. He is rightly careful of Dante's orthodox relation to Joachim, which has been misconstrued. I will signal another task for the brave scholar yet to come. These Christian mystics were not monists. But how shall we distinguish their philosophy, as it stands crystal-clear in the Paradiso, from that of which Persian poets like Jelal-el-Rumi and Ferid Ud-din Attar have been the ecstatic singers? Resemblances, differences, contrasts, invite the labours of an age destined probably to behold the religious invasion, growing steadily to a crisis, of the West by the East.

"THE BOOKMAN" PRIZE COMPETITIONS.

APRIL, 1913.

Answers to these competitions (each on a separate sheet bearing the name and address of the sender) should be forwarded not later than the 15th of the month to

"The Prize Page," THE BOOKMAN, Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton, Warwick Square, E.C.

The date fixed above for sending in answers does not apply to Competitors resident abroad, except in the case of competitions Nos. 1 and 3; answers from Foreign or Colonial readers for competitions 2, 4 and 5 (the subjects of these being the same each month) will be admissible to the first competitions that are adjudicated upon after the date of their receipt.

Each competitor may send in any number of attempts, provided each attempt is written on a separate sheet of paper.

- I.—A PRIZE OF ONE GUINEA is offered for the best original ballad in not more than forty-eight lines.
- II.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best quotation from English verse applicable to any review or the name of any author or book appearing in this number of THE BOOKMAN. Preference will be given to quotations of a humorous nature.

III.—A PRIZE OF THREE NEW BOOKS is offered for the best original drawing, humorous or otherwise, illustrating the title of any book mentioned on any page of this number of THE BOOKMAN.

IV.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best review in not more than one hundred words of any recently published book. Competitors should give the names of Authors and Publishers at head of their reviews.

V.—A copy of THE BOOKMAN will be sent post free for twelve months to the sender of the best suggestion for THE BOOKMAN Competitions. The Editor reserves the right to use any suggestion submitted.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT: TWENTY-ONE GUINEAS PRIZE POEM COMPETITION.

A First Prize of Five Guineas and a Second Prize of Two Guineas will be given for the best and second best original poem.

A First Prize of Five Guineas and a Second Prize of Two Guineas will be given for the best and second best original sonnet on Shakespeare, Milton, Chaucer, Keats, Shelley, Burns, Scott, Byron, Wordsworth, Wellington, Nelson, Gladstone, Disraeli, Darwin, or any other famous Englishman.

A First Prize of Five Guineas and a Second Prize of Two Guineas will be given for the best and second best original humorous poem in not more than forty lines.

All Poems should be addressed to the Editor, and should reach the offices of THE BOOKMAN, St. Paul's House, Warwick Square, London, E.C., not later than the first post on the 2nd June next, if sent from any part of the British Isles, and by the 1st July if from the Colonies, India, or elsewhere abroad. Envelopes should be marked Twenty-one Guineas Competition.

The name and address of the competitor must be written on each M.S., and will be published in the event of a Prize being awarded to him. Any competitor who wishes to do so may add a pseudonym, to be used instead of his own name if his poem is printed but does not receive a prize.

The awards will be announced in THE BOOKMAN for August next, and in addition to the winning poems a large selection of the best of the others sent in will be published in a Special Supplement to that Number.

RESULTS OF COMPETITIONS FOR MARCH.

I.—The PRIZE for the best original Ballad is divided, and HALF A GUINEA has been sent to Miss Violet D. Chapman, of Sorrento, Burnham, Somerset, and HALF A GUINEA to Mr. B. R. M. Hetherington, of Wide-open-Dykes, Carlisle, for the following:

A BALLAD OF COLOURS

"Oh give me my girdle of milk-white pearls,
And robe me in purest white,
And set a white rose in my golden curls,
For I am to wed to-night—

And white is the colour that best beseems
The heart of a maid in her bridal dreams!

"Oh give me my girdle like sapphire seas,
And my robe of the azure sheen,
For I shall dandle his babe on my knees,
Ere ever the Spring be green—

And blue was the colour that Mary wore
When she on her bosom the Christ-Child bore!

"Oh give me my girdle of ruby flame,
And my gown of the crimson bright,
Lest my wan white face put my heart to shame,
For my Lord is gone forth to fight—

Oh red is the colour of fire and strife,
And red is the hue for a warrior's wife!

"Oh give me my girdle of deepest jet,
And my robe of the sable dark,
For the arrow that deep in his heart is set
In my spirit hath found its mark—

Oh black is the shade of the funeral bier,
And black is the sorrow that knows no tear!

"Oh give me my girdle of amethyst stone,
And my robe of the purple hue,
For the babe's sweet sake I will hush my moan,
As my Lord would have me do—

For purple is royalty's signet-ring,
And my little son is the son of a King!"

VIOLET D. CHAPMAN.

IN THE DAY OF THE EAST WIND.

(THE SIEGE OF LEYDEN)

They looked across the level lands
At daybreak as the sun arose;
They wrung their bony, fleshless hands
Distraught with watching for their foes.
"O God of Hosts," the burghers said,
"Send us help for we are sped,
For we are starving, dying, dead."
And still the east wind blew

Said one, "The dykes are cut in vain,
This east wind blows the water back.
Yet were we dolts to yield to Spain,
To face the thumb-screw and the rack.
The east wind rakes the bitter sky,
The fields that should be swamped are dry,
And we are left indeed to die!"
And still the east wind blew.

Said one, "What profits all this moan?
Though we should die we trust in Him.
A space, and ye shall yet be shown
How He will teach our foes to swim!
He holds the waters in His hand,
And eke the winds at His command:
Lo, He shall save the faithful land."
And still the east wind blew.

By permission of Fredk. Hollyer.

The Seamstress.
By G. F. Watts.

Photo by A. Rischgitz.

At the Window.
By G. F. Watts.

(Lowndes Collection, Victoria and Albert Museum.)

They climbed once more the city wall
With dragging feet, with listless feet;
The pestilence was like a pall
That hung above each silent street
They scanned once more the Spanish line
That ringed them like a serpent's spine,
But out of Heaven there came no sign
And still the east wind blew

Photo by A. Rischgitz.

(Manchester Gallery.)

Prayer.
By G. F. Watts.

Yet lo, at eve, when hope was gone,
The wind to westward veered around,
It blew the salt sea-water on
And swamped the Spaniard's camping-ground.
At morn where trees and fields had been
And meadows with their trampled green
A tossing flood of brown was seen
And lo, the west wind blew
With loaves and victuals weighted down,
O the blessed wind and sea!
The ships sailed into Leyden town
And cast their loads upon the quay
O ye winds and waters praise
God the Ancient of all Days,
He who Leyden siege did raise
While the west wind blew

B. R. M. HETHERINGTON.

We also select for printing—

BALLAD OF NIGHT

Behind the sunset's dying scorn
I marshal my array;
I fling my lamps aloft to warn
The sentinels of day,
Then on I creep to kiss the blue
That hangs 'twixt earth and sky—
For few can woo as I can woo,
And none can kill as I!
I spread the hamlet with my pall,
I cloak the twilight down,
I ride upon the sea, I crawl
Into the aching town;
I watch with sorrow, sin and strife,
I see proud virtue fly
For few know life as I know life
And none knows death as I!
I hide the childless mother's grief;
The drunkard's sordid crime,
The stricken Christian's unbelief,
The ravages of Time
I pluck each mask in devilry,
And heap them mountains high!
For few dare see what I dare see
Yet none so blind as I!
I shudder down the silent street—
Across the ghostly lawn
And out along the hills to greet
My cold, pale lover, Dawn
And as he gazes on my soul
He lives that I may die
For few pay toll as I pay toll
And none exacts as I!

(Cyril G. Taylor, Farr Hall, Heswall, Cheshire)

LORO
A BALLAD

Where the bubbling moorland stream
Smoothed the top of every boulder,
Loro sat, in pensive dream,
Mists of noon day, to enfold her,
Wove a web of rosy brightness,
In the water cool,
Hung one foot of snowy whiteness,
Loro of the pool
Softly, wrapt in sunny mist,
Gurth, a knight, rode through the heather;
Rode to keep his marriage tryst,
In the drowsy summer weather
Said he rode, with brow o'er-laden,
Not as lovers ride,
For he did not love the maiden
Pledged to be his bride,
Loro, woken from her dream,
Saw his shadow on the boulders,
Turned, and saw his trappings gleam,
Shook the hair from her bare shoulders,
Drew the small foot back and hid it
'Neath her cotton gown—
Would he harm her? God forbid it!
Loro slim and brown
When he spied her, shy, afraid,
Gurth forgot his tryst the morrow;
He had never seen a maid
Half so fair as timid Loro.
Swiftly her slim form he lifted
To his saddle-bow;
On his cheek her black hair drifted
Soft as midnight snow.

"Swift, o'er heathered hillocks ride!
By the songful lark
above me,
Loro, you shall be my bride,
Moorland maiden,
you shall love me!"
Spell of dreamy magic bound her,
Soft her black eyes
grew,
All her rich hair fell around her,
Child of sun and dew.
(M. D. Baynes, Edgehill, Teignmouth.)

We hesitated over giving the second half of the prize to Mr. Cyril G. Taylor—the false rhyme in his first verse—aiding us against doing so. Good ballads, some of equal merit with the two last we have printed, have been received from E. W. Higgs (Clapton), Winifred A. Cook (Birkenhead), Alice W. Linford (S. Tottenham), E. Irene Seaton (Boxmoor), Margaret McDonnell (Glasgow), E. A. Pearson (Fleet), John D. Smith (Miln-gavie), Edith Furniss (Birkenhead), Marjorie W. Crosbie (Wolverhampton), E. T. Sandford (Saltash), Dorothy Seward (Cambridge), Mrs. C. P. F. Ferrier (Glasgow), Stanley Simpson (Birkenhead), Mrs. A. E. Wise (Leicester), R. B. Ince (Jarvis Brook), Gladys Evelyn Warren (St. John's Wood), Headley V. Storey (Brighton), Lorna Fane (St. Anne's-on-Sea), Noel D. Branthwaite (Ashton-under-Lyne), M. A. Newman (Framlingham), A. W. Jay (Devonport), M. Whitaker (Dewsbury), Verne D. Rowell (Ontario), Malcom G. Campbell (Glasgow), Jack Blainstein (Bloomsbury), Constance Goodwin (Clapham), Maud Marion Burnell (Ashford), G. Vivian, Violet E. Harley (Harrow), G. M. Northcott (West Kirby), Ivan Adair (Dublin), Gwendolen D. Harold (High Barnet), Kitty Lilian Lyon (Wimbledon), Agnes Lack (Margate), Arbel M. Aldous (Saffron Walden), A. J. Killoran (Forest Gate), Laura M. Mills (Lismore), Josephine M. Lumley (Newcastle-on-Tyne), J. Richard Ellaway (Basingstoke), B. M. Morris (Bath), Frances A. Mantes (Halifax), Mrs. W. Glazier (Streatham), C. W. Martin (Plumstead), Ernest F. Seymour (Kilburn), Louis Golding (Manchester), Eva Martin (Golder's Green), Enoch Daniels (Newcastle), H. R. Smith (Newcastle-on-Tyne), G. G. Jackson (Northampton), S. B. Irene Bull (London, W.C.), Betty F. Kirby (Hoylake), Robert Everall (Plai-stow), Beatrice Craig (Straidarran), Edward Gleave (St. Helens), James McClay (Bangor), A. Eastwood (Southampton), Doris Dean (Bromley), Miss C. M. Walkerdine (London, S.W.), Emily F. Ife (Plumstead Common), G. W. Turner (Burnley), Mrs. M. E. George (Lewes), E. W. Taylor (Newport), Ivan Julius Collins (Northampton), Doris Smith (Burton-on-Trent), C. R. Price (Wellington), Doris Rochefort (London, N.), Rodney Bennett (Isleworth).

II.—The PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best Quotation is awarded to Miss A. M. Strickland, care of Miss Church, Hale, Farnham, Surrey, for the following :

Photo by Elliott & Fry.

G. F. Watts.
October, 1889.

(Charles Powell, 290, Oxford Road, Manchester.)

III.—The Prize for the best original Photograph illustrating the title of any recent book is divided, and we are sending Two New Books to Miss E. A. Pearson, of Fleet, Hants, and Two New Books to Mr. F. C. Davis, of 46, Hill Road, Weston-super-Mare, for the two Photographs we reproduce on page 8. Several other good Photographs have been sent in, the best and aptest being the one by Mr. Ernest S. Heron, of 13, Grange Road, Chester, which we also reproduce on page 9.

IV.—The PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best Review in not more than a hundred words is awarded to Mr. Ernest A. Carr, of Lyndall, Park Crescent, Tonbridge, for the following :

WHEN I WAS A CHILD. BY YOSHIO MARKINO.
(Constable.)

This story of the author's youth, serious and touching, despite its quaint English, is in one respect unique. The mission scholar is generally too plastic and uncritical. Mr. Markino who in his eager boyhood starved to attend an American mission college at Nagoya, is a Samurai, trained in bushido from infancy. His pages show the impact of Western ideas and Christian theology upon an Oriental mind of fine type—sensitive, just, independent, and philosophic. The failure of his teachers to impress their ideals upon this earnest nature should teach our proselytisers the need of greater knowledge, wisdom, and modesty.

We also select for printing :

THE VICTORIAN AGE IN LITERATURE.
BY G. K. CHESTERTON. (Williams & Norgate.)

Mr. Chesterton has condensed his wide knowledge of Victorian literature into a concise, critical survey which should enlighten and stimulate public literary taste. Commencing from Cobbett, he marshals the great writers of the period through his pages, focussing their salient qualities and significance on to our attention, linking them up in a chain of criticism that brings us finally to the Shaw-Wells-Kipling finger-post pointing through present-day letters. The author's intimacy with his subject, his peculiar powers of criticism, and the compelling style that stamps his

THE CHINESE REPUBLIC AND ITS FUTURE.
REVIEW BY PHILIP D.

SERGEANT.
"It cannot be—it is—it is,
A hat is going round"
O. W. HOLMES—The Music Grinders.

We also select for printing :

HOBSON'S CHOICE.
By G. G. CHATTERTON.
(John Long.)

"Only this, and nothing more."

EDGAR ALLAN POE—The Raven.

(Edward Ward, 112, Chichester Road, South Shields.)

HOW TO LISTEN TO AN ORCHESTRA.

By ANNIE W. PATTERSON.
"I was all ear"
MILTON—Comus.

(W. McC. Miller, Straidarran House, Co. Londonderry.)

"BECAUSE OF JANE."
By J. E. BUCKROSE

"I am a man who is preoccupied"
WALT WHITMAN.

(M. Cornish, 5, Essenden Road, Belvedere.)

THE BURNING QUESTION.
By G. D. LICHFIELD.
(Putnam.)

"I hope the poor man is insured."
HOOD—Don't You Smell Fire?

work with individuality, together give this little book real value and interest.

(Alan C. Fraser, Highlands, Dodington, Bridgwater.)

HELEN REDEEMED AND OTHER POEMS. BY MAURICE HEWLETT. (Macmillan & Co.)

One feels that Mr Hewlett is not altogether successful when he essays poetry; in "Helen Redeemed," he has chosen an ambitious theme and at times his ideas are fine, but the expression of them is often rugged and uncouth. The lines are unmusical and fall unpleasantly on the ear. In his determination to rise above the mediocre his verse has become laboured and strained; it appeals to our intellect, but it fails to charm us; it is passionate but it leaves us cold. It appears as if the author feared to be tender lest he should cease to be robust.

(Sybil Waller, 27, St. George's Road, London, S.W.)

We specially commend the reviews sent in by Ernest F. Seymour (Kilburn, N.W.), Rev. L. Green (Bootle, Liverpool), Miss Richey (Belfast), Emily Gishy (Newbury), Mrs. Hooper (Wanstead), H. M. Creswell Payne (St. Austell), A. Compton Ellis

(Stoke-on-Trent), Lucy G. Chamberlain (Llandudno), Eva M. Martin (Golder's Green, N.W.), Euphemia Dalgleish (Leith), R. J. Pocock (Oxford), Miss F. S. Alexander (Stoke Newington, N.), L. H. Cooke (Heaton Moor, Lancs), James A. Richards (Tenby), M. A. Newman (Framlingham), Marjorie C. Barnard (London, S.W.), Arnold S. Walton (Newcastle-on-Tyne), Miss Bradshaw Ishergood (Colchester), Frank Haigh (Halifax), Norah Hemdryk (Woolton, Lancs), Frances D. Watson, (Heaton Moor, Lancs), G. M. Northcott (West Kirby, Birkenhead), Bernard C. Gillott (Alfreton), Ivar Adair (Rathmies, Dublin), Rev. J. A. S. Wilson (Edinburgh), Miss A. N. Strickland (Farnham, Surrey), C. H. Kerth Hebblethwaite (Nottingham), John W. N. Sullivan (Highbury New Park, N.), W. H. Lodge (Upper Norwood), Susan Jesse (Salisbury), John J. Gurnett (Shoburyness), Mrs. E. K. Marshall (Merton Park, S.W.), W. Maurice Wilson (Newcastle-on-Tyne)

V.—The PRIZE OF ONE YEAR'S SUBSCRIPTION TO "THE BOOKMAN" is awarded to Mr E. F. Thomas, of 3, Rangemore, Prestwich, Manchester

New Books.

ELTON'S ENGLISH LITERATURE.*

Professor Elton's book on our literature of the great romantic era, from 1780 to 1830, is a survey on a great scale of the master and minor specimens of literary art during the whole of this period. The epigraph from Hazlitt—"I have endeavoured to feel what is good, and to give reason for the faith that was in me, when necessary, and when in my power"—is justified by the result. To comment adequately upon a commentary so saturated and so crudite would be the work of about ten years. Upon every production of the period that came up in turn for review, the author's last word has been: "How has he got at this?—what does it mean for me?—how does it wear?—is it well done?" Applying this to the author's "survey," the answer must be with monotonous iteration: "By unflagging study—the work penetrates and suggests, rarely dogmatizes—it is bound to appreciate in value (rare though this is in a work of criticism)—it is admirably done, not only as a whole, but in every part." It is, in short, one of those books which, in a period of depression about literature, when books about books are felt to drag a lengthening chain of insincerity and "tosh" (as a much admired critic once described to me all books about Shakespeare and Shelley), makes one feel that after all the literary endeavour is worth while; that there is such a thing as deep feeling and high-class brain work upon the thought and expression of past ages, that books about books may be engendered in some other fashion than by being thrown at the heads of impecunious authors by ravening editors or jaded literary advisers in their annual circumnavigation of the cyclopædias. There are none of these mechanical aids to production here. The book tingles with life and spontaneity. One can almost see the sap rising as one proceeds. The book is charged, as a whole, with the secret of life which is the secret of power, and this spirit of enthusiasm pervades every artery and penetrates to every leaf. The preliminary chapter of transition, of foreshadowing and first stirrings of romantic renaissance, at once strikes the note and shows the hand of a master, though it is, perhaps, the least masterly in the book, in the sense that it is not quite so perfectly subordinated in scale and perspective to the main design of the book as the long score of its fellows. Crabbe and Cowper are excellent, and the discussions such as those on the anti-revolution satire, scientific poetry, and the dispute about the harp of Pope, prepare us for the thoroughness and complete mastery of controversial detail which receives the fullest confirmation in the notes associated with each chapter at the end of the volume by way of appendix. The author's full power flashes out for the first time, I think, in his description, in chapter four, of Burns in relation to his landscape. Here there was a gleam of good guidance from Angellier; but Mr. Elton has made a new exposure and developed the whole plate anew for himself and for us with exquisite results:

"Burns lived nearer to the brown earth, upturned for sowing and crowded with life, than any other of our poets. But he does not, in general, portray scenery for its own sake, though he can do so brilliantly. It is a habitation for men and dumb creatures, a background, a chorus, a thing subordinate to the life that swarms in it. It is alive itself, not in any pantheistic way after the manner of Wordsworth or Shelley, and it offers to Burns no religion and no instruction. Sometimes, certainly, it is an occasion for something a little declamatory or half-sincere, as in some of his most famous pieces, like those to the mouse or the daisy. In the latter poem Burns is not free, save for half-a-dozen admirable stanzas, from a suspicion of strain, any more than Chaucer in his treatment of the same flower, is free from a suspicion of exquisite convention. The comparison of the plough torn daisy to the artless victim of misplaced confidence and to the simple bard himself is a piece of rhetorical emotion. He is best when he describes without such after-thoughts (quoting 'The Brig of Ayr'); and Burns is equally sensitive to the happiness of rapid, and yet peaceful, water. But he does not speak of mountains or of solitudes, which he does not visit. His country is low, and rolling, and flat—Ayrshire and thereabouts. It is not thickly peopled, except with wild creatures, and of those he knows all the sounds. He hears the curlews call, and the patricks whin, and the bitterns roar, and the cornerakes clamour. He also knows the colour of the holiday

Photo by A. Ruchgits.

Tennyson (1859).

By G. F. Watts.

From the original in the possession of Lady Henry Somerset.

* "A Survey of English Literature, 1780-1830." By Oliver Elton, D.Litt., Professor of English Literature in the University of Liverpool. 2 Vols. (Arnold.)

Photo by A. Kischgutz.

Carlyle (1877).

By G. F. Watts

(National Portrait Gallery.)

dresses, and catches the glitter of the silks and scarlets on the women 'skelping barefoot' to the Holy Fair. Transient lights do not escape him; the greedy glower of the elder at his twopenny in the plate, or the moonbeams glancing through every chink in Alloway Kirk. Everything is seen in movement; he has comparatively few pictures of 'still life.' Things flash by, or the wind sweeps the voices along."

There is a long chapter on Blake, full of perception and, to my mind, intuition, but without extravagance, and a delightfully cool estimate and criticism of Miss Austen. The minor novelists are touched in with the rarest grasp of detail, the result, doubtless, of assiduous piece-work, but giving the impression of almost superhuman memory. A very honourable space is allotted to my favourite, J. J. Morier—possibly too much, for he is essentially a homo unius libri, the first instalment of Hajji Baba. The chapter on Sir Walter of Waverley, to my mind, occupies the summit of the book; and although I am fairly read in the general literature of the subject, including the notable appreciations by W. P. Ker and Charles Alexander Young, I do not think that any one of them in sweep, rapidity and range quite comes up to the wonderful survey here given of the great mountain chain of romance.

The second volume, taken as a whole, strengthens—more than sustains—the first. Mr. Elton is a little hard on Southey, the bent of whose genius he seems to think (as Henry James, senr., thought of Carlyle), might have been for comedy. Surely, but for the long tyrannous epics, "Southey might have done more in the low-lying forms of poetry, which have a scent of the autumnal earth." The cardinal chapters on Wordsworth, Coleridge and Shelley are solid, original, magistral. But Mr. Elton is nothing if not catholic and judicious, qualities most incumbent upon a surveyor upon this scale. He startles not a little when he buds the least expected of epigrams—"Earless on high stood unabash'd Byron"—but in the end he is fair, even to Iara. Over De Quincey and Landor he is more apt to rhapsodise than I should be. Lamb and Hazlitt are excellent. Coming straight from the ripe accumulations of Mr. Gooch, I do not appreciate his chapter on "The Historians" quite so highly. Once more the ensemble is very remarkable, and confers to my mind upon Elton as a critic the breadth and interestingness of a Biandes.

A caution may be administered to readers of this very advanced and concentrated critic, who enjoys also the distinction of being one of the very few prose-masters of his craft. Like Acton's book on the "French Revolution," or Lang's on the "Border Ballads," it postulates a considerable knowledge of the subject-matter and, the nearer the reader is to his originals and first impressions, the more will he appreciate the subtle artistry and unerring taste of his guide. Even then the critical paste is so highly concentrated that it will be to his advantage to consume but small quantities at a time. Mr. Elton does not care very much for colourless and scentless prose, the prose that merely says things, the prose that M. Jourdain found that he had been talking all his life—prose without an atmosphere, and a fortiori without magic or enchantment. It is vibratory or associational prose that he aims at, pretty continuously. Every adjective that he uses is charged with echoes and associations; there is always a hinterland of suggestion back

By permission of Fredk. Hollyer.

George Meredith.
By G. F. Watts.

and beyond of the straightforward and superficial meaning. The medium of the critic is in a very high degree figurative, and this makes the full volume of his meaning often very hard to be quite sure of. Well though the present work deserves translation, one recognizes at once that it would be a very hard book to translate.

Most historians, whether political or literary, experience the fatigue of continuously originating new ideas, new epithets, the incommodity imposed upon the litterateur alone among artists, of at all times and all costs meaning something. The boon of a background of a mechanical kind which an apprentice may fill in, the breathing space of cheers, "laughter and applause," or the legitimate relief of a "da capo" are denied to the writer who must go on perpetually varying the pattern. As a rule, however, the historian finds a good deal of ease in paraphrasing the conclusions of other writers, quoting at ample and sometimes superfluous length, using conventional epithets and summing up exhausted and more or less superannuated verdicts.

All "sugaring" of this kind appears to be held by Mr. Elton in unequivocal detestation and contempt. He revels in new collocations, in new epithets—in one random page, for instance, I find applied to the work of Hazlitt such unusual adjectives as "clayey," and "rodent," while the impress of life upon the writer is compared to "surf-bathing," which takes the breath away—he hates a flat, time-worn phrase, as Sir Andrew hates a Puritan; these delicate implications shake off the mob that scours the rutted highway, and our author is felt often when he is at his best to be emphatically addressing a select audience of ticket-holders within closed doors. Mr. Elton talks a little contemptuously at times, it must be confessed, of the "bookman." Southey, says he, is a dead poet, a bookman, a journeyman in verse, and yet he is emphatically, I incline to think, a bookman himself. He gets his results unsparingly by the distillation of innumerable tomes. Such distillations, however exquisite, are not for the taste of all. As a fifth essence or suprême of the literature of a whole epoch, they are, of course, pretty rich food these twenty-six chapters; and one goes dogging back after them pretty contentedly to a fare of biscuit and water—for a time. But, as the generations wheel round, and we approximate once more to a more bookish age, I can imagine that these select audiences will grow out of all knowledge, and that there will be a vogue, as compelling as that of the moment for the dialect of the "Western World" (in other words the western slope of Ireland), for the Eltonian epithet. These epithets, these figures, are recherché, no doubt; they have not the cryptic power of such catchwords as "Glory be!", but they are also far less monotonous. They require, it may be said, that the audience should not merely hear, but should overhear them.

And I can imagine our professor in blue and buttons, like the good antiquary, lifting the latch of some superb bard of the past age, hearing a tremulous voice chanting some mystic rune, instinctively grasping his pencil and memorandum book, and refusing to budge backward or forward until he has got the trick of the thing, and pinned it down with its solitary adjective.

"Hush, hush!" said the antiquary, 'she has gotten the thread of the story again' And as he spoke she sang:

"They hae saddled a hundred milk-white steeds,
They hae bridled a hundred black,

Swinburne.
By G. F. Watts.

With a chafron of steel on each horse's head,
And a good knight upon his back'
"Chafron!" exclaimed the antiquary, 'equivalent, perhaps, to cheveron—the word's worth a dollar'—and down it went in his red book."

Where the antiquary, who was a close man and looked narrowly at spot silver, said "worth a dollar," we, in the slang of the day, say "priceless." Well, there are many dollars'-worth of such words in these two volumes—beautiful words that vibrate, of which romantic prose-writers with a turn for poetry, whose names end in "ton," have a monopoly. But these two volumes are worth many dollars to the student who loves good books and their authors. As a faithful, minute and highly competent survey of the salients and re-entrants of a whole literary epoch, they have no equal, and hardly a distant rival.

By permission of Fredk. Hollyers.

Professor Schelling has, I believe, attempted something of the kind for the Elizabethan era. But, in the first place, the apparatus was not to be compared to that accumulated, by Mr. Elton. In the second place Schelling is incomparably inferior as a writer to Elton. The materia critica, too, is all in favour of the later period. Finally, in variety and profundity of literary genius, the period 1780-1830 is, taken as a whole, decidedly more opulent than the Elizabethan.

THOMAS SECCOMBE.

IBSEN'S MASTERPIECE.*

It is possible that those who know "Peer Gynt" in the original will find a hundred faults in Mr. Roberts's translation. Those of us who are not acquainted with the original will be amazed rather by his virtues. Mr. Yeats once said, in a fine sentence, that "in vital translation . . . a work of art does not go upon its travels; it is re-born in a strange land." In the present volume "Peer Gynt" is re-born into the English-speaking world. In other words, the soul of the play is saved alive, and "Peer Gynt" sweeps along in its new dress with the joyous ease of a masterpiece. It is Mr. Roberts's mastery of the play as a whole that makes it hardly worth while to pause to denounce the occasional outrage of a bad rhyme, or the occasional collapse of a rhythm into prose. In sitting down to translate "Peer Gynt" into English rhyme, while preserving the metres of the original, Mr. Roberts obviously undertook a work calling for great skill as well as understanding. Rhymed translations are, as a rule, the accursed thing. It is only in the hands of an exceptional man that a rhymed translation is more than a lifeless paraphrase. Mr. Roberts's is never that. He seems to me to have caught far more of what might be described as the fantastic and tragic humour of the play than did Mr. William Archer and his brother in the only other translation that has been published in English. Mr. Roberts has, of course, used the Archer translation freely, as he acknowledges. But he has made his borrowings his own. There is not a trace of the poverty of the second-hand about his work.

If we may judge by the reception given to "The Pretenders" by the dramatic critics when it was produced the other day at the Haymarket Theatre—since I wrote this, alas! the play has failed—England is at last getting ready to welcome Ibsen into its domestic circles. So determined a realist, so daring a moralist, so contemptuous a smasher of public idols, could hardly have expected to be tolerated by respectable people until he was dead—dead and pedestalled, and himself a fit object for the idol-smashers of a later generation. Now that Nietzsche and Strindberg have assailed the public ear, however, quiet people may well ask themselves whether after all Ibsen was not a good deal of a Christian. He glorified self-realisation, indeed, but—and this is true of "Peer Gynt" especially—he interpreted self-realisation, not as a shrill Imperialism of the soul, but as a losing of the self and a re-discovery of it in love. When Mr. Roberts, in his recent book on Ibsen, tried to assimilate the moral idea running through Ibsen's work to the Christian theory of the Atonement, I was inclined to disagree violently with him. But as I read "Peer Gynt" again, I feel much more open-minded on the point. On the other hand, is Mr. Roberts on such warrantable ground when he argues that in the end Peer is saved from the Button-moulder, not by Solveig's love for him, but by his love for Solveig? It is one of those points in regard to which one might easily fall into quibbling. But surely the answer Solveig gives to Peer, when he asks her where his real self has been all his life is:—

"In my faith in my hope, in my love wast thou"— is against Mr. Roberts's contention. It is one of the many virtues of his introduction, however, that it provokes

* "Peer Gynt." By Henrik Ibsen. Translated by R. Ellis Roberts. 5s. net. (Secker.)

the reader into a running fire of argument. On the other hand, it must not be thought that his sole concern with "Peer Gynt" is with its moral ideas. "Peer Gynt" may, in one aspect, be a many-coloured and delightful statement of the idea that self-sufficiency is merely a form of self-slaughter. Most essentially of all, however, it is the riotously brilliant comedy of a man. Peer Gynt can hardly be denied a place beside Don Quixote, and Falstaff, and the other great comic characters in literature. He is the self-seeker, with day-dreams taking the place of ideals, as he has never been portrayed in literature before or since. He is undoubtedly the self-seeker portrayed by the critical intellect no less than by the imaginative intellect. But what a wealth of fancy, of laughter, of humanity has gone to his making! Even Ibsen never gave us such another portrait again.

ROBERT LYND.

LIFE'S MANY-COLOURED TWIST.*

Miss Sinclair has reached the height of her achievement in this book. Since "The Divine Fire" she has had inequalities. One was not sure of her grip on life. "The Creators" had pauses, longueurs. The ground work of it was artificial. With "The Combined Maze" she has justified the very highest expectations her greatest admirers can have had of her, and she has been extravagantly advised.

"One word is too often profaned
For me to profane it"

The word, the glorious word, so often cheaply and easily used, genius, is in the mind of the present reviewer entirely in place concerning "The Combined Maze." Once before, in "The Divine Fire," Miss Sinclair gave us a hero out of that stratum of London life which lies midway between the middle-class and the people. I am not sure now that Ricky persuaded. In my secret heart even a woman of genius could not altogether make me believe that Ricky would have been loved by the exquisite Lucia. One demurred, hesitated. With Ranny of "The Combined Maze" there are no doubts, but full and warm and delighted acceptance. I doubt very much that any modern novelist of the creators, among whom Miss Sinclair takes her place, could give us finer than Ranny. He is an absolute triumph. Ranny is the son of a Wandsworth chemist, a clerk in a furnishing shop. He is of his world. He talks in cockney slang; he is something of a gamin. He is neither above nor below his class. But for sautty, for honesty, for sweetness, Ranny is an immortal creation. He flashes through the book, white and shining like a Greek god. He is adorable, the very flower of honest and lovely youth. Ranny is made, or at least, finished and polished at the Poly-Gym. He is an athlete as thousands of young fellows like him are. The thing that he most loathed and abhorred was Flabbiness, and after Flabbiness, Weediness. Ranny as an athlete is splendid, morally and physically. There is not an ounce of Flabbiness about him. He is immortally and for ever, Fit.

The odd title of the book is taken from the figure in which all the competitors at the Poly-Gym, displays take part. There is a glorious description of this figure in an early chapter which ought to find its place in an anthology of English prose. In the "Combined Maze" Ranny and his little destined mate, Winnie Dymond, a very strong and tender creation, meet for the first time. Winnie is as Fit, as far removed from Flabbiness as Ranny himself, though she is less splendid, the little brown true mate of the beautiful male.

For a time Ranny and Winnie lose their way. The figure goes dreadfully wrong. Ranny, led away by a momentary passion, marries the wrong woman; and Violet, who was much more than the average sensual woman, is as much almost of an artistic triumph as our white and beautiful Ranny himself. The book ends on a tragic note, but tragedy so uplifted that it is better than commonplace happiness. One has a feeling after one has read the book that it is a very secondary matter whether Ranny and Winnie were happy at last. The thing that matters is that two so fit, so utterly un-Flabby and un-Weedy as Ranny and Winnie should be shining down there like jewels among the little clerks of London. We take off our hat to Miss Sinclair; she has done a big thing this time. This book has something akin with the great French masterpieces of fiction. But it is to be doubted whether any Frenchman could produce a thing so clean, so radiant as Ranny. There would be the sensual stain which is the uglier when it is sentimental. Our Ranny has his passions like other men, but they are honest passions even when they betray him. The whole drama, unfolded with minute care and detail, is a fragment of life and profoundly moving. Every character is touched in deftly. There is no slovenliness in this art. As for the writing, one does not need to be told at this time of day that Miss Sinclair writes like an artist. The book has humour, which helps one to read the story of Ranny and Winnie to the conclusion with a light heart. It is packed full with wisdom. The thread of life runs out as fast and free, as many-coloured as the human thread in the Combined Maze of the Poly-Gym. Henceforth we shall look with a new interest at the crowds of little clerks and shop-assistants who pour all over London by the early morning trains, wondering if there may be among the steadily rushing mass a Ranny—a Winnie. This is a London novel, and like London, it is packed full with life. There are things Dickensian in it—the group of Ranny's relatives and Ranny's comrades for example. But at times there was a certain quality in the Master—shall we dare to call it Flabbiness?—from which this clean-cut book remains absolutely free. It is a Dickensian quality which made an imaginative child cry out sharply over Martha Peggotty and her bursting bodice: "Oh, I don't like it: I can't bear it. It's thick," as though the clear air had suddenly become asphyxiating. The story of Ranny is fit; it has neither Flabbiness nor Weediness. Ranny is clean as a sword.

* "The Combined Maze." By May Sinclair. 6s. (Hutchinson & Co.).

KATHARINE TYNAN.

THE JUVENILIA OF MR. GEORGE MOORE.*

If you were a vintner would you put new wine into old bottles? If you were a tailor would you put a patch of new cloth into an old garment? If you were the Director of the Louvre, would you hang Manet's brutal and powerful Olympia amongst the tender saints and pale Christs of the cinquecentists? Of course not, and, if you were anyone but Mr. George Moore you would not intrude into a volume of generous and enthusiastic "Impressions and Opinions" written in comparative youth, and now republished, an article entitled "Une Rencontre au Salon" written only yesterday with a pen dipped in cynicism and as out of place and bizarre in its present surroundings as a bull in a china shop. In a Preface written with the becoming weariness of an Old Master, Mr. Moore vouchsafes his reasons.—

"Three weeks ago," he writes, "it had seemed to us that all the beauty spots might be accepted without demur, but on looking into the book again, the article entitled 'Art for the Villa' seemed to us such a ravelled skein that we could not do else than strive to knit it together, and as this proved to be a task beyond our skill, a new article has been substituted, written, we admit, in our later style."

Now, now, Mr. Moore, are you quite frank with us? Are you not a tiny wee bit ashamed of having been once * "Impressions and Opinions." By George Moore. 6s. T. Werner Laurie.)

By permission of Fredk. Hollyer.

The Happy Warrior.
By G. F. Watts.

By permission of Fredk. Hollyer.

Sir Galahad.
By G. F. Watts.

young and enthusiastic, once an undisguised hero-worshipper of Balzac, Verlaine, Turgeneff, Zola, Degas, Rimbaud, Lafargue, Shakespeare, Villon, Thackeray, Dickens, Jane Austen, all of whose names adorn these charming pages, and have you not yielded to the temptation to intrude your later rather soured and cynical self into this matter of generous feeling and sentiment? Or can it be that—? But No! Perish the thought that Mr. Moore could not abide to let this volume of "Juvenilia" go forth without just giving a taste of what "we could do as we would, in our later style," lest the chance reader who had never read "Esther Waters" should judge that Mr. Moore had more heart than head.

But a truce to fault-finding. After all the matters written about in these early Impressions are of far greater importance than this or that motive of the author in editing them. It is, for example, well to be reminded that Balzac was not only the creator of the Modern School of Fiction, in which literature set out to compete with painting on its own ground, but that none has surpassed or even approached him in the realistic and pictorial representation of living, breathing, sinning, praying, complex humanity. And it is particularly interesting to recall this earlier storming of the prerogative strongholds of one art by another in these days when we see painting bent on making reprisals, determinately competing with the most subtle form of literary expression. True, we may be bewildered by, we may even deride the Post-Impressionists and Futurists, but we cannot deny—at least I for one cannot—and it seems to me here is the vital point—that these great departures in the Art of Painting fill all of us who give them a chance, with a divine discontent with the art that we have learned to consider consummate, and so remind us that the world is alive, that there is no finality, that we must not sit down, but we must still run if we are to obtain. But here we are going off at a tangent, embroidering when we should be praising. And yet it is a sort of praise, too. For surely in matters of taste we do not want always to acquiesce. We are stimulated to contradict, stimulated to enlarge, stimulated, in a word, to think, to realise.

Take for example the concluding sentences of the Essay on Balzac:

"As God is said to have created Adam from a handful of clay, so did Balzac create the French novel. Flaubert, Zola, Daudet, Goncourt, Bourget and Maupassant have only taken and developed that part of Balzac which individually they superficially represent. In conclusion I will say that as I understand criticism more as the story of the critic's soul than as an exact science, I confess that I would willingly give up Hamlet, Macbeth, Romeo and Juliet, etc., for the yellow books."

Well, we are not all going to agree with that, and yet the position is arguable and there is much of the like stimulation in this book. Here is an example of Mr. Moore's hero-worship. Of Zola he writes:

"The man is greater than his books, and that is a great deal for he has written some very fine ones."

Not the finest, for "his genius is but the triumph and apotheosis of commonsense. Wingless, it never rises towards the stars." Here is an example of Mr. Moore's optimism:

"The one invincible thing is a good book. It may be doubted if the world contains a single good unknown poem. If a man were to write a good sonnet and drop it in the middle of the Sahara, the fate that has watched over good poetry through so many centuries would catch it up, and carry it somehow into common repute."

Here is an example of Mr. Moore's sympathy:

"I am not aware," he writes with rare insight, "of any other poet, except Verlaine, who has written solely to tell how weak, how helpless and undistinguished he is in all ways and things."

But I have said enough to send the reader to the book itself, which, notwithstanding some crudity of expression, makes for refreshment and delight, makes us, too, like Mr. Moore more than we have liked him before, much as we have always admired his genius.

G. S. LAYARD.

A GREAT BIBLE CATALOGUE.*

It is ten years since the first volume of this monumental work was published, dealing with the English Bibles in the great collection of the Society. The editors have wisely refused to hurry their labours. To catalogue adequately the Bibles in foreign languages proved a still more serious task; English and English dialects numbered 24, whereas the foreign languages enumerated in the three parts of the second volume amount to no fewer than 604. The editors have completed their task with the same careful scholarship with which they began, and the catalogue is a fine contribution to the bibliography of the Bible, with rich materials for scholars and students. To all who have been engaged in its production, and especially to the responsible editors, the heartiest congratulations must be offered on the appearance of the book. It is a great enterprise, carried out with a care and a technical attention worthy of the subject.

What the volumes before us contain is a series of language-headings in alphabetical order, under each of which is grouped in chronological order, with short bibliographical notes, a list of complete Bibles, Testaments, or separate portions of the Bible. As the editors point out:

"This method exhibits the history of Bible translation in any tongue, and has peculiar value as tracing the evolution of those missionary versions which the Bible Society exists specially to promote. In order to make the sequence complete, we have endeavoured to note each vital link in the lineage of a version, enclosing within brackets such editions as are not represented in the Bible House Library."

The time required for the printing of so large a mass of material has naturally thrown some sections a little out of date. That was inevitable, under the circumstances. In the Polyglot section, for example, as in the list of Latin and Greek texts, some editions have appeared during the last few years which have been too late for insertion. But this was inevitable. No editor can wait dum defluat annis. And the outstanding feature of the catalogue is its wealth of material on the earlier history of editions, its copious and exact information upon the highways and byways of the subject.

Apart altogether from the scientific value of the work, there are repeated glimpses into the history and romance of Christianity afforded by these pages. We are reminded, for example, that almost the whole edition of the first Georgian Bible was destroyed in the fire of Moscow in 1812, that the editio princeps of the Old Testament in Irish did not include the Apocrypha, as "the Hon. R. Boyle refused to print those books, though they had been translated"; and that the poor Christians of Anertum paid for their vernacular Bible by raising £1,200, "the result of fifteen years' toil at arrowroot cultivation." This last item recalls the fact that about 1841, also, "the Eskimo of Labrador out of their poverty sent a thank-offering of three gallons of seal-oil," by way of thanking the Society for the Scriptures which had been sent them. These are more pleasant traits than that recorded of the two Welshmen who started the first edition of the Bible in Welsh but broke up their friendship over "the general sense and etymology of one word."

A remarkable story is told of the earliest complete Bible in Malagasy, which was unfinished when the persecution broke out in 1835. The missionaries managed to complete the version, which they distributed among the Christian islanders, burying other copies for safety.

"These books, which passed stealthily from hand to hand, and were read in secret and at the peril of their owners' lives, became the fuel which kept the sacred fire burning during a quarter of a century of ruthless persecution. When the missionaries returned in 1862, they found that the little band of Malagasy Christians had grown from 200 to over 2,000."

* "Historical Catalogue of the Printed Editions of Holy Scripture in the Library of the British and Foreign Bible Society." Compiled by T. H. Darlow, M.A., and H. F. Meule, M.A. Vol. II.: "Polyglots and Languages other than English." (The Bible House.)

A remarkable fact, in another direction, is noted with regard to Mr. J. E. Moulton's edition of the Tonga New Testament in 1880:

"This edition was published privately by the translator, owing to the fact that he felt himself unable to comply with the rules of B.F.B.S., which, at that time, required that the Textus Receptus should form the basis of all translations issued under its auspices. He seems to have had private access—probably through his brother, W. F. Moulton—to the unpublished documents of the New Testament Revisers, and to have based his own revision on them. Thus the Tonga edition of the New Testament, published some months before the English Revised Version (May 17th, 1881), affords the earliest example of a missionary version directly influenced by that revision."

Dean Burgon would have rejoiced to learn, however, that the edition was prohibited in schools by order of the Tongan Government!

The Gospels, especially Matthew, Mark, or Luke, are naturally the most popular parts of the Bible to be issued in separate editions. I observe Jonah is curiously popular, in this connection, among the Old Testament books. And the Keespeaking inhabitants of the Congo Free State have Nehemiah in addition to Luke as their total scriptures! The first book which happens to have been rendered into Karotongan was Galatians, but then it was soon followed by others.

There are only casual points, but they may serve to indicate the wealth and width of interesting material which is to be found in nooks and corners of this great work, apart altogether from its unique value as a bibliography.

JAMES MOFFATT, D.D., Litt.D.

GEORGE ELIOT.*

Although, probably, George Eliot is no longer a household word to us, the literary pre-eminence of her work amply justifies the "conscientious and prolonged labour" which Miss Deakin has devoted to "the detail of her early life."

We are not, indeed, prepared to accept without qualification the theory, said to have been established by M. Emile Legouis, that the "adolescence of genius" is not only "great enough to engage the investigator's concentrated powers," but, "from the standpoint of literary origins, more important than any other phase of a career." But no one can question the interest which must always be felt about the parentage, childhood, and education of a favourite author, especially one who seems to identify herself so thoroughly as George Eliot with the dreams and sufferings of her characters. Her personality, in fact, will carry with it an explanation of that strange mingling of intellectual arrogance and aloofness with passionate sympathy which characterises her art. Miss Deakin, in one of her few critical comments, has quoted the "wise and tender words" of Mr. Gilfil:

"God sees us as we are altogether, not in separate feelings or actions, as our fellowmen do. . . . Our thoughts are often

* "The Early Life of George Eliot." By Mary H. Deakin, M.A. With an Introductory Note by Dr. C. H. Herford. (Manchester University Press.)

"George Eliot." By Viola Meynell. The Regent Library. 2s. 6d. net. (Herbert & Daniel.)

worse than we are, just as they are often better than we are. . . . We are always doing each other injustice, and thinking better or worse of each other than we deserve, because we only hear and see separate actions. We don't see each other's whole nature."

Then she says:

"This was one of the things George Eliot longed to say. That way that God has of seeing us is the way the true artist has; it is the way George Eliot herself had."

This emphatic and picturesque statement, however, does not cover the whole matter, and somewhat depreciates the value of the personal insight which Miss Deakin has specially set herself to afford. For much of George Eliot's power comes from that half-knowledge which we derive from our own experience. As we all know, she put much of herself into Maggie Tulliver; she had faced, in her own person, many of the problems confronting Romola and Esther Lyon, Gwendolen, Dorothea and Will Ladislaw. We may learn, from this "Early Life," how faithfully her novels reflect her deepest convictions on men and life.

It proves also that, like her own heroines, she seldom depended on her own judgment, however tenaciously, if not dogmatically, she would pronounce upon the convictions she had acquired. At every stage of her intellectual or emotional development she confesses to an "absolute need of some one person who should be all in all to her and to whom she should be all in all." Probably, without George Henry Lewes, she would never have written a novel. Each of the many religious phases through which Miss Deakin has traced her was due directly to the personal influences. As Miss Meynell expresses it, "in each case the apostolic man becomes the woman's conscience."

Such changes, it will be remembered, were at an end before the publication of her first novel—in her thirty-ninth year. She had then settled down into a broad humanitarianism, subscribing to no definite creed, but convinced "of the efficacy that lies in all sincere faith and the spiritual blight that comes with no faith."

Miss Meynell, indeed, defines her ethical code as "uncompromisingly Christian" and "very hard," admitting no possibility of "compromise or dispensation"; "the code of a woman who in her own conduct of life has broken all the pledges made and implied for her by her parentage, kin, and education."

On the personal aspect of this question Miss Deakin reveals more sympathetic generosity, greater subtlety, and—in our opinion—more justice. She endeavours to show that George Eliot never put greater value on the restrictions of conventionality than when she broke them. In her opinion only exceptional circumstances, like her own, could make rebellion permissible. She never resented "the quick condemnation" of "public opinion," however much the misunderstanding of friends hurt her. Privately she held herself justified; and never regarded the teaching of her novels as an atonement. They upheld what she had always believed; what, in her own heart, she felt she had practised.

By permission of Fredk. Hollyer

For he had great possessions.

By G. F. Watts

Miss Deakin has justified her contention by reliable evidence, perhaps the most valuable part of her work. She also tells us how early in life George Eliot was puzzled by finding that "glory was an attendant on luck instead of on goodness"; and that, like Maggie Tulliver, "at a very early age she got the idea into her head that she would become a person of importance in the world." We find her accepting a "compromise" with her father on the trying question of religious observances; and are assured that, however autobiographical or reminiscent, her books contained no actual portraits from real life. There is, too, an interesting passage about the "tidiness" of her writing, which recalls Mrs. Poyser's dairy; a quality evincing self-discipline and conscientiousness, not entirely congenial to the highest art.

Yet surely it is as an artist that George Eliot will live; by her characterization, her insight and her wit; her genius for dialogue, invention, and narrative. She has given us a glorious gallery of full-length portraits; increasing the number of our intimate friends; and, through them, the problems of life which have an endless fascination for all who care to think. In that sense her work remains, as Dr. Herford puts it, "a great and still unexhausted literary and ethical force." Miss Deakin could not give us too much detail in illustration of her personality and her powers, though only the serious student will wish to follow so closely her various incursions into philosophy. It is not as a thinker that we value George Eliot to-day. The quotations, and deductions, from her letters and journals are most welcome: we could willingly have been spared some of her essays and reviews.

R. BRIMLEY JOHNSON.

E. F. BENSON'S NEW NOVEL.*

"The Weaker Vessel" is to be numbered among Mr. Benson's more successful novels. Had it been blessed with humour: had the spirit of the first pages, descriptive of the inner decoration of a church, prevailed throughout; had the dragonish Mrs. Ransome, whose mischief-making virtuousness adds thorns and pains to the narrow path which leads to the strait gate, been humorously instead of cruelly depicted, we might have hailed the book as one of his best: as it is, its strength and sincerity make it notable enough. It is entitled to a wide appreciation.

Has Mr. Benson ever depicted a really nice and truly good woman? Clever enough many of his feminine characters have been; several have proved well-intentioned, all are witty; but, so far as this penman's experience goes, not one of his good women is really living. Eleanor Ransome is an attempt at ideal womanly goodness. She is, we are led to believe, charming; her gentle clergyman-father adores her; she has something of dramatic genius, acts well enough to win the applause of London, in her trial shows wonderful strength and patience, and yet does not convince us that she is quite natural. There is an occasional gushiness of speech and demeanour which would hardly have applied in her case. She is, at all events, a conscientious attempt to realise God's Good Woman. The task set to Eleanor's hand is, certainly, one to test a character and make a woman womanly. It is her part to play the guardian angel and wrestle with the enemy for a weak man's soul. Tired of her step-mother's frequent disapproval and ultra-religious exactitude she goes as governess to a house where a tutor is kept. Harry Whittaker is Nellie's destiny. He has a weak mouth, a physical circumstance promising trouble ahead, which Mr. Benson has before now found significant. Harry has also a genius for play-writing; but there is a bee in his honey, as Nellie, after their marriage, comes to realise. The son of a dipsomaniac, he cannot write without the stimulus of alcohol. His muse is merely jog trot without whisky. Here is the horrid dilemma. He must write to live; yet cannot work without drunkenness. What is he to do? He tries to control his necessity; but that, of course, proves futile. The powers of darkness do not dole out iniquity in measured doses, and he is not blessed with a weak mouth for nothing. Harry drinks, struggles, continues to drink, deceives in order to drink. His wife wrestles with his weakness, and for a time is successful; it almost seems as if she may compel him to write well enough without whisky; then a new force enters, and Eleanor is baffled. Marian Anstruther, except that she has too clever a gift for speech (one would almost think, as Zuleika Dobson puts it, she had often sat at dinner beside Mr. Benson), is an actress, obviously intended to play the part of the naughty siren in cultured melodrama. She is beautiful, sensual, a temptress. From sheer wickedness and jealousy, she wantonly spurs the weakling's tendency, and so sends Harry some days' march nearer doom, making the task of the good wife much harder. The two women are rival forces; one inciting to evil, the other inspiring to good. It is the old, old battle, the time-old battle, and an allegory. The result seems inevitable, when fate, driving a motor-car, hurtles in, and the end is not completely conclusive.

Mr. Benson, it will be seen, has found in this story full scope for his particular gifts. The plot is one of the best-constructed he has yet produced, and the changing scene from clerical to theatrical life lends itself to effective contrast. Although it lacks the saving genial grace of humour, "The Weaker Vessel" is strong work.

C. E. LAWRENCE.

THE BAUDELAIRIAN SPIRIT.*

To what extent modern English literature is indebted to the bizarre genius of Charles Baudelaire can never be stated with anything like scientific precision. Yet few will deny that what has been called the decadence in modern literature, not only in England but in France and Germany as well, owes much of its individuality to that curiously aloof and elusive method of introspective exploitation which achieved its culmination in the work of the author of the "Fleurs du Mal" and "Les Paradis Artificiels." But that influence has not always been direct; it has not always been Baudelairean. When the Romantic movement of the first half of the nineteenth century had exhausted itself in heroics and insurrections, the spirit of personal revolt fell back upon itself, and the literary atmosphere became charged with the more subtle element of introspection. It was as though a world-weariness fell upon the human spirit, and everything that had been hitherto normally attractive became monotonous. Victor Hugo had set the young men of France thinking about themselves as heroes; Byron became a hero. Personality was nothing unless it was picturesque, and the need of being picturesque produced the poseur. There had been poseurs in every age, but it was not until romance ceased to be objective that anyone ever thought of giving the art of attitudinising in real life a philosophic basis. That distinction fell to the lot of Charles Baudelaire. It was he who gave the English idea of dandyism a new meaning. I say "new" because no one had ever thought philosophically about dandyism before; but what Charles Baudelaire actually did was to interpret for the first time the real and underlying idea of the spirit that produced the dandy. It was an accident that the temperament of Baudelaire found its chief exercise in a peculiarly intense form of the eternal battle between the spirit and the flesh. It might just as easily have happened that the first interpreter of dandyism had been one who had already conquered the flesh by denying it. Indeed, long before Baudelaire, mystics of more than one religion and period devoted ardent lives to such probings of the spirit in relation to the flesh which we associate with the genius of the decadent movement in the literature of modern times. The dandyism of Baudelaire only expressed itself incidentally in the

* "The Weaker Vessel." By E. F. Benson. 6s. (Heinemann.)

* "The Influence of Baudelaire in France and England." By G. Turquet-Milnes. 7s. 6d. net. (Constable.)

By permission of Fredk. Hollyer.

Hope.

By G. F. Watts.

clothing of the body; it strove tragically enough to achieve soul-sufficiency, not by tasting, as the old mystics did, all the stars and all the heavens in a crust of bread, but by experiencing purgatory in every sensation. He and his followers were dandies of the spirit because acute consciousness of sin bade them resist not evil, in contradistinction to the older mystics who became dandies of the spirit because they resisted evil. The desire of Charles Baudelaire, as of all those who are in any way akin to him, was to discover in life that ecstasy which is eternity.

"One must ever be drunken," he said. "Everything is in that; it is the only question. In order not to feel the horrible burden of Time that is breaking your shoulders, bending you earthwards, you must be ceaselessly drunken. But with what? With wine, poetry, or virtue, as you will—only intoxicate yourself; and if sometimes, on the steps of a palace, or the greensward of a grave, or in the mournful solitude of your room you wake to find the intoxication diminished or vanished, ask of the wind or the wave, or the star, or the bird, or the clock, or all that flies, all that groans, all that rolls on, all that sings, all that speaks, ask what time it is; and the wind, wave, star, bird and clock will tell you: 'It is time to be drunken.' Lest you should be the martyred slave of time, be ceaselessly drunken! With wine, poetry or virtue, as you will."

In such a passage we have the keynote of human aspiration, although it is stated with a symbolical use of a term generally considered to have no associations with virtue. But virtue with the decadents and the symbolists did not necessarily mean moral goodness, it meant the strength to survive, the power of Shadrach, Meshach and Abed-nego to walk unscathed through the flames of a fiery furnace. This spirit is only Baudelairean in the sense that Baudelaire gave it modern significance, and in that sense Mr. G. Turquet-Milnes has contributed a very useful study to modern literary history by tracing its manifestations from Baudelaire and such of his predecessors as, for instance, Edgar Allan Poe, Aloysius Bertrand and Théophile Gautier, who may be said to have had their influence upon him. Few will be inclined to question Mr. Turquet-Milnes' right to include as coming under the Baudelairean influence such writers as Barbé D'Aurevilly, Paul Verlaine, Joris Karl Huysmans, Stéphane Mallarmé and Maurice Rollinat, but they will feel inclined to say that he has overstated his case by insisting upon the influence in "Villiers de L'Isle Adam" and "Jules Laforgue," just as they will question his belief that there is any marked influence of Baudelaire in the paintings of Degas and Forain or in the music of Richard Wagner and Richard Strauss. Mr. Turquet-Milnes has fallen into the error of all specialists in influences by claiming too much for his subject. Granted pertinacity and dialectical ingenuity, one could prove that Baudelaire fathered all that was modern in the writings of all who succeeded him in point of time. But such a method of critical interpretation is valueless because with equal diligence and equal skill, you could come to much the same conclusion about any other outstanding literary and philosophic genius. This is already being done in the case of Friedrich Nietzsche, and it has been done in the sphere of music with more or less elaboration in reference to Richard Wagner. The commonsense of the matter would seem to be that the wakefulness of ideas is due to the perpetual action and re-action of one interpreter upon another. Influences are rarely direct among the powerful, and it would thus be easier to trace, say, the decadent line of descent among minor than among major poets. The author of "The Influence of Baudelaire" follows a more perilous path, and, of course, a more useful path, by tracing an idea from a distinguished exponent through a succession of exponents often of equal distinction and always standing out of the ruck of common writers. He is not an inspired interpreter, but he is workmanlike, and not without insight. His work has the virtue of clarity and abundant reference to fact; these qualities will make it useful to literary students. No one will deny that the subject is a suitable one for painstaking examination, because everyone knows that Charles Baudelaire is one of the supreme influences of the nineteenth century, not alone because he was a great poet, but because he represented the introspective spirit of humanity in a new, a modern expression. But he himself, as manifest in his work, represented not so much a beginning as the finale of a particular outlook upon life, an outlook ripe for expression at the time as is proved by the fact that so close an affinity as Edgar Allan Poe arose in distant America at the same time. Such influence as Baudelaire exercised upon his contemporaries and their successors is almost negligible compared with their own personal contributions to the literary understanding of life. Indeed, the important thing about the writers dealt with in this book as coming under the influence of Baudelaire, is the tremendous extent to which they did not come under that influence.

HOLBROOK JACKSON

CALL A SPADE A SPADE.***

This volume follows too fast on Mr. MacGill's previous publications for any material change to be looked for in his method of thought or work, but the new poems in it fully sustain the reputation gained by his "Songs of a Navvy." It is prefaced by some interesting particulars given by "J.N.D." who, in a few concise sentences, states all the facts of the author's career necessary for the public to know; that is to say, the biographical and bibliographical facts, leaving those of the poet's inner life to be sought for in his "Songs." If these verses are to be accepted as genuine chronicles of his story, Mr. MacGill is, indeed, one of those who have had to "learn in suffering what they teach in song." The woes of most young poets are mainly imaginary, but the hardships, mental as well as physical, told of in these lyrics appear to have been due to the stern logic of life, and Mr. MacGill in no way softens his phrasology when telling them. His sermons are enforced by no slight amount of coarse and ugly language, well calculated to shock the hypersensitive; but vigorous speech is needed to give his characters a vraisemblance to life, whether it is desirable or not to rake so much philological garbage out of the gutter. "Call a spade a spade," but why "turn diseases to commodities"? There are things in this volume which cause the burnished lines of Baudelaire and the versified fragrances of Verlaine to appear emasculate and flaccid.

* "Songs of the Dead End." By Patrick MacGill. 3s. 6d. (The Year Book Press.)

Mr. MacGill's powerful pictures of "low life," to use a conventional phrase, will not be deemed suitable subjects for poetry by those who would limit its expression to things of beauty only, but they have a meaning and a mission which can be best expounded in rhyme and rhythm. This is the form in which they can best stir the blood of the sluggish and terrify the tyrannical. The themes and treatment of these poems need not "the light that never was on land or sea," as they have enough inherent fire to kindle the wrath, or invoke the pity of their readers, according to their class, without any extraneous illumination. But not all these lyrics are concerned with the chronic sufferings and sorrows of the poor, or the indictment of their wealthy oppressors, and some of Mr. MacGill's "Songs" go to prove that not all is wrong with the world, and that there is a fair amount of happiness even for the homeless and houseless tramp. Under the most untoward circumstances, "despite the hate insensate which the fates have borne to crush below," the singer can find balm in Gilthead, and in "The Navy's Philosophy," tells of his joy in "The rustle of the wind-swept trees,

The robin's song at early morn,
The lark's above the crimson corn,
What music in the world like this!

"For me the music of the streams,
The tints of gold on heath and furze,
Where wind-blown gorse clumps shake their spurs,
For me the wonder world of dreams."

Nor does he despair of the future, only he declares the millennium is to be attained not by the pen but by that "Wonderful navy shovel! The days are near at hand

When you'll rise o'er sword and sceptre a mighty power in the land."

Happily, "the poetry of the earth is never dead," and however low the divine flame may flicker there is always a bard ready to resuscitate the fire; therefore, Mr. MacGill is willing and able to forsake or forget for the while his crusade against those who "grind the faces of the poor," to carry on the quenchless torch. It would be difficult to surpass the pathos of some of his lyrics of home life. There is unaffected beauty in such pieces as "Fate," where he finds a variation from the old, old refrain of "When we were young, ah, woe! when!" in the splendid line, "but we were happy being young"; and in such poems, as "Going Home," "Home," "The Return," and other kindred songs. The first named, "Going Home to Glenties," has been felicitously set to music by Dr. Charles Wood, and is likely to become a popular piece for singers. The lines "No More," written on the evictions in Gweedore, on the northern coast of Ireland, are replete with natural sadness, and shadow forth one of those miserable tragedies erstwhile so common in Erin, which the dawning of a brighter day should render no longer possible. The last stanza sums up the whole story:

"Sad, sad thy tale, land of my birth,
Bear witness, wild Gweedore,
Thy children banished o'er the earth,
And they return no more."

Mr. MacGill has many sides to his poetic character: he is not only a strong speaker on behalf of the down-trodden and oppressed, a sweet singer of domestic and pathetic incident, a narrator of startling and sensational deeds, but is richly endowed with humour, that rarest of all qualities amongst poets. In his previous volumes were several sarcastic and trenchant touches of this nature, and in the present work are further instances, as in "The Grave Digger," that jocose personage who finds a place for everybody and who levels all distinctions. It must be owned, however, that Mr. MacGill's power is most strongly manifested in those poems wherein he inveighs against tyrannisers of their brother man. A few lines from his grand invective, "Serfs," well represent his strength in this direction:

"In the lands that the leagueless and lonely, where fugitive, funeral-paced,
The day drags askance from the darkness to glower on the destitute waste . . .

Sullen and lowering and livid, furrowless, measureless, vast,
Pregnant with riches unravished, bearing a recordless past,
Conquer the keeps of its splendour, looting the treasure it holds,

Damming its turbulent waters, rifling its forests and wolds, Bridling its torrents with bridges, its mountain cliffs battering down,

Turning its wastes to a garden, moulding its rocks to a town,
Flouting at famine and failure, sober to suffer and serve, Staking their faith against danger in limitless daring and nerve . . .

And where shall you gather to dare it, men who are fearless and fit,

Primed with unquenchable courage, daring with Berserker grit? . . .

Seek for the men of the highway, ragged, untutored and gaunt,

Men who can wrestle with horror, and jeer at the terrors of want.

* * * * *
And there in the primitive fastness, more like brutes than like men,

They're huddled in rat-riddled cabins, stuck in the feculent fen, . . .

Hemmed up like fleas in the fissures, sweated like swine in the silt,

So that your deserts be conquered, so that your mansions be built.

* * * * *
These are our serfs and our bondmen, slighted, forsaken, outcast,
Hewing the path of the future, heirs of the wrongs of the past."

After such a volley of sonorous verse it is difficult to return to a calm consideration of Mr. MacGill's more conventional themes, and it suffices to say, whatever rank his works may eventually obtain for him in the chorus valum, it is certain that he must be included among the singers of the age; therefore, it behoves him to be all the more fastidious over his productions. If, of necessity, his juvenile verse has been occasionally crude, no real critic can now deny the clarity and superb harmony of his poetry.

JOHN H. INGRAM.

THE "PEOPLE'S BOOKS"—ANOTHER HANDFUL.*

The twelve "People's Books" may be held in one hand. Thin, tidy, pocketable and well printed, they are ideal companions for the railway carriage; but they are not all equally suited to while away a passing hour. We take three out of this parcel on which to speak particularly: "Wordsworth," by Miss Masson, "Nietzsche," by Mr. M. A. Mûgge, and "The Bible and Criticism," by Drs. Bennett and Adeney.

Miss Masson's "Wordsworth" is a life, a criticism, and a eulogy in one. The book is as breezy as Lakeland and full of those humorous touches which we fail to find in Wordsworth. The poet's biography is traced minutely from unpleasant childhood to self-satisfied youth, and from youth to didactic manhood, until the curtain rings down on the life which even now by means of its descendants controls English poetry. There are, of course, to-day, dissentient voices; and it would be instructive to have a free unconstrained criticism on Wordsworth from, say, Mr. Rudyard Kipling. Tennyson was rightly silent on Browning; his friend; but Mr. Swinburne amused the world with Whitmania. Miss Masson will have it that Jeffrey was a persecutor or a fool, or both, and plaintively asks why it was that Wordsworth's reward was so disgracefully delayed. But there is not much evidence that harsh reviewing does great harm; and, as our author admits, it caused the Idiot Boy to become ludicrously popular. If the new poet has always to create his audience, Wordsworthians cannot greatly complain; their late gleanings have become a fine harvest. The probable explanation of the obstinacy of the review is that Wordsworth always preached, as Coleridge did in prose, and that the purple patches did not prevent the eye being caught by (we quote

* "The People's Books." 12 New Vols. 6d. each. (T. and E. Jack.)

Miss Masson) "what might be called flat prosaic moralising, severe, sententious, heavy and dull." There would have been less Jeffrey had Wordsworth been as good a critic of his own work as he was of poetry in general; but these are unhappy, far-off things. Miss Masson tells us Wordsworth was lovable; this surely would be hard to prove. As a writer he scarcely evokes the feeling with which the names of Chaucer, Shelley, Charles Lamb, and even poor Southey are greeted, and, except perhaps in the one congratulatory remark on Tennyson's "Dora," he was impatient of contemporaries. Who can forget his attributing the failure of "Lyrical Ballads" to the insertion of the "Ancient Mariner," or the letter in which Charles Lamb chastised him in a manner as dignified as it was indignant?

Wordsworth's contribution to thought, apart from his splendid contributions to poetry, was twofold; the importance of the common man and the worship of the common flower. But he does not impress us with his love of individual specimens of humanity; his leechgatherers are looked at curiously as in a museum; and his nature worship, notwithstanding his expression of belief that the flower enjoys its life, never rises to the only consistent position which such an expression demands, that is, the sincere belief in the living consciousness of earth, the mother of us all. This belief Fechner, the physicist, held; this belief was surely Shelley's. However fantastic it may appear, it is a working hypothesis which gets rid of unnumbered difficulties, and the fantasy of to-day may be the demonstration of to-morrow.

Miss Masson is unerring in her enumeration of the finest poems. She is militant for Dorothy; and she is feminine in prefixing "little" to all references to infants (we have counted six). The "Ode on the Indications of Immortality" is as bad a printer's error as the well-known "O for the touch of a varnished hand."

In Mr. Mügge's admirable introduction to "Nietzsche," we have work by one who has on many occasions dealt with the biography and the eugenic philosophy of the unhappy poet; for surely poet better describes the author of "Zarathustra" and "Beyond Good and Evil" than does any other word. The writer follows Nietzsche through his various changes—so prophetic of the final catastrophe. On one page he is a rollicking beer-drinker, on another a morbid pedant; and, as the scenes of his life unfold, he is enthusiastic soldier, military nurse, professor of philosophy, Wagnerite, anti-Wagnerite, Dionysian, Apollonian, professional pessimist and anti-Christian. Throughout all he was the aphorist. Can it be expected that such an one should be always consistent with himself?

There is, however, no doubt as to the wisdom of writing a brief and clear account of Nietzsche in the "People's Books." Fas est et ab hoste doceri; and if ever we want to improve, the first step, as Bishop Butler says, is to know what our enemies think of us. Nietzsche is not only, as a gifted writer calls him, a herald of revolt, he is definite, super-aggressive and apparently simple. The people can understand the main lines of his teaching, and can appreciate the issues. We are all too weak; we want the will to Power; of all the things we profess to believe in Christianity is the worst, a slave-religion, mealy-mouthed, unmanly; it is ridiculous to beget the unfit; it is ridiculous to lose the fit in unmeaning wars; it is ridiculous to have no telos, no architectonic millennium for which to strive; man is yet in the making. But unless he believes in and practises far greater repression than he has been willing to practise in the past, there will be no hope of the coming of superman. Thus, he preaches war and no-war; law and destruction of law; religion and irreligion. The interest lies in this, that all the preaching is done with intense earnestness and in poetic form; the despair lies in this, that when the world has done all, it can but look forward to an Eternal Recurrence of the Eternal Past.

Everyone knows—Nietzsche must have known it in all sane moments—that there is nothing new in the revolt. Christianity itself, by implication, is eugenic; and is directly opposed to modern war-developments and to a great deal of modern custom; the doctrine of eternal recurrence eternally recurs; even the word superman is two hundred years old; and Apollo and Dionysus have been enemies from the beginning of the world. Indeed, one of the most interesting particulars in this interesting philosophy is that it harks back to the early pre-Socratic times.

The little book is throughout clear and fair; occasionally it descends into slang, which now-a-days even a People's book should avoid.

A clear statement on "The Bible and Criticism" has long been wanted. Professors Cheyne and Hastings' Cyclopædias are well known, but they are beyond most people's purses, and in the compass of a hundred pages Dr. Adeney and Dr. Bennett have given us the results of moderate criticism. By this the Bible has nothing to lose; indeed, the young who, temporarily we hope, have grown distrustful, may return to the Bible with eagerness when they find how little its real content has been lessened by the attacks made on it from the time of Geddes to to-day. The present volume deals with general principles, and after giving the results in the case of individual books, speaks very briefly on the Canon of the Old Testament. The second part is occupied with chapters on the Epistles, the Synoptists and the Johannine writings; and a most suggestive paragraph refers us to Gunkel's "Creation and Chaos," and to the influence of Babylonian tradition on the

By permission of Fredk. Hollyer.

Prometheus.
By G. F. Watts.

Apocalypse. The main conclusions we need not set out; but surely it is a pity not to give more space in a popular book to the Babylonian narratives that deal with the Creation of the world and the Flood. Nothing can be more illuminating than a comparison of this sort. Again, very little is said of a working theory of the development of the canon; and we are not reminded of Luther's strange objection to the beautiful letter of St. James. The writer tells us that Protestantism rejects the Old Testament apocrypha; but when and by whose authority, spiritual or lay, were the apocryphal books taken out of our Bibles? They are in the Geneva Bibles, in the A.V. of 1611, and in complete Bibles published by the University Press.

It is to be hoped that this little volume will be the forerunner of a complete annotated Bible in which the results of criticism are not avoided.

The other volumes include a statement of Psychology in both its aspects by Dr. Watt; interesting and careful accounts of Pond Life by Mr. C. E. Ash, and Zoology by Professor MacBride; a survey of the Eastern Question and Turkey by Mr. C. Macdonald; an historical essay on Wellington and Waterloo by Major Redway; a life of the epoch-making Rhodes by Mr. Ian D. Colvin; a simple everyday law by Mr. C. J. Adams, and a stiff book on the nature of mathematics by P. L. Jourdain. An atlas in colours, though vouched for by Mr. Bartholomew, is perhaps an error; the publication of general atlases in covers measuring five inches by four should be avoided. But in this handful, as in the famous vision-tree, there is meat for all.

ARTHUR BURKELL.

MANY INVENTIONS.

"The Porcelain Lady,"<sup>1</sup> by Frederick Niven, is a well-written and curiously attractive story of journalistic life, as it revolves about a London newspaper office. It is possible that there may be such a place as the Weekly, Daily, and Hourly offices, but it may be well to warn Mr. Niven's readers that they are not to be found every day; if they were, all the world would be journalists, if they could. But if the life is somewhat idealised, Mr. Niven has given us a very pleasant picture of the camaraderie, the sympathy and the unfailing helpfulness, which exist between the men and women of the ready pen, and the romance of John Brough and Ruth Winter ends as it ought, though "The Porcelain Lady" has very little to do with it. Mr. Niven generally sustains a high level of writing; it is all the more pity that he sometimes lapses into expressions inconsistent with the dignity of his work.

As might have been expected from so good a scholar and so distinguished a journalist as Mr. Harold Spender, "The Call of the Siren"<sup>2</sup> has many excellent qualities, and his pictures of Bath and the hills about it, Combe Down and Lansdowne, the lanes through Kelston and Swainswick, through which the children, Oliver and Elsie Martin, wandered so happily, have the authentic atmosphere. There are many characters and many incidents not closely related, so that the effect is sometimes confusing, and the author at times leaves the reader unsatisfied. How, for instance, did Johnnie Burrows know that Oliver's father was a thief, whence came the rumour, and having come, how did it die out so suddenly? Even Oliver's remarkable success in a cricket-match would hardly have the effect of making schoolboys forget so sinister a rumour; on the contrary, his greater prominence would lend additional zest to their speculation. But leaving apart such minor blemishes there is much that is excellent in the book, though some pruning would have improved it, and the chapter in which Alice Hardley plays the part of Potiphar's wife to her husband's old friend is full of dramatic power.

<sup>1</sup>6s. (Martin Secker.)—<sup>2</sup>6s. (Mills & Boon.) <sup>3</sup>6s. (Martin Secker.) <sup>4</sup>6s. (Chapman & Hall.)—<sup>5</sup>6s. (Constable.)—<sup>6</sup>6s. (Chapman & Hall.)—<sup>7</sup>6s. (Melrose.)

The characters generally are well drawn, with the exception of the Irishman, O'Brien, who speaks no known language and acts like an imbecile. By the way, what possessed Mr. Spender to call an Orange baronet by the name of O'Brien? An Orangeman would no more be called O'Brien than he would kiss the Pope's toe.

The wild justice of revenge is exemplified in "The Burnt House," by Christopher Stone.<sup>3</sup> The widowed Mrs. Tremayne, still young and beautiful, is obsessed with the desire to accumulate such evidence as will convict Blagg, a drunken tradesman, of the malicious burning of her home. To this end she employs a friend of Blagg's to spy upon him and ascertain his whereabouts on the night of the fire. When simple-minded people employ amateur detectives the result is all but inevitable. Hillier, the detective, draws large sums of money from his employer and produces no evidence, until at last Mrs. Tremayne has her eyes opened and angrily dismisses him. One part of the problem is solved by the opportune death of Blagg of a paralytic stroke, the other by the return of Mrs. Tremayne's old lover, John Dethluck. Quite a readable book, and the writing above the average.

"The Sword," by C. A. Benton,<sup>4</sup> is evidently a first novel, but it shows considerable promise. The female characters are ably drawn, but that of the hero is not very well realised. Desirée St. Just, young, vivacious, and handsome, under the shadow of a husband serving a term of penal servitude for fraud, is a pathetic figure, and her renunciation of the man she loves at the last moment touches a poignant note. Miss Benton must use her adverbs more sparingly in dialogue. The reader should be allowed to infer the meaning of such expressions as "whimsically," and "quizzically," etc., if they have any meaning, from the context.

Mr. Bernard Capes has the art, rare amongst English writers, no doubt through lack of encouragement, of telling a short story as it ought to be told. In "Bag and Baggage"<sup>5</sup> he does this often enough to justify the reproduction of these stories which have for the most part appeared originally in magazines. But he does not always. "Beneath Dark Wings" began excellently well, and if it had been half the length it would have been an effective piece of work. But the introduction of the dissertation on the spectrum analysis marred the effect by reducing to scientific terms the elements of mystery. The best of a good lot is undoubtedly "The Soft Seraphic Screen," a very terrible story, but told with consummate skill, of the inherited taint of alcoholism, which ends inevitably in a final catastrophe. The stories in lighter vein are good, but none so good as this.

It is a tribute to Mr. Desmond Coke's skill that, although none of his characters are likable and win our sympathy, "Helena Brett's Career"<sup>6</sup> holds one's interest. Hubert Brett, a fourth-rate novelist of proportionate vanity, was in his bachelor days "gey ill to live with," as his sister found to her cost. When he married Helena Hallam he meant her to be a great man's plaything in his leisure moments. Helena soon found that she had a formidable rival in her husband's work, and being left much to herself, she sought other diversions, and as the family pot was with difficulty coaxed to boil, Helena blossomed out into the anonymous author of a work entitled "Confessions of an Author's Wife." If the secret had been kept all might have been well; but it wasn't, for the publisher was a bad man and could not resist the temptation to make more money by breaking the contract of inviolable secrecy, and the fat was then in the fire. Helena apologises to her husband for having written such a bad novel that it had an instant success. But he, remembering his own dwindling circulation, is not to be appeased. But a deus ex machina arrives to solve the difficulty, and with what success we must leave Mr. Coke's readers to judge for themselves.

"The Ways of Eve," by Roy Meldrum,<sup>7</sup> is a bright and pleasant story, written round the claim to an estate, and the temporary impoverishment of the person in possession. There are, however, no grim tragedies and only enough trouble to remind one that the world, albeit a pleasant place enough, is not yet quite a Garden of Eden. The book ends with a wedding breakfast and the felicitous compliments generally associated with such an event, and what more can one desire?

H. A. H.

PHILIPPE-ÉGALITÉ'S EGERIA.*

"The front row of women of letters of the second class" is the place to which M. Émile Faguet assigns Madame de Genlis in the preface he has written for M. Harmand's careful biography; and Sainte-Beuve, who seems to have read but three of her hundred and thirty volumes, pronounced her style to be always good, but never better. Indisputable as are both these criticisms, they say but half the truth about Madame de Genlis. In the days of our grandfathers she disputed with Miss Edgeworth the title of leading literary upbringer of youth. She flirted and flattered in the drawing-rooms of Versailles when Louis XV was king. She ruled the household of Philippe Égalité, and drew up the pattern of the bonnet rouge which that discredited prince assumed on spectacular occasions. She saw the red fool fury of the Terror, and congratulated the soldiers of the First Empire on their achievements. Napoleon pensioned her in order that she might be free to write "whatever passed through her head." Chateaubriand complimented her; Tommy Moore warbled to her harp; Lady Morgan visited her with "the high-beating throb of expectation" and parted from her "with admiration and regret." She saw her old pupil, Louis Philippe, seated on the throne of France, and, as we have said, she wrote more than a hundred and thirty volumes.

This is a career well worth recording, and M. Harmand has spared no pains in collecting every scrap of information that is to be found about Madame de Genlis. It was no easy task. This heroine had a genius for telling half-truths, for presenting her own acts in the most favourable light, and the man who judged only from her own bulky "Mémoires" would find himself sadly mistaken. More than half an adventuress, she made a parade of respectability, and something of a Republican, if not a Revolutionary, she was one of the first to acclaim the return of the Comte d'Artois on April 12th, 1814. She claimed that she had "always held" Royalist ideas, and at once set to work to produce her "Histoire de Henri IV," in order to please Louis XVIII, "for it is full of allusions that are flattering to the Bourbons and very damaging to Bonaparte." Fate played her a sorry trick. The work was issued by the publisher on the very day that Napoleon, returning from Elba, made his triumphant entry into Paris.

Perhaps the greatest day in the life of Madame de Genlis was January 6th, 1782. Hardy records in his Journal of two days later that the Duke of Orléans—then the Duke of Chartres—had "just dismissed the governors and deputy-governors appointed ten years before for his two sons, the Duke of Valois and the Duke of Montpensier, in order to hand over for the future the entire care of their education to the gentle Comtesse de Genlis, already the instructress of his daughters, the two Princesses." To say that Paris

* "A Keeper of Royal Secrets: Being the Private and Political Life of Madame de Genlis." By Jean Harmand. 15s. net. (Eveleigh Nash.)

By permission of Fredk. Hollyet.

Physical Energy.

By G. F. Watts.

was surprised by this unprecedented step would be to give a faint notion of the amount of discussion it called forth. There was a shower of epigrams, lampoons, and satires. "Here," says a contemporary, "they talk for two or three days about a battle won or lost, and then the success or failure of a comic opera soon makes people forget all about it. It is not so with the adventure of Madame de Genlis. It has now, for more than a month, been the chief subject of conversation, and every day there is a renewed outburst of couplets, sarcasms, and puns."

What were the reasons for this appointment? The most disreputable, though the deciding one, was that she was the Duke's mistress. But she had other and by no means contemptible grounds for feeling that she was suited to the position. It is true that her own upbringing had been deplorable. Her father was a reckless spendthrift, her mother an empty-headed butterfly. In spite of their neglect, the child showed an early thirst for knowledge, and set herself to acquire it by every means in her power. Her mother had her taught the harp as a showy accomplishment, and she was naturally endowed with vivacity, an engaging manner, and a fair share of good looks. These advantages and a not too-scrupulous behaviour enabled her to push her way into society, to capture a husband, intrigue herself into the Orléans household, into the favour of the Duchess, into the Duke's affections. And yet she does not seem to have been really vicious. She was a woman and an arriviste. Her ambition was for intellectual distinction, and nothing was allowed to bar her path. "A prolix and insipid blue-stocking," says one of her critics impatiently. She was more than that. She had read more widely than any woman of her time, and if she was superficial, it was a vice of the age, and no human being could have more than a superficial acquaintance with the multitude of subjects which she handled. History, science, philosophy, cookery, theology, hygiene, politics, biography, fiction, pedagogy—she produced books on all these topics, and the list of her works resembles the catalogue of a library rather than the bibliography of a single author. And her method of educating the Orléans children was more enlightened and more in accordance with modern ideas than any of her contemporaries would have been likely to employ. It was Spartan in its severity, yet she won and kept the affection of her pupils. "King Louis Philippe said to me the other day," Victor Hugo relates, "I was never in love with anyone but once in my life." "And who was it, sire?" "It was Madame de Genlis.' " This love might have been something more than a platonic affection on the Prince's part, did not the governess detect and cure its early symptoms.

Madame de Genlis' two great and enduring passions were not for persons. They were for pedagogy and authorship. A couple of incidents will illustrate how strong and deep-rooted they were. When still a child in Saint-Aubin she was in the habit of escaping to a terrace of the house that overlooked a pond.

" Here it is that the urchins of the village, the sons of watermen and ploughmen, come to cut rushes and loiter about. Félicité calls to them, enticing them with promises of cakes, and from the height of her stone balcony, like a magistrate on the bench, suspended between heaven and earth, she recites to them some of Mlle. Barbier's verses or a passage from the Jesuits' history. The boys stand there submissively, and go through their spelling lessons to their small mistress, who withholds the manna of cakes until the lesson is over "

And so great was her passion for writing, that at the age of nineteen, when she hoped she might soon become a mother, but before her child was born, she wrote and published " Les Réflexions d'une Mère de Vingt Ans " !

Taking her all in all, she is not a sympathetic figure. She was lavish in bestowing the tribute which vice pays to virtue. We see her moving about the Orléans' household, making herself servicable and agreeable to all, with her prim yet sentimental manner, absorbed in the education of the young people, confidential yet respectful towards the Duchess, now and again throwing arch or languishing glances at the Duke—a woman of brilliant but superficial gifts, vain, theatrical, affected, good-natured, egotistic, sincere as far as she understood sincerity, and uninteresting because she belongs to all that was most ephemeral in her age.

A. W. EVANS.

A DWELLER IN GLASS.*

Those least tolerant of criticism on Miss Austen's literary qualities need not fear that any severe remarks in this book could harm her reputation, even had its general tone been less appreciative. It is difficult to pay serious attention to a critic who shows so much disregard for accuracy. " One is all but grieved," he tells us, " to notice many strange lapses and slips through the course of her stories, and much odd and imperfect English. . . . I profess I know not how to account for it." " One " is not merely " all but," but positively amazed to find in a book by a writer who " knows not how to account " for lapses and slips in other books, so many in his own. " And that mystery, Style—what a thing it is ! " writes Mr. FitzGerald. This remark is followed by the question : " How is it that a gentleman or lady dresses so that one can hardly tell what they wear, while another gets into his finery so awkwardly as to convey the idea that the garb is not part of his entity ? Style, which is the dress of our thoughts, amounts to no more. Jane Austen . . . left the thing to do its own work and made no effort. A great painter, or a sculptor like Rodin, never thinks of his method of expression. Inferior men think of nothing else. They must have models, clothes, etc., and these they copy. All the little touches of character that she observed she would set down without any thought of producing an effect by fine or elaborate writing " This passage may be taken as fairly representing Mr. FitzGerald's criticism. It is true that a good many great painters or sculptors (Monsieur Rodin himself among them) have found that, like the " inferior men," they " must have models " ; also, that admirable effects may be produced by the conscious avoidance of " fine or elaborate writing." Surely the author is mistaken if he supposes that Miss Austen gave no thought to style. Her own letters prove that she did think of it.

Mr. FitzGerald is critical about " Pride and Prejudice." He regards the Longbourn family as being of such " an inferior sort " that he describes them as being " ill brought up, ' ill kept, ill fed, ill dressed, and as bad as bad could be,' like Dr. Johnson's leg of mutton." When he remarks, a page or two later, " It is hard to understand why after Darcy's proposal, Elizabeth did not rush to her mother and father, and call all the family together to announce the happy news of her triumph," he seems to confuse Elizabeth with Lydia, as he evidently confuses her with Jane when he writes : " When the rich Mr. Bingley went off to London it was settled, without any grounds whatever, that he was to be Elizabeth's husband, though he had spoken no word."

* " Jane Austen : A Criticism and Appreciation." By Percy FitzGerald, M.A., F.S.A. 3s. 6d. net. (Jarrold & Sons.)

Mr. FitzGerald calls on us to " admire the judicious tact " shown by Miss Austen " in the choice of names." For examples he writes : " Sir John Bertram is rather melodramatic. Fanny Price, as the name of a quiet, shy-

By permission of Fredk. Hollyer.

Clytie.

By G. F. Watts.

eyed, dependent girl, could not be bettered. Catherine Morland is somewhat romantic, Mr. Woodhouse excellent," and so on, and so on. It were better if he had shown a little more " tact " in preserving the names Miss Austen chose, as a reader familiar with her novels may discover from the quotation just given. His fancy is to give two or even more varieties of a name. Thus we can here choose whether the lover of Elinor (in " Sense and Sensibility ") should be called Edmund Ferrers or Edward Ferrars ; whether Elizabeth's surname (in " Pride and Prejudice ") should be spelt with one or two t's, and if Darcy's aunt should be described as (1) Lady Catherine de Burgh ; (2) Lady Catherine de Bourg ; (3) Lady Charlotte, or (4) Lady de Bourg. Fanny's maternal aunt (in " Mansfield Park ") is called Lady Price. Coming from names of fiction to names of fact, Jane Austen's nephew, who wrote a sketch of her life, is impartially called Mr. Austen Leigh or Mr. Austen Lee. Even on a bust supposed to represent the novelist herself, a photograph of which is given as a frontispiece, her name is incised as " Jane Austen." Remembering Juliet's opinion on the insignificance of names, one might almost suppose, but for a difficulty of dates, that she had acted as Mr. FitzGerald's secretary after her first interview with Romeo.

W. H. HELM,

MR. BENSON AS WAYFARER.*

It is always a pleasure to take up a volume by Mr. Arthur C. Benson. We remember his coming as though it were but yesterday, and the new note that he struck in the history of English essay-writing. The note was new for the time; to state the fact more truthfully, one should say, perhaps, that Mr. Benson heralded a return to earlier days when the literary note was humanist first and literary in a subordinate if no less actual sense. Here was a gentleman and a scholar, living in the comparative seclusion of a college close, but looking out from his study window upon the young life springing up around him with a certain wistfulness at the old fields and at modern methods, but with clear vision discerning the connecting links between times past, present, and to be. His pages—lacking a little in humour as humour is commonly accepted, but instinct with a deep feeling for humanity—betrayed an emotion refined by culture, but touched by that vital spirit without which no art can live beyond the artist's own little day. Mr. Benson's appeal, testified to by the demand for his books, is accounted for to some extent by his ability to express, from an individual standpoint, peculiar in a subtle way to Cambridge, thoughts which are felt more intimately than they can be expressed by large numbers of his fellows. His acute sensitiveness has its drawbacks. He tells us of the pain caused to his father when the privileges accorded to picnic-parties at Addington were abused. In his own turn he has suffered from the "critical talents and transcendent judgment" of the Puffs of our time, who have pinched, so to speak, and made holiday in his preserves. But it is in the sensitiveness they express that the charm of his books is felt the more nearly.

There is a threefold interest about his latest volume personal, journalistic, and literary. The personal interest is to be found not only in those intimate relations which he contrives to create between himself and his readers, but in the fact that the book will have to be taken into account with its predecessors as a continuation of the autobiography of a singularly perceptive mind. The journalistic interest is derived from the circumstance that these sixty-two little essays are taken from a weekly newspaper, and are a sort of testimony to the health of a much criticised craft. The literary interest belongs rather to the philosophy of letters than to the discussion of books and bookmen as such. It is not so much evidence that life is greater than literature, but that the true concern of literature is the reflection of life; that, if you will, if life is the more important thing, it can hardly exist in a true sense without literature, which preserves for it its models, its impressions, the record of its progress along the road. And when we speak of literature, be it understood that we mean the literature of ideas. As Mr. Benson says, "What we Englishmen often suffer from is a want of interest in ideas." So he asks us to walk along with him whilst he points out to us, primarily, the bearing of certain little problems of life and character, and, secondarily, the common and ordinary things by the wayside—the wonderful treasure of ancient and beautiful associations which have accumulated in our land, but which, ordinarily, we are so apt to miss. It seems to us that there is a more definite aim, if no less literary charm, in this book than in any one Mr. Benson had previously written. He recalls old England's story, how richly dight she is in natural beauty; he takes us around a few storied and specially favoured spots, notably Addington; he talks about some of our great men, as Gladstone and Browning, and Newman and Keats; he discusses preachers and preaching, art and life, peace and war, work and play, publicity and privacy; more often he asks us to look within at the manifold phases of human nature; and he winds up in the study with a delightful little chat about reading, reminding us, in words which should be printed and put up in every library, that "Books, pictures, music, scenery, and people are all difficult things to talk about, because they are not wholly definite and tangible things, but depend so enormously for their value upon something in the mind and heart of the persons who read, see, hear, and observe them." The whole point about a book, he says, is whether it has a real life of its own. "Along the Road" will be found fully to survive the test indicated.

OF DANCERS AND DANCING.*

Surely there have never been so many inducements as now to sing of "the dancing stars"—"the dardal earth" having withdrawn from competition through agricultural depression; and surely there is no one more fit to raise that song than our dear Ellen Terry, at whose birth, like that of the Beatrice she portrays so winsomely, a star danced! A few years ago there was nothing in the way of terrestrial dancing to inspire her. Ballet was either a pale, feeble survival in the more attenuated operas, or else a rather crude display at the music-halls, depending for its popularity (according to that classic brevity of John Hollingshead's) upon "legs." Now and then a striking name like Cavalazzi or a little genius like Adeline Genée, flashed across the darkness; but these fitful apparitions did not so much shed light as make the darkness visible. So emphatically did ballet mean boredom to English opera-goers that even the pretence of giving it began to be evaded. Only in one season, I think, did Haris use the ballet in "Faust." In the "Huguenots," it was resignedly accepted as part of the general antiquated preposterousness of the whole show; but in "Carmen" it was resented as a stupid interruption of the drama. Even so exceptionally attractive an operatic ballet as the Dance of the Hours in "La Gioconda" passed almost without a hand. Yet now we see the big opera-house crowded in every part, as thickly as it used to be for Jean de Reszke, by people eager to enjoy a performance in which not a note of vocal music is to be heard. Truly, a tremendous change, the causes of which are too many to be set down here. Perhaps we may hint at one of them.

Ballet, as we used to know it, belonged to the era of opera when what was too stupid to say was sung. The intercalation of totally irrelevant diversions could not make more ridiculous what had already reached the height of the ridiculous, and as the dancing seems to have been good, it was enjoyed as much as the singing. Certainly, tradition preserves the names of the famous pas de quatre—Taglioni, Ellsler, Grhn and Ceito—as reverently as those of Pasta and Mahbrian, Grisi and Mario. But the generations that Wagner had educated into demanding a rational opera resented the ballet as an irrational excrescence; and in post-Wagnerian opera, generally, ballet could have no place. A première danseuse would scarcely be in tune (for instance) with an opera like "Fédora," where the hero is to be seen wearing a tweed Norfolk suit and heather-mixture stockings. Operatic ballet died, and went to its own place in the Christmas pantomimes. Only when ballet was separated from opera and from music-hall associations, and raised to the plane of the best artistic appreciation of its time, could it create any serious claim upon the attention. A happy combination of circumstances made that possible in Russia. At the right moment there existed the essential enthusiasm, the necessary Imperial and wealthy patronage, skilled inventors to arrange the themes, composers of genius to provide the music, brilliant artists to undertake the decoration, and a school of highly-trained mimes and dancers to produce and interpret the works. And so it comes about that ballet as presented by the Russians is able (quite literally) to stand upon its own feet, and to get as near to the ideal of music-drama as the best-intentioned opera can ever hope to do.

But this is a great deal of very dull talk about a very delightful volume, easily the best souvenir of a rare and exquisite entertainment. I gather that Miss Pamela Colman Smith's drawings are the real starting-point; and capital drawings they are, so good that one would like them to be better. The line blunders a little, here and there: it is sometimes too thick and washy, and sometimes too meagre and faltering; but no one can deny the spirit of the artist's work. Her pictures catch the very Nijinskyism of Nijinsky, as photographs never could; her Karsavina is as sweet as Karsavina herself; the startling black-cloaked figures from "Thamar" have all the sinister quality of that tragic adventure; and the barbaric drawings from "Schcherazade" reproduce with strange fidelity the grim humour and horror of the most ghastly and gorgeous production ever set before the guileless British public.

* "Along the Road." By Arthur Christopher Benson. 7s. 6d. net. (James Nisbet.)

* "The Russian Ballet" By Ellen Terry. With Drawings by Pamela Colman Smith 3s. 6d. net. (Sidgwick & Jackson.) "Fifteen Years of a Dancer's Life." By Loe Fuller. With an Introduction by Anatole France. 10s. 6d. net. (Herbert Jenkins.)

Miss Ellen Terry's text is more than a commentary; it is an interpretation, of high literary skill, and full of wise and witty sayings. With one of her judgments—that in the decorations of Bakst you cannot see the colour for the colours—I find myself in violent disagreement; and I wish she had insisted upon the immense superiority of the ballets written by genuine musicians, like Chopin, Weber, Schumann, Rimsky-Korsakov and Stravinsky, over those with what may be called mere conductor's music—"Narcisse," for example. Her critical praise of Nijinsky is delightful to read. Certainly no more remarkable man has appeared on the stage these many years. To see him as the pawing, sinuous, thick-lipped negro in "Schcherazade," as the horrid, noseless death's-head Petrouchka, with his joyless grin and his broken, wooden movements; and as the vision of the Rose, with his heart-stirring leaps and his floating, petal-like descents, is to gain new reverence for the capabilities of the human body as well as for the art of a richly-gifted personality. I suggest that someone should arrange Strauss's "Don Juan" as a ballet for Nijinsky.

There is nothing in common between the dancing of Karsavina or Pavlova and that of Miss Loie Fuller, whose volume I must dismiss with impolite brevity. Here the body counts for little. Great masses of white drapery placed in high relief against a black-draped stage, played upon from above, beneath and around by streams of coloured light, and whirled by rods held in the hand into the convolutions of a lily, the upward rush of a flame, or the flutterings of a butterfly—that is the dancing of Miss Loie Fuller. In the case of Pavlova or Nijinsky the personality of the artist is part of the charm; in the case of the serpentine dancers the spell is broken when the gigantic draperies collapse around a mere human figure. Miss Loie Fuller's volume is a very readable collection of professional stories—about early struggles, many adventures, lucrative engagements, distinguished critics, affable monarchs, and so on. There are many photographs and a preface by Anatole France.

GEORGE SAMPSON

THE WHITE, WHITE NORTH.*

Captain Mikkelsen is surely one of the most heroic, persevering, yet unfortunate explorers that ever went into the eternal ice of the North. Were it not for his indomitable and ever-kept determination to come up smiling after every reverse (although now and then in the depth of it he may have sworn pretty freely, and called Tyche everything but a lady), he must ere this have made a vow never to risk the Arctic again. After being members of the unsuccessful Baldwin-Ziegler Expedition, he and Mr. E. de K. Leffingwell organised an effort to go out to the north coast of Alaska, mainly to take soundings from there towards the Pole, for the purpose of forming conclusions, by the fall and rise of the sea floor, as to whether or not there is a small continent under the everlasting ice. A little of that object was attained; but otherwise the expedition failed—failed in all except an outstanding record of perseverance and heroism in the face of dangers and difficulties to which it appeared that there would never be an end. After passing, in the entrance to the Alaskan Sea, the 47-ton Gjøa, under the command of Amundsen, at the end of her wonderfully fortunate voyage through the North-West Passage—the first on record, and that after great navigators had failed—Captain Mikkelsen's little Duchess of Bedford sailed in, to come out no more.

And now his ill-starred (some persons will say, obviously, "ill-named") Alabama has gone to the same fate—not unsuccessfully, though, nor on the Alaskan coast, but in a Greenland bay, that tragically miscalled land which was, so far as the Sagas tell us, the Ultima Thule of the Norse Vikings. No, not unsuccessfully; the purpose of the venture was gained—at what a cost of physical, nervous and moral power! In 1906, L. Mylius Erichsen commanded the Danmarks Expedition, to explore, map and chart the unknown coast of north-east Greenland. The object was mostly attained; but, on what appeared to be his last journey, Erichsen, accompanied by Lieutenant Hoeg Hagen and a faithful, heroic Eskimo, perished in the terrible rigours of the country—another ice-bound tragedy of the return, such as has now come to us from the Antarctic. Two separate efforts were made subsequently to find the bodies and papers of the missing men, the second one being successful in the matter of Brönlund, the Eskimo; the great value of the first search party being the food depots which they laid down. It was by these that the lives of Captain Mikkelsen and his party were saved, when they made the third endeavour to gain definite knowledge of the fate of their forerunners. We have written that this finally successful explorer is an unfortunate man. The expedition began with bad luck. No workable dogs were forthcoming, according to arrangements, when he and his crew arrived at the Færoe Islands; by this mishap some extremely valuable time was lost—a loss that came fearfully near to writing another "Tragedy" on the discoverers' first northward trip, after housing the Alabama on the Greenland coast. It was at the end of this journey of three months odd during the home-run of which a live dog was actually attacked and devoured by its companions—that the body of Brönlund was found and reverently buried. The record covers 52 pages of a large book, written in the present tense and in English that is far too colloquial to be literary; yet, blasé though we are to the narratives of explorers, we read it not merely in a sitting, but, as near as such a thing could be, in a breath. No romancist of the rush-and-rapier order, nor any tumble-tremble-and-run incidentalist of the murder-mystery type, could write with such a breathlessness, to say nothing of the overpowering reality, as Captain Mikkelsen has employed in describing the dangers, hardships, touch-and-go incidents of that first northerly trip. Yet there is no dwelling on any point, no word too many in the description of any threatening disaster. When they arrived back at the Alabama, day had shortened down to about three hours of more or less dull, grey light, during which the whirling snow was often too blinding to allow of progress.

The remainder of that winter, 1909-10, went in recuperating men and dogs ready for the far greater trip then to come, and in healing Jorgensen's frost-bitten hands and feet. On March 4th a fresh party set out on the big effort to reach Danmarks Fjord, seven degrees further up on the north-east shoulder of Greenland, and there find the bodies of Erichsen and Hagen, or locate the place where they died. It was a long, long journey, paid for by the attainment of its object; but the outward going, stiff and marked by danger as it was at times, was in the nature of a holiday trip compared with the return. This part of the narrative is one of those rare records whereof we should have a stock, if so many heroes of exploration had not died in their return tracks and their papers had not been lost with them. Hopeless beyond the touch of anything human is the heart that can read this and still be unmoved. All so simply told as the record is, even hardened men of action must find their pulses quicken as they read it page by page. Death seemed to be playing with the party, as a cat plays with a mouse—happily as a cat plays too lightly with a mouse, when its hole is handy enough for escape at last. With the leader ill, the last dog gone (after each man had declared that he would take his faithful beasts to Denmark and keep them in ease and affluence till they died, if they did but come safely out of the venture), all their gear compulsorily discarded, and the next food depot far away, again and again it was an apparently ever-losing race with death; finally a wondrously inspiring story of success, punctuated continually by misfortune. Of such stuff only are heroes made; and this book should become a classic narrative of Arctic exploration.

* "Lost in the Arctic: Being the Story of the Alabama Expedition, 1909-1912." By Ejnar Mikkelsen. With numerous illustrations and a Map. 18s. net. (Heinemann.)

J. PATTERSON.

EPISODES IN ENGLISH CATHOLIC HISTORY.*

For some years past the story of that remnant which was left in England after 1559, faithful to Rome and suffering under a succession of penal enactments, has been pieced together from widely-scattered sources. It is a chapter of moving and melancholy accidents, unknown to the reading public, not until of late decipherable even by professed historians, and boldly misrepresented in the pages of men like Froude, Kingsley, Macaulay—to name no others. Romance distorted its features; religious prejudice turned away from the saints and heroes who, had they not belonged to the old Church, would certainly have won admiring recognition. The Penal Laws have passed away, but the chronicle of mischiefs wrought by them and of the splendid passive resistance they provoked is waiting still for a place in popular volumes. The average Englishman knows as little of his Roman Catholic kinsfolk since the Reformation as of mediæval or modern Jews.

Catholics are now doing their utmost to break down the wall of separation and come out of their Ghetto. Vast piles of documents from colleges abroad, from Rome and Douay, from bishops' chanceries, have been examined, partly edited, and the contents of them distilled into print, with a care as well as a frankness of dealing not surpassed elsewhere. I do not believe in "scientific" history; but these narratives, founded on original evidence, correspond to the requirements of a judicial report. There is no need to praise Abbot Gasquet's qualities in writing on subjects which he has made his own. Experts acknowledge them; the public who feel an interest in such studies have learnt that they can trust his eye and his word. On doctrinal inferences from the facts which he brings forward there will, of course, be no lack of disputation. But the facts remain. His picture of the monastic life just before it was violently ended in this country is a sketch, drawn with restraint in clear outlines, well worthy to be kept in mind. Perhaps the most novel, as it is surely the most harrowing, of additions now made by Dr. Gasquet to our information will be his account of "Scotland in Penal Days"—a frightful record taken from authentic sources. The whole book has much to commend it.

* "England under the Old Religion and Other Essays" By Abbot F. A. Gasquet, D.D. (G. Bell & Sons.)

"The Eve of Catholic Emancipation" Vol. III By the Right Rev. Monsignor Ward, President of St. Edmund's College. (Longmans.)

With his third volume Monsignor Ward, the son and brother of eminent writers, brings to a triumphant close the movement known—somewhat inaccurately—as Catholic Emancipation. He has followed it mainly as it was helped or hindered by events and persons on this side of St. George's Channel, treating it in the light of domestic and Church history rather than connecting it with European revolutions. The original papers quoted in full, or analysed in the text, give Mgr. Ward's pages a value which they must always retain. His freedom from bias, independent judgment, and lucid order, make him a pattern witness to the true state of the questions at one time passionately agitated between clergy and laity, bishops and religious corporations, Irish Catholics and their English brethren. A good companion volume to Mgr. Ward's, now accessible in cheap form, would be Lecky's on Daniel O'Connell. Both men, differing as they do on fundamental principles,

By permission of Fredk. Hollyer.

Ariadne in Naxos.
By G. F. Watts.

By permission of Fredk. Hollyer.

Love Triumphant.
By G. F. Watts.

are yet to a certain degree in sympathy with the great agitator. If a little more philosophy is required, it may be sought in Arnold's "Irish Essays," and above all, as Arnold himself remarks, in "every essay, letter, and speech of Burke on the subject of Ireland."

WILLIAM BARRY.

STUDIES IN LOVE AND TERROR.*

Mrs. Belloc Lowndes's new book persuades one more than ever that she is a born writer of the conte. "Studies in Wives" had brought us to that way of thinking on its first appearance. She is very good in the grand manner of "The Pulse of Life." She is better in the excellent sensationalism of "When No Man Pursueth" and "The Chink in the Armour." She is best of all in the short story for which she has a French genius. She has the simple direct expression which the conte requires, the concentration, the delicate and keen observation. So far she is the true countrywoman of De Maupassant and all those excellent craftsmen in words who have followed him. "The Chink in the Armour," the least ambitious and yet in a sense the most complete of Mrs. Lowndes's novels, for it compelled the breathless interest of the reader as few modern novels compel it, was a short story somewhat spun out. The first and the last story in these "Studies" compel in the same way. The element of the terrible in the first story is very well done, but it does not create the atmosphere as does "St. Catharine's God," where we touch and feel the slow life in the old country-house, where there is madness and horror and death. Once more we have to congratulate Mrs. Lowndes on her manner. One always feels that the story is so well in hand and the grand manner rarely fails. She is not very much concerned with speculation and doubt as to whether the French naval captain in the first story would have outraged discipline and compromised the woman he loved by taking her out in a torpedo-boat: whether the lady would have embarked on the forbidden adventure with a crew of ten of her own and her husband's townsmen, for example. She has the art to persuade us that these things are done. At her best she writes beautifully; and there are strange poignant bits of observation, such as: "As is always the case with a living creature near to death little Peter Bellairs looked very lonely." Mrs. Lowndes has always her story to tell. Sometimes she is just a little fatigued. She could have made more of "The Woman from Purgatory." But in an age of the slipshod and the cheap, it is a delight to find such craftsmanship, such good breeding as hers.

* "Studies in Love and Terror." By Mrs. Belloc Lowndes. 6s. (Methuen.)

SOME VICTORIAN GIANTS.*

Mr. Coleridge's book is primarily a book of anecdotes; which being so, the obvious way to review it is to give anecdotes by which its qualities may be suggested and readers sent to the book itself. The large number and excellence of the tales about Victorian celebrities make selection difficult, and the difficulty is increased by the fact that the work contains many stories which, though familiar in one shape or another, are here told for the first time in their proper authentic form. That Mr. Coleridge sets out most advantageously for a gossip about an age that has gone may be gathered from the fact that among those he knew more or less intimately were Matthew Arnold, Cardinal Newman, Meredith, Dean Stanley, "Bob" Lowe, Browning, Lewis Morris, Jowett, Ruskin, Gladstone, General Booth, G. F. Watts, Whistler, Boehm, Labouchere, and Sir Henry Irving. It is a list that only indicates the catholicity of the contents; and it has to be noted that Mr. Coleridge has a special and appropriate manner for dealing with each of his subjects. For instance, writing of Newman he is all tenderness and dignity, while for some of the stage and painting friends there is a fitting abandon and gaiety. When any given celebrity is under consideration one gets the impression that with that celebrity Mr. Coleridge's sympathy and understanding are complete. It is a respect in which he is an ideal raconteur; but, in view of the wide and curious range of subjects, the impression may have been harder to create than Mr. Coleridge would have us infer.

The note throughout is of cheery kindliness—an exception being some remarks as to Henry Irving and the dramatic critics. Mr. Coleridge remembers a certain "first night" during the actor's long reign at the Lyceum. Irving asked him to stay and have supper in the Beefsteak Club-room upstairs, "and help him with some of the critics." The helping would seem to have been done chiefly with cigars that "looked about ten inches long, and were no doubt very choice, rare and precious." Irving paid for these, and he "ladled out" the cigars into the critics' "deep and large coat pockets." During the process, though, he looked swiftly at Mr. Coleridge, shut one eye, and gazed at him with the other with "the drollest and most informing expressions." Mr. Coleridge departed with the critics, he tells, continuing to "help" Irving with them by extolling the play all the way up the Strand. It is not an edifying picture. Less edifying is this:

"Many years afterwards, I remember Irving saying to me that if the Press took bribes he was bound to pay them, disgusting as the business was. . . . He said that one critic, whom he named to me, had 'cost him,' since he began, quite ten thousand pounds. Of course it was done indirectly, by buying plays which were never performed, and such like elegant transactions." This was long ago, and one can only wonder when the practice ceased.

It is a relief to turn to Mr. Coleridge in his placid mood, to read his tales of Newman, of Arnold, Manning, Lewis Morris, Browning, and "Coleridge, C. J." Of Newman, presented to children, he writes:

* "Memories." By the Hon. Stephen Coleridge. With 12 Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net. (Lane.)

G. F. Watts,
1889.

3

"I do not think the old man saw any little children very often in an intimate way. . . . Certain it was that after gazing at them silently for a little while he became visibly moved, and rising from the table he murmured in a low voice half introspectively as it were, 'I think I must bless him.' He came round the table and laid his hand on the little child's head and said a few words of benediction."

All the anecdotes are not of men well remembered to-day. We have stories, for instance, of Bishop Phillpotts, seemingly a prelate of some geniality, who said to his host, on departing, "Good-bye, Sir John. I have much enjoyed my visit. I have only two suggestions to make for the improvement of your home and park: I should pull down the house, and fill up the pond with it." In the absence of proof that the saying was not the work of someone of earlier date, a connoisseur of anecdotes must offer no unpleasant comment; but what of this, attributed to the bishop as his suggestion on a proposed plan for paving with wood blocks? "In my opinion, if the Dean and Chapter would put their heads together the thing would be done." Those learned in regard to the colthic age, or even the days of Sidney Smith, may have something to say. Still, in an anecdotal work such things are bound to occur, and in Mr. Coleridge's volume they are refreshingly few.

No new light is shed on Mr. Coleridge's varied collection of giants, but a good deal of the old light is emphasised: as in the case of Browning, whom he met frequently. He was an inveterate "diner-out," says Mr. Coleridge, who adds that the poet always talked down to ladies, and discoursed to them about bonnets and clothes. This may, of course, have been Browning's humour or an endeavour to accommodate himself to environment, but Mr. Coleridge assures us that it "not seldom filled clever women with annoyance." There is also this naïve comment on the poet in private life:

"Though my diary mentions frequent occasions when I was in his company, it records no luminous sayings of his. I do not think anyone would have discovered from his talk that he was the extraordinary man his writings show him to have been." In other words, he was a smooth social acquisition, a human being who left shop behind him in years when it was apparently not the custom to do so. A multiplicity of reticent or bonnet-talking Brownings would have made succeeding book-compiling Coleridges an impossibility. Mr. Coleridge, though, admits that Browning had a sense of humour:

"Shortly after the publication of one of his volumes which was rather more obscure than usual, he and my father met . . . and Browning asked my father if he had read this last volume. My father replied: 'Yes, I have, and I think I understand about a third of it.' To which Browning rejoined: 'That's very well for a man of your understanding.'"

Mr. Coleridge ends on a low key. He writes of "the great galaxy of the Victorian Age," saying that John Morley alone survives, "the last of the giants," and adds: "Where are those that fill their places? Where indeed? The mould is broken." Let Mr. Coleridge be of good cheer: other times, other moulds.

DAVID HODGE.

TRUTH AND GLAMOUR OF DARTMOOR.*

I think there should be no question that "Widcombe Fair" is the ripest fruit of Mr. Phillpotts' genius. This book might well be the model of an English realism, saner than any taught us outside England. The wealth and fairness of honest observation that have gone to the making of it are rarer even than the skill that has packed a mass of humanity into one volume; and, so far as my reading goes, this is unique in fiction. There are critics who, accepting the author's modest foreword, have said that his work is not a story but a picture, and have seemed to mean by this that it did not strongly hold their interest. The common story method by which a few characters are linked together by events that affect the fortunes of one or two of them, and subordinate those of the rest, as in a play, is one that may be used successfully by far less able hands; but the interest it rouses is not often one for philosophic natures. Here is a novel of humanity. Yet, for my part, I find it sufficiently absorbing, and think that in any age and country where the pace and purposes of life were normal, and the intelligence of adult readers was balanced, it would at once displace, even in popular esteem, most of the thin and feverish fiction that beguiles our hurry. As it is certain that we must either be ruined or fall to a normal pace again, somehow and some day, the future of "Widcombe Fair" is, to my mind, assured. I take it to be one of the permanent books.

* "Widcombe Fair." By Eden Phillpotts. 6s. (John Murray.)

"Sleeping Waters." By John Trevena. 6s. (Constable.)

It presents the life of a Dartmoor village during four years, and the singular triumph of its workmanship is that this is done impartially, alike in spirit and in the choice of material for study. One sees a fair proportion of wisdom and folly, good and evil, comedy and tragedy. On a canvas so large as this of Mr. Phillpotts, such justice of design and accomplishment appears masterly in a sense that puts him above rivals. Only the finest humour made it possible.

A question of art raised by the author in his foreword finds me sympathetic with his ideal, but uneasy about its practical phases. Answering the charge that he has often made his scenery as important as the people who moved through it, and so delayed action for the purpose of describing the theatre of action, Mr. Phillpotts affirms the right of an artist to do as he pleases in this matter; says that to him the phenomena of man's environment are as interesting as man himself; and outlines an art which, surveying the whole spectacle of Nature, should awaken a new sense of proportion and perspective. One had divined this ideal in "The Forest on the Hill" and other novels; my own view is that, of necessity, it must inform a writer's mind much more fully than it fills his actual canvas. His purpose being to convey to others a conception and a point of view, he is obliged to consider their capacity as well as his message, or the message may miscarry; and it is a simple psychological fact that we are more interested to hear what Uncle Tom Cobleigh felt and said about the landscape or the weather than to have them finely pictured for us in an equal number of words. More, the finest and most sympathetic picture possible cannot move us, or make us see them as clearly, as we are moved and made to see by far less art expended on the man.

In "Widcombe Fair" the question never arises; and it is for this reason, as much as for any other, that I adjudge this novel the ripest fruit of Mr. Phillpotts' genius and the finest achievement of his workmanship. "At the elevation needed for such a survey, only the sound of laughter is heard: Melpomene's self stalks dwarfed out of recognition, as seen by the indifferent gods;" but we who read are on the ground, and that is why the author's elevation pleases us. "The Forest on the Hill" was about the environment and man; "Widcombe Fair" is about man in the environment. Its greatness is due to the very sense of proportion and perspective which that elevation gives, but its interest is still human, and only human. No other kind of interest can equal that, or detract from it, or much alter it. I dispute, therefore, that the landscape with figures lies as much within a novelist's range as it does within that of a painter. The figures in a novel insist on living.

The glamour of Mr. John Trevena's story, "Sleeping Waters," which is reviewed here because it also is a novel of Dartmoor, baffles the reader strangely, and seems to me to have a little confused the writer. A consumptive priest, overworked in the East End of London, is sent away into Devonshire by friends, and, as the effect of robust health—so we are led to think—behaves unlike a priest in a series of romantic and peculiar adventures that fill the book. But at the end, when the lack of verisimilitude in some of these adventures has alarmed us for the author, we are allowed to understand that the hero is, as a matter of fact, neither robust nor sane, but, like ourselves, has been a victim of hallucinations. One is sorry, but this will never do. There is so much good writing in the book, and so much else that goes to prove an author's quality, that I wish Mr. Trevena had had the courage to deal outright in fantasy.

KEIGHTLEY SNOWDEN.

MORE GEORGIAN POETRY.*

The book of the moment in verse is Mr. D. H. Lawrence's. He is remarkable for what he does not do and for what he does. Thus, he does not write smoothly, sweetly and with dignity; nor does he choose subjects, such as black-birds at sunset, which ask to be so treated. For some time past it has been understood that verse is not best written in jerks of a line in length. Mr. Lawrence goes further, and at times seems bent on insulting rhyme, as in this stanza from "Dog-tired":

"The horses are untackled, the chattering machine
Is still at last. If she would come,
I would gather up the warm hay from
The hill-brow, and lie in her lap till the green
Sky ceased to quiver and lost its tired sheen"

Correspondingly, he writes of matters which cannot be subdued to conventional rhythm and rhyme—chiefly the intense thoughts, emotions, or gropings of self-conscious men or women set on edge by love or fatigue or solitude. If he trusts to make a general appeal, it is by faithful concentration on the particular—a woman receiving a lover straight from bloodshed, a man repulsed, standing like an "insect small in the fur of this hill" in the night when "The night's flood-winds have lifted my last desire from me, And my hollow flesh stands up in the night abandonedly,"

and saying to the woman:

"And I in the fur of the world, and you a pale fleck from the sky,
How we hate each other to-night, hate, you and I,
As the world of activity hates the dream that goes on on high,
As a man hates the dreaming woman he loves, but who will not reply."

The last comparison would be a flaw were it not that Mr. Lawrence sacrifices everything to intensity, particularly in amorousness. His triumph is, by image and hint and direct statement, to bring before us some mood which overpowers all of a sick, complex man save his self-consciousness. Mr. Lawrence is fearless in treatment as in choice of subject. He will be exact in defining an intuition, a physical state, or an appearance due to the pathetic fallacy—herein resembling the man in "We have bit no forbidden apple." He will give us in dialect the plainest outlines of a working-class tragedy, and in careful abstract monologue a schoolmaster's moment of satisfaction when it is sweet in the morning to teach boys who are his slaves:

"Only as swallows are slaves to the caves
They build upon, as mice are slaves
To the man who threshes and sows the sheaves"

Such moods he will sometimes follow with a painful curiosity that makes us rather sharers in a process than witnesses of a result. He does not refuse external things, a gang of labourers at work on timber, a picture by Corot, the Moon. A surprising number of his poems are tributary to the moon, but a moon of his own world, "divesting herself of her golden shift," or bringing him a pang of reminiscence, or reddening:

"The moon lies back and reddens;
In the valley, a cornerake calls monotonously,
With a piteous, unalterable plaint, that deadens
My confident activity:
With a hoarse, insistent request that falls
Unweariedly, unweariedly,
Asking something more of me,
Yet more of me"

* "Love Poems and Others" By D. H. Lawrence. 5s. net. (Duckworth.)

"Helen Redeemed and Other Poems." By Maurice Hewlett. 4s. 6d. net. (Macmillan.)

"Valdimar: A Poetic Drama." By Ronald Campbell Macfie. 3s. 6d. net. (Erskine Macdonald)

"Jesus of Nazareth: A Poetical Drama in Seven Scenes." By Alexandra von Herder. 5s. net. (Heinemann.)

"The Gallant Way." By Frank Taylor. 2s. 6d. net. (Murray.)

"Prison Songs and Poems." By J. Robert Clarke. 2s. net. (Erskine Macdonald.)

"Thomas Campion and the Art of English Poetry." By Thomas MacDonagh. 3s. 6d. net. (Dublin: Figgis.)

I doubt if much of his effect is due to rhythm. Verse aids him chiefly by allowing him to use a staccato short-hand which would be more uncomfortable in prose. But, whether the verse is always relevant or not, Mr. Lawrence writes in a concentration so absolute that the poetry is less questionable than the verse.

Mr. Hewlett is far removed from Mr. Lawrence in form. Mr. Lawrence's form has been groped for: it is as near as possible natural poetry. Mr. Hewlett's has been assumed: it is a fascinating, not wholly deceptive mask. He appears in verse as a servant of Diana:

"To whom all the praise of him who writes, Ever!"

as he says in one of his ten "staves" about Helen. But it is in speaking of himself that he is at his best: writing dignified sonnets, in whose mediæval mixture the spiritual masters the sensuous, and in fact survives alone in "Hymnia-Beatrix." He is less happy, but more painstaking and detailed, in depicting Argive Helen, slim and sweet,

For whose bosom and delight,
For whose eyes, those wells of peace,
Paris wrought, as well he might,
'Ten years' woe for Troy and Greece."

For this Argive Helen and his own imagined Helen are two different conceptions, which his art is not strong enough to save from confusion time after time. Had he kept to her, and left out the heroes and the gods, he could have made something of her, but on the large canvas his inkings are lost.

It is hard to be just to Dr. Macfie after reading Mr. Lawrence. For his drama concerns chiefly a Viking turned Christian, whom nothing could lure to fight again until in the last act his beloved, who has led his army instead, is seen to fall; and the king speaks to his Vikings in blank verse, thus:

"When the dawn
Comes shimmering into the western sky
Our oars will beat and beat across the foam;
Our sails will blossom in the morning breeze . . ."

But for those who still like to see heroic figures in every way worthy of this straightforward blank verse, Dr. Macfie is unexcelled.

His manly sweetness is not to be found in the dramatic pageant of "Jesus of Nazareth," where the blank verse, by the way, is seldom decasyllabic, but seldom lacking in substance or force. The scenes suffer by being a mixture of the old and the new, instead of a simplification on the one hand, or, on the other hand, an elaborate rehandling of the old. In spite of the excellence of several passages, and its invariable reverence, it is not much more than a dignified tinkering with the theme.

Mr. Frank Taylor makes no mistake in writing of "The regiments that so gaily took the rub, (rub-a-dub, rub-a-dub)"

from Cressy to Malplaquet and Minden, wherever British soldiers have been led by officers bred

"In the schools that forge and weld the best of the breed, Brave boys in the schools that are schools for men, hard schools for the men that lead."

There is not much patriotic verse written with less nonsense and more metrical skill than Mr. Taylor's.

Mr. Clarke's verses would not have been remarkable if they had not been written in prison, as the "Epic of Hades" was written in the "Underground." But knowing that they were so written makes them more memorable than the similar ones written daily, for all that can be known to the contrary, in fairyland.

Mr. McDonagh, himself a poet, now shows himself a very keen student of poetry and of criticism, a worthy follower in prosodical studies by Mr. T. S. Omond, and a suggestive if not a victorious one. In the course of studying Campion he leaves few important questions of prosody untouched, and none of these unilluminated. He gives also, by the way, much promise of sympathetic insight and several specimens of delightful prose.

EDWARD THOMAS.

A CRITIC'S LIQUEURS.*

To the younger generation—a scarcely negligible quantity nowadays, when Lancashire dramatists in their uncensored plays suggest to approving British audiences that it is really the only generation that matters—Sir Frederick Wedmore is doubtless known almost exclusively as a writer on art, an unrivalled expert on prints and etchings. This little book serves well to show his versatility. It is not, it may be remarked, a book to read at a sitting: rather is it a book to be taken as liqueur-taking people take liqueurs, at intervals, small draughts at a time. Sir Frederick's liqueurs are suggestive and exhilarating. In epigrammatic prose—marred now and again by a heavy employment of parentheses, but generally careful, limpid and easy-flowing—he sets forth his views on many things, which range from Browning's "Landscape" to the Macbeth of Sir Henry Irving, from Job to François Coppée.

One of the selections is a short story, "A Chemist of the Suburbs," which presents Sir Frederick in a manner that would have made him an acceptable addition to the writers for The Yellow Book, and proves that the dry point is not necessarily the only point of a dry-point authority. "A Chemist of the Suburbs" is highly charged with sound sentimentality, and might have been written by Mr. Leonard Merrick or one of the French masters of the short story. That Sir Frederick understands the art of the conte is suggested by his own comment, that writers and serious readers know that a good short story "cannot possibly be a précis, a synopsis, a scenario as it were, of a novel." He says that that is why great writers succeed in it so seldom . . . even a novelist like Mr. Hardy, the stretch of whose canvas has never led him into carelessness of detail. While on the subject Sir Frederick has something to say of Whistler. To a remark that the short story is wont to be estimated, not by its quality, but by its size he adds,

" . . . a mode of appraisement under which the passion of Schumann, with his wistful questionings . . . would be esteemed less seriously than the amicable score of 'Maritana'. And a dry point by Mr. Whistler, two dozen lines laded with the last refinement of charm, would be held inferior to a panorama by Philippoteau."

Sir Frederick's views may, for all we know, never have varied in the very least as to Philippoteau and his seemingly deplorable "panoramas"; but there has been a certain flux as to the other artist.

Engaging throughout, the book is best when dealing with Rembrandt and Méryon.

D. H.

TYRCONNEL.†

Mr. Sergeant's title, as he himself recognizes, is not exactly fitting or expressive. "Little Jennings" has a comparatively small part in the story, though so far as it goes it is a vivid part. The greater interest of the work is historical, not biographical. It will not secure its due straight away. Along with the first-hand and valuable material there is too much needless detail, particularly in the first volume. Mr. Sergeant is full of his subject and of things that bear but slightly or indirectly thereon, and in his interested and impartial way he crowds a series of pages with a wealth of matter in which the graphic and the well-nigh trivial are intermixed. This means a certain strain on the reader who is not as deeply concerned over the period and the personalities as he is himself, and it militates for a time against his conscientious presentation of, we might almost say his apologia for, Tyrconnel. In due course, however, the persevering reader is fairly well rewarded. He finds that with all his faults "Dick Talbot" had bold and striking qualities, that he has been recklessly and grossly maligned by Macaulay and others, that much in the tortuous drama of his time, in Ireland especially, has been misunderstood, or presented in the spirit of prejudice and partisanship.

* "Pages Assembled. A Selection from the Writings, Imaginative and Critical, of Frederick Wedmore" 1s. 6d. net. (Mathews.)

† "Little Jennings and Fighting Dick Talbot: A Life of the Duke and Duchess of Tyrconnel." By Philip W. Sergeant. 2 Vols. Illustrated. 24s. net. (Hutchinson.)

It may be long, however, before the sober truth will supersede the vividly rendered untruth in the popular imagination, or even in that of historians who do not go to original sources and documents. Tyrconnel is a vicious * bogey-man in the minds of writers of historical primers and articles in popular encyclopædias. "Dirty work," "this scoundrel," "wretches of this stamp," "characteristic treachery" occur even in "Chambers's," in which his crowded and dramatic life is summed up and blackened in some twenty lines. Racial bias and theological bias have both helped to distort the vision and the picture of the general historian, who is on the side of William and against James II. —strangely enough the Pope of the period was an abettor and a helper of William.

Mr. Sergeant deals with tangled issues in a patient temper and with matters of racial and historical controversy in a fair-minded and balanced spirit. A good deal of the work is a corrective, part of it is an acquisition. If the best of it, were judiciously extracted, and presented in a popular form and at a popular price, it would be enlightening and helpful in many quarters that it cannot reach at present.

It makes the Anglo-Irish circumstances of a troubled and tragic years rather clearer to the general reader. The inner and real Ireland, with her vision, sufferings, philosophy, expressed in her own language, does not come within Mr. Sergeant's province. That inner Ireland, however, affords the material for a great and moving story when the accomplished and penetrative historian arises.

W. P. R.

THE BACONIAN HERESY.*

The only real Shakespeare-Bacon problem is how on earth anyone ever managed to persuade himself that there was one. We are already beginning to forget the amazing gentlemen who discovered those absurdly ingenious cryptograms which clearly proved that the plays were written by Bacon. Apparently they had satisfied themselves that great poetry could be written something in this fashion:

"To be or not to be, that is the question, Whether 'tis nobler in the mind to—"

"No—that won't do. I've got B in all right as the third letter of the first line, and I must have A as the third letter in the second line, or I shall never be able to spell Bacon in this soliloquy."

No man so stupidly preoccupied could write poetry of any kind; and no man in his senses would go over great poetry he had written and mangle it and make its beauty subservient to the introduction into it of an elaborate cryptogram. The person who had no more respect than that for his art could not write a poem that was good enough to win a prize in a Lamerick competition. The whole theory was obviously nonsensical, and the wiser Baconians abjure it and openly regret it was ever advanced, because it has discredited their cause with all thinking people. They say now they have other and more reputable evidence. But what does it amount to? A few years ago one of these curious gentlemen wrote an article in a magazine saying that in one of Bacon's notebooks was a list of forms of salutation; that these had been invented by Bacon, and, at all events, made their first appearance in literature in the plays attributed to Shakespeare. * Yet anybody who took the trouble to look back a little could find most of these forms of salutation in the old Robin Hood ballads that were written before Shakespeare was born. Then they laboriously compile what they please to call parallel passages, similarities of phrase or opinion that are common to the works of both Shakespeare and Bacon, and offer this as evidence that Bacon must have written the plays; moreover, they find in the plays a display of legal knowledge that they say could only be possessed by a trained lawyer, such as Bacon was. More than all, perhaps, they rely on the unproved fact that Shakespeare was a man of no education; they even exaggerate his ignorance, and the most persistent of them scornfully calls him "an illiterate clown." So we are asked to believe that so shrewd a man as Bacon, desirous of concealing his authorship of the plays, was so unspeakably foolish as to arrange for an illiterate clown to pass them off as his own. The thing could not be done. If Shakespeare could not read or write, his fellow-actors and brother-dramatists could not be kept unaware of that, and such a silly deception could never hope to deceive any of them. So your indomitable Baconian tries to shuffle out of this difficulty by suggesting that there must have been two Shakespeares: one the illiterate clown who was merely the actor who afterwards settled down as a country gentleman at Stratford, and one, a more intelligent William Shakespeare, who posed as author of the plays that Bacon had written.

* "The Baconian Heresy." By J. M. Robertson; M.P. 21s. net. (Herbert Jenkins.)

It is all too farcical. The Baconians are in the main an unimaginative people who being quite without genius themselves cannot make the least allowance for its miraculous workings in another. They do not realise that it is the poetry in them that makes the plays of Shakespeare great, the poetry and their feeling for nature and their knowledge of humanity; and that the learning in them is the least important of their merits. Given the genius that the author of the plays must have had, there is nothing else to wonder at: it could be nothing for a man so alive and nimble-witted as Shakespeare to pick up all the legal knowledge he displays, and the scraps of correct and incorrect Latin and French that he uses now and then. Your stolid Baconians cannot comprehend that such a man as Shakespeare might employ in the plays every ounce of learning he had acquired, and had the nous to use it so easily and in such fashion as to suggest that there was far more at the back of it, they take it for granted that if he knew so much he must needs have known ever so much more. Which is the natural attitude of men whose whole knowledge is drawn laboriously from books in the presence of a finer, higher spirit whose quick wits and intuitions have rarer means of education. If Bacon had written plays they would certainly have been more like Ben Jonson's, overlaid with his learning. And before they worry about parallel passages, let the Baconians quote us passages from Bacon that contain any glimmerings of the humour that leavens all the plays and riots so gloriously in many of them; let them prove from anything Bacon is known to have written that he had it in him to create a Falstaff or a Dogberry.

They simply cannot do it, because with all his wit Bacon had no humour. Still, one feels it was worth while to take the blustering Baconian theory into a corner and knock it quietly on the head, once for all. And this is the pious, serviceable job that Mr. J. M. Robertson has done in "The Baconian Heresy." He meets the Baconians on their own ground, and by applying the comparative method not only to the writings of Bacon and Shakespeare but to those of Bacon and the other Elizabethan dramatists, knocks the top off the Baconian theory and the bottom out of it and shows you there is simply nothing inside. He accounts for the apparent classical scholarship of Shakespeare, and demonstrates by comparisons how widely and utterly different were the prose styles of Bacon and Shakespeare. He might have printed Bacon's few acknowledged poems to demonstrate how widely different, too, were their poetical styles. He astutely points out that Bacon,

"does not lard with law his writings on other subjects, as the Baconians make him out to have done in the Plays—a circumstance which alone might have served to guard careful readers against the notion that the law tags in the Plays came from his pen."

He gives you a careful study of the vocabularies of both men, and makes it clear that these differed as widely as their styles do. He shows you that there are more parallel passages or coincidences of phrase to be found between Bacon and other contemporary dramatists than between Bacon and Shakespeare; and he has collected from divers other Elizabethan dramatists who never studied the law passages that would seem to indicate at least as much legal knowledge as the Baconians attribute to the writer of Shakespeare's dramas. He might have mentioned that Massinger's signature is as crude and "illiterate" as the signatures of Shakespeare, though Massinger was an Oxford man. But he has done enough. He has written the most careful and most masterly exposure of the Baconian heresy that has yet been published. If the thing had to be done at all it was well to do it minutely, thoroughly, convincingly, and that is how Mr. Robertson has done it. For every reasonable man who has read his book the Baconian theory will henceforth be dead, and the Baconians may go on waking the corpse as long as they like, they cannot bring it to life again.

Photo by Oppenfeld, Ltd.

Mr. J. M. Robertson, M.P.

A. ST. JOHN ADCOCK.

Novel Notes.

THE AMATEUR GENTLEMAN. By Jeffery Farnol. 6s. (Sampson Low.)

There will always be a public, and a grateful one, for those novelists who take the advice of Mr. Balfour and "cheer us up." High in the admired circle of the cheery romancers stands Mr. Farnol, weaving inventions out of the Regency time, and making everything in that very mixed period subservient to constancy and manly courage. Manly courage has it virtually all the way in the person of Barnabas Barty, for when he is down on his luck and thwarted in his social ambitions, he stands highest in the affections of the unsophisticated reader. He inherits good looks and brawny sinews from his father, the ex-champion of the English ring in the heyday of pugilism, and he inherits some three-quarters of a million from a quarter which we can only assign to the arbitrary region of the author's expediency. He enters his hero to back up pluck and patience with unbounded generosity, and makes him fulfil his purpose. But Barnabas is not a whit more generous than his author, for Mr. Farnol lavishes language and incident and character up and down his pages with the largesse of a spendthrift possessed of inexhaustible resources. The heroine, Cleone, has a good deal in common with Charmian in "The Broad Highway," and the social ornaments and villains whom Barty encounters in his upward progress to Cleone's hand and the honours of Court, have every mark of kinship with Sir Maurice Vibart and his compeers in that most enchanting story. Where Mr. Farnol best succeeds, however, is in depicting the plainer humours and eccentricities of the population of the road, and here, we fancy, he has no equal since Dickens. There is the same weakness for labels and unchanging attributes and tricks of speech, but there is the same inventiveness, and the same glorious high spirits slung off a flying pen that has neither guile nor misgiving.

THE SECOND-SIGHTER'S DAUGHTER. By G. B. Burgin. 6s. (Hutchinson.)

Mr. Burgin awakens one's interest and curiosity by commencing his story with an ancient legend: "Once upon a time there was a man who picked up a stone to throw at his enemy. But his enemy escaped before he could hurl it at him. So the man carried the stone in his pocket for seven years, turned it, and at the end of another seven years threw it at his enemy and missed him." It is a shrewdly significant prelude to the story of thwarted revenge which follows. Mr. Burgin has selected a strikingly uncanny character for his heroine: a wild, radiantly beautiful woman with a power and charm that are inhuman. She dwells in an atmosphere of mystery; her father has weird traffickings with the Other World—what wonder then that she can cast spells about men, running the lives of two of them and spoiling her own? The best character in the book is undoubtedly Mirby Harrison—a bloated, irritable old man, with an undernature so generous and sincere that one forgives him his many failings. The story bristles with strongly dramatic situations; it is well written, and the interest that is foreshadowed in the legend at the beginning is cleverly retained to the end.

THE HIPPODROME. By Rachel Hayward. 6s. (Heinemann.)

A novel that excites with its incidents, and at the same time satisfies with its characterisation is not very frequently met with. Miss Hayward certainly fulfils both the demand for adventure and the desire that adventure should be worked out through living people, and not by means of labelled shadows. But "The Hippodrome" would have been more aptly entitled "Fatalité." Fate undoubtedly met Arithelli when she alighted at the railway station at Barcelona in the person of Count Poleski, a devoted member of a gang of Russian Anarchists. The cleverly-contrived plot centres in Arithelli, a girl of haunting beauty, who becomes chief equestrienne at the Barcelona Hippodrome. She finds the famous Spanish city a veritable "entresol de l'enfer," but escapes unscathed from its gross temptations. Inevitably through her friendship with Poleski, she gets mixed up with the Anarchists, and is taken like a bird in the fowler's snare. Vardri, another member of the gang, with whom she falls in love, attempts to free Arithelli and himself from the clutches of Sobrenski, the leader. Arithelli is portrayed with care, and deserves the pains the author took in her delineation. The theme is full of dramatic scenes, and its interesting possibilities are developed into an enthralling story.

MRS. PRATT OF PARADISE FARM. By Katharine Tynan. 6s. (Smith, Elder & Co.)

"Mrs. Pratt, of Paradise Farm, leant across her gate and looked up and down the road. She was a big, fair-skinned, soft-eyed young woman, with abundant chestnut hair. . . ." Two figures appear in the distance, and she hides behind a bush until she thinks they will have passed; however, they do not pass; creeping cautiously out, Mrs. Pratt sees that they have stopped at the gate—a young and beautiful girl and a handsome young man—strangers to her. They ask if she has lodgings to let. Mrs. Pratt is startled, and says she has never thought of letting lodgings, and although she would very much like to take these two kindly and aristocratic young people as lodgers, she feels they cannot know who she is. "Tears formed, large and liquid, in her eyes. You can't want to come and lodge here," she said, with a broken-hearted humility. "You can't have heard; yet 'twas in all the papers! I'm Mrs. Pratt—the Mrs. Pratt—the one that was tried for the murder of her husband!" The story of Nancy Pratt and these two strangers is full of romance and mystery, of sunshine and clouds. It is a charming story, told daintily and sympathetically, and contains some excellent character studies; "Old Sarah" is a masterpiece.

DOCTOR WHITTY. By G. A. Birmingham. 6s. (Methuen.)

Since Kirriemuir gave Mr. Barrie an original for "Thürms," we may fairly doubt if any Scots or Irish village has supplied anyone with so much gay material as Westport, in County Mayo, has done to Canon Hannay. He has given us several novels, and short stories by the dozen, all more or less coloured with the grey light and April shadows of that little village on the sea edge of Connaught. "Dr. Whitty" is a compromise between the author's two best fiction veins, being simply a series of short stories around one character. He has everything in common with his counterpart in "General Regan," Dr. Lucius O'Grady, but improves on the parallel to the extent of getting married at the finish. One slip on the author's part which reveals the haste at which these stories were written, is that he has not made up his mind as to the Doctor's Christian name, for he calls him George as a rule, but makes him (on p. 53) sign himself with the initial "E." But whether George or Edward, the Doctor is a fountain of gaiety, and sprinkles freshness and laughter on every page of this droll and jolly book.

MONTE CARLO. By Mrs. De Vere Stacpoole. 6s. (Hutchinson.)

Mrs. de Vere Stacpoole is the novelist born, not the novelist made by proximity to a novelist. Her first book is good enough to make a reviewer read it from beginning to end, and how much that implies will be understood by reviewers, for it is remarkable how often a halting and amateurish first novel will have workmanlike successors. To this new writer the business comes easy. "Monte Carlo" is extremely brisk, interesting, and well written. The hand that gives us the Riviera scenery so deftly and delicately may well have a kinship with the hand that gave us "The Blue Lagoon"; that is to say that Mrs. de Vere Stacpoole has beautiful words and beautiful colours to make us see the land of delight. Her heroine, Julia, puzzles one a bit. How did her maker view her? To one reviewer she seems dull, cold, and not a little vulgar. Nothing of the refinement, though it be dull and prosy, of the Cathedral Close clings to her garments. She might have come from a shop parlour rather. Perhaps that is exactly what Mrs. de Vere Stacpoole meant her to be, in which case she is a triumph. Jack is just what one often finds in the raffish Bohemian life, a simple, boyish person, who touches pitch all the time and never is defiled. The book goes with a swing; and there are many touches of keen observation, with a talent for turning an epigram. "Monte Carlo" is very good, but its successors will be better and better.

THE CHAIN OF OB. By St. Clair Harnett. 6s. (Andrew Melrose.)

Most critics will agree that Mr. St. Clair Harnett's second novel indicates a marked advance in literary power and interest. Mr. Harnett still takes the most amazing liberties with time and space, and steps as unconcernedly from the twentieth century into the twelfth as did "Alice Through the Looking Glass," but he never fails to remember that he has a strong, consistent, and well knit story running through his fingers, and, from the point of view of the tired novel reader who asks for something bright and vital and fresh "The Chain of Ob" is really admirable. His hero is the one who is marked with "the devil's bracelet." It extends right round the left forearm just below the elbow in an unbroken chain, and by old sorcerers is reputed to derive its power from a passage in the Book of Samuel—that which relates when Saul would seek the Witch of Endor, his servants were told to find a woman who was mistress of an Ob. At all events, those who own this token are reputed wondrous tender to influences from worlds unseen and ghostly visitors, and so when Tony goes with his friend to take possession of the haunted and mysterious Girdlestone House, all manner of weird and uncanny things happen. The figures in the moth-eaten tapestry come to life, and the hero finds he is in plain prosaic Devon in the daytime and at night a leading figure in some of the thrilling tragedies of passion and ambition that were enacted in England centuries ago. The effect is extraordinarily penetrating and vivid.

DAISY DARLEY. By W. P. Ryan. 6s. (Dent.)

You cannot exhaust the fascination of Fleet Street. Never was street so thickly populated with arresting personalities. Put Fleet Street, the human side of Fleet Street, into a chapter of your novel, and you will be sure of at least one living chapter. Mr. W. P. Ryan has done more than this; his new novel is leavened throughout by a realistic "inside" description of the running of a great evening newspaper. Indeed, so intimately and convincingly does the author sketch the staff of the "Gleam," that even the sweet and airy heroine who gives her name to the story loses colour and vitality by comparison. Sub-editors and reporters live vividly in these pages, and towering above these smaller fry looms the massive figure of Theobald Cunningham, the great journalist who edits the Gleam and weeps in print over the sorrows of Sad Humanity. "His momentous, world-weary, yet prophetic 'I' spoke for all mankind. It appealed to the imagination like a star through the mist—ruthful, portentous, suggestive of diviner verities. His world took his most trivial confidences as something touching and sacred; even to his indigestion and insomnia, of which he often wrote, he gave a large human dignity, a sense of the Universal Ordeal." The story opens with the advent to the staff of the Gleam of Arthur Clandillon, an able young writer with large-hearted ideals and mystical leanings. "This office," the chief tells him, among many other wise reflections, "like every other office is run and ruled by invisible women." In Arthur's case the invisible woman, to whom his soul speaks in all his writings, is not, as one might suppose, the woman he is engaged to marry, but Daisy Darley, a distant relative of his. For—and here is Arthur's problem—side by side with his increasing affection for Daisy Darley, the conviction is growing upon him that he has outgrown the "self" which took the false step of becoming engaged to Alice Considine, a hot-blooded, vigorous girl, whose views on religion and life in general are cramped and narrow compared with his own. The love tangle which forms the plot is, however, quite secondary to the clever character studies in the novel, which is distinguished throughout by an exceptional depth and brilliancy of thought and expression.

LOT BARROW. By Viola Meynell. 6s. (Martin Secker.)

"Lot Barrow" affords yet another proof that the one sex never understands the other. The female characters are excellent; particularly that of Lot herself, the servant girl. Her first adventure terminates disastrously, far more disastrously for her lover than for herself. And it is all her doing. Yet her compassion is not for him, but for herself. This is absolutely typical of rather low intelligences cursed with vanity. But a second sorrow, a great blow to her vanity, has a refining influence on her. She emerges a humble woman, prepared to breast the blows of circumstances, to take the evil with the good. Such a development is natural, and it is most naturally told. Mrs. Child, her mistress, is another clever portrait, though a profile rather than a full face. A woman with unusual burdens to bear, who manages to put a brave face, even a merry face, on it for her husband's sake, for her lodger's sake, but no further. That is the extent of her endurance. Beyond that she is waspish and nagging. A marvellous transcript from life. But the men! The hyper-sensitive lover of Lot, an extraordinarily thin-skinned village swain, reduced to a bottomless abyss of despair by a moment's disappointment. Her second lover, a young, healthy, hard-working farmer, who year after year poisons his own life and the lives of his parents because his cries for the moon are shown to be impracticable. It is not thus that we conceive of the rustic mind. And thirdly, the exquisite prig, cultivating quite honestly what he imagines to be a platonic friendship with Lot, inculcating quite seriously the duty of callousness in the face of the deepest sorrows. He is impossible, inhuman. And what there is of humanity in this precious hero bears an unpleasant likeness to the villain of Mr. Hardy's "Woodlanders." But Lot, with her splendid physique, her Atalanta-like power of running, might well be admitted to that society. Mr. Hardy has drawn no more living human girl.

THE FINGER OF MR. BLEE. A Tropical Comedy. By Peter Blundell. 6s. (John Lane)

Harold Blee, the hero of this extravaganza, is a young Eurasian, a purely delightful specimen of a Malay competition-wallah on a comparatively humble scale. Of his antecedents we are not permitted to more than guess. From a condition of primitive childhood, in which he runs about in a state of nature, Fate removes him to a mission school, whence he is drafted to the service of the government in Jallagar, and becomes a kind of god-in-the-car in a feud between the Commandant's lady and the wife of the agent of the great Bung Steamship Company—Commandant and Agent being (through their respective wives) rivals for the social ascendancy of Jallagar—and of a very charming love affair between two of their young relatives. The author has studied types in the Far East with a keen eye to character, and the result in the volume before us is entertaining to a degree.

Miss Viola Meynell.

THE LADY OF THE CANARIES. By St. J. Lucas. 6s. (Blackwood.)

To pick up a book by Mr. St. J. Lucas is to be sure of reading something of distinction. His style is easy and scholarly, and he has gifts of pathos and of humour such as few other writers possess. The story from which this collection takes its title is one of the best things of its kind that Mr. Lucas has yet done. The heroine is an English governess who has fallen in love with a man who proposed to her on the spur of the moment, and who realised almost immediately afterwards that he was not in love with her. The man took up an appointment at Trieste and made half-hearted attempts to break off the match, but, being of a weak, vacillating character, has allowed the girl to throw up her post and come to meet him in Venice, where for some time he has not the courage to go and meet her. She, poor soul, has spent all her money on flaunting clothes in Paris, and is in extremity when at last he appears, and in a short time becomes so disgusted with her that he leaves her. A "thin" enough plot, it may be said, but Mr. Lucas handles it in the most masterly fashion, and when we see, as we do, that beneath all her external tawdriness and artificiality there is a genuine passion burning in her, we feel the righteous indignation that we ought to do towards the vapid, yet really kindly, man who deserts her. Of the other stories "The Brandon Leonardo" is far the best. A tale that hangs upon some picture is a favourite exercise with Mr. Lucas, but in this story he has conjured up a particular "atmosphere" which is one of his happiest achievements, and the whole episode is treated with a delicacy and deftness of touch that leave nothing to be desired.

A MARRIAGE OF INCONVENIENCE. By Thomas Cobb. 6s. (Mills & Boon.)

The main theme of Mr. Thomas Cobb's new novel deals with the life of the heroine Nina Hallday, who is apparently (the author does not make her parentage clear) the illegitimate daughter of a wealthy old roué, Campion by name. Mr. Cobb is a bold man, he is not easily perturbed or daunted by social difficulties, and he places his heroine in a position which is one of great embarrassment, even after her marriage with a quite desirable and fairly interesting hero. Vernon Hartford is a good, sound character, nothing very much out of the way, but what in slang phrase has become known as a "white" man. He makes up his mind that Nina is the woman for him, and the "nosy" propensities of his undesirable aunt, Mrs. Flemmerton, and the pressure brought to bear upon him by his sister, Mrs. Grahame Marsack, who is quite a fashionable woman in her way, prove insufficient to alienate him from his choice. Had he abandoned Nina we cannot but think that Hartford would have sunk to a low position in the average novel reader's esteem. Nina herself is just an extremely nice girl—with no apparent kink in her nature arising from her unfortunate birth—with a fine figure, and remarkable eyes, of which she makes good use. Vernon is an adept at evading the leading questions of his sister, and some of the most amusing passages in the book are concerned with the exercise of this useful accomplishment. Euphemia Flemmerton, a rather attractive girl of eighteen, is a well drawn character. Mrs. Flemmerton has all the objectionable characteristics of that too common type, the person who concentrates a large amount of energy in poking her nose into other people's business. A good and amusing story.

ISRAEL KALISCH By W. L. George. 6s. (Constable.)

There has been a definite "purpose" in each of the two earlier novels which Mr. George has written, but neither in "A Bed of Roses" nor in "The City of Light" was the essential motif so insistently obtrusive as it is in this study of the life and death of an intellectual Anarchist. From its very nature the story is one of sordid life on the Continent, in New York, and in London, but the sordidness is merely that of the material circumstances in which the characters live, and the tale is saved from being "unpleasant" (in the Shavian sense of the term), by the subsidiary love-affairs of several of the characters, and, in particular, by the devoted passion of Karsavina for the hero, Israel Kalisch. The conception of Israel Kalisch is first-rate. While he is thoroughly sympathetic with his hero, Mr. George is not unduly carried away by his creation, and he uses Kalisch very skilfully as a foil to other of his fellow Anarchists. The book, indeed, is extremely clever. Mr. George has the gift of being able to put a political sermon, or rather a political debate, into the form of fiction without either destroying the value of his real thesis or obtruding the teacher too much upon the storyteller, and so long as he retains this power he will be read with interest by people to whom most of the views held by his characters are utterly obnoxious.

PHYLLIDA FLOUTS ME. By Mary L. Pendered. 6s. (Mills & Boon.)

Phyllida Woodruff is a very charming young lady who lives in a sleepy little village, reading poetry and dreaming of a haloed ideal lover; she has found John Martin, a neighbouring farmer, too matter-of-fact, too commonplace, and has consequently refused to have anything to do with him. John's sister, knowing the sterling worth of her brother, resents that his love should be treated flippantly by a silly, sentimental girl, and determines to be avenged and at the same time to teach her a lesson. So she makes herself up as the sort of man she thinks will appeal to Phyllida's heart, and getting John off to London for a time, she takes advantage of his absence and tries to win the affection of Phyllida, who has never seen her before, and has no suspicion of her disguise. The result is she experiences the most amazing ten days of her life, and ends her adventure by falling in love with the squire of the village and, after her disguise is seen through, getting engaged to him. It is a fresh, amusing story, told brightly and vivaciously, with many humorous touches. Phyllida's natural disappointment in her ideal man with his exaggerated passions and his flow of empty words, her realisation that life is something more than poetry after all, and the sudden silhouetting of John's strength and virtue against the weaknesses of the bogus lover, help one to draw the satisfactory conclusion that the best things in life are not the things we have not, but those we already possess.

THE LITTLE GREY SHOE. By Percy James Brebner. 6s. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

For a good, stirring tale of romance and adventure, one cannot ask for a better novel than Mr. Percy James Brebner's latest, "The Little Grey Shoe." The hero is a man named Heleston, an officer in the Guard of King Philip of Saxe-Oldenburg, who thinks he has left the happiest portion of his life behind him in England, and suddenly finds he is mistaken when he chivalrously assists a Princess passing as a maid of honour, and for the nonce disguised as a serving maid, to escape from the blatant attentions of some German soldiers. This slight action—the opening of a gate he had no right to open—brings him into disgrace with the king; but he is the one man who stands loyally by the king when a rebellion rises and Count Christian claims the throne. It is at the beginning of the fight that Heleston picks up the little grey shoe which belongs to his lady, and which saves his life; it is for the sake of the owner of the shoe he chooses to live and serve Count Christian, rather than be hanged as a traitor; and it is the lady herself who rescues him at the end when he is awaiting certain death. The plot is ingeniously constructed; the story has a delightful love interest and simply bristles with incident and surprises from start to finish.

THE CATFISH. By Charles Marriott. 6s. (Hurst & Blackett.)

The catfish, it appears, "is the demon of the deep, and keeps things lively," and if Mary Festing does not deserve to be called a demon she certainly possesses those attributes which enable her to prevent matters from becoming torpid. And yet Mary is, as it were, a temperament rather than a vivid personality. Her influence upon George Tracy is always somewhat enigmatic, and that curious character, himself an odd compound of the romantic and of the practical, is probably moved sub-consciously by the soundest eugenic promptings when he turns from Mary, whom he has loved almost in a resentful manner, and marries the somewhat ordinary and healthy Lesbia Garnett. George Tracy is by far the most prominent figure in the story, and his gradual development from a predominantly romantic boy into the successful but always intellectual and artistic head of "Tracy's" is worked out with that skill and neatness by which Mr. Marriott's novels are generally characterised. The days of Tracy's early childhood and of his school career are especially well described, and the same criticism applies also to the character of his friend, Miles Darragh, which is not, unfortunately, elaborated as much as could have been wished. However, the elusiveness of the whole story is, in great part, its main charm, and it is clear that in Mr. Marriott we have a novelist of considerable sympathetic insight and delicate imagination.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE GENTLEMAN. By W. E. Norris. 6s. (Constable.)

This is an excellent specimen of the novel to which Mr. Norris has made us grow accustomed—quiet, thoughtful, well bred and refined, skimming lightly over the surface of life yet etching people and scenes deep enough for us to recognise their fidelity and to remember their truth. The keynote to this new story is found, perhaps, in the fact that Mr. Norris has, for any reason, discovered the time has arrived when he must paint a socialist. Other writers, no doubt, would give "The Right Honourable Gentleman" an aggressive beard, a check suit, a bowler hat, and a red tie. This is not, and never could be, the Norris method. The Socialist in his story figures in the first chapter as "The Unsociable Socialist" and is quite a respectable personage, for his creator is at some pains to explain that "the Right Honourable Arnold Calthrop, President of the Local Government Board, did not like being stared at. He thought people who stared at him impertinent—a view not very easy, it must be confessed, to reconcile with the principles which he professed, yet comprehensible enough by those who had sufficient insight to divine the mental attitude which must needs accompany such a physique as his." Later we learn that "for many generations the Calthrops of Monkshill had been great territorial personages, exercising a benevolent quasi-feudal rule over a large tract of country, practising a lavish hospitality, upholding Tory traditions, and occasionally filling high offices of State, though always declining ennoblement." Any doubt we therefore felt as to the suitability of "The Right Honourable Gentleman" to be a Norris hero is quite set at rest, and from this point onward we read this account of his flirtation with the impeccable Mrs. Newmarch with suitably chastened regret.

AUNT OLIVE IN BOHEMIA. By Leslie Moore. 6s. (Alston Rivers.)

Into whatever life "Aunt Olive" intrudes, she is sure to bring the charm of her sunny, old-fashioned personality. The story of how Miss Olive Mason takes a studio in Chelsea after a long life of dull self-repression in the country, and how she befriends six artists is infectiously entertaining, and deserves to be popular. We thought nothing could be added to the charm of the theme, till the girl-child Pippa appeared, a spritely elf who talks in broken English and has a captivating individuality of her own. In a novel set in an artistic milieu, it is impossible to avoid thinking of "Trilby"; but the author has her own story to tell, and she owes little or nothing to George Du Maurier.

Photo by F. O. Hoppe.

Mr. Charles Marriott.

Fortunately for all who come under "Aunt Olive's" sway, she enjoys an income of five thousand a year. When the six artists succumb to this delightful old lady, she begins to play the part of kindly fate. Jasper Merton and his wife, and the Duchessa di Corleone and Paul Treherne then find their troubles vanish in a miraculous way. Only the solution supplied to the difficulties surrounding Pippa's parentage reads like a bit of special pleading, provided for the sake of a pleasant ending. The style is discursive, and the construction somewhat loose, but the novel is one for which to be grateful.

AN AFFAIR OF STATE. By J. C. Snaith. 6s. (Methuen.)

It would be interesting to know how the central idea of this remarkable book first took shape in the author's mind. Even so tragic a thing as a social revolution has its humorous side. Carlyle found humour in the Terror? Was it in the spirit of this grim humour that Mr. Snaith first put pen to paper? There is a bizarrie in his opening chapters, an intellectual levity, that breaks out at intervals later, which would seem to support this theory. But as the story progresses one feels that it is gripping the writer with a force that makes him serious in spite of himself. The book is so clever, so good in the main, that many if not most of its readers will wish that Mr. Snaith had been inspired throughout with a really vital purpose. The volume is full of daring contemporary portraiture, touched here and there, Whistler-like, with a kind of mocking cynicism. Probabilities are treated with no respectful hand. The relations of the principal personages are Gilbertian. James Draper, son of the people but gentleman by nature, an idealist, another Oliver Cromwell come to judgment, who speaks with the passion of a Burke and the silver tongue of a John Bright and a like religious devotion, is married to a daughter of the aristocracy of birth. His chief friend and confidant, his disinterested Egeria, is the Duchess of Rockingham. Draper is loyal to his King, devoted to his country, an idol of "the North," but he is convinced, nevertheless, that, in order that it may go forward, Democracy must be first put back, and saved from the emotional dishonesty of the Cockney agitator-journalist, Mr. George John Galloway. The portraits of Draper and the Duchess are wildly imaginative, but they are finely drawn for all that, actual in a world of their own. As the narrative draws to a close, the social and political chaos becomes a mere background for the contest between James Draper, his wife the Lady Aline, and the Duke and Duchess of Rockingham, in which contest the ex-Premier Solomon Grundy and a certain Lord Peveril play a subsidiary part. There is, perhaps, a suspicion of melodrama in the tragedy of the Duke's death, but of how many public men may it not be said that "one never know's one's Rockingham"? Mr. Snaith has a nice sense of character, a crisp, telling style, and his dialogue has point and appropriateness.

WHITE MOTLEY. By Max Pemberton. 6s. (Cassell)

Among a party of happy holiday-makers who are enjoying the winter sports amid the glistening snow and the clear, hard sunshine of Switzerland, there arrives a gentle, sympathetic little woman, known as the "little widow." We have already learned of a sorrow that has shadowed her life, and we guess that she has come to Andana wishing to hide herself from the world. But she has come, too, to play a principal part in a tragedy that takes place in the white silence of the Alps, and to win incidentally the love of a good man, who, at the critical hour does all within his power to save her name from disgrace. One expects from the pen of Mr. Max Pemberton a plot that is thoroughly exciting, a story that is well written and full of incident, and in this case, at least, none will be disappointed. He has caught the true care-free atmosphere that lingers round the snow-clad peaks during the winter holiday months, and has used it for striking a vivid contrast to the dark doubt and grief that is assailing the "little widow" while she sends out her warm sympathy to all those who come in contact with her. The other characters staying at the hotel afford plenty of scope for amusement,—the irrepressible Bess Bethune, a precocious child of thirteen, two impressionable young men, who turn to the "little widow" for advice and help out of a love tangle; and many another who has part in the panoramic background to the "little widow's" sufferings and joy.

The Bookman's Table.

MY FRIEND'S BOOK. By Anatole France. Translated by J. Lewis May. 6s. (John Lane)

"My Friend's Book" is not one of Anatole France's most interesting or important works, but that it possesses distinction and charm goes without saying. It is in main the recollections of a man about his childhood and upbringing. The life of a small Parisian of the nineteenth century is shown us with that delicacy of touch and emotion, with that kind of faint hint of gentle irony, for which Anatole France is so famous. There is little plot in the story—in fact, there is no plot at all in one sense. The tale just winds along through the remembered episodes of youth, here bright with the curious, precise details of memory, there hazy with the usual lapses of recollection. The psychology of children has a singular attraction for Anatole France. Probably it is that his own memories are peculiarly vivid and that all his books on childhood are to a large extent sheer autobiography. The exquisite and cunning ease of his style is an almost perfect medium for so simple a story as this. A child might read "My Friend's Book" with delight—a delight that would be shared by the most cultured people. There is always in Anatole France an ironic reserve which is very piquant. You never quite know whether his tongue is not in his cheek. One need only read the long conversation at the end of this book between Octave, Laure, and Raymond upon the subject of fairy tales to be conscious of the feeling. That vague suggestion of a mocking smile that hovers over all his work gives it a rare flavour that is all its own, gives it a subtle and almost indefinable personality. You might as well try to explain why it is that certain rooms affect one so queerly, or certain scents, or certain silences even. And what makes Anatole France especially fascinating is the fact that his mockery is so kindly that you never quite know whether it is mockery. It is as elusive as a name that is on one's lips but will not shape itself into a word. This translation appears to be competently made, but, of course, any translation of a French stylist loses some precious essence which simply cannot survive in an alien tongue. That is a sad but undeniable truth.

OUR VILLAGE HOMES. By Hugh Aronson. 2s. 6d. net. (Murby.)

As Lord Henry Bentinck says in a brief preface to this little handbook, Mr. Aronson's writing is here and there tinged with party feeling, and we regret this fact the more that in many respects Mr. Aronson shows himself to be a careful and sober observer of the condition of rural England to-day. He is not so dithyrambic in his denunciations as Mr. F. E. Green, but at the same time he hits hard, and he has a great deal of strong criticism to offer upon the action and the inaction in recent years of the Local Government Board. Mr. Aronson estimates very fairly, as it seems to us, the respective merits of the Bill introduced by Sir Arthur Griffith Boscawen and of that prepared by the Rural League, and it is clear that he does not expect salvation to be achieved by the passage of either of these two projected measures. Like many other students of the same problem, Mr. Aronson looks to what has been accomplished in Ireland recently as the most hopeful example of what can be done, and he argues that the same remedy, if applied in England, would meet with not dissimilar results. The Irish system, he says, should be applied until the wages of agricultural labour can be raised, after which the system of State grants should be withdrawn, and he goes on to suggest that this rise in wages should be effected, not by the passage of a Minimum Wage Act, but by giving to each labourer a piece of land of his own to till, and time in which to till it. In advocating this course Mr. Aronson is almost certainly on the right lines.

SIR ROGER L'ESTRANGE. By George Kitchin. 10s. 6d. net. (Kegan Paul.)

In any history of the early days of journalism L'Estrange must needs bulk largely; it was a good thought to give him a book to himself, and Mr. Kitchin has written a full biography of him that is at once painstakingly accurate and alive with interest. L'Estrange was a Royalist pamphleteer; he was imprisoned in Newgate after the Parliament triumph, but escaped. The Restoration gave him opportunities of avenging himself on his enemies and mending his own fortunes, and he was not slow to profit by them. He was active in bringing authors and publishers of seditious books to punishment, and presently the office of "Surveyor of the Press" was created for him, and he obtained a monopoly of the printing and publishing of news and advertisements. His three first newspapers, The Intelligencer, The News, and the City Mercury were ably conducted, but the journalistic rivals he had supplanted or suppressed fiercely resented his possession of such exclusive privileges, and before long they were curtailed. Other papers came into existence under other editors, but until the Revolution he remained one of the most powerful and influential of the Royalist journalists and pamphleteers, and also one of the most unscrupulous. He was coarser and more abusive than Defoe became later on the other side; he was scurrilous and slanderous to a degree, though whilst he had the power he gagged and persecuted his brother-journalists without mercy. But there is more than a touch of romance about his record; he was a strong and interesting personality, and remains for ever a significant figure in the history of journalism, to which history Mr. Kitchin has made a very welcome and valuable contribution. There are several illustrations in facsimile and from old prints, and a good reproduction of Kneller's portrait of L'Estrange.

GW

DESKS

Think of the Choice !

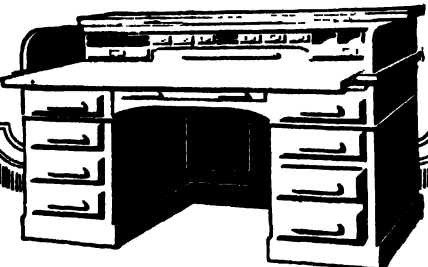

When buying a desk, why be limited to three or four models? Why not call at the Globe-Wernicke Showrooms, where you can see over FIFTY STYLES of Desks? If unable to call, a postcard will bring you our Catalogue No. 180, which is specially devoted to Desks.

N.B.—Note the pull-out writing bed in the Desk illustrated. This is Style No. 1633.

Packing Free.—Orders of £2 Carriage Paid to any Goods Station in the British Isles.

The Globe-Wernicke Co.

Office and Library Furnishers,
44, HOLBORN VIADUCT, LONDON, E.C.
33, VICTORIA STREET, S.W.
28, BISHOPSGATE, E.C.

Still Supremely Best.

Note the underlined words.

For underlining the above words we have to thank a correspondent in Hull, who, seeing our announcement in the "Daily Mail," of February 7th, cut it out, underlined the words "STILL SUPREME THE BEST," and sent it to us, with this testimonial written across the announcement:—

"As the result of 17 YEARS' experience of your 'Koh-i-noor' Pencils, I can thoroughly endorse the above."

Take a "Koh-i noor" home with you to-night, Compare it with any other pencil you like. You'll note a difference — and the difference will be all in favour of the "Koh i-noor."

One "Koh-i noor" outlasts SIX ordinary Pencils.

4d each, 3/6 per dozen everywhere. Made in 17 degrees and copying List Free from L. & C. HARDTMUTH, Ltd., Koh-i-noor House, Kingsway, London, W.C. (Paris, Brussels, Dresden, Zurich, Milan, Vienna, Barcelona, New York.)

By "MARK RUTHERFORD."

(1) JOHN BUNYAN BY THE AUTHOR OF "MARK RUTHERFORD."

A Volume of the "Literary Lives."

With Photogravure Frontispiece and Illustrations. Price 3/6.

"No more perfect biographer could have been found for Bunyan than the author of 'Mark Rutherford.' There is something puritanical in the exquisite simplicity of his style, his high seriousness, his keen sympathy, which is saved from partisanship by the breadth and philosophy of his outlook. Understanding the hidden depths of Bunyan's spiritual life he has expounded his character, not in the formulas of a sect, but in the eternal phrases of humanity." Spectator.

Other Volumes in the "Literary Lives" Series, Edited by SIR W. ROBERTSON NICOLL, LL.D.
Illustrated. Price 3/6 each.

PEPYS
CHARLOTTE BRONTË
ERNEST RENAN
NEWMAN
IBSEN
SIR WALTER SCOTT
COVENTRY PATMORE
MATTHEW ARNOLD

By Percy Lubbock
By Clement Shorter
By William Barry
By William Barry
By Edmund Gosse
By Andrew Lang
By Edmund Gosse
By G. W. E. Russell

(2) THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF "MARK RUTHERFORD"

To be Published shortly in HODDER & STOUGHTON'S SEVENPENNY LIBRARY.

HODDER & STOUGHTON, PUBLISHERS, LONDON, E.C.

MR. NASH'S NEW BOOKS

A CANDID HISTORY OF THE JESUITS. By Joseph McCabe, Author of "The Decay of the Church of Rome," etc. "Mr. McCabe's 'Candid History' with its marshalled facts amounts, it must be confessed, to an indictment hardly less trenchant than the brief of Clement XIV. himself."—Glasgow Herald. Price 10s. 6d. net.

THE SAILOR WHOM ENGLAND FEARED. Being the Story of the Admiral Paul Jones. By M. MacDermot Crawford. "Intensely interesting throughout."—Manchester Courier. Illustrated. Price 15s. net.

A KEEPER OF ROYAL SECRETS. Being the Private and Political Life of Mme. de Genlis. By J. Harmand. "An absorbing book."—Evening Standard. Illustrated. Price 15s. net.

THE MARRIED LIFE OF QUEEN VICTORIA. By Clare Jerrold, Author of "The Early Court of Queen Victoria." Illustrated. Price 15s. net.

READY EARLY IN APRIL

ADVENTURES BEYOND THE ZAMBESI: Of the O'Flaherty, the Insular Miss, the Soldier Man, and the Rebel Woman. By Mrs. Fred Maturin (Edith Cecil-Porch). A most amusing book about a six months' trip in search of sport and adventure. Illustrated. Price 10s. 6d. net.

THE TRUTH ABOUT WOMAN. By C. Gasquoine Hartley. A frank exposition of the problem of present-day womanhood, and an historical survey of woman's place in the world, based upon twelve years' careful study of the question. Price 7s. 6d. net.

MR. NASH'S NEW NOVELS

VEILED WOMEN. (Second edition) By Marmaduke Pickthall. 6s.

LADY OF THE NIGHT. By Benjamin Swift. 6s.

I'D VENTURE ALL FOR THEE By J. S. Fletcher. 6s.

GLOOMY FANNY, AND OTHER STORIES By Morley Roberts. 6s.

CARNACKI, THE GHOST-FINDER By William Hope Hodgson. 6s.

THE LOST MILLION By William Le Queux. 6s.

POISON By Alice and Claude Askew. 3s. 6d. net.

THE EMPEROR'S SPY By Hector Fleischmann. 6s.

Ready early in April.

THE UNGUARDED HOUR By Lady Troubridge. 6s.

SOLD TO THE SULTAN By E. de la Villeneuve. 6s.

Evelyn Nash, 36, King St., Covent Garden, London.

BLACKIE'S LIST.

IN BYWAYS OF SCOTTISH HISTORY.

By LOUIS A. BARBÉ, B.A., Officier d'Académie, Author of "Viscount Dundee," "Kirkcaldy of Grange," &c. With Photogravure Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, gilt top, 10s. 6d. net.

"The book is a fascinating contribution to historical knowledge and is all the more welcome since it breaks new ground."—Standard.

THE INDIAN THEATRE: A Brief Survey of the Sanskrit Drama.

By E. P. HORRITZ, sometime Lecturer in Sanskrit at Trinity College, Dublin. Crown 8vo, art binding, cloth back, 2s. 6d. net.

The book is a first attempt to render a popular and at the same time scholarly account of the fascinating history of the Sanskrit drama.

HOW TO SPEAK AND READ.

By J. BRUCE ALSTON, Recognised Teacher of Public Reading and Speaking to the University of Glasgow, Lecturer on Elocution in St Mary's College, St. Andrews, &c. Crown 8vo, art binding, cloth back, 2s. 6d. net.

In this book an attempt is made to put before the student of the art of public speaking, in the simplest and clearest way, the common-sense principles on which the art is based.

THE RISE OF DEMOCRACY.

By J. HOLLAND ROSE, Litt.D., Reader in Modern History, University of Cambridge. New Edition. Crown 8vo, art binding, cloth back, 2s. net.

This well-known study of the history and development of the Democratic Movement is now reissued in new form. Dr. Rose dwells less on the politicians who figure largely in Parliamentary annals than on the efforts of humbler individuals, who stirred up the artisans of England to action which finally compelled responsible statesmen to listen to their demands.

WOMAN'S PLACE IN RURAL ECONOMY.

Translated from the French of PAUL DE VUYST, Chief-Inspector of Agriculture in the Department of Agriculture, Belgium. Demy 8vo, art boards, 3s. 6d. net.

This is a translation of a notable book by M. Paul de Vuyst, which obtained the prize of the Royal Academy of Belgium for the best essay upon the means of improving the moral, intellectual, and physical condition of the working classes.

SAFETY IN COAL MINES: A Treatise in Fundamentals for Firemen, Colliery Managers, and others.

By DANIEL BURNS, M.Inst.M.E., Professor of Mining and Geology in the Royal Technical College, Glasgow. Small crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net.

GARDEN WORK: A Book for Garden Lovers.

By WILLIAM GOOD, F.R.H.S. With 8 Plates in Colours and many other Illustrations. Large crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 5s. net.

LETTERS OF GREAT WRITERS: From Spenser to Wordsworth.

Edited by the Rev. HEDLEY V. TAYLOR, B.A. 4s. 6d. net.

"One of the most delightful anthologies of letters ever published."—Spectator.

SPECIMENS OF SCOTTISH LITERATURE, 1235-1835.

With Introduction, Notes, and Glossary, by W. M. METCALFE, D.D., Editor of "The Scottish Legends of the Saints"; Author of "Supplementary Dictionary of the Scottish Language," &c. Art binding, cloth back, 2s. 6d. net.

PLANT DISEASES.

Translated from the German of Dr. WERNER F. BRUCK, of the University of Giessen, and Edited by J. R. AINSWORTH DAVIS, M.A. (Frim. Coll., Camb.), Principal of the Royal Agricultural College, Cirencester. Fcap. 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. net.

THE MOST POPULAR SERIES OF COLOUR BOOKS.

BEAUTIFUL ENGLAND.

Pictured by E. W. HASLEHUST. Fcap. 4to, bound in boards, with coloured panel; each volume containing 12 full-page illustrations in colour, 2s. each net; also bound in levant grained leather or smooth lambskin, 3s. 6d. each net.

NEW VOLUMES.

HAMPTON COURT. Text by WALTER JERROLD.

THE DUKERIES. Text by R. MURRAY GILCHRIST.

EXETER. Text by SIDNEY HEATH.

DARTMOOR. Text by A. L. SALMON.

HEREFORD. Text by C. EDWARDS.

Complete List of the Series on application.

London: BLACKIE & SON, Ltd., 50, Old Bailey, E.C.

THE BOOKMAN SPRING SUPPLEMENT

110m The Etchings of Frank Brangwyn
(The Fine Art Society)

THE BRIDGE OF SIGH.

THE ETCHINGS OF FRANK BRANGWYN.

63s. net. (The Fine Art Society, Ltd.)

In this large and very handsomely bound volume the Fine Art Society has compiled an exhaustive catalogue of Mr. Frank Brangwyn's etchings, reproducing two hundred of them. Many of these are necessarily much reduced, for most of Mr. Brangwyn's more important plates are on the grand scale, and could only be accommodated in a Gargantuan portfolio; but, even so, as often as not the reductions remain as large as average etchings, and are so beautifully reproduced that to describe such a book simply as a catalogue would be rather misleading. It is that, and something more: it is a portfolio of vividly realistic drawings of scenes and characters by one of the most strikingly individual of living artists. Each picture is faced with a brief note giving particulars of the size of the original, where the plate was etched, whether and where it was exhibited, what galleries contain proofs of it, and so forth. Mr Brangwyn had become famous as a painter before he turned to experiment with the etching needle. Then he began purely for the sake of relaxation, and for the gratification of his friends, but realising the power he had in this fresh medium of expression, he passed from amusing himself with it to a serious working in the etcher's art, and despite the usual doubts of some of the more conventional of English critics, it was not long before the public here, and especially on the Continent, were awake to the advent of a new master. His first three important plates were exhibited at the Rowland Club in Clifford's Inn in 1903, and in the ten years since then he has made himself a reputation as an etcher that is second only to his fame as a painter. You have the same breadth and vigour of treatment, the same subtle play with clear light and massed shadows, the same easy strength and sense of power and vision in these black-and-white studies as he brings to his magical colour schemes. Whether he is drawing some familiar London scene, such as the Monument, London Bridge, Cannon Street Railway Bridge, Old Kew Bridge; or the Bridge of Sighs, or some picturesque Venetian street or church; a commonplace view of a tanyard, the mouth of a coal-pit, a butcher's shop, a farmyard; a sketch of bakers or sawyers at work, or a vision of the Nativity, he blends with his wonderful gift of realistic presentment certain qualities of large imaginative sympathy and a feeling for the beauty of form in the commonest things, for the strange beauty that the unloveliest of objects will put on when it is touched with flying lights or veiled in brooding shadows. He is in art very much what Wagner is in music. You feel or see the force of his dominant personality in all his work; he is a mighty master who strikes a new harmony out of seeming discords, and makes the real thing beautiful without idealising it. One looks through this catalogue with a growing admiration of the scope, variety and prodigious power of Mr Brangwyn's genius. A bibliography in an appendix supplies gratifying testimony to the increasing appreciation his work is meeting with at home and abroad; another appendix gives a list of all the etchings, now in public galleries, and there is an excellent frontispiece portrait of the artist.

THE BOOKMAN. SPRING 1913.

TRENT'S LAST CASE.

By E. C. BENTLEY With Coloured Frontispiece. 2s. net. (Nelson.)

There is a possibility that you will guess the murderer of Sigsbee Mander-son, the American millionaire, and, indeed, Mr. Bentley supplies you with a very strong clue, but it is a most improbable contingency. Probably not one reader in a hundred will be honestly successful, and it is as well to notice that in this instance it is more than usually damaging to look at the end of the book before you have got half-way through. Treat the author as fairly as he treats you. That is very fairly indeed, for "Trent's Last Case" is quite one of the most enjoyable detective stories we have ever read. Mr. Bentley possesses a quality not usually displayed in authors of this particular brand of fiction. He really can write well; he can construct and tell a story, his characters are not puppets but creatures of flesh and blood, and much of the dialogue

From The Etchings of Frank Brangwyn
(Fine Art Society).

BROWNING'S HOUSE, VENICE.

is very amusing indeed. Of late years, the detective story has maintained its popularity with the general reader, but the art of writing it has fallen off rather than otherwise, and one reason why we are grateful to Mr. Bentley is that he has, in "Trent's Last Case," lifted it to a higher level again. If all detective stories were on the same plane as this, they would rank as one of the most deserving classes of fiction. We are grateful to Mr. Bentley for a thrilling evening's entertainment.

SKI-RUNS IN THE HIGH ALPS.

By F. F. ROGET. 10s. 6d. net. (Fisher Unwin.)

SKI-ING.

By ARNOLD LUNN. 3s. 6d. net. (Eveleigh Nash.)

Professor Roget's book marks an epoch—which is not necessarily the same as saying that it makes an epoch. So far, ski literature has been severely technical, like the book of Zdarsky expounding the obsolescent Lilientelder system, or those of Vivian Caulfeild and E. C. Richardson waging uncompromising war against the stick. We do not forget Mr.

Fulton's charming and unaffected "With Ski in Norway and Lapland," but that was as much about Norway and Lapland as about ski. Professor Roget's is the first winter mountaineering book whose inspiration is literary rather than technical. True, it does contain some excellent practical tips, but they are more or less irrelevant, and the reader who wants instruction in straight running and in the mysteries of Christamas and Telemarks must turn to Caulfeild or to Richardson. The present volume bears the same sort of relation to winter mountaineering on the "planks" as (say) "The Playground of Europe" does to summer mountaineering on the rope; though, of course, the ski-runner who attempts the big heights must leave his ski behind at times and take to the rope and the irons. It is a series of essays, short and long, upon the glorious ends to which the ski were a means; and so attractively does the Professor write, that not only they who run may read, but even those whose running is of the past or the future will find the book delightful. Little did the first runners who began joyously slithering about on easy slopes in Switzerland a few years ago imagine that they were making possible such a trip as this of Professor Roget's, the "high-level route" itself, taken in the incredible month of January. First day, Bourg St. Pierre to the Valsorey Hut; second day, wind too strong; third day, Valsorey Hut to the Chanrion Hut; fourth day, Chanrion Hut to the Bertol Hut; fifth day, ascent of Dent Blanche (him, or rather her, even I); sixth day, Bertol Hut via Col d'Hérens and the Zmutt glacier to Zermatt. Equally wonderful, too, was the Oberland circuit, made in a week; and most wonderful of all, the author's "night out" on the Plaine Morte glacier in the depth of winter. The maps, reproduced from the Siegfried sheets, are excellent in intention, but scarcely legible, and the illustrations are poor substitutes for the good photographs one might expect in a book like this. Professor Roget argues that "ski" should be pronounced with the "k" hard. His argument is not very sound, and in any case he is too late. For all of us now, these fascinating boards are "The fair, the chaste, and unexpressive She."

Mr. Arnold Lunn's volume is a relative of Professor Roget's; for he accompanied the professor on the best of his mountain ~~trips~~ and wrote certain articles • (included in this book) from which Roget culled some descriptive passages. The volume is excellent at its best and the other thing at its worst. Mr. Lunn should really have taken more pains with it. A hotch-potch of tips, instructions, topographical memoranda, ski-politics and purple passages of description cannot make a satisfactory book. Mr. Lunn tells the beginner just the very facts he wants to know, even down to how and where to order his ski, and the probable price of the same. His remarks on outfit are capital and his treatment of the delicate topic of lady-skiers and their ways is the most useful and fearless thing yet said on the subject. The more is the pity, therefore, that he should leave the novice struggling on his first slope, and plunge into the advanced technique of mountaineering. Moreover, he would have been well advised to leave out both the story of club squabbles and the sort of prospectus of that latest family concern the British Ski Association. The latter would have been in its proper place among the advertisement pages. Still, with all its faults, it is a most useful book. The would-be skier should invest first of all in Mr. Richardson's "Shilling Ski-runner," and then in this book of Mr. Lunn's. They will save him many hours, pains and pence.

From The Etchings of Frank Brangwyn
(Fine Art Society).

THE MONUMENT.

From Ulster (Blackie).

DARTMOOR:

Pictured by ERNEST HASLEHUST Described by ARTHUR L. SALMON. 2s. (Blackie & Son)

"Dartmoor," says Mr. Arthur L. Salmon, "is a fine sounding name and no one would wish to displace it." We have read so much of it that even for those who have never seen it, the very name has power to conjure up visions of sweeping plains and moss-grown boulders, great tors and rugged hills. Mr. Ernest Haslehust has caught the grim spirit of the place and his pictures are full of its mists and sombre colourings. Those who are going to Dartmoor, as well as those who have been or are planning to go, will be glad of this book. It is more than ordinarily interesting. Mr. Salmon's references to the early history of the moor, the possible origins of the weird ghost and pixy and fairy tales all add to the eerie atmosphere that haunts the great wild spaces. Mystery clings to Dartmoor still, tradition wanders among the hills and across the bleak wastes. The village of Widecombe, for instance, is famous yet "not because of its famous sheep fair, nor because its church is the finest on Dartmoor, but because the Devil himself paid the spot some very personal attentions at one time, and indeed was once reported to have lived there." On an October Sunday in 1638 "a stranger riding through Poundsgate enquired the way to Widecombe, and, being given drink, it was noticed that the liquor actually hissed as it passed down his throat." Many other startling things happened as well—darkness and thunder while the people were in church, and a ball of fire fell through the roof. One hopes it will be long before the spread of modern scepticism sweeps these picturesque old superstitions from the moor for ever.

From Dartmoor (Blackie).

OCKERY, BRIDGE, NEAR PRINCETOWN.

From The Dukeries (Blackie)

THE BEECH AVENUE, THORESBY.

THE DUKERIES:

Pictured by ERNEST HASLEHUST. Described by R. MURRAY GILCHRIST. 2s. (Blackie and Son.)

The publication of this splendid series of colour books will do much to make the average Briton more intimate with and more interested in his native country. Few of us can truthfully say that we really know England. To know England is not only to know its contours, its vales, its forests, its history, and its people; for England is composed of all these and more, and at most one can boast of familiarity with this or that corner of the island, of these or those few famous manors or churches. But in this series of books Messrs. Blackie & Son are gathering together all these remote and well-known or little-known places, and with the help of skilful writers and artists bringing England nearer to us and us nearer to England. "The Dukeries"—so admirably described by Mr. R. Murray Gilchrist—is an exceedingly interesting volume, full of vivid word-pictures and gleanings from the high-ways and by-ways of history. For the text of Mr. Gilchrist and the delightful paintings of Mr. Ernest Haslehurst we have nothing but praise—between them they have made "The Dukeries" one of the most pleasing volumes in a wholly useful and pleasing series.

HEREFORD:

Pictured by ERNEST HASLEHUST. Described by CHAS EDWARDS. 2s. (Blackie & Son.)

Nothing could be better in their way than Mr. Charles Edwards' alluring description and concise history of Hereford and Mr. Ernest Haslehurst's beautiful paintings of the district. As one reads one is vividly conscious of that curious fascination that belongs to every town with a past; every beauty of its streets and houses is made more beautiful by the associations that have gathered about them; a light of memory glorifies them, as a light of

From Hereford (Blackie).

MONNINGTON FALLS.

THE BOOKMAN SPRING 1913

sunset transfigures the commonest of things. Mr. Edwards shows you the old town playing its part in the lives of men through the generations that are gone; inseparable from their hopes and fears, though insensible of them all; seeing the world always with it but always gliding by, as the peaceful Wye glides majestically at its feet. "The cathedral," says Mr. Edwards, "comes like the postscript in a lady's letter. Take away the Wye, and still for this majestic, if rather miscellaneous, old lane, and it alone, Hereford would merit the devotion of many days." Those who love a place for itself and its own characteristics can find plenty in Hereford to please them; for those who prefer it for its historical connections it is steeped in history; and Mr. Edwards' book and Mr. Haslehurst's many pictures will be equally helpful and interesting to these and to those.

INDIA.

By PIERRE LOTI
Illustrations by A
HUGH FISHER
7s. 6d. net (1
Werner Laurie)

This handsome volume is one of a uniform edition of the works of Pierre Loti. "India" was first published in English seven years ago, and has always been deservedly popular. It has not the force and living, vivid power of the Indian pictures of Kipling's great travel book, "From Sea to Sea," but in its delicacy of impression and expression, in its glimpses exquisitely observed and exquisitely told, it shows itself worthy of the high esteem in which it is held. Loti's eyes wander through the world, he has always an air of fatigue, of languor, an ascetic voluptuousness that casts a strange glamour over his pages. He is a very difficult writer to translate, for the essence and fragrance of his work is desperately volatile and elusive. "India" is somewhat a heavy book to read, slow, somnolent; it is like lazily walking with bare feet through mud warmed in a hot sun, soft, caressing, clinging. Read the chapter entitled "The Great Palms," or that called "In Famished India," and you will understand. But the slowness is due to an added pleasure, the pleasure of giving oneself up to the writer's thought, to seeing with his eyes, to sharing his reflections and tasting them to the full. There is certainly in this book something of the real spirit of India that is easily missed, because so difficult to disentangle, to express precisely, and that is Loti's power—to express clearly things hard for the average mind to grasp. The illustrations are good but without distinction

From The Ancient History of the Near East (Methuen).

CEREMONIAL PALETTE (END OF PREDYNASTIC PERIOD).

From The Ancient History of the Near East (Methuen).

PREDYNASTIC POTTERY.

THE ANCIENT HISTORY OF THE NEAR EAST.

By H. R. HALL,
MA, F.S.A. With 33 Plates and 14
Maps. 15s. net.
(Methuen)

From the earliest times to the battle of Salamis! A colossal task of compression to bring this within the compass of six hundred pages. Yet Mr. Hall has carried through his task so deftly that his book, while moderate in size, is exceedingly readable and most interesting to anyone who possesses even a simple general idea of ancient history. The story begins with prehistoric Greece, though, as Mr. Hall points out, we have not yet learned to write the history of the civilization of the Bronze Age revealed by the discoveries of Schliemann, Halbherr and Evans. Accordingly, Greece is treated separately, and Mr. Hall passes on to Egypt and Babylonia, of which we have intelligible records upon which we can base real history.

From India (Laurie).

THE ROSE-COLOURED GRANITE TOWER.

THE BOOKMAN • SPRING 1913

repulse of the barbarians by Greece the record ends, the future civilization of the world was fixed and determined by Salamis and Marathon. Mr. Hall has brought together a fascinating storehouse of art, archaeology and history which will prove no less authoritative than delightful reading. It includes and takes into account all the most recent discoveries, and is in this way thoroughly up-to-date even when dealing with the affairs of five thousand years ago.

From The Ancient History of the Near East (Methuen).

KING SENUSERT III.,
DÉR-EL-BAHRI,
British Museum

From Gloucester Cathedral (Dent)

At first the Nilotic and Egyptian communities are treated separately until they come in contact with each other and with the Anatolian culture of Asia Minor, after which they can no longer be kept apart. Then come the rise of the Israelitish kingdom in Palestine, then from 850 B.C. to 650 B.C. Nineveh and the warlike armies of Asshur take the central place. Nineveh was destroyed, Babylon woke again till Persia took its place and brought all the Near East into its empire, except Greece. With the

From Gloucester Cathedral (Dent).

THE BOOK OF THE TARPON.

By A. W. DIMOCK.
With 93 Illustrations from Photographs by JULIAN A. DIMOCK. 7s. 6d. net. (Palmer)

Mr. Dimock is, as this book will show you in a moment, an experienced tarpon fisherman, and, like all others of his ilk, he has an enthusiasm for the tarpon which is almost boundless. "The tarpon meets every demand the sport of fishing can make. He fits the light fly-rod as no trout ever dreamed of doing and leaps high out of the water a hundred times for every

THE BOOKMAN SPRING 1913

EDMUND BURKE.
From The Windham Papers
(Jenkins).

once that a brook trout clears the surface. When grown to the size of an average man he is no less active, although he will snap a line of thirty threads and break a hickory hoe handle, as you or I would break a reed." And again, "To one who knows the tarpon, the feeble efforts of the salmon to live up to its own reputation are saddening." Besides, it is a handsome fish— a really beautiful creature, as anybody who has seen these photos must admit. To those in search of sport, "The Book of the Tarpon" will be an eye-opener, while the photographs with which it is illustrated are nothing short of marvellous.

REMINISCENCES OF DIPLOMATIC LIFE.

By LADY MACDONELL.
With 16 Portraits
7s 6d net. (Black)

The life of the diplomatist has a fascination for the general reader which is equalled probably by no other calling. The reasons for this are probably two-fold; firstly, because he nearly always has a wide experience of several foreign countries, while, secondly, he is supposed to be the depository of "state secrets" and hardly-won information. Lady Macdonell first met her husband in 1869, when he was holding a Secretaryship at Buenos Ayres, and his fortunes subsequently took her to Madrid, Berlin, Rome, and Munich, and with her husband as Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Rio de Janeiro, Copenhagen, and Lisbon. About her varied experiences and the many interesting people whom she met, Lady Macdonell writes in a pleasantly chatty manner, and her book affords many interesting sidelights upon the history of the last forty years.

DR JOHNSON.
From The Windham Papers
(Jenkins).

THE DALESMAN.

By A. WREN RUMNEY With 14 Illustrations 5s. net. (Titus Wilson, Kendal)

Around a somewhat slender central plot Mr Rumney hangs a number of delightful studies of the scenery and characters of the English Lake District. If regarded as a novel "The Dalesman" is no more than conventional, but no reader of the book will be content to regard it as a novel. Mr. Rumney clearly possesses a deep knowledge and love of the Lake District, he has a true sense of humour and the ability to draw character. Moreover, the dialect which he frequently introduces is well managed and seldom or never troublesome. "The Dalesman" is an unusual and altogether charming piece of work—and the photographs with which it is illustrated are exceedingly fine

WEST INDIAN TALES OF OLD.

By ALGERNON E. ASPINALL.
With 43 Illustrations. (Duckworth.)

In a couple of earlier volumes Mr. Aspinall has proved how thorough is his acquaintance with the West Indies, and the attractive book now before us goes far to strengthen the high opinion of the author which we had formed from his earlier work. In their time the West Indies have had their full share of the more exciting episodes of the world's history, but these stories will come, nevertheless, comparatively freshly to the general reader. Whether he is dealing with the exploits of the brave Benbow or with the unexplained Barbados mystery (in which lead coffins play a leading part), Mr. Aspinall writes brightly and vividly. Among travellers and those who enjoy such romances of the past, "West Indian Tales of Old" will find a ready market.

A MONTESSORI MOTHER.

By DOROTHY CANFIELD
FISHER With 20 Illustrations
4s. 6d. net.
(Constable)

To those who may not know what is meant by the Montessori Method we would say that it is by far the most important theory for the education of young children put forward since the general adoption of the kindergarten. And it is something more than a theory; it is successful in practice. "Children's Homes" are now flourishing in Rome, and Dr. Montessori is giving direct instruction in her method to a number of teachers who have come to her from all parts of the world. It must, however, naturally be some time before Montessori schools are properly organised in this country, and in the meantime there comes this valuable book from the pen of a lady who has had a considerable experience of Dr. Montessori's work. Mrs. Fisher writes in a clear and untechnical manner, and the volume contains an appreciative introduction by Mr. E. G. A. Holmes, the well-known writer upon educational topics.

CHARLES JAMES FOX.
From The Windham Papers
(Jenkins).

From The Windham Papers SIR SIDNEY SMITH IN PRISON.
(Jenkins). Reviewed in last month's BOOKMAN.

THE POETICAL WORKS OF ADAM LINDSAY GORDON.

1s. net. (Ward, Lock.)

We are glad to have this collected edition of Lindsay Gordon's poems. The quality of the verse is uneven, of course, but at times it touches a very high mark. Deep melancholy broods over the poems, so that we get to understand the tragic self-destruction that ended Gordon's life at Melbourne on June 23rd, 1870—the very day his "Bush Ballads and Galloping Rhymes" were first published. Now, after more than forty-two years have passed, we can more justly appraise the poet's work than contemporary critics could. The swing and quick movement of "From the Wreck"; the vigour of such a verse as this:

'Then a steel-shod rush and a steel-clad ring,
And a crash of the spear staves splintering,
And the billowy battle blended'

Frontispiece to Oliver
Goldsmith, Regent Library.
(Herbert & Daniel).

ARBELLA STUART.

By B C HARDY. Illustrated. 12s. 6d net.
(Constable)

The story of Arbella, or Arabella Stuart, is one of the lesser tales of great misfortune befalling high estate. Cousin to Queen Elizabeth, standing in close affinity to the English crown, if fortune had smiled on her birth she might have been Queen of England in her own right, by alliance she might have been Duchess of Lennox, Duchess of Parma, Duchess of Holstein, Princess of Nassau, Queen of Poland, Queen of Spain, Queen of France, or even (by marriage with her cousin, James VI. of Scotland) Queen of Great Britain, for every one of these marriages had been proposed for her, and been passed by. She was a grand-daughter of grand old Bess of Hardwick, from whose masterful ways she had at times much to endure. But her great sorrows came through her secret marriage to William Seymour,

Frontispiece to Poems by John Dryden
(Blackie).

Riot of chargers, revel of blows,
And fierce, flush'd faces of fighting foes,
From croup to bridle that reel'd and rose
In a sparkle of sword-play splendid!

and the beauty and wealth of description in some of the sea-poems, all reveal the gifts of Adam Lindsay Gordon. It is curious to think of Gordon as a member of the Australian Parliament, but so he was for two brief sessions in the days of his prosperity. The anonymous introduction, critical and biographical, to this edition of Gordon's poems is both sympathetic and discerning. If Gordon's appeal is directly to the Australian, it is still true that there are many lovers of good verse in England to whom the appeal is no less irresistible.

Frontispiece to Plays and Poems by Oliver Goldsmith (Blackie).

later Marquis of Hertford, which earned for both King James's displeasure and separate imprisonment. Romantic is the tale, and it has inspired poet and novelist from her own day down till 1844, when G. P. R. James published his "Arabella Stuart," which was popular enough in its own time but has long since gone the way of all dull books and is no longer remembered. Since then there have been several biographies, long or short, and the present work is derived from these and from the rich collections of private correspondence belonging to the period. It gives a very lively and sympathetic portrait of a woman who filled no little space in the Court and the life of her day, and whose griefs were nearly as poignant as those of Mary of Scotland, but less legendary.

Frontispiece to George
Eliot, Regent Library
(Herbert & Daniel).

THE BOOKMAN SPRING 1913

THE YOUTH OF HENRY VIII.

A Narrative in Contemporary Letters. By FRANK ARTHUR MUMBY. 10s 6d. net. (Constable & Co.)

Mr. Frank Arthur Mumby has conceived a plan of relating the whole history of England in a very vivid and attractive way. He has already done some good work in collecting and editing examples of the art of the best modern letter writers. A year or two ago he went back to the early days of Queen Elizabeth, and composed a delightful story of her girlhood by means of letters written by the young princess and the persons around her. It was the success of this novel essay in historical narrative that inspired him with the large project of telling the entire history of our country by means of contemporary letters written at the time when events occurred. And now, in "The Youth of Henry VIII," Mr. Mumby, having prepared the groundwork of his scheme, prosperously enters upon his laborious and yet pleasant task. If he can carry the whole of it out with the success he has achieved in the story of the youth of Henry VIII, he will win the gratitude of a large number of readers. I must confess that I have not studied all the letters of the early kings of England, but I should be much surprised if the art of letter-writing in the eleventh and twelfth centuries was practised so widely and so well as it was at the dawn of the English Renaissance, when King Henry VIII—young, handsome, cultivated and immensely wealthy—set out to dazzle Europe as the beau ideal of a Renaissance potentate. All that Lorenzo the Magnificent had been on a small scale Henry meant to become in a very large way. There was apparently no vice in him except a touch of vanity and vain-gloriousness, pardonable, and even natural, in a young man of his position.

"Our King," wrote Mountjoy to Erasmus in 1509, "does not desire gold, or gems, or precious metals, but virtue, glory, immortality. The other day he wished he were more learned. I said, 'That is not what we expect of your Grace, but that you will foster and encourage learned men.' 'Yea, surely,' said he,

From Arbella Stuart
(Constable).

ARBELLA STUART
AGED ABOUT 17.

From The Youth of Henry VIII
(Constable).

HENRY VIII.
From the painting in the National Portrait Gallery.
Photo by Emery Walker.

'for indeed without them we should scarcely exist at all.' Make up your mind that the last day of your wretchedness has dawned. You will come to a Prince, who will say: 'Accept our wealth and be our greatest sage.'"

And here is King Henry at twenty-four, as described in the letter by the Venetian Ambassador: "His Majesty is the handsomest potentate I ever set eyes on; above the usual height, with an extremely fine calf to his leg; his complexion very fair and bright, with auburn hair combed straight and short in the French fashion, and a round face so very beautiful that it would become a pretty woman. The Queen is rather ugly, but the damsels of her court are handsome and make a sumptuous appearance."

The observant Venetian goes on to hint that the Queen, in spite of her plainness, is secure against her lovely rivals, by reason of the fact that she is about to give birth to an heir. There can be little doubt that Henry would have remained openly faithful to Catharine of Arragon if she had given him a son. On the whole, the lively and entertaining volume of letters that Mr. Mumby has collected from the Calendars of State Papers, the Rolls Series, and various other sources, is calculated to give an unprejudiced reader a good opinion of our Royal Bluebeard at the height of his glory. Generous of nature, he trusted men, and was betrayed by those nearest to him. Queen Catharine, on the other hand, does not show in her own letters any of the grace and nobility of character with which Shakespeare has endowed her. The daughter of the subtlest and craftiest intriguer in Europe, she fought for power and position with a cunning that could stoop to strange baseness. Married in her youth to Henry the Seventh's elder son, Prince Arthur, she wrote to her father that she would rather drown than leave England after the death of her husband. With a view to bringing off her re-marriage with the new heir to the throne, she suggested that her father-in-law, old King Henry the Seventh, should be won over by wedding him to her sister, Juana. At the time she wrote Juana was insane and wandering about Castille, carrying with her the corpse of her dead husband, Philip.

It is quite likely that Catharine had fallen in love with the new Prince of Wales, and was ready to see her own mad sister become her mother-in-law, so that she in turn might marry handsome Prince Hal. But injured pride and a fierce passion for power are clearly revealed in Catharine's letters.

There are some wild dramas of naked human passions in this volume of epistles, written for the most part in the ceremonious diction with which princes addressed each other in the first part of the sixteenth century. Now and then one of the actors loses control of himself under the stress of passion and fear, and breaks out into ordinary speech, half inarticulate with emotion. Such is the letter that the Duke of Suffolk wrote to Wolsey, after he had betrayed the King's interests in France and married the widow of the French King. Wolsey's letter in reply is one of the masterpieces of English literature, its subtlety, its power, and its nice balance between a secret friendship for Suffolk and an open fidelity to the King, would have made Machiavelli envious. If Mr. Mumby can continually find material of this sort in contemporary letters, for his series of historical narratives, he will win a numerous and delighted public.

L. W.

PAINTERS AND PAINTING.

By SIR FREDERICK WEDMORE. (Williams & Norgate.)

In this volume of the excellent Home University Library, Sir Frederick Wedmore places his extensive knowledge at the service of the reader, and, without descending from the heights of trained and disciplined taste, discourse, in friendly—one might almost say colloquial—fashion on great painters and their work. Certainly an easy book to read, and illuminating, too, in many a phrase and well directed criticism. Limitations are inevitable, Sir Frederick explains that all schools cannot be included, "and several men, really great, who have been discussed too much, I scarcely discuss at all." But Blake is not even mentioned, and the Japanese artists are left out. After that, we must put up with hearing nothing about Post-

From Mrs Gaskell: Homes, Haunts, and Stories, of which Sir J. Pitman & Sons are about to issue a new edition.

ELIZABETH CLEG-HORN STEVENSON (MRS. GASKELL) BEFORE HER MARRIAGE. From a miniature painted about 1840. Photo by Harrick Brooks, Manchester

bery, executed with that meticulous attention to detail which adds social value to Mr. Newte's work. From the moment when Julie Potter is encountered studying "The Ladies' and Gentlemen's Complete Guide to Conduct and Deportment in Every Circumstance in Life" to the thrilling dénouement, the reader's interest is kept on an almost

A "YOUNG LADY."

By HORACE W. C. NEWTE. (Chatto & Windus.)

Thackeray would have enjoyed this absorbing study of suburban snobbery, executed with that meticulous attention to detail which adds social value to Mr. Newte's work. From the moment when Julie Potter is encountered studying "The Ladies' and Gentlemen's Complete Guide to Conduct and Deportment in Every Circumstance in Life" to the thrilling dénouement, the reader's interest is kept on an almost painful stretch of attention. Julie's infatuation for Bert Spatcher, "one of the k-nuts," her business experiences in the city, and the masterful intrusion into her life of Kenneth Woodward, together with a whole contemporary portrait gallery of suburban types, form a living, closely knit narrative. Hints there are of May morning romance, even of primitive passion, and the inimitable Mr. Applebee, the taxidermist, provides refreshing humour. Paltry social pretences, affectations and mean ambitions are exposed in "A 'Young Lady'" with relentless power. The discovery of Mr. Marble's occupation—he was a carver in a city restaurant—and its appalling effect on the "select" Woodbridge folk, makes one hope this novel will be read by the pathetically stunted women who "give tone" to the Woodbridges of London. Beyond the fact that Mr. Newte overworks the verb "perceive," we have nothing but praise for his new novel.

From Great Composers in Love and Marriage (Long).

B. J. H. Reviewed in last month's BOOKMAN.

From Painters and Paintings CHARDIN: LE BÉNÉDICITE.
(Williams & Norgate). Louvre, Photo Alinari

A GREAT COQUETTE.

By JOSEPH TURQUAN. With 16 Illustrations. 12s 6d.
net. (Jenkins.)

"My book," says M. Turquan, "contains the history of a woman who fascinated at every step." Yet even he finds it difficult entirely to account for the secret of Madame Récamier's fascination. It can be granted that she was beautiful --extraordinarily so-- but even her beauty was of a cold and passionless type. She had no wit, no particular charm of manner. "She was too commonplace to have real intelligence. Without being silly, she was far from being a superior woman, as Madame de Stael would like us to believe. . . . She was a perfect mistress of the art of being bored without showing her weariness. Her heart, source of every beautiful action, generous thought, and originality of intelligence, had been dried up in her worship of vanity." And yet among her "salon" were numbered many of the most distinguished men of her time, she was universally courted, flattered, and adored. She is indeed, as M. Turquan shows so well, a curious study, and one of unusual interest. The anonymous translator of "A Great Coquette" appears to have done his work remarkably well, for the book is both idiomatic and easy reading.

From A Great Coquette
(Jenkins)

MADAME TALLIEN AND MADAME RÉCAMIER.
After the painting by Marguerite
Gérard in the Bordeaux Museum.
Photo, Artigue.

From An Exiled King.
(Hutchinson).

KING GUSTAF ADOLF IV. AND HIS QUEEN, FREDRIKA DOROTHEA WILHELMINA.

LIFE'S CHANCES.

By MARJORIE CROSBIE. 1s. (Alfred Hinde.)

In this collection of verse by Miss Marjorie Crosbie there is much that is very pretty and thoughtful. Miss Crosbie is fluent and graceful, and in the philosophy and facile melody of her poems challenges comparison with Mrs. Ella Wheeler Wilcox, but for the most part the poems have a note of sadness in them, they have not the flashing optimism, the triumphant hope, that makes Mrs. Wilcox's work so universally popular. Nevertheless, Miss Crosbie now and then touches a lighter, happier note very pleasantly; and her purely descriptive verses are charming and vividly realised. Her sadness is, we believe, no more than the sadness of youth; she is young enough still to feel the joy of grief; and when another year or two have ripened her gift and added to her experience we predict that she will give us lyrics that shall be tenderer than these perhaps, though not so pensive. It is only when one has really trodden the sorrowful way that one learns how to be happy. Meanwhile, we are glad to have this little book of thoughtful and very promising poems.

MOLIÈRE.

Euvres complètes en Six Volumes. Avec une Notice sur Molière par EMILK FAGUET, de l'Académie française 1fr 25c. net le volume (Nelson.)

In this age of the world it is hard to be original, as authors and publishers alike know too well. Something like a miracle of originality, however, has been accomplished by the firm of Nelson; for a glance at the bookstalls will show you multitudes of shilling and of sevenpenny reprints that were never there till the Nelson tactics proved the possibility of victory on those desperate lines. Just now, in a specially delightful sense, Nelson has conquered "that sweet enemy, France." The "Collection Nelson" provides exactly what is wanted in England, namely, a choice of the best French literature, new and old, in cheap volumes,

From The Complete Works of Molière (Nelson).

DON GARCIE DE NAVARRE (ACTE II., SCÈNE V.)

From The Complete Works of Molière (Nelson).

LE TARTUFFE (ACTE IV., SCÈNE IV.)

From The Complete Works of Molière (Nelson).

LES FOURBERIES DE SCAPIN (ACTE III., SCÈNE II.)

From The Complete Works of Molière (Nelson).

L'ECOLE DES FEMMES (ACTE V., SCÈNE IV.)

not too large for the pocket or too small for the shelf, sound in text, legible in type, and (oh, great desideratum!) clad in covers of something stronger than Parisian paper. To that collection a most happy addition has been made in the shape of a complete Molière in six charming white and gold volumes, adorned with prints, and enriched as well with a long general preface, and a short introduction to each play from the pen of the most distinguished of living French critics. Ten or fifteen years ago you would have thought these volumes really cheap at half-a-crown apiece. In these happier days they sell at 1fr 25, which, being interpreted, is neither more nor less than the nimble shilling. Such a venture will not lack a generous English welcome,

THE BOOKMAN SPRING 1913

for French, completely French, as Molière is, he has qualities that make him specially attractive to the countrymen of Shakespeare and Dickens, of Sterne and Bernard Shaw. We in England who have taken Don Quixote and Sancho Panza to our bosoms as if they were, like Mr. Pickwick and Sam Weller, part of our national mythology, are not likely to let the accident of nationality lessen our admiration for Molière. We know Tartuffe well, though we sometimes call him Mr. Pecksniff. We have our George Dandin, though we have solemnized him and stiffened him out with British starch and side-whiskers into Mr. Dombey. Even the fault that M. Faguet urges when he calls Molière "un grand écrivain négligé" is pardoned more easily beside the Thames than beside the Seine. Not, by any means, that England is indifferent to form—that, surely, cannot be urged against the land that gave birth to Milton and Shelley. What makes the Briton restive is not form but formalism. We do not care for a poet with a marble style if his heart is marble too. The grandeur of remoteness that distinguishes French tragedy is an impediment rather than an attraction to the Englishman. The noble classic figures seem to move and have their being against the background of a world that is vast and menacing, but dim, aloof, and unpopulated. In that world are passions, but no people; it is not the world in which folk eat and drink and are merry—and die. In that tragic world people do not die; they slay or are slain, or they perish. One is conscious of the few who suffer and of the immortals who sport with them, but not of humankind at large. This, remember, is not so much what French classic tragedy is, as what the generality of Englishmen find it. Shakespeare by contrast teems with life. In and beyond his plays you hear the hum and whirr of the world, and you hear it, though more faintly, in Molière. This, you exclaim, is the world we know, the world, not of passions, but of foibles, where much is terrible, but where much more is ridiculous. The world of Molière is not the world of a few, a super-few, whose voices reverberate to the skies. It is just the mingled concourse of men, various and unexalted, of amusing rogues who cheat, and honest fellows who are cheated, the worst with something good in them, the best redeemed by something humanly foolish.

GEORGE SAMPSON.

ANCIENT GREECE.

By H. B. COTTERILL, M.A. With nearly 150 Illustrations in Half-tone and Line, and 5 Plates in Colour. 7s. 6d. net. (Harrap.)

"Ancient Greece" is the first volume of a new series of histories—the Great Nations—which Messrs. Harrap are publishing. Mr. Cotterill's aim has been to treat adequately every aspect of the Greek civilization in the course of a volume which is neither of unwieldy size or length. Beginning with the Achæan supremacy in the Ægean civilization he traces the whole history of the country until the Rise of Macedonia in the time of Philip and Alexander the Great. His attention is also largely devoted to the art and literature of the country, and his book will be found invaluable as a handy guide to the Grecian spirit. The volume, which is most liberally illustrated, will shortly be followed by others on Rome, France, Germany, Ireland, Scotland, and Mediæval Italy.

THE MATING OF LYDIA.

By Mrs. Humphry Ward. 6s. (Smith, Elder.)

There are haunting echoes in Mrs. Humphry Ward's latest novel, "The Mating of Lydia." "Armored of Lyonesse" comes back to the memory, with its story of the two artistic natures, the woman preternaturally serene and harmonious, the man falling but only to rise again, exceeding human. Here, too, in this story of the Cumberland dales, the man rises on stepping stones of his dead self to higher things. He is the moral of the tale and perhaps for that very reason is a little unreal, just misses capturing our sympathy. Even his creator seems to hurry over him a little impatiently. The other moral of the tale, the collector who tramples everything, family ties, sympathy with his kind, everything and anything human, in his mad mania, is also unreal, more so than his victim. He is a Frankenstein's monster.

Lydia, on the contrary, lives. She is a product of the age which is emancipating women. She will be superior to the old commonplace affections of her sex. The beauty of the world is enough for her. She will only have dealings with men on equal terms, as comrades in the pursuit of the good and beautiful. She would insist on possessing the new dignity and joy added to a woman's life by the march of events, having her soul in her own keeping. "Yet perhaps the Spirit of Irony took note of these new forms in which the natural vanity and the possessive instincts of the sex may now assert themselves." True, for the Spirit of Irony pervades the book. Strong in her new philosophy, blind to its effect on other less ethereal natures, she rejects the young Greek god, but tries to keep him as a comrade, with disastrous results. Her other comradeship, that with the tempted man, contains in itself from the very first the germ of what will eventually level all her magnificent theories with the dust, and show her just as much a woman as her foolish old Mrs. Nickleby of a mother.

The book professes to be a disquisition on the use of wealth. Underneath this obvious motif there is another, perhaps introduced semi-consciously, and certainly more interesting, the subtle resemblance between different forms of selfishness. Lydia determined on enjoying the beauties of nature and art without the intrusion of old-fashioned love; the great lady at the hall keeping to herself her throbbing pleasure in the Cumberland countryside—a remarkable portrait, and as modern as Lydia herself; Faversham, the tempted, determined on retaining the prestige accruing from the possession of priceless cameos; and the Frankenstein's monster who, with all his mania for collecting, does collect the most beautiful things—all these are companions in selfishness. And note the curious fact that the arrival of Faversham and his cameos brings out the old collector's love of beauty, almost hidden under the crust of acquisitiveness. The one really unselfish character in the book, the Greek god, Lord Tatham, is most cruelly treated by fortune, even the marriage hastily arranged for him at the end we feel to be cruel. In many ways he is the greatest success of all the dramatis personæ. Ultra-modern yet absolutely sane and sympathetic, he is a splendid type, a fine creation, one that seems to glow with warmth under his creator's loving delineation.

From Ancient Greece (Harrap).

W. A. F.

THE MOSLEM CHRIST.

An Essay on the Life, Character, and Teachings of Jesus Christ according to the Koran and Orthodox Tradition.
By SAMUEL R. ZWEMER, D.D., F.R.G.S. 3s. 6d. net. (Ophiant, Anderson & Fernier.)

Dr. Zwemer is a well-known antagonist of Islam in the missionary field, and he has now added another volume to several preceding works directed against the Moslem faith. Much of this present book will be chiefly useful to those directly concerned in combating the teaching of Mohammed—a whole chapter, indeed, is given up to the question, "How to preach Christ to Moslems who know Jesus"—but the general reader will also find many things of interest. It is well to know the official Moslem view of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and to learn what is written in that strange medley of writings, the Koran, concerning Him. Both these points are explained with great thoroughness by Dr. Zwemer, and the statements and quotations given may be accepted with confidence. The text of the Koran is taken from Palmer's translation, and the standard commentaries used are those of Berdhawi, Zamakhshari, and Jellalain. A good bibliography is added.

NEW WINE AND OLD BOTTLES.

By CONSTANCE SMEDLEY. 6s. (Fisher Unwin.)

When we catch sight of the name Scroose on the first page of Miss Constance Smedley's new book, it raises hopes that we may perhaps be going to meet again some of the delightful acquaintances we made in "Commoners' Rights." But although the scene is again laid among the Cotswold Hills, none of the people we knew come down from Chipping-dun into the present story. Nevertheless, the new acquaintances we meet in Scroose are quite as attractive as the old, and in some cases even more so. "New Wine and Old Bottles" impresses one in its opening chapters as a keenly interesting story, but it is not until we near the end that we realise the underlying motive of the plot and the great skill with which the author secures her objects. We have nothing but praise for the book and its ideals. Needless to say, Miss Smedley understands her characters through and through, and writes with sympathy and kindly humour of their doings. Readers of the story will long remember Miss Valentine, and her brother who receives such mysteriously heavy packages by rail, Mr. Griggs, the tailor, who designs all the dresses for Miss Valentine's Pageant, Mr. Dobbs, who dogs all Mr. Valentine's movements, suspecting that he is an anarchist, the Beverleys, Mr. Lawrence, the Pringles, and the many others so vividly portrayed in Miss Smedley's stimulating and powerful new book.

From Ancient Greece (Harrop)

From Ancient Greece (Harrop).

From Ancient Greece (Harrop).

From Dream Cities, which will be published shortly by Mr. Fisher Unwin.

BUDUA FROM THE WEST.

in foul nights and fair around our coasts. As to the scope of the work, the author says that he has endeavoured to give a brief but interesting account of our lighthouses and other sea-marks; and, seeing that the book is intended for the general reader, technical and statistical details have been kept down. At the same time, sufficient of the former is given for the reader to understand somewhat how the latest beaconlight is

BRITISH LIGHTHOUSES:

Their History and Romance. By J. SAXBY WRYDE. With 73 Illustrations. 10s 6d. (Fisher Unwin)

Here we have a book that should fill a "felt want." Until it came, we had nothing quite of its kind. Books on seagoing craft, general and particular, on sailormen in all their colourful variety, on long-shore life, the sea and almost all that therein is, we had galore; but, with the exception of W. J. Hardy's "Lighthouses"—a book that differs largely from this one—this is the first attempt to give us a somewhat connected story of the "sailor's candles" that shine so mercifully from their tall "sticks" made to do its work of warning and guiding seamen in dangerous places. As Mr. Wryde says, to have described every lighthouse in detail would have been monotonous indeed; he has been far wiser in giving "a simple description of the more important lighthouses, on an imaginary voyage round our coasts," and in tracing clearly, with here and there that touch of romance which illuminates stolid history, "the gradual growth of the warning signal, from the wood fire in cresset, to the electric arc whose brilliancy is computed in millions of candles." The book is well illustrated, the reproductions from sketches of such places as Cromer Church and East Cliff, Ramsgate lighthouse and harbour, and Swansea bay being particularly good.

From Lost in the Arctic (Heinemann).

See review, "The White, White North," by J. E. Patterson.

ROS-WITHA:
BEING LEAVES
FROM THE LIFE OF MY LITTLE DAUGHTER.

By OTTO
ERNST.
Translated
by A. C.
CATON. 5s.
(A.C.Caton.)

This very charming study of child-life has just been translated from the German by Miss A. C. Caton. The author has a remarkable sympathy with children, and the many touches of quaint humour and the amusing anecdotes scattered through the pages, make Roswitha a real and human, and altogether lovable little creature. The book is refreshing and original; it deals solely with incidents in the life of a bright and happy little girl, and they are natural, perhaps even ordinary incidents, just as she is a natural and perhaps even ordinary child, but it is the simplicity of the book, the total lack of any affectation or straining after effect that makes it so thoroughly readable and so specially appealing to all child-lovers. The translation itself is so ably done that it does not read like a translation. One can open the book at almost any page and find some delightfully amusing little story about Roswitha, or about one of the many people who make up Roswitha's world. She is a little sprite dancing merrily through it, leaving behind a trail of happy memories, which her father has caught between the covers of this volume, and kept there, that others who have never met her may know and love Roswitha too.

From Lost in the Arctic (Heinemann)

AMONG THE ICEBERGS.

FLORIDA TRAILS.

By WIN-THROP PACK-ARD With 41 Illustrations from

Photographs by the Author and Others 7s. 6d net. (Palmer.)

In its flora and fauna Florida is richer than almost any other part of the world, and the impressions of this enthusiastic naturalist, Mr. Winthrop Packard, are well worth reading. The writer is frank enough in regard to his own shortcomings. "Huh!" said one of the local fishermen, "he didn't even know what a garfish was." But, as this book shows, occasional ignorance of Mr. Packard's type can be a good deal more instructive than another man's

From British Lighthouses (Dawson).

THE SOUTH LIGHTHOUSE, LUNDY ISLAND.
(Gibson & Sons, Penzance.)

THE BOOKMAN SPRING 1913

knowledge, and many of his sketches are curious indeed. Such is that devoted to the seven thousand pelicans which cover the face of a three-acre island at breeding time, and which, having broken down all the mangrove trees on their island, have become ground builders rather than leave it. But there is something in the book for everybody who takes the least interest in natural history, while many of the photographs with which it is illustrated are of considerable beauty.

FORTUNES FOR FARMERS.

By BERNARD
GILBERT. With 1
Illustrations. 2s.
net. (Palmer)

England, Mr. Gilbert thinks, still offers an opening for the farmer. There is no need for him to emigrate; he can, if he chooses and sets about it in the right way, easily make a living "off the land" in this country. The writer takes, for example, the specific case of the Lincolnshire farmers. "In my immediate locality are a number of young farmers, between twenty-five and thirty-five years, who are progressing rapidly, taking more and more land, up-to-date, enterprising, and ever ready to try new methods. Some were labourers ten years ago, saved a little money, took a small holding, and never looked back; others were started by their fathers, mostly in a small way, and have gone forward." And the secret of it all is no more than enterprise and modern methods. Mr. Gilbert, for instance, has the utmost scorn for the absurd attitude of the majority of farmers towards the motor-car. Why be prejudiced against an invention which may clearly be adapted in such a manner that it may prove of the utmost practical use in agriculture? And why always row corn, when very often much

Iron Heals
(Cambridge University Press)

STUDY OF AQUILEGIA VULGARIS.

true dweller in the woods the volume is one worth keeping no less for its information than for the way in which it is given. The illustrations are invaluable, and make clear everything in the text. We are shown leaf and bud and flower and fruit, and an especially interesting point is that we have photographs of several trees in winter when the lack of foliage allowed the structural arrangement of the bole and branches to be clearly seen. Very interesting are the scraps and tit-bits of folk-lore and history that gather around particular trees. How many of us remember that the city of Ravenna and the famous Rialto Bridge at Venice are built on piles of alder? Or that the fruit of the ash-tree used to be pickled when it was green and tender, and eaten as a "delicate salad"?

more money may be made in fruit or vegetables? "Fortunes for Farmers" is a stirring, common-sense and practical book. Every farmer should be compelled to digest its teaching.

TREES AND HOW THEY GROW.

By G. CLARKE
NUTTALL. 1 Sc.
With 149 Illustrations. 6 net.
(Cassell & Co)

This is a charming and useful book, describing twenty-five British trees, and all about them, from the cradle to the grave, from seed to root, their ways and appearance and whims, their domestic and interior habits and characteristics, the uses to which they can be put by mankind, in short everything interesting or necessary to know about all the trees of Great Britain. Written with a real love for the "tall tree," it hardly with the passion of the

From Florida Trails
(Palmer).

A LITTLE BLUE HERON AND HER NEST;
THE COMMONEST FLORIDA HERON.

CAMP
AND TRAMP
IN AFRI-CAN WILDS.

By E. TOR-
DAY. With 42 illustrations and a Map
16s. net.
(Seeley, Service & Co.)

In this remarkable book Mr.
Torday

From Trees and How They Grow

ELM TREES IN WINTER, SHOWING BRANCHING.

tribes, finding real friendships among the chiefs and their people, learning to understand and to love them. His book is a noble record, and offers an excellent instance of what the right type of man and the right way of dealing with the native in his

CONES AND LEAVES OF LARCH.

gives an account of his adventures and experiences from 1900 to 1907 in the Congo. Though its record finished six years ago, it is remarkable because it remains fresh and valuable, and because it ignores merely topical matters of great interest
at a certain moment and soon stale. But most of all it is remarkable because of the attitude of the writer to the natives with whom he came in contact. All through the book he shows himself wise,
discerning, tolerant,
sympathetic and understanding to the native and his point

LEAVES OF WYCH ELM AND COMMON ELM.

of view. He sought not to impose
Western civilized ideas upon his impressions, but rather to think with the mind of the native.
The result was that he travelled immense distances through the Congo, often staying for lengthy periods at one village or another, making fast friends with many

Four illustrations from Trees and How They Grow (Cassell).

LARCHES IN WINTER.

home can do for true
civilization.
Often and again he was able to settle deadly wars of extermination between chiefs, without bloodshed, able to help other Europeans in difficulties,
through his experience and prestige. He has no scorn for savages and their habits, not even when they are

From Camp and Tramp in African Wilds (Seeley).

SOUTHERN BAMBALA MAN AND WOMAN.

From How England Saved China
(Unwin).

A STREET SCENE: A BARBER SHAVING.

cannibals, but, as befits a member of the Council of the Anthropological Society, he observes everything and records for our instruction and delectation the habits, the art, the crafts, the folk-lore of his friends. And once at least he received a useful lesson in tolerance and good manners from a cannibal. Two tribes were on the point of deadly war. Mr. Torday had arranged a palaver, which lasted two whole days, and in which he was opposed by a chief who incited the tribe to fight. Losing patience Mr. Torday addressed the tribe vigorously. "Do not listen to this bad man, . . ." and gave excellent and clinching reasons for making peace. The chief said no more, and peace was concluded. But "when all was over he came up to me and said 'You have called me a bad man, because I expressed opinions with which you did not agree. I only said what I thought right. If you did not want to hear the views of people with whom you do not agree why did you call a palaver?' Mr. Torday felt duly rebuked, but the chief bore no malice, and they became excellent friends later on. The book, with its humanity, and its valuable account of the tribes and their ways, is a permanent contribution to knowledge.

STORIES OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE.

By AGNES MAULE MACHAR. With Preface by the Right Rev. J. E. C. WELLDON, D.D. Series I. and II. With 23 Illustrations and 7 Maps. 6s. (Elliot Stock.)

Miss Machar unquestionably possesses the ability to write in a manner that will prove interesting to children, for whom, we take it, her book is primarily intended. At the same time, it should not be neglected by adults—the "busy folks" of the title-page — and if, as we hope it will, the book should come into their hands, they are almost equally certain to appreciate it. Taking the two series together (the first ends with the death of Mary, Queen of Scots), a complete picture—or, better, a series of pictures—is presented of the history of this country from the earliest times until the accession of King George V. It is a varied and vivid panorama of the stirring incidents and great events that have gone to the building up of the British Empire. Miss Machar, who is a Canadian by birth, writes vividly and well, and we have no hesitation in prophesying for the book the success it deserves.

HOW ENGLAND SAVED CHINA.

By J. MACGOWAN. With 38 Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net. (Unwin.)

Mr. Macgowan's book is, as he frankly avows, one with a purpose—that of proving that the Christian missionary in China is justified of his calling. To prove his point the writer gives three examples of reforms which have been introduced by Christianity. The first and most terrible evil of which he treats is the custom—now happily discouraged by the Chinese authorities themselves—of foot-binding among the women. The Heavenly Foot Society, with which Mrs. Archibald Little was prominently associated, has now branches all over China, and it is the exception rather than the rule for Chinese women to bind their feet. The second evil against which Christian missionaries have fought with success is the Chinese custom of destroying unwanted girl babies; while Mr. Macgowan's third example is found in the greatly increasing popularity of modern methods of surgery and medicine, which has been fostered by the medical missionary. Mr. Macgowan's justification of his calling is complete and unanswerable, and his book is one which deserves to be read by everybody who is interested in Chinese questions.

THE LAND OF THE NEW GUINEA PYGMIES.

By CAPTAIN C. G. RAWLING, C.I.F., F.R.G.S. 48 Illustrations and a Map 16s. net. (Seeley, Service & Co.)

This interesting book is, according to the subtitle, "an account of the story of a pioneer journey of exploration into the heart of New Guinea." It was organised towards the end of 1909 by the British Ornithologists' Union in order to commemorate their jubilee. "New Guinea as a whole," says the author, "still offers greater opportunities for the explorer, collector and anthropologist, than any other portion of the globe," so it is not at all surprising that the Union should have decided upon this island for so elaborate an expedition. The work was undertaken in an unknown quarter of Dutch New Guinea and proved exceedingly arduous. The difficulty of obtaining supplies, the impassability of the jungle, and the terrible climate hampered them on every side. During the first year rain fell on no fewer than 330 days and on 295 of them was accompanied by lightning and thunder. Malaria, beri-beri and various other diseases accounted for many deaths. In the year and a quarter that the expedition remained on the island the vast majority of those who did not die were invalided to a healthier climate. Very few remained from the beginning to the end. And yet the results were remarkable. They can be summarised in Captain Rawling's words:—

"Close at hand for the museums were packed 2,200 skins of birds comprising 235 species, many of which were new to science; six cases of mammal skins; many tanks and bottles of reptiles; entomological specimens;

From The Land of the New Guinea Pygmies (Seeley).

DR. MARSHALL (WHO IS ABOUT 5 FT. 9 IN. IN HEIGHT) AND THE FIRST TWO PYGMIES WHO VISITED OUR CAMP. THE STRING BAGS CONTAIN ALL THEIR WORLDLY POSSESSIONS.

quantities of ethnographical objects of great interest and value . . . a map of 3,000 square miles of a hitherto unknown land, complete in every detail . . . But of more human interest than all these was the discovery of the Tapiro pygmies, a really remarkable find at this period of the world's history, and sufficient in itself to have warranted the despatch of the expedition."

From The Fetish Folk of West Africa (Revell).

SEVERAL STRIDES TOWARDS CIVILIZATION.
A Group of Bulu.

THE BOOKMAN SPRING 1913.

Captain Rawling's book, although rather difficult to follow at times, makes capital reading. The modesty and perseverance of these adventurous men is quite astonishing. Reading in his almost joking words of horrible dangers and privations, it is hard to realise what extraordinary difficulties they overcame. They plunged, undismayed, into the heart of the treacherous forest, a forest full of every kind of evil. And yet it was worth it all. The romance of adventure is always worth its hardships.

From The Children's Home Finder
(Nisbet)

From California
(Stanley Paul).

PRESENT OCCUPANTS OF R. L.
STEVENSON'S HOUSE, MONTEREY.

From Good-night and Good-morning,
by Richard Monckton Milnes (Lord Houghton), of which Mr. Elkin Mathews is publishing a new edition.

THE WASTREL.

By HAROLD BINDLOSS. With Coloured Frontispiece. 6s.
(Ward, Lock & Co.)

The plot of "The Wastrel" is sufficiently complicated to do great credit to Mr. Bindloss's powers of invention, but it is not so involved as to confuse his readers at any time. The story is laid in Canada throughout and it opens quietly enough. Jernyngham, the "wastrel," is threatened with a visit from a relative. Well aware that he does not do credit to his family, he induces a friend, Prescott, to assume his name. Prescott consents to what he considers a harmless piece of deception and plays his part with much success.

From Gutter Babies
(Heinemann).

But one thing leads to another, and before long Prescott finds himself in a particularly awkward position, as Jernyngham's suspected murderer. There is a girl also—two, in fact—so that even his love affair is not so straightforward as it might be. Mr. Bindloss avails himself to the full of the opportunities his material gives him, and he has concocted a powerful dramatic and romantic story.

From Painters and Painting.
(Williams & Norgate.)
(See page

RAPHAEL: "LA BELLE JARDINIÈRE."
(Louvre, Mansell).

THE FETISH FOLK OF WEST AFRICA.

By ROBERT H. MILLIGAN. 6s. net. (Revell.)

This is a very good book by an American missionary, and it is valuable because of the author's long and intimate acquaintance with the people whose ways of thought and conduct are here described with great fidelity. Mr. Milligan has no illusions about the "noble savage" or the beauty of primitive man. He is fully alive to the value of all that is good in civilization, but is equally alive to the fact that for the African material progress brings "no power of moral renovation." Against the modern trader in West Africa, with his rum selling, his San Thomé slavery, and his brutal indifference to the welfare of the native population, Mr. Milligan appeals nobly and humanely. Thus modern European trader indeed is seen to be as callous and cruel as the average Spanish "Conquistador" of South America in the sixteenth century, and but for the missionary things would be even worse than they are for the unfortunate West African. The case against the decent

From Paris and her Treasures.
(Methuen).

CLODION'S STATUETTE OF A FAUN WITH HIS CHILDREN. IN THE MUSÉE DE CLUNY.

trader and the government official is that they destroy all tribal authority and ancient customs without doing anything to help the African to adapt himself to the changed conditions. Mr. Milligan, a Protestant, does not do justice to the Catholic missions, but apart from that his book deserves to receive a wide and serious consideration. The stories of the West Africans amongst whom the author dwelt are both gruesome and humorous.

GUTTER BABIES.

By DOROTHEA SLADE. Illustrated. 6s. (Heinemann.)

Miss Dorothea Slade is one of those happy people who can find flowers growing even in the gutter. At all events she has brought from the heart of the slums some of the most delicately pathetic and most quaintly humorous stories that have ever been published. The gutter babies really live and play and work and die in her delightfully realistic book, and one feels at the end as closely akin to those small, wild people of the back streets and alleys, as if one had stolen a little of Miss Slade's deep understanding and tender sympathy. In all the sordid tales of tragedy and woe, of sin and suffering, Miss Slade never loses sight of the brighter side, and even before we are aware of it we are laughing through our tears. There is no exaggeration,

SIGNOR TOSELLI,
who will shortly publish an autobiographical volume through Messrs. Duckworth

VIEW OF LONDON BRIDGE AND THE POOL - ABOUT 161

"LONDON"

From On and Along the Thames (Jarrold).

no extravagant phrasing, no obvious desire to waken pity in the heart of the reader; it is all told simply and naturally, and it is exactly this that makes the tales the more human and pathetic. The impulsive, lovable "Special Johnnie" lives inside the book as vividly as outside it, and his mischievous character is silhouetted boldly against the general greyness of the gutter-life—but each character is real and distinct, and for each of them one has a half tender, half amused memory. The delicate illustrations by Lady Stanley are an added attraction to an altogether pleasing and attractive book.

PARIS AND HER TREASURES.

By ETHEL E. BICKNELL
With 64 Illustrations, 2
Plans, and a Map 5s. net.
(Methuen)

The amount of work which Miss Bicknell has put into this remarkably efficient little guide is nothing short of marvellous, and we have no hesitation whatever in saying that its acquisition is the plain duty of every British visitor to Paris. The feature of the book is its alphabetical list of sights—the "treasures" of the title—than which nothing could have been better done in its way. It seems to us to be absolutely exhaustive. The Louvre, of course, is treated—and well treated—but it is not allowed to swamp the claims upon the sightseer of less-known collections and monuments, while the book's minor details—a select list of restaurants, advice upon theatres and music-halls and shops, recommendations as to what should be seen during a stay of a week, an alphabetical treatment of the principal sights in the adjacent suburbs, and so forth—will be found to be of the utmost value. The book is, indeed, a complete guide minus the customary list of hotels and pensions, and it possesses the great advantage that one can find what one wants in a moment. The map, which marks the Métro routes and stations, is a good one, and the illustrations, though small, are exceedingly well reproduced. It is a model of what such a book should be.

From The Empress Josephine (John Lane).

(From an engraving by Delagorgue, after Label, pupil of David.)

EMPERESS JOSEPHINE.

ON AND ALONG THE THAMES.

By W. CULLING GAZE.
Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net.
(Jarrold)

The full story of the Thames is not to be told in a single volume. Mr. Culling Gaze has, without the least prolixity, devoted the whole of this portly book to a record of less than a quarter of a century of its history during the reign of James I. He begins with an account of the towns and villages on the banks of the river from its head to its mouth, and gives separate chapters to the royal residences along its course; to the court life, the religious life that were lived beside it; and passes to an account of its government, its association with naval and military affairs; its commerce and trade, its pleasure and sport, and there is a delightful

From On and Along the Thames (Jarvold).

chapter on the water processions that used to take place upon it on Lord Mayors' Days. Mr. Gaze has done his work so thoroughly and well that "On and Along the Thames" is one of the most entertaining of the almost countless books that London has inspired. The illustrations from old views of London along the Thames about 1616 add greatly to the charm and usefulness of the volume

THE EMPRESS JOSEPHINE.

By JOSEPH TURQUAN.
Authorized Translation by Violette M. Montagu
12s 6d net. (John Lane)

Because men love romance better than reality, the fictitious figure of the Empress Josephine will probably long maintain its place in the great Napoleonic drama as that of a heroine of surpassing beauty, noble character, and saintly disposition, who was ruthlessly sacrificed as soon as she barred the way to the accomplishment of her husband's inordinate ambition. M. Turquan claims to have demolished this fancy picture, and to show us instead the Empress Josephine as she really was. In his latest book he continues and concludes the version of her life story which was commenced in The Wife of General Bonaparte some two years ago. The present volume is characterised by much the same merits and defects as its predecessor. He marshals his carefully selected facts very well, and states his case with vigour and lucidity; but it is obviously the ex parte speech of a counsel for the prosecution rather than the deliberate summing-up of the judge.

Of course, it cannot be denied that the real Josephine was something very different from the popular melodramatic conception of her. She was neither a great beauty, nor a woman of unimpeachable character. Although the possessor of a wonderfully fine pair of dark, expressive eyes, a singularly melodious and caressing voice, and a supple, well-proportioned figure whose every movement was marked by a characteristically indolent Creole gracefulness, Josephine when she first emerges into the light of history appears as a widow over thirty years of age (six years older than Napoleon); who endeavoured to make up for the bloom of youth by rouge and powder, and to conceal the disfiguring badness of her teeth by a close-lipped smile. She had had no education worth speaking of, she possessed few accomplishments, and she owed her position in the anomalous society of the time to the fact, which she somehow managed to conceal from Napoleon, that she was a paid mistress of the infamous Barras. There is no doubt whatever that although Napoleon was passionately in love with her, she had at the outset little affection for him. She was cold and dilatory in her replies to his ardent letter from Italy, and hung back as long as possible from joining him at Milan. Within less than a year of their marriage she compromised herself with Hyppolite Charles, a young hussar officer; and a year

From Stories of the British Empire
(Elliot Stock)

SIR WALTER RALEIGH.

or two later behaved so indiscreetly with him during her husband's absence in Egypt that Bonaparte then had serious thoughts of divorcing her, and would have had good ground for so doing. From that date onward the fear of a divorce hung like the sword of Damocles over Josephine's head, but although he was perpetually being urged to it by his brothers and sisters, Napoleon's affection for his wife was too strong to permit of his making the wretch. After the estab-

From The Life of Gilbert Sheldon
(Wells Gardner).

THE SHELDONIAN THEATRE, OXFORD.

Napoleon had placed the matter on a purely pecuniary footing by promising to pay her debts, allow her an income of three million francs, provide her with a palace or two to live in, and permit her to retain the title of Empress. By suggestions of this kind, and by a too persistent and somewhat monotonous insistence on Josephine's triviality or childishness, or selfishness, or some other undesirable quality, M. Turquan detracts from the value of what might otherwise have been an in-

Photo by Henry H.utton.

THE DUOMO AND BAPTISTERY OF PARMA.

From Little Cities of Italy
(Putnam).

lishment of the Empire, however, another and more powerful motive came into play. Josephine was incapable of bearing a son and hence to the throne, and was asked to consent to a divorce in order that by another marriage the Napoleonic dynasty might be more firmly established. M. Turquan goes the length of maintaining that it was Josephine's plain duty to have welcomed the proposal, and, crediting her as he consistently does, with none but the most forming as well as interesting piece of work. The translation is very well done, and the volume is illustrated with numerous portraits.

JOHN FVIL.

THE LIFE AND TIMES OF GILBERT SHELDON

By VERNON
STALEY. With
20 Illustrations
(Wells Gardner)

"From the death of Laud to the primacy of Sancroft," says Mr. Staley, "a most important and eventful period of English Church history, Sheldon stands

(Johnson & Hoffman.)

AKBAR'S GATE. FATEHPORE-SIKRI.

From Indian Pages and Pictures
(Putnam).

selfish motives, he alleges it was not the prospect of losing her husband which distressed her, but the thought of losing her exalted rank and of having to live on a reduced income which would not permit of the extravagance to which she had become accustomed. And he suggests that she would probably have consented readily enough if

From The Life of Gilbert Sheldon
(Wells Gardner).

ALL SOULS, OXFORD.

out as the most eminent and capable Church man of the time covered by the Great Rebellion and the Restoration. . . . To Sheldon and Clarendon was committed the delicate and responsible task of re-organising the English Church and Nation, after the convulsion and upheaval of the Commonwealth—a task which, when we survey the whole complicated situation created by the Revolution, and recognise the corrupt state of the Court at the Restoration, fills the mind with dismay by its intricacy and vastness." Yet until now there has been written no record of the life and deeds of this great Churchman, a man who dared to remonstrate publicly with Charles II. for his profligacy and evil life. Mr. Vernon Staley, who, as Archbishop Sheldon once was, is the Rector of Ickford, Bucks, is to be warmly thanked for having ably filled an important gap in the literature dealing with the English Church.

LITTLE CITIES OF ITALY.

By ANDRÉ MAUREL. Vol. II. 108 net (Putnam)

Monsieur André Maurel is well known in France as a novelist and journalist, and a distinguished critic and connoisseur in painting, sculpture and architecture, and a delicate and charming writer upon the artistic and natural beauties of Italy. His "Little Cities of Italy" dates from 1890, and the appearance of the first volume was hailed

From Gardening (The Hobby Books) (Nelson).

A ROCK GARDEN.

with cordial appreciation from a critical public, and was crowned by the Academy and won the Marcelin Guerin prize. The present translation, of which this is the second volume, gives the work to American readers and to English. It is really a delightful book, full of impressions of beautiful and interesting things recorded by a most sensitive and discriminating mind. It wanders from town to town, leaving with the reader little vignetted glimpses for the mind's eye, little swift peeps into the lurid and tormented history of those troubled communities, tender little idylls of travel. It would make an agreeable addition to the books that are part of the baggage of the wanderer in Italy, and deserves less than most the usual fate of such books—to remain locked in a portmanteau, left somewhere to be called for later. There might, however, have been a map, and there should most certainly have been an index, the lack of which is the one blemish upon a handsome volume.

Coleridge's Cottage: Nether Stowey
From Coleridge and Wordsworth
in the West Country
(Elkin Mathews).

INDIAN PAGES AND PICTURES.

By MICHAEL MYERS SHOEMAKER With 63 Illustrations.
108 net (Putnam)

Mr. Shoemaker has written a pleasant, discursive book about India sufficiently described in its title "Pages and Pictures." He is clearly an experienced "globe-trotter," experienced enough to be something more. Unfortunately it is just the something more that is lacking to Mr. Shoemaker. He writes with knowledge and in a direct, bright style that is agreeable and engaging, he would certainly be

The Holford Coombs

From Coleridge and Wordsworth
in the West Country
(Elkin Mathews).

From Byzantine Architecture
(Cambridge University Press)

NOTRE DAME LA GRANDE, POITIERS.

f Supplement

a delightful companion. But he never loses the globe-trotting point of view, he sees always from the outside. So it is he naively tells us writing of Oudeypour, as he spells it, "those old moghuls were men of taste surely." His surprise at the discovery is fresh and exquisite, and he seems to call the world to share it. A little further on he tells us gravely that the carvings on Hindu temples "upon closer inspection are repulsive, for most are of the vilest character." It is essentially of the globe-trotter to bring an unspoiled mind from his home, "coelum non animus mutant, qui trans mare currunt." However, Mr. Shoemaker's book gives a lively if superficial picture of Indian places and Indian life, and may be commended for its liveliness as a fireside guide to the armchair traveller for whom it is intended.

From Byzantine Architecture
(Cambridge University Press).

THE NARTHEX AND WEST DOOR, VEZELAY.

THE LIFE OF JOHN JERVIS; ADMIRAL LORD ST. VINCENT.

By CAPTAIN W.
V. ANSON, R.N.
With Illustrations, Maps and Plans. 10s 6d
(John Murray.)

Following up the well-deserved success that he gained with his biography of Admiral Anson, Captain Anson has now as efficiently turned his attention to that eighteenth century seaman whose very name seems—to those who know the history of the Navy—to spell discipline. There is an especial fitness in the author making this his second book, as

From King René d'Anjou and his Seven Queens
(Long).

YOLANDA D'ARRAGONA
(KING RENÉ'S MOTHER).
From coloured glass window,
Le Mans Cathedral

From King René d'Anjou and
his Seven Queens
(Long).

KING LOUIS OF SICILY-ANJOU (KING RENÉ'S FATHER).
Le Mans Cathedral

he shows thus: "Put into the Navy by Anson, who was a Staffordshire man like himself, John Jervis started with nothing to help him beyond Anson's nomination, and a letter afterwards asking Saunders to look after him." "It was doubtless the hard battle he had to fight as a lad, in order to force his way up, that produced in him the stern simplicity and hard exterior (hiding a warm nature underneath) which made him feared, indeed, but respected and obeyed with all the loyalty a good and able man is sure to win from those who serve under him and trust him." It is the life of this man—without, like the oak of which his ships were built; within, manly and tender—that Captain Anson so ably puts before us, showing the great importance of the disciplinary work that was done by St. Vincent and a few of his immediate forerunners and contemporaries, and without which Nelson's victories could not have been what they were, and might even have been defeats. It is a fine and stimulating record.

From St. Augustine of Canterbury
(Murray).

THE SO-CALLED ST. AUGUSTINE'S CHAIR
AT THE CATHEDRAL, CANTERBURY.

THE BOOKMAN SPRING 1913

SAINT AUGUSTINE OF CANTERBURY.

By SIR HENRY H.
HOWORTH, K.C.I.E.,
Hon D.C.L. (Durham),
F.R.S., F.S.A., etc., etc.
With 14 Illustrations,
Maps and Plans 12s.
net (Murray)

The present volume—its predecessor being "Saint Gregory the Great"—is the second which Sir Henry Howorth has devoted to his study of the birth of the English Church. It cannot be said that its hero is a man in any way comparable with the great Pope to whom Christianity in England was originally due. Augustine as a Churchman was narrow and prejudiced, trained in a monkish school, and his efforts to force himself as their primate upon the British were attended with only moderate success. His mission was indeed in many respects a failure, and in the author's view, "the best that can be said of Augustine is that he was a commonplace man with good motives and high standards, set to do a work much beyond his capacity, and for which he had a very indolent training." As a study of little known times the volume is of the greatest interest, and the various details of Saint Augustine's mission are set forth in an exact and scholarly manner. The appendices are lengthy and exhaustive, and the illustrations are well worthy of their place in the volume.

THE MARRIED LIFE OF QUEEN VICTORIA.

By CLARE JERROLD
With 18 Illustrations.
15s. net (Nash)

Mrs. Jerrold's "Early Life of Queen Victoria" was, we believe, very well received by both critics and public, and the companion volume which has just been published gives the writer an even better opportunity of displaying her capability for the task she has set herself. Queen Victoria's earlier years may have been less generally known to the public, but at least the materials for a history are avail-

From Way Stations
(Hodder & Stoughton)

ELIZABETH ROBINS
Photo by Elliott and Fry

From Mary Russell Mitford, by W. J. Russell, which will be published during the Spring by Mr. Melrose.

MARY RUSSELL MITFORD.
From a painting by John Lucas, 1829.

able. Her married life is seen through a veil of prejudice. Prince Albert, unfortunately, aroused no enthusiasm for his many excellent qualities. The young person of the present day believes that he was dull—which he was not—and priggish—which he may have been. In many respects he was to blame for the attitude both of the past and of the present. He "kept himself to himself," as the saying goes, he had no intimate friends in this country, and he had all a middle-class Englishman's abhorrence for an exposure of the facts of his private life. Moreover, he had but little charm of manner, and he was emphatically not gracious. He was wholehearted in his determination to keep himself in the background as far as possible. "He made the members of his household promise most solemnly," Mrs. Jerrold tells us, "that they would never repeat anywhere any account of the things they heard or saw in the Royal Household, while Ladies and Maids were on their honour not to keep diaries. These promises were kept most loyally. And the result of it all was that the Prince helped to annihilate himself." Mrs. Jerrold's picture of the Prince Consort is finely drawn. Evidently she feels much sympathy for him—more than she does for Queen Victoria, towards whom she is sometimes perhaps a little unkind. But she is never unfair. She solidifies her attitude by a recital of facts. Nevertheless, in order to appreciate Queen Victoria properly it is essential that you should read this book. As a volume of popular history it is admirably done. Sometimes piquant, invariably well-written, it interests and holds the reader from the first page to the last.

WAY STATIONS.

By ELIZABETH ROBINS.
6s. net. (Hodder and Stoughton).

When one looks at the list of women distinguished in literature, art, science, music, who support the cause of woman's suffrage, it is difficult to understand how any man can flatly oppose their demands—how any man can, in effect, say to himself: "I am capable of voting in Parliamentary elections, but these women are not." One would think it required an almost sublime self conceit to enable him to maintain that complacent attitude of mind. But as a rule it is not so much conceit that governs his view as a careless ignorance of the case for the other side, and all such who are wise enough and fair-minded enough to wish to be cured of that ignorance should read Miss Elizabeth Robins's "Way Stations." It is made up of articles, lectures and speeches—some of them now for the first time printed—that Miss Robins has written and delivered on the more salient aspects of the woman's movement, and these are linked together with concise historical chapters that relate the whole story of that movement and its striking developments within the last eight years. The prevailing tone of the book is so calmly and finely reasonable, its facts are marshalled so ably and its arguments advanced with so much force and such a breadth of sympathy with and understanding of both sides of the question, that it is hard to see how an impartial anti-suffragist could read it and remain uninfluenced. It is a masterly and convincing assertion of woman's claim to the common rights of citizenship, it knocks to pieces the ridiculous bogey that women are actuated in their demands by any sex-antagonism, and disposes of the suggestion that men have deliberately initiated the injustices that women suffer from, with a shrewdly imagined account of how man rose to predominance and woman sank into subservience naturally and from force of circumstances in their pre-civilized state. "Way Stations" is a deeply interesting and valuable contribution to the literature of woman's suffrage by one of its most brilliant advocates.

THE WAY OF UNDERSTANDING.

By J. WARSCHAUER,
M.A., D.Phil. 3s. 6d.
net (James Clarke)

Here the author presents us with twenty-five sermons which he preached on consecutive Sunday mornings to an urban and industrial congregation in the North of England. Mr. Warschauer assures us that they are printed practically as they were delivered, therefore it must have been a pleasure to hear him. The word "sermon" usually acts as a mild panic on us moderns; but here the preacher is nothing if not manly. Take this as a sample: "Do not, I beg of you, let us identify religion with owlish and sepulchral airs, or even with particularly plain and unbecoming garb, as though an offence to taste were really an outer sign of godliness—the connection is quite imaginary. I have always sympathized with Dante Gabriel Rossetti's quaintly despairing remark when his gifted sister, Christina, became a novice of an Anglican convent at Clewer: 'Here is Christina, who has entered the religious life, and made herself look exactly like a penwiper!' And I am bound to say that one has known some excellent religious people conscientiously and deliberately affect a style that cast a chill over a summer's day. What a mistake!" Quite true. More such commonsense Christian preaching would do something towards refilling our empty churches. We recommend Mr. Warschauer's twenty-five addresses as good, straightforward, interesting talks.

From The Married Life of Queen Victoria
(Nash)

H.R.H. THE PRINCESS ROYAL AT
THE TIME OF HER MARRIAGE.
From a painting by Winterhalter

From A Keeper of Royal Secrets
(Nash).

MADAME DE GENLIS IN LATER LIFE.

THE BOOKMAN SPRING 1913'

SPIRIT AND POWER.

By DAVID M. M'INTYRE. 2s. 6d. net. (James Clarke.)

This is a helpful sort of book that has largely been made out of addresses and discussions which took place in Scotland during the summer and autumn of the past year, when there appears to have been a general desire for spiritual awakening. At the same time it is not solely a collection of conference addresses. It is an examination, as detailed as the assigned limits admit, of elements which may contribute towards a revived condition of the religious life of our own time and need. Taking the material of what he said on the platform, the author has worked out and beyond what was then said, seeing and elaborating, in the leisure of the study, points which were naturally left unnoticed in the

MR. TIGHE HOPKINS.
Author of "Wards of the State" of the innumerable tomes that spring continually from brief journeyings in Palestine. The keynote of the book is the immemorial antiquity of Palestine, its unchanging traditions, beliefs, manners, even geographical land marks, the persistence of the old Canaanite and his habits. When we have read, we are conscious of a profound sympathy with the people of the country, not because of their Biblical interest, but for themselves, and at the same time we feel a keener interest in the Bible story of the Israelites. The difference between this fresh, full, undidactic book and the ordinary concoction of a half-digested tour among beaten tracks is something to be very grateful for.
(Herbert & Daniel).

A SON OF THE SUN.

By JACK LONDON. 6s. (Mill & Boon)

An indescent fabric steeped in

DR. J. WARSCHAUER.
Author of "The Way of Understanding"
(Clarke).

heat of debate and the flow of platform language. Nor is he in the least pawky, feeble or sentimental in his religion; on the contrary he writes strongly, with fervour and not a little virility on such subjects as "The Outlook," "Joy in the Ministry," "Revival in the Church," "The Gospel the Preacher's Theme," "Pastoral Care," "The Missionary Motive," "The Gift of Faith," etc. Altogether the book is one that should appeal and be helpful to all who have the cause of Christianity at heart.

THE IMMOVABLE EAST.

By PHILIP J. BALDEN-SPERGER. With 24 illustrations. 7s. 6d. net. (Pitman.)

The author of this book was born in Palestine and educated with the Arabs and lived for nearly forty years among them until he settled in Nice in 1892. With his four brothers he devoted himself to agriculture, and for years travelled up and down the country carrying their bee-hives and their wooden houses on the backs of camels from hill to plain and sea-coast, following the seasons, deeply identified with the country and learning all its ways until there were few things secret from this son of an Alsatian missionary. Though he has been a regular contributor to certain journals, and has been much quoted by other writers on Palestine, this is his first book, and is a refreshing surprise to the reader

Frontispiece to The Life of the Right Hon. Sir Alfred Lyall, by Sir Mortimer Durand, which will be published shortly by Messrs. Blackwood

SIR ALFRED LYALL.
From the portrait by J. J. Shaughon, R.A., 1890.

nesia, half-children and half-gods, to the howling savages of Melanesia, head-hunters and man-eaters, half devil and all beast. Told in Mr. Jack London's terse and vivid style and packed with a wealth of exciting incident, "A Son of the Sun" is certain to be one of the most widely read adventure stories of the year.

REV. D. M. M'INTYRE.
Author of "Spirit and Power"
(Clarke).

the intense colours and perfumes of the tropics, and thickly studded with clear-cut gleaming gems of adventure--such is "A Son of the Sun." Mr. Jack London's hero, David Griof, is a muscular trader, worth untold millions, whose delight it is to rub shoulders with fun and adventure in the course of his cruises among the fascinating islands of the South Pacific, where his multifarious interests extend from Samoa to New Guinea, and embrace pearls and pirates, buried treasure and uncharted coral reefs. Blue-eyed, with a yellow moustache, he possesses a skin with a marvellous sun-resisting capacity. "Other white men were pervious. The sun drove through their skins, ripping and smashing tissues and nerves, till they became sick in mind and body, tossed most of the Decalogue overboard, descended to beastliness, drank themselves into quick graves, or survived so savagely that war vessels were sometimes sent to curb their license." The natives of the islands are sketched with equal power, ranging from the flower-garlanded, golden-glowing men and maids of Poly-

A HALF CENTURY AMONG THE SIAMESE AND THE LĀO:

An Autobiography: By DANIEL MCGILVARY, D.D. With an Appreciation by ARTHUR J. BROWN, D.D. 7s. 6d. net.
(Fleming Revell.)

Dr. McGilvary spent fifty-three years in Northern Siam as a Presbyterian missionary, and died, at the full age of eighty-three, in the land of his adoption in 1911. When he was seventy-five years old he began to write this autobiography, the plain and grave life-story of a man of high character and purpose. Dr. McGilvary was an American, but of Highland race, and, in his own words, "a Scotsman of Scotsmen." All that he tells us of his boyhood in Buffalo, where his father was "a ruling elder" in the church, is of exceptional interest; for the "old school type" of piety that prevailed, with its nightly task of the Shorter Catechism, its "great quarto Illustrated Family Bible, with the Apocrypha and Brown's Concordance"—the only pictorial book in the house—the Fall Communion, and the Sabbatarian rule that forbade whistling even of hymn tunes on Sundays, must be hard to find in the United States to-day. "My father loved his children, but never descended to the level of familiarity with them when young, and could not sympathise with their sports," wrote

From August Strindberg BUST OF STRINDBERG.
by L. Lind af Hageby, a translation of which is announced for early publication by Messrs. Stanley Paul.

Dr. McGilvary, calmly and without hint of reproach. After two years in Siam McGilvary married, and all the country did honour to him and to his wife when they celebrated the jubilee of their wedding in 1910. The respect was justly won, though at times the solemn, disinterested altruism of the missionary must have puzzled the lads. The autobiography is utterly free of all exaggeration, and is as modest and thoughtful as it is matter of fact.

MARRIED.

By AUGUST STRINDBERG. 6s. (Frank Palmer)

These twenty stories of married life are some of the best things that Strindberg has ever done. When the book first made its appearance in Sweden, in 1886, its sale was prohibited; the author was prosecuted and acquitted,

AUGUST STRINDBERG, AUTHOR OF "MARRIED" (Palmer).

DANIEL MCGILVARY.
Frontispiece to A Half Century among the Siamese and the Lāo (Revell).

From The Dalesman
(Titus Wilson, Kendal)

FARMER OR LAWYER?
Photo—Mr. G. L. Saul

and the volume, being then republished, had an enormous success. Why it should have been censored it is a little difficult to see. The opening story, which is by no means one of the best, is the only one to which any serious objection can be taken. It is a clever enough study of a rather abnormal, unhealthily morbid youth who marries a woman older than himself and dies when he is about twenty. Again and again Strindberg ascribes much of the sin and misery of the world to the fact that men cannot earn a large enough income to be able to support a wife when they are very young; withal, most of the marriages in these stories of his turn out unhappily. They are drab, saddening, somewhat sordid stories in the main; they are ironical or grimly humorous, steeped in the pathos of disillusionment and failure, yet not without their moments of pity and tenderness and glimmerings of occasional idealism. The men and women of them may not often be pleasant persons, but they are amazingly natural. Strindberg paints life almost as sombrely as Ibsen did, though in one story he makes delightful fun of Ibsen's philosophy. One wishes that the tales had a little more of the joy and sweetness of human experience in them, but of their truth, within their limits, and the insight and power with which they are written, there can be no question.

ELIZABETHAN KESWICK

By W. G. COLLINGWOOD, M.A., F.S.A. With 15 Illustrations. 5s. net. (Titus Wilson, Kendal)

Mr. Collingwood's most interesting work consists of a series of extracts from the original account books, 1564-1577, of the German miners, in the archives of Augsburg. It is seldom realised that it was a German firm that developed the copper mines at Keswick and in other parts of the Lake District during the reign of Queen Elizabeth. A regular German colony or settlement was then made in the district, in time to be absorbed by its English neighbours. For a while, however, it was an important concern, as is shown by numerous extracts which Mr. Collingwood has transcribed and translated. His book, indeed, is a most important contribution to the science of archaeology, and nobody who is interested in that subject should err by overlooking it. The illustrations are from old prints.

From Camping with Car and Camera
(Dent).

From Caravanning and Camping-out, which will be published shortly by Messrs. Herbert Jenkins

A HALT BY THE WAYSIDE.

THE SAILOR WHOM ENGLAND FEARED.

By M. MACDERMOT CRAWFORD With Illustrations
by Nash

"The Sailor Whom England Feared" is an attractive and well-written account of the life of John Paul Jones, the famous "pirate" and "traitor." Although born in Scotland of mysterious but almost certainly British parentage, as a fact, Paul Jones was neither pirate nor traitor. Certainly he won fame by carrying arms against the country of his birth, but he was then an American citizen, and his sympathies were naturally enlisted on the side of the United States. His memory has suffered much at the hands of contemporary historians. Paul Jones seems in reality to have possessed a manner which may be justifiably described as charming while he was certainly a man of personal integrity and of a courage which won the respect and admiration of his adopted countrymen. He was a born commander and a naval fighter of brilliant abilities. The story of his life and adventures reads like one of the most romantic of novels, and it is here told in a most vigorous and interesting manner. The author establishes a complete vindication of the character of an heroic and much misunderstood man.

From The Immovable East (Pitman).

A FELLAH AND HIS CAMELS, ON THE BANKS OF THE KISHON.
From a photo by I. H. Halladjian, Haifa

From A War Photographer in Thrace
(Unwin).

THE RETREAT AFTER LULE BURGAS: A PHOTOGRAPH AT CHORLU.

THE PASSING OF THE DRAGON.

By J. C. KEYTE, M.A. With 38 Illustrations and a Map.
6s. (Hodder & Stoughton)

For some reason or other the impression has arisen that the recent revolution in China was practically bloodless and that it was attended by but slight loss of life. That may have been the case in the coastal districts, but in the interior portions of the country it certainly was not so. Almost inevitably foreigners were involved—most unwillingly—in the struggle, and the consequences were very far from pleasant for them. It was very fortunate for Mr. Keyte's friends that he happened to be in Peking when the news reached him of the awkward situation in which they were placed. He at once set about organising an expedition for their relief, and so successful was he that he was asked by the Swedish minister to attempt the rescue of the Swedish Missionaries at their station in north-west Shensi. Mr. Keyte writes in a lively and vivacious manner (though he is not above pointing a moral at times), and as a record of travel, adventure and politics combined it would be hard to find an equal to "The Passing of the Dragon."

THE PASSING OF THE TURKISH EMPIRE IN EUROPE.

By CAPTAIN B. GRANVILLE BAKER. With 33 Illustrations and a Map. 10s. net. (Seeley.)

Captain Granville Baker's admirable book is especially useful as a supplement to the many volumes dealing with the Balkan War which have recently been pouring from the Press. The author does not appear to have had any personal experiences to record, but he was present in Constantinople in war time, and the countries of the Balkan League seem to be fairly familiar to him. The book is at once a popular and admirably condensed history of the various nations involved in the struggle, and a volume of travel sketches. The author writes with a sympathetic and understanding pen, and many clever little accounts of personal impressions— as, for instance, his acquaintanceship with Dedo Mitli, an old Bulgarian innkeeper— show him at his best. As a keen military man the lessons which Captain Granville Baker draws from the Balkan War are of minatory import to this country, but on the whole his is an enjoyable volume, while the illustrations—from the author's own sketches—are decidedly attractive.

From The Passing of the Dragon
(Hodder & Stoughton).

THE GATEWAY AT SUITECHOU. TOWN GUARD AT GATE.
HEADS OF BANDITS EITHER SIDE OF THE GATEWAY.
PROCLAMATIONS POSTED UP AGAINST EACH HEAD.

A DAY IN TANGIER.

By SIR ARTHUR
LASSENBY LIBER-TY. With 25
Illustrations by JOHN HASSALL,
17 from Photographs by LADY LIBERTY and others, and a Frontispiece by JOHN LAVERY.
Edition limited to 250 copies.
7s. 6d. net.
(Black.)

It is rather pleasant to find oneself in complete agreement with a publisher's puff, but it is decidedly an unusual experience. Still, Messrs. A. & C. Black are exactly right in claiming that "A Day in Tangier" "suggests the ideal way of making holiday and gleaming enjoyment from the most trifling incidents." It does. It is a slight book—one of humour rather than of travel—but it is very well worth reading and keeping, as well for the illustrations as for the text. (Mr. Hassall is, as usual, delightfully amusing.) Sir Arthur Liberty shows none of the signs of the novice, if indeed he be one—his work is as creditable to him as it will be amusing to other people. The binding and general production make the volume a thing of beauty and worthy of the taste of its author.

From Two Years under the Crescent (Nasbet).

NAZIM PASHA.
A sketch from life by the author.

towards, for instance, the Reinhardt productions, is to be regarded as indubitable sign of the increase of its popularity. But what is being done upon the Continent? Here Mr. Carter places before us the impressions he has gathered

THE NEW SPIRIT IN DRAMA AND ART.

By HUNTLY
CARTER. With
63 Illustrations
(5 in Colour).
12s. 6d. net.
(Frank Palmer.)

A guide to recent tendencies in art and the drama was badly needed, and Mr. Huntly Carter may be congratulated upon the admirably clear and readable manner in which he has set them forth. He regards the "new spirit" as it affects the art and drama of this country. "England," he thinks, "can no longer be regarded as insular in the matter of ideas. Ideas know no boundaries, and those of the reform of the European theatre and drama are at our doors." In the person of Gordon Craig, however little his work may be appreciated in England, we have supplied the movement with one of its leading spirits, and the hospitality recently extended

From A Day in Tangier
(Black).

"OUR CAVALCADE ATTRACTS MUCH UNSOUGHT ADMIRATION FROM THE CROWD."

From Fifteen Years of a Dancer's Life

(Herbert Jenkins). See Review Dances and Dancing by George Sany

THE BUTTERFLY DANCE.

from a recent tour of Europe, and the result is a volume of much importance and interest. A special feature of the book is a large number of beautifully produced illustrations, five of which are effectively rendered in colours.

JOZEF ISRAELS.

By J. ERNEST PHILLIPS. 1's. 6d. net. (George Allen)

When Jozef Israels died, in the summer of 1911, he was eighty-seven years of age, and had been a painter for over seventy of them. At forty-eight, or so, he entered, by resonance and full sympathy, the circle of artists conveniently known as the Hague School. Though absent from the beginnings, he survived the close of their remarkable "movement." He saw the stream of modern Dutch painting break back and forward into fresh beds, and himself carried on in his old course. He was developing all the time. The circumstances of his life were fortunate. At a comparatively early age he attained a world-wide popularity. As he matured he won more and more the respect of the discriminating. His old age was a revelation and triumph of personality. He became the pet of his countrymen, the smallness of his inches favouring the affectionate and intimate sentiment with which they surrounded him, and taking nothing from the authority of his figure as a great artist himself and the last (if we except Matthew Mauns, and he stands alone) of a group of great artists.

As a man and as a painter he was vital to the end. That was his happy fortune.

Israels and his work were so variously discussed in his lifetime that there is little new to say of them now that he is dead. The facts of his life are simple and unimportant. He was born (1824) in Groningen, where his father was a stock and share broker. His parents, Jews, designed him for the Rabbinate, but he wished to be a painter, and at sixteen was having his way. For seven years or so he was in Amsterdam.

From The New Spirit in Drama and Art
(Palmer).

STUDY OF NIJINSKI,
by Paul Irlbe.

From Fifteen Years of a Dancer's Life
(Jenkins).

THE DANCE OF THE BUTTERFLY.

working in the studio of the younger Kruseman, and studying at the Academy under the elder Pieneman. Mr. Marius says that while in Amsterdam he received a great impression from the exhibition of Ary Scheffer's "Gretchen at the Spinning Wheel," and that he went to Paris in 1846. There he studied under Picot, and came within the influence of Delaroche. For fully twenty years after his return to Holland, in 1848, Amsterdam was his home, but the village of Zandvoort (to which he first went in the early fifties, to recuperate after an illness) was his inspiration. It was not until 1860 or 1870, perhaps later, that he settled in the Hague. In one of his letters, dated May, 1872, Bosboom writes that he and his wife are going to call on Israëls, who has just taken the house occupied by Schelfhout, recently dead, and adds, "Israëls is very happy that he lives in the Hague . . . It is a difference—in Amsterdam and the Prinsengracht and here opposite the Acclimatietuin!" So he was at least forty-five before he joined the group at the Hague of which Bosboom, then over fifty, was the central figure. For the forty years thereafter the landmark dates in Israëls' career are those of his pictures and the triumphs he shared with the so-called Hague School. His part in the Rembrandt celebrations in 1906, the essay he wrote on that master (not specially for Messrs. Jack's "Masterpieces of Colour"), the personal tributes he received, and his late journey into Spain, are all so many lights on his own art and on theirs.

We should expect, therefore, in any book on Israëls now an appreciation of his personal artistic development, and a survey of his group and his particular place in it. The latter Mr. Phythian in the present volume does not attempt at all. He mentions that there are contemporaries who made common artistic cause with Israëls, and on an early page promises to take note of their art, but the kind of note he takes is that "Anton Mauve painted on the coast also a big, broad, coast scene, boat just drawn up by horses" . . . Inland anything sufficed him, for the poetry of light is everywhere," which is not a note on Mauve's art, but only at best a note (and a rather futile one) on its subject. The complete inadequacy of the book on this side of it is illustrated by the fact that it never once mentions Bosboom, and this, although pages are given to Israëls' adoration of Rembrandt, in which Israëls was Bosboom's successor. Other pages are given to discuss Millet's influence on Israëls or Israëls' on Millet, but nowhere is there a hint of the breezes that were stealing into Holland from Barbizon long before Israëls settled at the Hague, and that were blowing in Paris when Israëls was studying there and painting, say, "The Bathers," which was shown at the French Gallery last spring. As far as Israëls' contemporaries go, Mr. Phythian's pages are uninforming and uninformed.

Mr. Phythian prefers to treat Israëls as individual and apart from his countrymen and townsmen, and that is not a bad, nor need it be an unilluminating, method of studying him. Israëls possibly held himself just a little aloof; his art, at any rate, can be understood without reference to them. He worked out his own salvation. The steps towards it might have been shown more definitely than in these pages, for example, there was beautiful painting done at Zandvoort, and in what may be called the Zandvoort period, which deserves greater consideration than our author gives it, if only because it points to how much the artist deliberately jettisoned in the larger aim of his later years. The progress from the Academic canvases to such a work as "The Sick Neighbour" has been fully displayed in London picture galleries this year, but it may very well have been found impossible to acquire for this volume a similarly complete and adequate series of illustrations. The usefulness of those which do appear would have been greater had they all borne the approximate date of their painting and the place where they can be seen, and been backed somewhere in the text by notes towards a catalogue. Still, in a general way, the reader will gather from these pages the circumstances of Israël's development and the canvases he painted in the course of it. He will nowhere be led to an understanding of how he painted them. Israël's art is never really discussed. Mr. Phythian confines himself to an analysis of its subjects. He cannot get away from the idea of sentiment as at once the end and the measure of art. He is persuaded that a return to contemporary life was the secret of the Hague "movement," of which the initiator was Bosboom, who not six times perhaps touched in a figure later than 1700. As if it were the contemporaneity of Mauve's "Ploughing" or Maris's "Amsterdam" that is its essence! The one and the other and Bosboom's "Alkmaar" in the Mesdag Museum approach Rembrandt in the quality of painting reaching out after spirit, and so does Israël's "Son of the Old Folk," quite irrespective of its subject. But, according to Mr. Phythian, summing up that relationship, "the single word that serves most aptly to describe the difference between Rembrandt and Israël is that the latter was the more homely of the two, both in his art and in his interpretation." A less imaginative artist, he thinks, might have given the picture, "A Son of the Old Folk," the title "A Jewish Pawnbroker." A less sophisticated artist also might.

From How to Listen to an Orchestra (Hutchinson).

THE MODERN ORPHEUS: PAGANINI
From a contemporary photograph.

From Wayfaring in France,

By Edward Harrison Tucker, a "recasting" of which will be published shortly by Messrs. Macmillan.

A GORGE IN THE CORRÈZE.

seur, selected a cigar. And then he replied. It was, he said, very gratifying to see that an idea which one has painted so strikes the heart of the spectator that he, forgetting the art of painting, sees the poet in the picture. But as for me"—and then followed the confession and the denial that trouble Mr. Phythian. That was Israël's mocking, humorous reminder to those who discuss his work and forget the art of painting.

D. S. MELDRUM.

CALIFORNIA.

By ARTHUR T. JOHNSON With 57 Illustrations from Photographs by E. NORA MEER. 10s. 6d. net. (Stanley Paul)

Mr. Johnson is an Englishman who has had a very considerable experience of the State of California, and this piquant and amusing book gives us the impressions that he

From Life and Evolution,

A new and cheaper edition of which is announced by Messrs. Duckworth.

NOW READY.

MOLIÈRE

Œuvres Complètes

Beautifully Bound in Cream Cloth, Gold Lettering, and containing 31 Illustrations by LOUIS LELOIR.

In Six Vols. Price 1/- net each Vol.

Owing to the great success of our French Series entitled Collection Nelson as well as to the splendid reception given to our series of Victor Hugo's works now being issued in 51 volumes, we have decided to begin the publication of a series of French Classics under the title of Edition Lutetia.

No edition of Molière has ever been so beautifully produced at so low a price. Each volume is printed in good, clear, readable type, and is accompanied by Biographical and Critical Studies,

By Professor M. EMILE FAGUET de l'Académie Française.

THOMAS NELSON & SONS, 35 & 36, Paternoster Row, London, E.C.
Edinburgh, Paris, Leipzig, and New York.

FRANK PALMER'S NEW LIST NOVELS

WILD LIFE IN WALES. By GEORGE BOLAM
10s. 6d. net. With 60 Illustrations.

This book is written in a delightful manner, and although primarily appealing to sportsmen and naturalists of all classes, it must fascinate even those to whom rod and gun do not appeal. The author, in addition to an impressive knowledge of his subject, has the rare knack of an entertaining and easy style, so that the literary attraction of the book almost rivals its outdoor charm.

CENSORSHIP IN ENGLAND: Its History from the Fifteenth Century. Illustrated. By FRANK TOWILL and FRANK PALMER. 7s. 6d. net.

An investigation into the origin and history of the modern office of dramatic censor. The book gives an instructive and amusing resumé of the historical absurdities of the English censorship and forms the only detailed history of the office which has yet been attempted.

MARRIED: By AUGUST STRINDBERG. 6s.

This famous book is essentially one for initiates—for those who know as much about Malthus as they do about Milton, for such readers it is very good, for it is a collection of little masterpieces. Daily Chronicle

EXCUSE ME. By RUPERT HUGHES. 6s.

A more delightful story than this it would be impossible to conceive, from first to last the story is a bit of good humoured, rollicking fun, that is quite irresistible. Aberdeen Journal

THE BOSS. By J. W. McCONAUGHY and EDWARD SHILLDON. 6s.

The abominable evils of "bossism" as they are practised in the United States have never been more forcibly exposed, and the story provides a succession of thrills from the first chapter to the end.

THE PRODIGAL PRO TEM. By E. ORIN
BARILETTI. 6s.

The gayest, most spirited story for many a year. Unquestionably one of the most charming comedies we have had for a long time. Westminster Gazette

RECENT BOOKS OF INTEREST

THE NEW SPIRIT IN DRAMA AND ART.
By HUNTLEY CARTER. 12s. 6d.

With 100 coloured plates and 70 illustrations.

There is no other book in English that covers the same ground. Spectator

THE THEORIES OF EVOLUTION. By YVES

METAGI, M.D., Sc.D., and MARTIN GOLDSMITH. 7s. 6d. net.

We cordially commend this work to all students of biology. The Outlook

THE BOOK OF THE TARPON. By A. W. and
S. A. DIMOCK. 7s. 6d. net.

93 photographs of leaping fish.

One of the most readable sporting books of the season. Liverpool Post

FORTUNES FOR FARMERS. By BERNARD

GILBERT. 2s. net.

"Every farmer will be wiser for its perusal. It is full of sound, practical sense." London Echo

Of all Booksellers, or from the Publisher,

FRANK PALMER: Red Lion Court, London.

Spring Announcement List free on application

NEW FICTION.

THE GAY REBELLION

By ROBERT W. CHAMBERS, Author of The Street of Auld. 6s.

In the new volume the author has given us a delightful story of modern woman asserting her rights and at the same time retaining all the charm of the eternal feminine.

GEORGE HELM

By DAVID GRAHAM SMITH.

Tells of the love affairs of a girl and her mother's daughter. A charming story in the author's well known and fearless style.

THE BLACK PEARL

By MRS. WILSON WOODROW.

A passionate romance. Will W. The dramatic story of the dancer, The Black Pearl, casts its spell over you instantly, and you read it with intense suspense.

MARCUS HOLBEACH'S DAUGHTER

By ALICE JONES.

A vigorous romance of the Canadian Pine Woods. A strong, stirring, and wholesome story of the Far Northern Gold Fields.

THE INHERITANCE

By JOSEPHINE DANKAM BACON.

With a hero who starts in the slums of London and works out the problems of life for himself.

BILLY FORTUNE

By WILLIAM R. LICHFORD.

A breezy story of the Cowboy Country. Billy's weakness is the fair sex, and his adventures furnish a bright comedy interest.

THE GHOST GIRL

By HENRY KIRCHFELT WEBSTER.

An exciting detective story by the author of The Whispering Min.

APPLETON'S, — — — — LONDON.

Frontispiece to Wordsworth (The People's Books)
(J. L.).

has carried away with him. He does not "spread himself" upon the scenery to any great extent, and the Yosemite and Grand Canyon are hardly even mentioned. Nor is he particularly interested in the natural wealth of the State, except in so far as it affects its inhabitants. He concentrates himself upon the people of California; his book is

Frontispiece to Shelley (The People's Books)
(Jack).

emphatically one of human interest. Here the Californian can see himself as others see him—or at any rate as Mr. Johnson does. The portrait may be truthful, but it is hardly flattering. The author does not dislike the Native Son—he finds, indeed, much to admire in that gentleman—but he seems to take rather a cruel pleasure in pointing

Frontispiece to Lamb (The People's Books)
(Jack).

Frontispiece to Nietzsche (The People's Books)
(Jack).

GEORGE ALLEN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

ST. ALBAN THE MARTYR, HOLBORN

A History of 50 Years, 1863-1913

By the Right Hon. G. W. E. RUSSELL.

With Portrait in Colour and 13 Full-page Illustrations.

Crown 8vo. cloth. 5s. net.

"Will not easily be surpassed in interest by any book of the season."—Church Times.

"Absorbingly interesting narrative."—Standard.

CHURCH AND MANOR

A Study in English Economic History

By S. O. ADDY, M.A. With 40 Plans and Illustrations.

Demy 8vo. cloth gilt top 10s. 6d. net.

"A model of careful study and construction." Pall Mall Gazette.

"Is deserving of close study by all interested in the subject. A notable addition to our literature on economic history." Outlook.

THAMES SIDE IN THE PAST:

Sketches of its Literature and Society

By F. C. HODGSON, M.A., Author of "Venice in the 13th and 14th Centuries." With 17 Full page Illustrations

Demy 8vo. cloth, gilt top, 12s. 6d. net.

"These subjects are treated with quiet and abundant knowledge."—Pall Mall Gazette.

MEMORIALS OF OLD NORTH WALES

[Just Out.

Edited by E. ALFRED JONES. With 35 Plates and Text Illustrations.

Demy 8vo. cloth extra, gilt top, 15s. net.

CONTENTS: The Eisteddfod, The Cromlechs, The Lewellyns, The Castles, Cathedrals, Parish Churches, Religious Houses, Regalia, Civic Plate, &c.

NATURE MYSTICISM

By J. E. MERCER, D.D., Bishop of Tasmania.

Crown 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

"Will open up new fields of thought to many." Athenaeum.

NEW FICTION Crown 8vo. cloth 6s. each.

A LITTLE WORLD

[Just Out.

A Story of Everyday People

By ARNOLD GOLDSWORTHY ("JINGLE").

Author of "The Odd Man," &c., &c.

IN THE GRIP OF DESTINY

A Romance of Russian Nihilism

By CHARLES E. STERREY, Author of "The Voice from the Night."

[Nearly Ready.

DUST OF THE WORLD

A Romance of Belfast in the XVIIth Century

By S. M. HARRIS (ATHENE). [Nearly Ready.

THE KING'S FAVOURITE

A Romance of the Court of Louis XI.

By H. H. ATKINSON.

"Much more vivacious than most historical novels."—St. James' Gazette.

By KENNETH WEEKS.

DRIFTWOOD

STORIES, SKETCHES
AND DIALOGUES

Crown 8vo. cloth, gilt top, 3s. 6d. net.

"Shows no little imaginative power." Times.

FIVE UNPRACTICAL PLAYS

Crown 8vo. cloth, gilt top, 5s. net.

[Just Out.

ESAU AND THE BEACON

Crown 8vo. cloth, gilt top, 5s. net.

"The cleverness and beauty of his writing is undeniable."—Country Life.

ZONES OF THE SPIRIT

A Book of Thoughts

By AUGUST STRINDBERG. With Portrait.

Translated by CLAUDE FIELD, M.A.

Crown 8vo. cloth, 5s. net.

[Just Out.

London: George Allen & Co., Ltd., 44/45, Rathbone Place.

HERBERT JENKINS' LIST

THE MUSE IN EXILE

Mr. William Watson's new volume of Poems, to which he has written a lengthy prose introduction on "The Poet's Place in the Scheme of Life." 3/6 net.

THE FRINGE OF THE DESERT

The Wise Man said, "Those who love with passion stand on the fringe of the desert, and they who heard laughed and passed upon their way." Miss R. S. Macnamara's novel of Passion and the Magic of the East. 6/-

A GREAT COQUETTE

In this study of Madame Récamier and Her Salon Joseph Turquan has been aided by the discovery of much new material that throws a new light upon the Beauty of Beauties. 16 portraits. 12 6 net.

WILLIAM MORRIS

A new study of the Poet, Craftsman, and Social Reformer, by A. Compton-Rickett, who has been assisted by such distinguished friends of Morris' as Sir P. Burne-Jones, Bt., Sir W. B. Richmond, The Rt. Hon. John Burns, Messrs. Walter Crane, T. Watts-Dunton, &c. New Anecdotes. With an Introduction by R. B. Cunninghame Graham. 7/6 net.

Shortly

15 YEARS OF DANCER'S LIFE

Anecdotes of Queen Alexandra, the late Empress of China, Rodin, Dumas, Bernhardt, Sardou, Calvé, &c. By Loie Fuller, the famous Serpentine Dancer. An Introduction by Anatole France. Illustrated. 10/6 net.

THE WINDHAM PAPERS

The "Secret" and "Most Private" confidences of Princes and Premiers. With an Introduction by Lord Rosebery. 34 portraits. 2 vols. 32/- net.

NATIONAL REVIVAL

A lofty and stirring appeal to the patriotism of the nation that every patriot and politician should read. With an Introduction by Lord Willoughby de Broke. 2/6 net.

THE BACONIAN HERESY

Shakespeare is planted more firmly than ever upon his pedestal by this remarkable confutation. By J. M. Robertson, M.P. 600 pages. 21/- net.

THE ONE MAID BOOK OF COOKERY

A unique book for housewives with small incomes who keep one maid or no maid at all. By Mrs. A. E. Congreve, first class diplomée. 2/6 net.

Shortly.

WHITE WITCH

A new novel by a new writer, Meriel Buchanan. 6/-

Shortly

HERBERT JENKINS LTD
12 ARUNDEL PLACE, S.W.

FORRABURY, CORNWALL. PERPENDICULAR BENCH-ENDS NOW PART OF ALTAR. EAGLE RENEWING ITS YOUTH; AGNUS DEI.
From Symbolism of Animals and Birds (Pitman).

out that even the inhabitant of God's own country is open to improvement in several respects, which we will not now enumerate. It is sufficient to say that Mr. Johnson is just about as frank and hard-hitting as he could be. But there is no malice behind his blows, and we shall not be surprised if the Californian follows his usual custom (according to the author) of clipping out the most defamatory passages and printing them in his newspapers without comment. For ourselves, not being Californian, and having no feelings on the subject one way or the other, we feel inclined to thank Mr. Johnson for much entertainment.

DINTON, BUCKS. NORMAN SOUTH DOOR; DRAGONS AND TREE OF LIFE; S. MICHAEL AND DRAGON.
From Symbolism of Animals and Birds (Pitman).

SYMBOLISM OF ANIMALS AND BIRDS REPRESENTED IN ENGLISH CHURCH ARCHITECTURE.

By ARTHUR H. COLLINS, M.A. With 120 Illustrations. 5s. net. (Pitman)

One of the most striking points in the architecture of our ancient churches is the frequency with which appear carved representations of animals and other creatures. It has been held that such carvings must be regarded as mere decorations, but Mr. Collins—with many other experts—is not of that opinion. He finds a meaning in them; to him they are veritable sermons in stone. The medieval natural history books called Bestiaries supply him with many of his clues, while some carvings may be traced back to Biblical or classical sources. It is an absorbing pursuit, and the author invests his pages with much of its fascination. The book strikes us as an exceedingly valuable introduction to an unhackneyed subject, and we can strongly recommend it to people in search of a new hobby. The illustrations are as well printed as they are numerous—which is saying a great deal.

CASTLE FROME, HEREFORD. NORMAN FONT; DOVES WITH CALF OF S. LUKE.
From Symbolism of Animals and Birds (Pitman).

CASTLE FROME, HEREFORD. TWELFTH-CENTURY FONT; S. MARK AND S. JOHN.
From Symbolism of Animals and Birds (Pitman).

WITCHING HILL.

By E. W. HORNUNG.
 Illustrated 6s (Hodder & Stoughton.)

"Witching Hill" is less a novel than a collection of stories around two leading characters, but it possesses a strong enough central interest to justify its publishers' description, while the manner of its working-out allows the author to give you a thrill in every chapter from the first to the last. And, as the author is Mr. E. W. Hornung, the creator of "Raffles," you may be sure that you will not be disappointed of excitement. Briefly, the main idea of the book is that the Witching Hill estate, which is being developed as a garden suburb, is haunted by the spirit of an ancestor of the hero, which corrupts hitherto respectable citizens and compels them to actions of which in their saner moments they would not dream. The manner of the laying of the ghost by its descendant, Uvo Delavoye, entails a number of thrilling and dramatic situations, very well handled by Mr. Hornung. In fact, "Witching Hill" is just the sort of book for an idle hour, and you are not at all likely to regret having ordered it from your library.

BLACKWOODS' FIRST SPRING LIST.

LIFE OF THE RIGHT HON. SIR ALFRED LYALL, K.C.B., G.C.I.E., Hon. D.O.L. (Oxon.), Hon. LL.D. (Cantab.)

By the Right Hon. Sir MORTIMER DURAND, G.C.M.G., K.C.S.I., K.C.I.E. 16s. net.
Sir Mortimer Durand's "Life of Sir Alfred Lyall" ought to prove of uncommon interest, for apart from Sir Alfred Lyall's distinguished career in India, he was a man of mark in letters, and had hosts of friends in high places.

TALES OF THE MERMAID TAVERN

By ALFRED NOYES, Author of "Drake: an English Epic," &c., &c.

THE LIFE OF A REGIMENTAL OFFICER DURING THE GREAT WAR, 1793-1815

Compiled from the Correspondence of Colonel SAMUEL RICE, C.B., K.H., 51st Light Infantry, and from other sources. By Lieut.-Col. A. F. MOCKLER-FERRYMAN, Author of "Annals of Sandhurst," "Lads of the Light Division," &c. 10s. 6d. net.

IMPERIALISM & DEMOCRACY

Unionist Principles applied to Modern Problems.

By ARTHUR PAGE, of Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law, Author of the "Licensing Bill, 1908. Is it just?" 5s. net.

The Right Hon. AUSIEN CHAMBERLAIN, M.P., in an Introduction to the work, says: "We are living in the midst of revolution: yet, because the revolution is peacefully conducted and cloaked in parliamentary forms, few among us realise how profound are the changes which have already taken place in our polity, or how far-reaching are the movements, both domestic and Imperial, which are shaping themselves before our eyes."

IN THE LAP OF THE LAMMERMOORS

By WILLIAM M'CONACHIE, B.D., Author of "Close to Nature's Heart." With Illustrations 5s. net.

6s. FICTION.

SUNIA AND OTHER STORIES

By MAUD DIVER, Author of "Captain Desmond, V.C.," &c., &c.

THE LADY OF THE CANARIES

By St JOHN LUCAS, Author of "Saints, Sinners, and the Usual People," &c.

WILLIE IN THE ISLE OF MAN (AND AFTER)

By ARTHUR FETTERLESS, Author of "The Career of Kembole."

THE GAY ADVENTURE

By RICHARD BIRD, Author of "The Forward in Love."

TOM, VRON

By E. M. SNEYD KYNNESELEY, Author of "H.M.I.," "A Snail's Wooing," &c.

THE ALIAS

By ALEXANDER CRAWFORD, Author of "Kapak," "Monsieur Carnifax."

*Blackwoods' Shilling Editions of Popular Novels.
Bound in cloth. With Coloured Illustrations on wrapper.*

NEW VOLUMES

A SAFETY MATCH

By IAN HAY, Author of "The Right Stuff" and "A Man's Man."

No. 101

By WYMOND CAREY, Author of "Monsieur Martin."

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH & LONDON.

Seeley, Service & Co Ltd

Founded 1793

A TURKISH WOMAN'S EUROPEAN IMPRESSIONS.

By ZEYNEB HANOUM, heroine of Pierre Loti's "Les Désenchantées." Edited by Grace Ellison. Portrait by Roslin & 23 illus. 6/- net.

"A fascinating book. The reviewer has read nothing so informing and illuminating for a long time—nothing since Lady Duff Gordon's 'Letters from Egypt,' and an old book, now wholly forgotten, 'The Private Life of an Eastern Queen'; but the newest is in some ways the best of the three. He can vouch for the truth of the facts, most of which he had from several good authorities, but the personality revealed in the letters is new to him & full of charm." —Prof. SIR WM. M. RAMSAY, in Manchester Guardian.

THE LAND OF THE NEW GUINEA PYGMIES.

By Capt. C. G. RAWLING, C.I.E., F.R.G.S. 43 illus. & Map. 16/- net. "We follow with the closest interest every step of Captain Rawling's journey." Daily News.

CAMP AND TRAMP IN AFRICAN WILDS.

By B. TORDAY, Member of Council of R. Anthropol. Soc. 45 illus. and Map. 16/- net.

"We advise everyone who wishes to learn about African character to procure 'Camp and Tramp.'" —Westminster Gazette.

THE PASSING OF THE TURKISH EMPIRE IN EUROPE.

By Captain B. GRANVILLE BAKER. 12 illus. 16/- net.

THE PRACTICE AND SCIENCE OF DRAWING.

By HAROLD SPEED, A.S.N.B.A., Paris. 91 illus. 6/- net.

KARLHOLM VOLK, IN THE NEW ART LIBRARY:

THE PRACTICE OF OIL PAINTING.

By SOLOMON J. SOLOMON, R.A. 6/- net.

HUMAN ANATOMY FOR ART STUDENTS.

SIR ALFRED FRIPP, K.C.V.O. 7/6 net.

MODELLING AND SCULPTURE.

By ALBERT TOFFI, A.R.C.A. 6/- net.

THE PILGRIM'S WAY.

A little scrap of good counsel for travellers. By SIR A. T. QUILLER-ROUCH, Professor of English Literature, Cambridge. 3/6 & 5/- net.

STUDIES IN MODERN MUSIC.

First Series, Berlioz, Schumann, & Wagner. 5 Portraits. Crn 8vo, 7/6. Second Series, Chopin, Dvorak, Brahms. 4 Portraits. Crown 8vo, 7/6.

Illustrated Prospectuses Post Free from 35, GREAT RUSSELL STREET, W.C.

April No. Ready on the 1st.

The HIBBERT JOURNAL.

A QUARTERLY REVIEW OF RELIGION, THEOLOGY, AND PHILOSOPHY.

Principal Contents April Number.

THE CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE OF LIFE Prof. Josiah Royce
THE BUDDHIST DOCTRINE OF SALVATION

Rev. Princ. J. E. Carpenter, D.D., D.Litt. John Galsworthy

THE NEW SPIRIT IN THE DRAMA L. P. Jacks

DOES CONSCIOUSNESS 'EVOLVE'? Rt. Hon. Q. W. Balfour

TELEPATHY AND METAPHYSICS Prof. W. R. Boley

DOES RELIGION NEED A PHILOSOPHY? N. Jarintzoff

INCIDENTS AND CHARACTERISTICS OF THE LIFE OF John A. Hobson

THE RUSSIAN CLERGY, PAST AND PRESENT Prof. B. W. Bacon

HOW IS WEALTH TO BE VALUED? Rev. Hubert Handley, M.A.

A CENTURY OF CHANGE IN NEW TESTAMENT Captain W. Cecil Price

CRITICISM Prof. B. W. Bacon

THE EFFECT OF BIBLICAL CRITICISM IN THE WORK OF A CHRISTIAN PASTOR

Rev. Hubert Handley, M.A. Captain W. Cecil Price

THE BOY SCOUT MOVEMENT

Price 2s. 6d. net.; postage, inland 3d., abroad 4d.

Subscriptions may commence with any number, 10s. for four issues, post free.

EDUCATION AND ETHICS.

By EMILE BOUTROUX, of the French Academy.
Authorised Translation by FRED ROTHWELL.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. net. [Just Ready]

A NEW PHILOSOPHY: Henri Bergson.

By EDUARD LE ROY.

Translated by VINCENT BENSON, M.A.

The author's interpretation bears the imprimatur of Mr. Bergson himself, who writes: "Your study could not be more conscientious or true to the original."

Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. net. [Just Ready]

WITHIN: Thoughts during Convalescence.

By Sir FRANCIS YOUNGHUSBAND, K.C.I.E., LL.D.

In small demy 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

"A book of great beauty, and the revelation of a mind tender, strong, and spiritual. A man of action as a teacher of men."—Public Opinion.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

THE COMPLETE
ASSOCIATION FOOTBALLER.

By B. S. EVERS
and C. E. HUGHES
DAVIES. With 29
Illustrations and 7
Diagrams. 5s. net.
(Methuen)

The latest addition to Messrs. Methuen's "Complete" sporting series is an excellent volume on Association Football by two Cambridge men. In spite of the universal popularity of "Soccer" with the people of the country at large, comparatively few books have been written around it, and there should therefore be a large public for the clear and handy guide to the game that Messrs. Evers and Hughes Davies have put together. The authors treat in detail the policy and play of the various positions on the field (the chapter on goal-keeping having been written by Mr. F. R. Hopewell), and chapters are also devoted to General Principles, the Captain, Outfit and Kicking, Amateurs and Professionals, and School Football. The illustrations and diagrams will be found particularly useful.

From The Biography of the Prince Imperial, to be published during the Spring by Mr. H.

MEDIAE-VAL GLAS-GOW.

By the Rev JAMES PRIMROSE,
F. S. A.
(Scot.), 10s.
6d. net.
(Glasgow
Maclehose
& Sons.)

There is a vague belief in the minds of the majority of Southerners, and a deep-rooted conviction amongst all Edinburgh folk, that the city of Glasgow suddenly appeared in a cloud of coal

From The Complete Association Footballer
(Methuen).

KEEPING OFF FOR GOALKEEPER TO THROW.

smoke about fifty years ago. And in a manner of speaking, its antiquity has been obscured by the growth of commerce during the last hundred years, and in particular with the last quarter of a century. At the time of the '45, for instance, Glasgow was hardly more than a Cathedral, a struggling University, and a cluster of rude houses and neglected streets; whereas Edinburgh was the centre of Scottish life, noble and academic, literary and fashionable.

In his interesting and handsome volume, which we may add is lavishly illustrated, Mr. Primrose, an expert on the history of Glasgow, has treated the subject from the ecclesiastical rather than the purely historical standpoint, and as he explains in his preface he uses the term "mediaeval" in its wider sense as synonymous with the ascendancy of the "Mediaeval Church in Scotland." And as the Cathedral has ever towered above the clustering houses at its base, so the various prelates loomed above the history of Glasgow and to some extent moulded the future of Scotland. At this point we must admit we are inclined to differ a little with Mr. Primrose in his estimate of the political influence of Glasgow and its ecclesiastics. In the history of Scotland the worthy bishops to whom he devotes his chapters are either very wronged personages or (and we lean to this view) brave rather

Messrs. Constable & Co.'s New Books

THE YOUTH OF HENRY VIII.

By FRANK ARTHUR MUMBY

Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net. This work is uniform with the Author's previous volume, "The Girlhood of Queen Elizabeth," and forms part of a series of monographs on which he is engaged, illustrating the history of England by the way of contemporary letters.

IRISH PLAYS AND PLAYWRIGHTS

By CORNELIUS WEYGANDT

With Portraits. Demy 8vo. 6s. 6d. net.

"The book deals justly with the course of the movement from the pioneer work of Mr. Edward Martin and Mr. George Moore to the younger dramatists like Mr. Lennox Robinson, Mr. Padraic Colum, Mr. W. Boyle, Mr. T. C. Murray, and Mr. Rutherford Mayne. Nor, of course, is the mystic fervour of Mr. George Russell left out in the cold. There are several interesting portraits, and the book is the best complete study of the new Irish theatre yet submitted to the public."—The Evening Standard.

GERMANY AND ITS EVOLUTION IN MODERN TIMES

By HENRI LICHTENBERGER

Translated from the French by A. M. LUDOVICI. 10s. 6d. net.

"A work of great interest and importance. It is difficult to do justice to the scholarliness of this fine work, or to the comprehensiveness and detachment with which M. Lichtenberger traces the various movements of German thought, but no one who wants a clear conception of modern German tendencies can do better than have recourse to these pages."—The Scotsman.

THE ENGLISH SCENE IN THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

By E. S. ROSCOE

With 24 Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net.

"Very thoroughly is its purpose attained; within its compass we know of no publication to compare with its comprehensive and informative picture of the time. . . . The English Scene helps to a right view of the whole of the time. Very well worth reading. . . . The book is illustrated, we commend it warmly to our readers."—The Evening Standard.

THE MAKING OF MODERN ENGLAND

By GILBERT SLATER, M.A., D.Sc.

Principal of Ruskin College, Oxford. Author of "English Peasantry and the Enclosure of Common Fields." Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

"What he has done is done admirably; there is certainly no better text-book of general social development in modern England. This is high praise, richly deserved by a work which is a model of industry and concentration. . . . the general reader, as well as students, will find it admirable reading."—The Manchester Guardian.

AN ENGLISH SAINT-BEUVE

ESSAYS IN BIOGRAPHY

(5s. net.) By CHARLES WHIBLEY

Author of "The Pageantry of Life," "A Book of Scoundrels," "Studies in Frankness," &c. Bound in buckram.

"With each of these studies each man lives again and brings to life with him a particular phase of the life of his time. Mr. Whibley's essays are unflickering lights in the dark places of the east. They are vividly historical. Such studies are what he can do better than anything else and better, perhaps, than any man now living. His heart lies in the work. His mind takes on breadth and lightness in dealing with such a theme, which he decks with all the grace and richness of the language at his command."—The Observer.

THE GENESIS OF PARLIAMENTARY REFORM

By GEORGE STEAD VEITCH

Assistant-Lecturer in History in the University of Liverpool. With an Introduction by RAMSEY MUIR, Professor of Modern History in the University of Liverpool. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

"Mr. Veitch's brilliant book. It is a book of which Liverpool—both University and City—may justly be proud. . . . A book packed without being crowded, fascinating without being superficial, solid without being dull. . . . A very fine and careful piece of historical investigation, admirably arranged and admirably written. A book which should prove a classic for the student."—The Liverpool Courier.

Please write for Constable's New Lists of Spring Announcements.

CONSTABLE & Co., Ltd. London: 10, Orange St., W.C.

J. M. DENT & SON'S, Ltd.

THE MYSTIC WAY.

A Study in Christian Origins

By EVELYN UNDERHILL.

Square demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net

Daily News "The book is a beautiful, noble, and interpretive piece of work."

TOWARDS A NEW THEATRE.

By EDWARD GORDON CRAIG.

With 40 Designs for Stage Scenes, accompanied with Critical Notes by the Inventor.

Square royal 4to, 21s. net

RAVENNA.

By EDWARD HUTTON.

THE MOST COMPLETE STUDY OF THIS MARVELLOUS CITY THAT HAS YET APPEARED IN ANY COUNTRY.

With 10 Illustrations in Colour and 30 Line Drawings by HARALD SUNDT. 10s. 6d. net.

CHAUCEER.

By EMILE LEGOUIS.

Translated by L. LAMMOUX.

Large crown 8vo, 5s. net.

Manchester Guardian "This small volume has every right to be acclaimed as the best introduction to Chaucer which has yet been offered to the world."

WINDS OF DOCTRINE.

STUDIES IN CONTEMPORARY OPINION.

By Prof. G. SANTAYANA.

Small demy 8vo, 6s. net

DANTE AND THE MYSTICS.

By E. G. GARDNER, M.A.

Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net

SONGS & BALLADS OF GREATER BRITAIN.

Compiled by E. A. HELPS.

Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net

DANTE AND AQUINAS.

By Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED.

Crown 8vo, 6s. net

The book aims at giving the student a connected idea of the general Theological and Philosophical background of the "Comedy," and therefore a keen appreciation of those distinctive features in which Dante's own personality more especially reveals itself.

NEW FICTION.

THE CHARMING OF ESTERCEL. GRACE RHYS.

DAISY DARLEY;

Or, the Fairy Gold of Fleet Street. W. P. RYAN

TWIXT LAND AND SEA.

JOSEPH CONRAD.

THE ADVENTURES OF MISS GREGORY.

PERCEVAL GIBBON

BROKEN ARCS.

DARRELL FIGGIS.

CHILDREN OF LIGHT.

FLORENCE CONVERSE

Crown 8vo, 6s. each.

J. M. DENT & SON'S, LTD.,

28, Aldine House, Bedford Street, W.C.

THE BOOKMAN SPRING 1913

From A Londoner's London,
by Wilfred Whitten, which Messrs. Methuen are publishing this month.

From St. Alban the Martyr,
High Holborn (Allen)

THE CLERGY HOUSE,
BROOKE STREET.
From a drawing by W. Walcott.

than brilliant, conscientious and upright men steering their craft with fine courage through stormy seas. That they were a power for good we frankly agree—that they influenced the royal quarrels or controlled the feuds of the nobility to any great extent we are not so ready to be convinced. Scotland was, until the Reformation, and the Highlands long after, in a state of perpetual warfare, held in leash neither by prelate nor peer, but ready to sacrifice either should they bar the way.

In the first chapter Mr. Primrose gives his attention to the origin of the place name of Glasgow, and destroys our cherished delusion that it was formed of the two Celtic words "glas" and "cu," meaning "the dear green place." The oftener we visited Glasgow the stronger grew our conviction that someone had blundered. In Mr. Primrose's opinion "Cleschu" signifies "the dear church," and was a term of endearment used by Kentigern on his return from exile in Wales. The foundation of the Cathedral is a landmark in the history of Christianity in Scotland, a far greater landmark than St. Andrews or Edinburgh. Indeed, Dr. Robertson has written, "Here the cross was planted, and here the ground was blessed for Christian burial by a Christian bishop, while Iona was yet an unknown island among the western waves, while the promontory of St. Andrews

From The Berwick and Lothians Coast, to be published shortly by Mr. Fisher Unwin.

ST. GILES' CATHEDRAL AND STATUE OF
CHARLES II. FROM ARCH OF PARLIAMENT
HOUSE (SOUTH SIDE).

was the haunt of the wild boar and the sea-mew, and only the smoke of a few heathen wigwams ascended from the rock of Edinburgh." In his second chapter on Bishop de Bondington who built the Cathedral, the author introduces an ecclesiastic too slightly known in Scottish history, but an interesting and dignified character rendered all the more conspicuous in a century of tarnished ideals.

A chapter is devoted to that Bishop Wishart (1272-1316), who gave absolution to Bruce after the murder of Comyn, and furnished him with coronation robes. He suffered imprisonment at Porchester, was sent to the Pope, and only returned to Scotland in 1314. That he took a leading hand in the struggle for independence has made his name to be worthily linked with those of Bruce and Wallace.

The founding of Glasgow University under Bishop Turnbull forms one of the most engrossing of the remaining chapters, but the final contributions on Glasgow Castle and the Market Cross are excellent in every way.

Mr. Primrose is to be warmly congratulated on his masterly treatment of what might, at first sight, prove a tedious chronicle to the general reader. That the book should be scholarly and yet so full of charm is all to the credit of the author.

F. W.

From CAMBRIDGE FROM WITHIN (Chatto & Windus).

SIDNEY SUSSEX COLLEGE

CAMBRIDGE FROM WITHIN.

By CHARLES TENNYSON. 7s. 6d. net. (Chatto & Windus.)

To have an individuality and give it play appears to be essential for a book on such a subject. There have been so many other books. And happily this time we are not treated to a disquisition on the bricks and mortar, we are not, which is much more unbearable, assailed with college-bred superior facetiousness. Mr. Tennyson is an observer and a moraliser, he is serious and speculative, humorous and properly fantastical. We have the pleasure of listening, and sometimes, at the same time, of disagreeing, but we flow from page to page. He cleaves a little closely to his own college, King's, and to Trinity, but, after all, he knew them best, and this is the jolly book of an individualist. He does, indeed, in one or two passages, mark the rising, or rather the renaissance of Magdalene, which, in the present writer's day, lived chiefly on its Pepys and one undergraduate who was alleged to keep four horses. Oliver Cromwell, of course, ensures a mention of Sidney Sussex, but Jesus surely should not have been passed over. It has a character of its own—somewhat similar to that of the Hall—and it has a Don who would have figured worthily in Mr. Tennyson's gallery of eccentrics. It is interesting how all the colleges save Trinity undergo changes; and perhaps a chapter on the characters of all the colleges would have but a fleeting value. But if there is another edition of this book, or if Mr. Tennyson writes a companion volume, we suggest that there are various themes he might include. For instance, the life of non-collegiate students, the tragedies of failure and success, the Union, the Athenaeum, the Indians and other exotic persons. His philosophical account of the surrounding scenery is excellent, and in the style of Alice Meynell. As for the illustrations by Mr. Harry Morley, the market place lacks some of its celebrated "beefiness," but is otherwise satisfactory. "The Roofs of Cambridge" is quite as good as Yoshio Markino's pictures in the Oxford volume, and the various pictures of "The Backs" will be a delight to all Cantabs.

FANNY'S FIRST NOVEL.

By F. FRANKFORT MOORE. 6s. (Hutchinson.)

In these days of advanced womanhood one feels, in reading of Fanny Burney's literary struggles, that one is indeed probing into dim and dusty corners of the past. Fanny herself is like a poor little fly trying desperately to free its wings from the cobweb of convention. The book is interesting in many ways, not only as an entertaining story where people who belong to actual history figure prominently and talk and act as if they were still something more than mere names, it is interesting too in showing how the world in general has progressed and how many of her letters woman has shaken off. The penalties that Fanny had to suffer for being a woman, and in spite of that fact daring to write and publish a novel, seem absurd enough nowadays, but Mr. Moore has not exaggerated biographical truth. "Fanny's First Novel" is much more than an ordinary tale, it is history dramatised—or novelised—history cast in its lightest, most entertaining mould, and it makes the Fanny Burney of history, and her family and friends, all very real and living personalities.

From Medieval Glasgow
(Maclehose).

GLASGOW CASTLE AND CATHEDRAL IN 1790.
The Beaton Tower in front of the Castle, with the Cameron Tower behind, and the Gateway. The N.W. and S.W. Towers of the Cathedral in the background removed 1742-1843.

*From Early English Water Colour
(Methuen).*

BYZANTINE AND ROMANESQUE ARCHITEC- TURE.

By THOMAS GRAHAM JACKSON, R.A.
Illustrated. 2 Vols. £2 2s net (Cambridge Press)

It is with architecture as with literature—as, indeed, with every form of art: a mere imitation of yesterday's achievements is as stultifying as mere ignorance of them. Progress is not made by slavishly copying the art of the past, but by drawing inspiration and new suggestion from it. "Art to be worth anything," as Mr. Jackson has it,

From Early English Water Colour (Methuen).

*From Early English Water Colour
(Methuen).*

to the main current of the movement,
but to its irregular and local advances, and to the subtlety with which it developed a distinctively national character in each country that adopted it throughout eastern and western Europe.
It is a full, careful and luminous study in a subject of the deepest interest and importance to archaeologists and architectural students, and it is the more valuable because Mr. Jackson combines with the capacity for patient original research the ability to impart clearly and attractively the knowledge he has gathered. He is that rarity the technical expert who can write like a man of letters, and as an architectural text

"must be modern and express its own age and no other. It has always been so in the past, and it must be so in the future. Imitation, necessary at first, has done its useful work, and the blind worship of precedent is now only capable of doing harm. . . . Consciously or unconsciously we form our views from our experience; and our ideas are inevitably shaped in a greater or less measure by what has been done already.
But while an architect must take archæology to some extent into his service, he must beware lest it become his master. He must study the art of the past—neither as a subject of historical research, nor as a matter for imitation—but in order to learn its principles, taking it as his tutor rather

From In the Lap of the Lammermoors, "WHERE THE STREAM SINGS TO THE HILLS" by William McConachie, R.D., which will be published shortly by Messrs. Blackwood.

From Early English Water Colour (Methuen).

book that is also a history of architecture his work is sure of a permanent place in our libraries. Some three hundred excellently reproduced drawings and photographs illustrate the changing characteristics of the Byzantine and Romanesque styles in Greece, Italy, Germany, France and England, and a useful and well-arranged chronological table of architectural examples is supplied at the end of the second volume. There is a good index, and one must add a word of special congratulation to the Cambridge Press on the beauty and artistic taste with which the books are produced.

TRAVEL PICTURES: THE RECORD OF A EUROPEAN TOUR.

By BHAWANI SINGH, Raj Rana Bahadur of Jhalawar
With Photogravure Portrait and 96 Illustrations from Photographs by the Author. 6s. net (Longmans, Green)

His Highness says: "The impressions left on my mind by a prolonged tour in Europe are given to the world with considerable diffidence." But there was no need for any such diffidence. Sir Bhawani made his tour with eyes keen for the unknown, a receptive mind, no small stock of observation and insight, and a readiness to see sovereigns is Mary II., to whom Miss Sandars's scholarly and well written "Princess and Queen of England" is devoted.

From Travel Pictures (Longmans).

AMSTERDAM: A CANAL

Yet she was lacking neither in ability nor charm. Probably she was always overshadowed by the greater figure of her husband; but of the two she was the more generally respected and liked by her subjects. Comparatively few "Lives" of her have been written during recent years, and as a good deal of fresh and important material has lately come to light, Miss Sandars's work is all the more welcome. She handles her subject in a manner which is altogether efficient, and when occasion demands she can "let herself go" in pleasant pieces of descriptive writing. Mary possessed neither the saturnine virtues of her father, James II., nor the riotous vices of her uncle, Charles II.; the best of the Stuart qualities of mind and heart were combined in her. "Princess and Queen of England" is an attractive, even important, book.

From Changing Russia, by Stephen Graham, to be published shortly by Mr. Lane.

and know the essentials of what passed under his notice. Hence it will be seen that his record is by no means commonplace; moreover, it is written in so unaffected a manner that, unpretentious though the writing is, there is a charming personality running through the book, which pretty well covers most of the well-known places in Europe. It was originally written for Sir Bhawani's own people's enlightenment in European matters; but as friends advised a wider publication, and as the King graciously accepted the dedication, the author rightly decided to let Great Britain see what he thinks of Western things and notions.

PRINCESS AND QUEEN OF ENGLAND.

By MARY F SANDARS With 26 Illustrations 16s. net. (Stanley Paul).

Not the least misunderstood of English

THAMES-SIDE IN THE PAST.

By F. C. HODGSON 12s. 6d.
net. (George Allen)

This is an ideal book for reading after you have put on your slippers and settled yourself in a comfortable chair by the fireside—a book of good gossip about the literature and society of the Thames side. You pass from a consideration of whether Pope was a poet and an admirable study of his character to a dissertation on "Optimists and Pessimists," which takes you away from the Thames Valley; but with articles on Horace Walpole, Gray and his haunts, and other such, you are back again in the neighbourhood of the river. There are pleasantly informing essays on Hannah More and the Garricks, on the Richmond palaces, and on some minor celebrities of Twickenham. It is inevitable that Mr Hodgson travels over a deal of ground that has been well trodden, but he knows his subjects thoroughly and has the great gift of being interesting. He is a reliable and most companionable guide, and we have read his book with complete enjoyment. The portraits and sketches that illustrate it are well chosen and well reproduced.

From Princess and Queen of England
(Stanley Paul).

PORTRAITS OF THE DUKE AND DUCHESS OF YORK AND THE PRINCESSES MARY AND ANNE.
From a picture by Sir Peter Paul Rubens. In the collection of Viscount Dillon, by whose permission it is here reproduced.

LIFTED CURTAINS.

By EDWARD NOBLE. 6s (Constable.)

In these ten stories of the sea Mr. Noble maintains the conspicuous place he has won for himself as a writer about those who "do business in great waters." His deft use of the technicalities of seamanship, and vivid descriptions of storm and calm in strange seas, as usual enhance the tale he has to tell of men whom to read about is to be thrilled with pride in their manhood and daring. "The Bladder" envisages with terrible reality the hardships of the crew of an undermanned tramp steamer,

From Thames-Side in the Past
(Allen)

ST. EVREMOND.

From Louis V. and Charles the Bold (Stanley Paul).

CHARLES VII.
From the Louvre picture.

and we hope its underlying purpose will not be lost on the official mind. "Quid Glorialis" is tinged with some of the occultism of the day, and one cannot rest content till the mystery surrounding the strange passenger known as the Cynic is unfolded. But not all the stories are concerned with the stern battle with the elements. In "Their Obvious Duty" a rich vein of humour is revealed. The encounter on the high seas between Captain Ritchie and the Irish skipper of a broken-down steamer contains the very essence of salt-sea comedy. The kind of sentiment possibly most in demand at the circulating libraries is represented by "Bab' Walters' Lapsus Linguae" and "The Chief as Medical Officer." Every story has distinction and atmosphere, and shows a remarkably fine sense of character.

RIVAL FRENCH COURTS.

By S. H. LOMBARDINI.
With 15 Portraits 10s. 6d.
net. (Murray.)

Madame de Staël Delaunay, author of the memoirs on which Mr. Lombardini has based this interesting volume, entered the service of the Duchesse du Maine some four years before the death of Louis XIV. in 1715. She was young then -- whether eighteen or twenty-five is uncertain -- but she rose superior to her surroundings and became one of the most favoured companions of the "Queen of Secaux," who "masqueraded through life . . . and forced into her masquerade all those who came into contact with her. She also dragged them into a conspiracy, which has its place in history, yet savours more of a comedy than of a political undertaking, dragged them incidentally into prison, and having herself emerged from a 'cruel' captivity without having learned anything therefrom about the realities of life, she went back unchanged to her absurdities." The companion of the Duchesse's troubles, the unfortunate Mademoiselle Delaunay was doomed to more of her own in a wearisome and distasteful marriage -- arranged for her by the Duchesse. In spite of her strong sense of humour, therefore, her diaries are not always cheerful reading, but her very considerable powers of observation at least invest them with considerable interest. Mr. Lombardini has done well to introduce them to the English public in this convenient and easily readable summary.

From Rival French Courts
(Murray).

LE DUC DU MAINE ET MADAME DE MONTESPAN.

selected by Mr. Metcalfe extend from the beginning of the eighteenth century until the present day, and, so far as they can tell from a hasty

PEER- ESSES OF THE STAGE.

By CRANSTOWN
METCALFE.
With 24 Portraits (Melrose)

It is our present purpose only to make a preliminary announcement of the recent publication of Mr. Cranstown Metcalfe's new book, with which we propose to deal more fully in a subsequent number. The examples of the actress - peeress selected by Mr. Metcalfe extend from the beginning of the eighteenth century until the present day, and, so far as they can tell from a hasty

From Peeresses of the Stage (Melrose).

ELIZABETH, COUNTESS OF DERBY
Photo. Kischgutz.

THE MYSTERY CAR.

By MORICE GERARD. (8s.
(Hodder & Stoughton.)

"The Mystery Car" has an ingenious, well-constructed plot, and is full of adventure and excitement. The attention of Lord Straffer is attracted one night to a car that is numbered XYZ747, and driven by a man who is incapable of driving it. Some curious impulse urges him to follow in his own car, and, luckily for the girl who is knocked down by the other and left stunned by the wayside, he acts upon that impulse. He renders her assistance and conveys her to her mother's cottage, and even in that brief, bewildered moment, amidst the alarm and hasty excitement, they are instinctively drawn to love each other. But things do not run smoothly. There are many difficulties in the way, enemies to be outwitted and overcome, shadows to be swept from the path. Mr.

From With the Bulgarian Staff,
by Noel Buxton (Smith, Elder).

DIRECTING THE BATTLE OF CHATALJA.

Gerard knows how to keep his mystery in hand, and the reader remains on tenterhooks of uncertainty, only sure that the end is going to be what it should be when the rush and excitement is beginning to slow down and the end is in sight. We congratulate Mr. Morice Gerard on the writing of one of the best and most stirring stories of adventure that we have read for many months.

TO MENELEK IN A MOTOR-CAR.

By CLIFFORD HALLÉ With an Introduction by HERBERT WELD-BLUNDELL, B.Litt. (Oxon), F.R.G.S., and 72 Illustrations from Photographs and a Map by B. BENTLEY. 12s. 6d. net. (Hurst & Blackett)

In April, 1907, Mr. Bede J. F. Bentley started on his self-imposed mission of delivering a motor-car to the Emperor Menelek of Abyssinia. His intention—which subsequently he carried out—was to take a boat from Marseilles to Djibouti, and thence to drive the car to Adis Ababa, Menelek's capital. As a plan it was simple enough, but it was very far from being easy to carry out. In that part of the world there are no roads whatever, but there is desert, largely composed of soft sand, through which it is impossible to drive a motor-car, or rock of a puncturing quality that no known tyres can resist. There are also hostile natives who have a very particular objection to railways and are inclined to confuse motor-cars with trains. So Mr. Bentley had an exciting time. But he did what he started out to do, and triumphantly presented the car to Menelek, whom he also instructed in the art of driving. The adventure is all the more creditable in that Mr. Bentley was accompanied by only one white companion— a mechanic named Wells— without whom it is safe to say that it would have failed. Mr. Hallé, who is responsible for the cheery and well-written account of the affair that now appears in volume form, has taken the story from the hero's own lips and has made a very readable business of it. He may be warmly thanked for this lively record of a very modern romance.

OF SIX MEDIAEVAL WOMEN.

With a Note on Mediaeval Gardens. By ALICE KEMP-WELCH. 8s. 6d. net. (Macmillan.)

The six ladies with whom we are here concerned are Roswitha, a tenth-century Benedictine nun of Germany, and a dramatist; Marie de France, a twelfth-century romance writer, and lady at the court of Henry II. of England; Mechthild of Maydeburg, a thirteenth-century mystic, beguine, and nun; Mahant, Countess of Artois, a fourteenth-century art-patron and philanthropist, great-niece of St. Louis; Christine de Pisan, a fifteenth-century feminist, an Italian, at the court of Charles V. of France; and Agnes Sorel, the wise counsellor of Charles VII. of France. Let us say at once that of these Agnes Sorel alone is conspicuous in popular history, and that we are all indebted to Mrs. Kemp-Welch for bringing to our notice the other five notable women. The picture we get of the life of Mahant, Countess of Artois, is particularly good, and the writings

From Round the World for Gold.
(Sampson Low).

SIAMESE NATIVE WOMAN.

Messrs. Longmans & Co.'s List.

OUT OF THE BLUE

By R. GORELL BARNES.

Price 6s.

This is the story of a man and a girl cast together on a desert island, and left in its freedom and its solitude to face for a year the problem of a love which they were already on the brink of recognizing.

CONFESSIONS of a CONVERT

By the Very Rev. Monsignor

ROBERT HUGH BENSON.

Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net

This is the record of the author's religious life and development, with accounts of the various stages of belief through which he passed, and of the influences which bore upon him

Levia Pondera : an Essay Book. By JOHN AYSCOUGH.

With Portrait Crown 8vo 5s. net.
"Any cultured reader who likes a cultured essay will find much in it advantageously to entertain a studious mind." Spectator.

In God's Nursery. By C. C. MARTINDALE, S.J.

Crown 8vo 3s. 6d. net.
"Thorough acquaintance with the mentality of pre-Christian religions, thorough sympathy with the youthful mind of all ages, humour and grace of style, make this little volume a delight for the cultured and experienced as well as for the school-boy. For Martindale's readers will clamour for more." Month.

Stolen Waters. By T. M. HEALY, K.C., M.P.

Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.
This narrative brings to light the hitherto unknown frauds practised on the Crown and the City of London in the time of James I., Charles I., Cromwell, and Charles II. It is woven round the controversy as to the title to two great fisheries in Northern Ireland—the River Bann and Lough Neagh.

The Taylor Papers. Reminiscences, Letters, and Journals in the Life of Lieut.-Gen. SIR HERBERT TAYLOR, G.C.B., G.C.H., Military Secretary to H.R.H. the Duke of York, Adjutant-General of the Forces, 1828-30. Arranged by ERNEST TAYLOR

With Portraits, &c. 8vo 15s. net.
HENRY VIII. By A. F. POLLARD, M.A., Litt.D., Professor of Constitutional History at University College, London. NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION. Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d. net.

LONGMANS' POCKET LIBRARY. (New Volume.)

Old Friends: Essays in Epistolary

Parody. By ANDREW LANG. Fcap. 8vo. Cloth, gilt top. 2s. net. Leather, 4s. net.

"These parodies are full of choice morsels which will be welcome to all lovers of good literature."—Spectator.

Royal Spades Auction Bridge. By

"BASCULE" Fcap. 8vo. 3s. net

TABLE OF CONTENTS
INTRODUCTORY	DIFFERENT METHODS OF SCORING
THE ORIGINAL BID BY THE DEALER	A TABLE OF THE VARIOUS SCORES FOR HONOURS
OVER-BIDDING ON THE FIRST ROUND	A NOTE ON THE VALUES OF THE DIFFERENT GAMES
OVER-BIDDING ON THE SECOND ROUND	THE LAWS OF AUCTION BRIDGE
DOUBLING AND RE-DOUBLING	WITH EXPLANATORY NOTES BY "BASCULE"
THE PLAY OF THE HAND CONVENTIONS TACTICS

* By the same author, AUCTION BRIDGE the Rules and Principles of. With Portland Club Rules, &c. 3s. net.

A History of the Papacy, 1378-1527.

By MANDELL CREIGHTON (Bishop of London). 6 vols. Crown 8vo. 5s. net each.

Stonewall Jackson and the American

Civil War. By Lieut.-Col. G. F. R. HENDERSON With 2 Portraits and 33 Maps and Plans. 2 vols. Crown 8vo. 16s. net.

By the same Author.

The Science of War. With Memoir by EARL ROBERTS, V.C.

With a Portrait and 4 Maps. 8vo 14s. net.

Select Epigrams from the Greek

Anthology. With a Revised Text and Translations. By I. W. MACKAIL, M.A., LL.D., formerly Professor of Poetry in the University of Oxford. 8vo. 14s. net.

Pocket Edition, 2 vols. (Greek Text, 1 vol., English Translation, 1 vol.). Fcap. 8vo, gilt top. Each, 2s. net, leather, 3s. net. (Also by Mr. MACKAIL).

Lectures on Greek Poetry. 8vo. 9s. 6d. net.

Lectures on Poetry. 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

LONGMANS, GREEN & Co.,
39, Paternoster Row, LONDON, E.C.

SMITH, ELDER & CO'S

NEW AND FORTHCOMING BOOKS

With the Bulgarian Staff

By NOEL BUXTON, M.P., Chairman of the Balkan Committee. Author of "Europe and the Turks." With 20 pages of Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

[April 3.]

Money-changing: An Introduction to Foreign Exchange

By HARTLEY WITHERS, Author of "The Meaning of Money," "Stocks and Shares," &c. Large post 8vo. 5s. net.

[April 3.]

Halfpenny Alley

By MARJORY HARDCASTLE. With a Frontispiece by LADY STANLEY and an Introduction by ALEXANDER PATERSON, Author of "Across the Bridges; or, Life by the South London Riverside." Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

[April 17.]

The Ring of the Nibelung

By RICHARD WAGNER. Translated by RANDLE FYNES. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

[In April.]

Studies in British History and Politics

By D. P. HEATLEY, Lecturer in History, University of Edinburgh. Large post 8vo. 6s. net.

[May 1.]

New 6s. Fiction

The Mating of Lydia

By MRS. HUMPHRY WARD. With 4 Illustrations by CHARLES E. BROCK.

Standard.—"As chronicle of country house life Mrs Humphry Ward has only Mr. Galsworthy for rival"

Daily Citizen.—"A fine story. Mrs. Humphry Ward has not, in my judgment, done a better."

Oxford Chronicle.—"From 'The Mating of Lydia' much may be drawn; primarily, it draws delight"

Scotsman.—"What will be widely enjoyed are the powerful delineation of character and motive. A drama which both moves and enlightens us."

The Confession of Richard Plantagenet

By the late DORA GREENWELL McCHESNEY. With a Prefatory Memoir by LADY MACDONELL.

[April 3.]

Napoleon Boswell. Tales of the Tents

By HERBERT MALLESON. With a Preface by LADY ARTHUR GROSVENOR.

[April 3.]

Michael Ferrys

By MRS. HENRY DE LA PASTURE (Lady Clifford).

[May 1.]

LONDON:

SMITH, ELDER & Co., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W. 1

THE BOOKMAN SPRING 1913

and opinions of Christine are, of course, of interest in these days. Mechthild of Maydeburg, like other saintly women of the Middle Ages, is very outspoken in her admonitions to the clergy, but her rebukes seem to have been taken in good part. Christine de Pisan has a good answer for the traducers of her sex: "To the charge that books are full of the condemnation of women, she replies with the simple remark that books were not written by women." A number of rare illustrations from old MSS and Books of Hours are skilfully reproduced, and are a pleasing addition to the text. But an index ought not to have been omitted.

*car design to The Mystery Car
(Hodder & Stoughton)*

THE HOBBY BOOKS.

Edited by ARCHIBALD WILLIAMS. Illustrated 1s. net each (Nelson).

The latest of Messrs Nelson's series is one which will appeal to almost everybody. Hardly anyone is without a hobby of some description, and these handy little volumes, well arranged, liberally illustrated, and well printed, contain the latest information on a variety of subjects. Of those at present to hand, that which makes perhaps the most appeal to us is Mr. D. Rowland's book on "Pets," which contains 8 coloured plates and 98 sketches and diagrams. Exceedingly well handled by the writer, who has, by the way, a very pleasant sense of humour, it tells you all you want to know about dogs, cats, rabbits, guinea-pigs and so forth, together with some information about more unusual pets—goats, monkeys, ferrets, meercats, jerboas, etc.—while about a third of the book is devoted to birds of all descriptions, from the canary to the parrot and the bantam. Messrs F. I. Beeson, F.R.P.S., and A. Williams have a clearly-written and most instructive volume on "Amateur Photography," with 25 plates and 144 sketches and diagrams, and Mr. Percy A. Wells's book on "Woodwork," liberally illustrated with 430 sketches and diagrams, deserves all the success it will doubtless meet with. Finally, Miss M. K. Gifford is most useful and practical on the subject of "Needlework," a book containing 19 plates and 273 explanatory diagrams and sketches.

From To Menelek in a Motor-Car (Hurst & Blissett).

ADDIS ABABA. EMPEROR MENELEK LAUGHING AT THE SIMPLICITY OF THE DRIP FEED LUBRICATOR. BRITISH AND RUSSIAN MINISTERS IN BACK OF CAR.

CASSELL'S IMPORTANT NEW WORKS.

PANAMA AND WHAT IT MEANS By John Foster Fraser.

With 47 Half-tone Plates from Photographs, Extra crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.

The Standard—"His latest book gives without waste of words exactly the kind of information which people want to get concerning that marvellous feat of engineering the Panama Canal. . . . A capital book written with imagination and brains, with the help of a pen that can make pictures."

The Scotsman—"Mr. John Foster Fraser's volume recommends itself to general readers who wish to learn without deep or technical study, how the Canal came into being."

The Pall Mall Gazette—"A close and picturesque description of the Canal and its construction, the men who have carried it out, the difficulties encountered and the benefits to accrue."

Glasgow News—"An excellent work in Mr. Fraser's happiest vein, graphic, sane, instructive, in most respect the best that has yet been written from the popular point of view."

EVERYDAY LIFE IN THE HOLY LAND By James Neil, M.A.

With 32 Coloured Illustrations by JAMES CLARK, R.I., assisted by J. MACPHERSON HAYE and S. B. CARLILL under the direction of the Author. Small Crown 4to 7s. 6d. net.

The Archbishop of Canterbury in a letter to the Author says: "The book will, for certain, be of genuine service to parents and teachers everywhere if they have the capacity to realise the vivid touch which has been given both to pictures and letterpress—a touch not of fancy, but of fact."

The Bishop of Manchester—"Your book 'Everyday Life in the Holy Land' cannot fail to be of interest to all who care to know something of life in the unchanging East. The illustrations and letterpress are worthy of all commendation. It is a book that should be within reach of every intelligent Sunday School Teacher."

The Rev. Charles Brown—"I am charmed with your book. The pictures are wonderfully good, and the literary part of the book is full of illuminations and instruction. It cannot fail to do great good to increase interest in the Bible. It is moreover a marvel of cheapness."

CASSELL'S SPRING FICTION

CHILD OF STORM . . . . .	—	—	—	—	H. Rider Haggard	6s.
RED HARVEST . . . . .	—	—	—	—	Newman Flower	6s.
A MASTER OF DECEPTION . . . . .	—	—	—	—	Richard Marsh	6s.
THE GATE OF TO-MORROW . . . . .	—	—	—	—	Norman McKeown	6s.
WHITE MOTLEY . . . . .	—	—	—	—	Max Pemberton	6s.
THE DRUG SLAVE . . . . .	—	—	—	—	Mary Lake	6s.
LOVE'S SOLDIER . . . . .	—	—	—	—	Olive Christian Mackirdy	6s.
					(Author of 'The Soul Market')
MORNING GLORY . . . . .	—	—	—	—	Helen Wallace	6s.
THE MYSTERY WOMAN . . . . .	—	—	—	—	Mrs. Campbell Praed	6s.
THE TWO CARNATIONS . . . . .	—	—	—	—	Marjorie Bowen	3s. 6d.
THE HOUSE OF SPIES . . . . .	—	(April 3)	—	—	Warwick Deeping	6s.
THE WHITE WATERFALL . . . . .	—	(April 10)	—	—	James Francis Dwyer	6s.
A MAKER OF WARE . . . . .	—	(April 17)	—	—	Spencer Edge	6s.
A WOMAN'S LOVE . . . . .	—	(April 24)	—	—	Silas K. Hocking	3s. 6d.
CANDLELIGHT DAYS . . . . .	—	(April 24)	—	—	Adeline M. Teskey	6s.

CASSELL & CO., LTD., LA BELLE SAUVAGE, LONDON, E.C.

From CHATTO & WINDUS'S LIST.

CAMBRIDGE FROM WITHIN.

Demy 8vo, Cloth. 7s. 6d. net

By CHARLES TENNYSON. With 20 Plates in Colour and Sepia, by HARRY MORLEY

MOZART'S OPERAS.

A Critical Study. By EDWARD J. DENT.

With Illustrations and Musical Examples. Demy 8vo, Cloth. 12s. 6d. net

GEORGE DU MAURIER:

The Satirist of the Victorians. By T. MARTIN WOOD.

With Photogravure Frontispiece and many Illustrations. Small fcap. 4to, 7s. 6d. net [Shortly]

A NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "PANSY MEARES," "SPARROWS," &c.

A 'YOUNG LADY': 6s.

A Study in Selectness.

By HORACE W. C. NEWTE.

A BRILLIANT NOVEL BY A NEW WRITER

THE EVERLASTING SEARCH

By CECIL DUNCAN JONES. 6s.

LONDON: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, ST. MARTIN'S LANE, W.C.

PUTNAM'S NEW BOOKS.

PATCHWORK COMEDY. By HUMFREY

JORDAN Author of "The Joyous Wayfarer" 6s.

Mr. Humphrey Jordan belongs to the school of younger novelists for whom life is a gay adventure. He tells in the capital story, of love and character in contemporary Paris and England.

NEW COMEDIES. By LADY GREGORY, author of "Irish Folk History Plays," with Portrait in Photogravure. 5s. net.

The Hoge Man, The Full Moon, Coats of Arms, Gold, Mc Donough's Wife

THE WOMAN MOVEMENT. By ELLEN KEY.

Author of "Love and Marriage," etc. 6s. net.

"Ellen Key is the authentic voice of the woman movement, which is the greatest movement, perhaps, that has ever been." Observer

RAHEL VARNHAGEN. By ELLEN KEY.

6s. net.

A biography from original sources of one who has been described as among the first and greatest of modern women

SYMBOLS & SATIRES IN THE FRENCH

REVOLUTION. By ERNEST F. HENDERSON.

Author of "Blucher," etc. Fully illustrated.

16s. net.

"A complete summary of all the important episodes of the Revolution, and so fresh that justice has been done to every modern authority. The book is one that students will want to have and keep." Daily Chronicle

LITTLE CITIES OF ITALY. By ANDRÉ

MAUREL. Second Series. Fully illustrated.

9s. net.

M. Maurel has wandered from town to town, painting in vivid colour his impressions of their historical and artistic aspect.

Send for latest catalogue.

24, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

THE BOOKMAN. SPRING 1913

REMINISCENCES, IMPRESSIONS, AND ANECDOTES.

By FRANCESCO BERGER. With 27 Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net. (Sampson Low.)

It is a pity, perhaps, that Mr. Berger's autobiography was not cast in more orthodox form, but we can sympathise with him in his excuse: "I have not been able to arrange what I have said quite chronologically, because I am very bad at dates, and because I kept no notes at the time of the occurrences." But even so "Reminiscences, Impressions, and Anecdotes" is a book that is quite well worth reading. The author became a Director of the Philharmonic Society in 1880, and Honorary Secretary in 1884, an office which he held until quite recently. In that capacity he met a number of eminent musicians, and his brief character-sketches of some of the greatest among them are most frank and piquant. He was also a personal friend of Dickens, of whom several of his most interesting "impressions" are recorded. It is a natural, attractive book, and one which we close with regret.

From Of Six Medieval Women (Macmillan).

BOOK OF HOURS OF ETIENNE CHEVALIER.

A TURKISH WOMAN'S EUROPEAN IMPRESSIONS.

By ZEYNEB HANOUM. Edited and with an Introduction by GRACE ELLISON. With 23 Illustrations from Photographs and a Drawing by AUGUSTE RODIN. 6s. net. (Seeley, Service & Co.)

It will be a little disconcerting for those of us who are quite contented with the state to which Western civilization has been developed to learn from these vivid impressions of a Turkish woman, that to one who had wearied of the oppressive restrictions of harem life our greater freedom and the privileges our womenfolk enjoy seemed so wearisome and inferior by comparison that after two years trial of them she preferred to return into her captivity.

DR. WILFRID T. GRENFELL, whose new book "What Life Means to Me" is to be published this month by Messrs. Nisbet.

From Reminiscences, Impressions, and Anecdotes (Sampson Low).

GRING.

BOOKS TO READ MANY TIMES

Philosophy, Biography, History, Travel, &c.

The History of English Patriotism

(2 vols. 25s. net.) ESME C. WINGFIELD-STRAITFORD
This work compresses into half a million words the substance of eight years of uninterrupted labour. Leading experts who have read the MS praise it unstintingly. The work is not only "The History of English Patriotism," but it is a new history of England written from an entirely fresh point of view. The author has woven together the threads of religion, politics, war, philosophy, literature, painting, architecture, law and commerce. The book is a world book.

Memories

(7s. 6d. net.) 2nd large impression.

THE HON. STEPHEN COLERIDGE

Daily Chronicle.—"A volume of which one says: 'I should have liked to meet all these people and write about them as Mr. Coleridge has done'"

From Studio to Stage

(16s. net.) 3rd large impression. WEEDON GROSSMITH
Daily Chronicle.—"If one could image Thackeray sitting down to write one of his best Bloomsbury chapters, as full of quaintly sympathetic satire as he could make it, throwing all attempts at name-disguising to the winds, and describing actual living people with all their pet frailties set forth in living guise, one would find one's fancy very nearly realised in the altogether delightful autobiography of Mr. Weedon Grossmith."

The Empress Josephine

(12s. 6d. net.) JOSEPH TURQUAN

The Life and Letters of William Cobbett

(2 vols.) 32s. net.) LEWIS MELVILLE
Globe.—"We most heartily congratulate Mr. Melville. . . Here is a study of the extraordinary Cobbett so complete that there can be very little more left to be said on the subject."

The Struggle for Bread: a Reply to Norman Angell's "The Great Illusion"

By "A RIFLEMAN" 5s. net.

ART VOLUMES

TAPESTRIES: Their Origin, History and Renaissance.

By GEORGE LELAND HUNTER. With 4 full page Plates in Colour and 147 half-tone Engravings. 16s. net.
Globe.—"Author and publisher are alike to be congratulated on this exhaustive and sumptuous volume."

AUSTRIA: Her People and Her Homelands.

By JAMES BAKER. With 48 Pictures in Colour by DONALD MAXWELL.
THE VAN EYCKS and their Art. By W. H. JAMES WEALE. With the co-operation of MAURICE BROCKWELL. 12. 6d. net. Now and especially revised edition.

Mr. HALDANE MACFALL in Academy.—"This prodigious work . . . Mr. Weale's scholarly research into the history of early Netherlandish art cannot be bettered."

POETRY & BELLES LETTRES

DEBORAH.

By LASCELLES ABERCROMBIE. 2s. 6d. net.

CROSS VIEWS.

By WILFRID S. JACKSON. 5s. net.

Pall Mall Gazette.—"Mr. Jackson has a very pretty wit. . . . Extremely clever entertainment. The author will certainly consolidate his reputation as a wit and humourist."

THE OLD GARDENS OF ITALY and How to Visit them.

By MRS. AUBREY LE BLOND. 5s. net.

POEMS.

By LUCY MASTERMAN. 2s. 6d. net.
Westminster Gazette.—"Her verse is finely wrought, her mind has the habit of high themes."

SIX SHILLING NOVELS

Topham's Folly - - - - - GEORGE SILVERSON

Myles Calthorpe, I.D.B. - - - F. E. MILLS-YOUNG

Stella Maria - - - - - WILLIAM J. LOCKE

The Finger of Mr. Blee - - - - PETER BLUNDELL

The Man Who Would Not be King - - - - - SIDNEY DARK

Fire and Frost - - - - - MAUD CRUTTWELL

Outside the Ark - - - - - ADELAIDE HOLI

Henry Kempton - - - - - EVELYN BENTWOOD

The Silence of Men - - - - - H. F. PREVOST-BATTERSBY

Knowledge and Life (3s. 6d. net) WILLIAM ARKWRIGHT

My Friend's Book - - - - - ANATOLE FRANCE

Jocasta and the Famished Cat ANATOLE FRANCE

Aspirations of Jean Selvien ANATOLE FRANCE

NOTE ALSO

The New Machiavelli

(1s. net.) H. G. WELLS

JOHN LANE, The Bodley Head, London & New York.

FROM . . .

PITMAN'S LIST

WHO'S WHO IN MUSIC

A BIOGRAPHICAL RECORD OF CONTEMPORARY MUSICIANS.

Compiled and Edited by H. SAXE WYNDHAM and GEOFFREY L'EPINE. Large cr. 8vo, cloth, 6/- net; Leather, 8/6 net.

The first edition of the work contains about 1,000 biographies of the leading British, American, Continental and Colonial Musicians, including Concert and Opera Singers, Concert Agents, Critics, Managers, with detailed accounts of their careers. There are many other features of interest and value contained in the book, including lists of artists that have appeared at Royal Opera, Covent Garden, since 1895; Cathedral and College Organists; chief Musical Institutions and Societies; obituary of the year; and a calendar of notable musical events, birthdays, productions of the past, etc.

[Uniform with "WHO'S WHO IN THE THEATRE," by JOHN PARKER. Cloth, 6/- net. Leather, 8/6 net.]

MRS. GASKELL:

HAUNTS, HOMES, AND STORIES.

By Mrs. ELLIS H. CHADWICK. New and Cheaper Edition, with additions and some new illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 38 illus., 5/- net.

This new edition has been brought up to date, and all available information regarding the author of Cranford has been included, and several new illustrations, including a strikingly beautiful portrait of Mrs. Gaskell before her marriage, have been added. Though many previous attempts have been made, this is the first and only biography of one of the greatest and most famous of Victorian novelists.

THE EMPIRE OF INDIA

By SIR BAMPFYLDE FULLER, K.C.S.I., C.I.E., formerly Lieutenant-Governor of Eastern Bengal.

Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt top, with 26 full-page plate illustrations and map. 7/6 net. Uniform with other volumes in the "ALL RED" Series on AUSTRALIA, by the Hon. B. R. Wise; NEW ZEALAND, by Sir Arthur P. Douglas, Bt.; CANADA, by W. L. Griffith; SOUTH AFRICA, by W. Basil Worsfold; and THE BRITISH WEST INDIES, by A. E. Aspinall.

THE IMMOVABLE EAST

STUDIES OF THE PEOPLE & CUSTOMS OF PALESTINE

By PHILIP J. BALDENSBERGER. With Biographical Introduction by FREDERICK LEES. With 24 full-page plate illustrations and map. 7/6 net.

The Athenaeum says: "Nothing so intimate has yet appeared upon the subject as this book. To those who know already something of the people and the life described, there is no book we should recommend more strongly to enlarge their knowledge."

SYMBOLISM OF ANIMALS AND BIRDS IN ENGLISH CHURCH ARCHITECTURE

By ARTHUR H. COLLINS, M.A. With 120 illustrations. 5/- net.

Of all Booksellers.

LONDON:

SIR ISAAC PITMAN & SONS, Ltd.,

1, Amen Corner, E.C.

From A Turkish Woman's European Impressions (Seeley).

ZEYNEB, WITH BLACK FACE-VEIL THROWN BACK.

Zeyneb Hanoum and her sister, high-born Turkish ladies, escaped from the harem and fled to Paris. The Sultan made futile efforts to have them stopped on the way and brought back, but they successfully evaded his authority, travelled much about Europe, came to England, were interested in all they saw, and Zeyneb gives a fresh and piquant account of it in a series of letters to her good friend Grace Ellison. Incidentally she writes of her past and sketches intimately and minutely the cloistral Harem existence against which she and her sister had revolted. In Paris they met, amongst other famous persons, Pierre Loti, who made Zeyneb the heroine of his novel, "Les Désenchantées;" in London they moved in the best society, and paid a visit to our House of Commons, and the description of a debate they heard there, if a little farcical and over-

From Little Jennings and Fighting Dick Talbot. (Hutchinson)

See review, "Tyrconnel"

FRANCES JENNINGS, DUCHESS OF TYRCONNEL.

From an engraving by T. Cheeseman after the painting by Verelst in Lord Beaulieu's collection.

scornful, is not so far from the truth as we should like it to be. Zeyneb is intolerant of the aspirations of the suffragettes; but on the other hand she found that our society ladies were as much hampered and restricted by petty social distinctions, snobberies and customs as she and her sister had been by the rigid rules of the harem. Western civilization was not what she had dreamed it was, and in the end she was glad to go home again, disillusioned and prepared to feel in future that she was as well off in the harem as our English women are under our marriage laws which make every husband a Sultan in his own house. It is a salutary thing for us to see ourselves as she sees us, and may help us to adjust our balances and to realise that the West is not so very far from barbarism nor the East so near to it as we easily suppose

From Commodore Sir John Hayes (Longmans).

SANDOWAY, ARAKAN.

Messrs. BELL'S BOOKS.

Volume IV. now Ready.

The Correspondence of Jonathan Swift.

Edited by F. ELRINGTON BALL, Litt.D. With an Introduction by the Right Rev. the BISHOP of OSSORY. To be completed in 6 vols. Vols. I., II., III. and IV. now ready. Vol. V. in the press. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net each.

"This is the most important venture in the literary history of our country upon which any publisher is at present engaged." Morning Post

Modern Chile.

By W. H. KOEBEL. Demy 8vo. With numerous Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net.

Just Published. Crown 8vo., bound in buckram. Uniform with the 'Barsetshire Novels.'

Phineas Redux.

By ANTHONY TROLLOPE. A sequel to "Phineas Finn." 2 vols. 3s. 6d. net each.

Phineas Finn.

By ANTHONY TROLLOPE. With a Critical Introduction by FREDERIC HARRISON. 2 vols. 3s. 6d. net each.

A Literary event of the first importance.

Bohn's Popular Library.

The pioneer series of cheap reprints in new and distinctive format

Bound in Cloth

One Shilling Net.

FIRST LIST OF TWENTY VOLUMES

(Ready March 31st)

1. SWIFT (Jonathan). Gulliver's Travels.
- 2-4. MOTLEY (J. L.) Rise of the Dutch Republic. 3 vols.
- 5-6. EMERSON (R. W.) Works. A New Edition Vol. I, Essays (1st and 2nd series) and Representative Men Vol. II, English Traits, Nature, and Conduct of Life.
- 7-8. BURTON (Sir Richard). Pilgrimage to Almadinah and Meccah. 2 vols.
9. LAMB (Charles). Essays.
10. HOOPER (George). Waterloo. The Downfall of the First Napoleon.
11. FIELDING (Henry). Joseph Andrews.
- 12-13. CERVANTES. Don Quixote. 2 vols.
14. CALVERLEY (C. S.) The Idylls of Theocritus, with the Eclogues of Virgil.
15. BURNEY (Fanny). Evelina.
16. COLERIDGE (S. T.) Aids to Reflection.
- 17-18. GOETHE Poetry and Truth from my own Life.
19. EBERS' Egyptian Princess.
20. ARTHUR YOUNG'S TRAVELS IN FRANCE.

Write To-day for the full prospectus of "Bohn's Popular Library," which gives a history of the famous "Bohn's Libraries" from their inauguration to the present day.

London: G. BELL & SONS, Ltd.,
Portugal Street, Kingway, W.C.

MR. FIFIELD'S SPRING LIST.

HENRIK IBSEN: Poet, Mystic and Moralist.

By HENRY ROSE. 160 pages 2s. 6d. net. A valuable introduction to the whole of Ibsen's work. The contents include: A Biographical Portraiture, Earlier Plays, History and Religion, Plays of Social Life (6 chapters), Psychological Plays (4 chapters), The Last Phase, Art for the Sake of Life, and Mysticism and Idealism.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

Maeterlinck's Symbolism: The Blue Bird and other Essays.

2nd edition. 1s. and 2s. net. On Maeterlinck: Notes on the Study of Symbols. Wrappers. 1s. net | cloth gilt top. 2s. net.

THE NOTE-BOOKS OF SAMUEL BUTLER.

Edited by H. F. JONES. With Photogravure Portrait. 6s. net; postage, 4d.

"No one knows Samuel Butler who has not read this book through, and perhaps it will come to be the most read and valued of all his work."—Times
"Even the most liberal quotation could hardly convey any adequate sense of its gay wisdom and pregnant wit."—English Review

THE NATURE OF WOMAN.

By J. LIONEL TAYLER. 3s. 6d. net, postage, 3d.

THE FAILURE OF THE CHURCH IN THE VILLAGES.

By Rev. A. H. BAVERSTOCK. With Foreword by Dr. E. HERMITAGE DAY. Wrappers. Post free, 7d.

THE VINEYARD.

A Monthly Magazine devoted to the Literature of Peasant Life. Edited by MAUD EGERTON KING. 6d. net; post free, 7d.

THE PEACEMAKERS.

A Play. By Dr. Winslow Hall. 1s. net.

THE CALL OF THE MOUNTAINS.

By J. E. Pickering. 1s. net.

LIFE'S LOTTERY.

By B. L. ffollott. 1s. 6d. net.

THE PLAYS OF BRIEUX.

An Essay. By P. V. Thomas, M.A. (In preparation). 2s. net.

London: A. C. FIFIELD, 13, Clifford's Inn, E.C.

NEW FICTION.

SUCCESSION

A Comedy of the Generations (a sequel to "Promise.") By ETHEL SIDGWICK. Crown 8vo. 6s.

TIME'S WALLET.

By LUCY DAIF and G. M. FAULDING. Crown 8vo. 6s.

AN INN UPON THE ROAD.

By JANE DODGE (Author of "Tony Unregenerate.") Crown 8vo. 6s.

DISCOVERY.

By HAROLD WILLIAMS. Crown 8vo. 6s.

THE THIRD MISS SYMONS.

By F. M. MAJOR. With an Introduction by JOHN MASEFIELD. Imp 16mo. 3s. 6d. net.

NEW DRAMA.

FOUR PLAYS.

By GILBERT CANNAN. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

THE MARRIED WOMAN

By C. B. FERNALD. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

POETRY.

FIRST POEMS.

By MAX PROWMAN. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

Eleventh Impression now in the press of John Masefield's Great Poem, "THE EVERLASTING MERCY."
Also by the same Author, "THE WIDOW IN THE BYE STREET." Each Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

PAX BRITANNICA. A Study of the History of British Pacification.

By H. S. PERRIS, M.A. Large Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

Adelphi SIDGWICK & JACKSON London

From Modern Chile (Bell).

A MINOR PLAZA, SANTIAGO.

COMMODORE SIR JOHN HAYES:

His Voyages and Life (1767-1831), with some Account of Admiral D'Entrecasteaux's Voyage of 1792-3 With Illustrations. By J. M. L. E. E. 7s. 6d. net (Longmans, Green)

In this concise and well-written account of the nautical doings of Commodore Hayes we have a late-rendered tribute to a man whose value as a

From California (Stimley Paul).

WHERE ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON LIVED: MONTEREY.

navigator and ocean explorer had previously received no proper measure of the honour and justice due to it and him. Mrs. Bruce Marriott, possibly from reasons of space, has little, too little, to say as to the early life of her subject; for we all like to know how a man or woman of mark grew to be what he or she finally became. It is not enough to say that he was so-and-so, and he did this and that; this is all very well as impressionism, but in biography we ask for much more detail. With Mrs. Marriott's presentation of the Commodore as a sailor and a man we have no fault to find. Lucidly and straightforwardly she shows us how this

Cumberland man fared as a member of the Bombay Marine. Then we learn of how he became a merchant venturer, fitted out two vessels at Calcutta and sailed away to the exploration of the coasts of what was then New Holland (Australia); how he wound his way in and about the islands of the East Indian Archipelago, then went north to Hong Kong, returned by the Straits of Malacca to Calcutta, and

From Three Years in the Libyan Desert (Unwin).

THE MUD CITADELS OF THE CAPITAL OF THE OASIS.

A Charming Volume of Sketches of Canadian Rural Life. 5/-

WHERE THE SUGAR MAPLE GROWS.

By ADELINE TESKEY

Author of "The Yellow Pearl," etc.

Miss Teskey has produced in these idylls of a Canadian Village something unique in the way of character studies, equal in all respects to the quaint types of "Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush." Her work will prove a revelation to those who claim that Canada has no Literature.

THE MUSSON BOOK COMPANY, LIMITED,
Mansion House Chambers, 11, Queen Victoria Street, London, E.C. Head Office—Toronto, Canada.

The Complete Edition in One Handsome Volume of the Poetical Works of E. PAULINE JOHNSON, the Great Canadian Poetess.

"FLINT AND FEATHER" is the first volume of the complete poetical works of E. PAULINE JOHNSON, the famous Mohawk poetess, and the daughter of the late Chief Johnson of the Six Indian nations fame. The reader of "The Bookman" has only to look upon the face of the portrait here reproduced, to conclude that the poems of Indian life and love which make up this delightful edition, are the work of a most accomplished writer. The volume has just been issued in a handsome binding, and will make an ideal present for friends both home and abroad.

FLINT AND FEATHER

Being the Complete Poems of

E. PAULINE JOHNSON
("Tekahionwake.")

With a brief biographical sketch of the author. With portrait frontispiece. Cloth, 6/- net.

This collection of verse I have named FLINT AND FEATHER because of the association of ideas. Flint suggests the Redman's weapons of war; Feather the eagle plume that crests the head of a warrior chief; so both flint and feather bear the hall-mark of my Mohawk blood.
E. PAULINE JOHNSON.

THE MUSSON BOOK COMPANY, LIMITED,
Mansion House Chambers, 11, Queen Victoria Street,
London, E.C. Head Office—Toronto, Canada.

Songs of the Day.—Songs of the Night,

3/6 net.

CANADIAN CANTICLES.

A Companion Volume to those two beautiful anthologies "The Garden of Love" and "Fragrance of Flowers." A most tasteful production, and will prove a very acceptable present for Christmas or any other time. The compiler has divided the selection into two parts, viz.—"SONGS OF THE DAY" and "SONGS OF THE NIGHT," the aim has been well carried out and with good judgment.

The following is but a short selection of the varied contents of this attractive volume:

The God of Colour—The Call of the River—The Irish Emigrant—The Spirit of the Ocean—The Heart of the Woods—The Gold God—The Death of Yesterday—Life and Death—The Soul—The Need of Love—The Soul Market—The City of the Sea—Disguised Blessings—The Ghost of Poverty—My First Love—For I turn—The Spirits of Music—Hope's Golden Sea—My Lady's Glove—Repentance—Since I Know You Love Me—To My Love—The Spirits of the Night—Ghosts' Hours—Love and I—Death's Bride—The City of Silence—I Miss You—Her Bridegroom—Expectation—Immortal Love—My Bird of Hope—The Fountain of Tears—The Soul of the Murderer—Little Love—The Palace of Tears.

THE MUSSON BOOK COMPANY, LIMITED,
Mansion House Chambers, 11, Queen Victoria Street, London, E.C. Head Office—Toronto, Canada.

Frontispiece to Trent's Last Case (Nelson). See p. 2, Supplement

From Halfpenny Alley,
by Marjory Hardearth.

"THE CRICKET MATCH."

A story of life among the London poor, that has just been published by Messrs. Smith, Elder.

From The Wastrel
(Ward, Lock). See p. 22.

"HE STOOD VERY STILL, HIS EYES FIXED UPON THE APPROACHING MAN."

Frontispiece to The House of Spies
(Cassell).

"I THINK THAT YOU AND I HAD BETTER PART."

From the The Mating of Lydia,
by Mrs. Humphry Ward
(Smith, Elder).

Reviewed on page 14 of Supplement.

From The Harvest Moon
(Cassell)

"GIVE IT TO ME! GIVE IT TO ME!"

Frontispiece to Child of Storm
(Cassell).

"SLOWLY SHE LIFTED HER LANGUID ARM."

Frontispiece to No Other Way
(Ward, Lock).

From Elizabethan Keswick
(Titus Wilson, Kendal).

SORTING THE ORE: THE TWO MASTERS ON THE LEFT ARE TRYING TO "STREAK" ON THE TOUCHSTONE.

From Munster's Cosmographia, Basel, 1552, a copy of which was among books at Keswick at this time all the interesting things that happened to them during the voyage. This and all that Mrs. Marriott writes of the Commodore's doings in Tasmania makes stimulating reading. The illustrations are good, and the book is indexed with particular care.

COVENT GARDEN: ITS ROMANCE AND HISTORY.

By REGINALD JACOBS. Illustrated. 6s net. (Simpkin, Marshall & Co)

Of the making of books about London there is no end—nor do s there yet seem to be any reason why there should be. Each suburb, every parish has its own history. Many of them have already been writ'en but many still remain to do. It would be easy enough to write a book about each separate street in London, therefore Mr. Reginald Jacobs has found no difficulty in doing it about Covent Garden. Apart from a brief account of certain business aspects of the Garden today, he has devoted himself to unfolding a topographical and historical record of the district. He has touched only lightly on Lamb's connection with it, and makes no reference to that part of the amazing story of "Janus" Wainwright that properly belongs to it. One or two other such omissions there may be, but there are bound to be such in every book of this kind, and the author, whose personal preferences might have led him to say something of Donne's sojourn in Drury Lane, would probably have left out something else that would have been of greater interest to the majority of us. It is wiser to be grateful to Mr. Jacobs for the good work he has done, for the mass of useful and interesting information he has included and the quantity and variety of local historical romance he has compressed into his two hundred pages. He relates the story of Covent Garden more fully than it is possible to give it in books that take all London into their scope; it was well worth telling, and he tells it remarkably well. The numerous illustrations from old prints are excellent.

THE LAND OF ZINJ

By CAPTAIN C
H STIGAND
Illustrations
and a Map.
15s net
(Constable)

This is "an account of British East Africa, its ancient history and present inhabitants," and as such it will be of interest to a good number of readers. Capt. Stigand has a wealth of knowledge at his disposal, and lavishes it upon us with both hands. In main, perhaps, a book of history and information as to races of men, it is also a book of travel and topographical description. Ancient history takes up the first hundred pages, then come chapters on the Arabs of Mombasa, the Swahili, and (further

THE ABBÉ EDGEWORTH DE FIRMONT.
From The Abbe Edgeworth and his Friends

(Jenkins).

From Covent Garden (Simpkin, Marshall).

on) the Masai. There are also chapters on the Lamu archipelago, the Coast Belt, the Uganda railway, Masailand, Mount Kenya, Lake Victoria Nyanza, and so on. The book lacks atmosphere and real distinction, though there is almost a superfluity of detail. It is by no means a piece of book-making, for it is in its own way really valuable and full of first-hand knowledge; but all the same, it has not the one thing needful for a book of this sort—the touch of arresting personality. Unless we can be made almost to feel the glow of the equatorial sun in a work on the tropics, what good are all the facts in the world? They miss the mark, for without that something else they are lifeless. This criticism applies, of course, only to the actual descriptive portion of the book. The other parts are, no doubt, of much superior merit.

THREE YEARS IN THE LIBYAN DESERT.

By J. C. EWALD FALLS.
Translated by ELIZABETH LEE. With 61
Illustrations. 15s net.
(Unwin.)

Herr Ewald Falls was a member of the Kaufmann expedition to the tomb of St. Menas, an Early Christian ruin in the Libyan district of Egypt, and this very readable translation of his story of his experiences is well worthy the attention of those who are interested in archæology. At the same time we are bound to admit that the writer's account of the excavations made by the expedition suffers somewhat from being swamped by a plethora of rather ordinary travel impressions. Seeing that the tomb is situated within the Egyptian boundary, it is not extraordinarily difficult to get to, and the writer's prejudice against the British occupation seems rather absurd when one takes into consideration that the proposed Kaufmann expedition to Cyrenaica was quashed by the Turks for no particular reason at all, and the Menas expedition would likewise have failed had it been excavating upon Turkish soil. However, Mr. Falls is interesting, which is the main thing. His photographs are very good indeed.

From A Queen of Shreds and Patches

by L. Gastine, which will be published by Mr. Lane during the

PANAMA AND WHAT IT MEANS.

By JOHN FOSTER FRASER. With 48 Illustrations and a Map. 6s. (Cassell)

That experienced and most observant of travellers, Mr. John Foster Fraser, here sings the epic of the Panama Canal—and, incidentally, of the American nation. If you want to understand just exactly how big a thing it is which the United States has undertaken to do in Central America, you should read his book. There you will find statistics of the most picturesque variety, a little criticism, and a very great deal of entirely merited praise, for it is, not exactly a simple thing to cut a 50-mile canal through one of the unhealthiest bits of country in the world. And Mr. Foster Fraser does something more too—a very useful thing. He gives a detailed account of the history of the undertaking, a story which is almost as remarkable as the building of the canal itself. It is all done simply, pleasantly, and readably, and it makes a most attractive book. The illustrations, too, are well worth all the attention you can give to them.

From Dame Fashion
(Sampson Low).

1807

From The Land of Zinj
(Constable)

DOORWAY OF OLD PERSIAN MONASTERY AT LAMU.

QUEBEC : THE LAURENTIAN PROVINCE.

By BECKLES WILLSON. Fully Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net
(Constable)

Mr. Beckles Willson is a great lover of Canada—her history in the past, her story in the making to-day, and her great hopes for the future. He has written many books on this theme, all with "fluency, fervour and zeal," and among recent contributions to historical biography his work on Wolfe, the young general whose audacious victory at Quebec gave Canada to the Empire, must be given a high place. The present volume describes the province of Quebec, and is rich with information for anyone who is interested in a country to which so many people go yearly from the United Kingdom to become citizens of Canada. In area some 350,000 square miles—large than France and Germany combined, a fact we seldom realise in glib speech and loose thinking—Quebec has a population of just over two million souls, four-fifths of whom are of French origin. This fact lends a special interest to the province and offers certain problems to the Dominion Government. Mr. Willson has avoided everything that can be politically controversial; his task is sympathetic and interpretative; he takes the reader through every part of the vast province, showing him its natural features, its cities, towns and villages, its institutions, its commerce and industries, and the character and peculiarities of its people. And he presents to us a noble picture of a country well advanced on the first stages of the road to greatness

From India and the Indians
(Murray).

YARANDAWANA CHURCH FROM A DISTANCE.

From Panama and What it Means (Cassell).

A BEND IN THE CULEBRA CUT, JUNE, 1912.
The steam shovel in the foreground is standing on the final bottom of the Canal, 40 feet above sea level.

MOZART'S OPERAS:

A Critical Study. By EDWARD J. DENT. 12s. 6d. net. (Chatto & Windus.)

The operas of Mozart, the perfection of comedy in music, deserve the best of commentaries, and receive it in this volume by Mr. Edward J. Dent. The author is already well known for his efforts in connection with the revival of "The Magic Flute" at Cambridge, and he here extends his researches over the whole series from "La Finta Semplice," to "La Clemenza de Tito." His general method is to discuss the circumstances of each production, to indicate the predecessors that influenced it (such predecessors as those, for instance, from which Don Giovanni's band derived two tunes for performance at the tragic supper), and then to discuss the principal features of the completed work. This he does in a fashion so clear and so free from musical pedantry (the worst kind of pedantry) that every person with sense enough to appreciate a pretty tune like "Batti, batti," can follow everything he says without difficulty. And, really, every listener is the better for having his ears guided by a cultivated intelligence. Let us hope that this book may lead to such a general interest in Mozart that managers may even take down "The Magic Flute" from the shelf where, so far as London is concerned, it has reposed for nearly a quarter of a century. There is, of course, always the difficulty about a theatre. Covent Garden is really too vast for the delicate, intimate comedy of Mozart, even His Majesty's was too large, as we found it during Mr. Beecham's season, when no less than four Mozart pieces were produced with such capital spirit. But that is merely a mechanical detail. Mr. Dent mentions some interesting facts in connection with the tenor air "Im Mohrenland," from "Die Entführung." Has he ever noticed that, in its turn, it is the probable source of inspiration for the tenor air "Take a Pair of Sparkling Eyes," by the Mozart of these islands? Hearty thanks for this readable, informing volume, with its portraits and abundant musical illustrations.

From Quebec
(Constable)

A MILL ON THE MAGOG RIVER, SHERBROOKE.

particularly well suited to his temperament. The reader will find much in the book that is amusing, as, for instance, in the description of the "astonishing automatic

MODERN CHILE.

By W. H.
KOEBEL.
With 28
Illustrations.
10s. 6d. net.
(Bell.)

Among modern writers upon South America none has a wider acquaintance with his subject than Mr. W. H. Koebel. He has a catholicity of outlook, a keen sense of humour, and an acute critical power, that combine to make him an ideal writer of travel books. In Chile he finds a subject

From Mozart's Operas
(Chatto & Windus).

THE SUMMER HOUSE USED BY MOZART.

From Modern Chili (Bell).

MAIN ENTRANCE TO THE CERRO SANTA LUCIA.

piano " at the Hotel de la France at Concepcion, or in this little sketch of a Chilian waiter which immediately precedes it: "When a waiter has come bustling up with a dish, and has laid it tenderly on the table, you need not be surprised if he pauses for a while to gaze in triumphant admiration at the work of the chef. Then his feelings will overcome him. 'Nothing could be better done' he will ejaculate, and, having thus vindicated the quality of his freight, he will depart in search of something equally admirable for someone else." Although he does not consider the country incapable of improvement—even our own country has not yet reached that happy state of perfection—you can tell that Mr. Koebel liked Chile very well. Anyhow, he has written a book on the country that the general reader will find attractive, while we have not the least doubt that the traveller and the business man will find it useful. We must add a word of special praise for the illustrations—an excellent series of photographs most excellently reproduced.

experiment in some measure reconcile the general reader desirous of hearing something interesting or amusing, and the critical scholar in search of information. The style of the book sufficiently accounts for the omission of an incubus of footnotes and literary references. I have absorbed the writings of others, not quoted them." The district of Central Asia of which the author treats is the land between the Amu-darya and the Oxus and Jaxartes. This area he calls the Duab, and it "contains everything that is typical of and common to various overlapping or subdivided conceptions" of Turkestan, which, as he explains, is an atmosphere rather than a locality. Within this district the author has travelled elaborately, and has gathered facts—and photographs—which are at once of the greatest scientific value and of much general interest. The style of the writing is not unduly technical, and the author has spared no effort to make it readable. The volume is one which does the utmost credit both to Mr.

Rickmers and to the Syndics of the Cambridge Press.

MAIDS IN A MARKET GARDEN.

By CLO GRAVES. With 16 Illustrations by MAURICE GREIFFENHAGEN. 2s. net. (Holden & Hardingham.)

"Maids in a Market Garden" shows Miss Clo Graves in a mood very different from that which has brought her her greatest popularity under the pseudonym of Richard Dehan. It is short, slight, and humorous—the account of the adventures of half-a-dozen young women who have decided to make their living by market-gardening. It is an attractive little story—exceedingly well illustrated by Mr. Maurice Greiffenhagen—and it is pleasant to hear that it has run through a considerable number of editions in more expensive form. At two shillings it should have a new lease of life before it.

From The Duab of Turkestan
(Cambridge University Press)

THE LABIHAUZ AT BOKHARA.

NELSON IN ENGLAND:

A Domestic Chronicle.
By E. HALLAM MOORHOUSE. 10s. 6d. net.
(Chapman & Hall.)

Surely there is a place on the Nelson shelves for this book; crowded as they are, and more crowded as they are bound to grow, there is a vacancy which this book must fill and keep for itself. We are told, and pretty truly, that "no living writer knows so much about Nelson as E. Hallam Moorhouse, and she has here a theme untouched by historians." The book explains itself in its title; it is largely a chronicle of the national hero's domestic affairs and movements in England here. But the public and the general things appertaining to him on his returning from victories do peep in now and then, such as the crowd taking the horses from his carriage on Ludgate Hill and drawing it themselves to the Lord Mayor's banquet, when he was driving there after the battle of the Nile, or his seeing in the crowd at Salisbury, while on his way from London to Fonthill—with the ever-adorable Emma and her husband—a sailor who had fought on his ship in the Nile engagement, his speaking to the man and giving him a present. Here is another incident that shows how he was loved by those who served with him. A man in the crowd was shouting hurrah above all the others, Nelson, recognising his face as that of one who had been present when his arm was amputated, called him closer and gave him a guinea, whereupon the sailor whipped "from his bosom a piece of lace which he had torn from the shirt sleeve of the amputated arm as a token in memory of his gallant commander." The book is illustrated, it is put together with that care and continuity of story which always mark Miss Moorhouse's work, and it contains a reproduction of a portrait of Nelson as captain of the Agamemnon; the original is in Norwich Castle Museum, and has not been reproduced till now.

W. HEATH ROBINSON.

By A. E. JOHNSON.
With many Illustrations in Colour,
Half-Tone and Line.
3s. 6d. net. (Black.)

The latest addition to the Brush, Pen, and Pencil Series forms one of its most attractive volumes. Mr. Heath Robinson's art is the subject of a brief but well-reasoned appreciation by Mr. A. E. Johnson, and the remainder of the book consists of reproductions of the artist's sketches and drawings, chosen with a view to the exhibition of all

From Mexico, the Land of Unrest,

new book by Henry Barclay, which will be published shortly by Messrs. Herbert & Daniel.

THE CATHEDRAL AT MEXICO CITY.

sides of his talent. In the case of Mr. Robinson this is rather a large order, for perhaps no modern artist is more versatile. That the attempt has been successful may be laid to the credit of the publishers of the volume, who have been remarkably generous in its illustration. And it is as cheap as it is delightful.

A SUMMER IN SKYE.

By ALEXANDER SMITH. Illustrations in Colour by JOHN BLAIR. 6s. net. (Edinburgh: Nimmo, Hay & Mitchell.)

There is only one possible objection to this charming edition of a charming book, excellent in its snowy paper, its clear type, its worthy margins, the shape and spacing of its page, its strong binding in blue buckram—the best of all plain bindings. And that is, it is too large, too thick, too heavy for the pocket. For "A Summer in Skye" is emphatically a book to pull out of your pocket when you are deep in heather, or high on a hillside, or in a cliff cranny.

From A Queen of Shreds and Patches,
by L. Gastine, which will be published by Mr. Lane during the Spring.

From W. Heath Robinson (Black).

As for the seventeen essays that make up this delightful, immortal volume, they show an exquisite style—a style that once gave Alexander Smith a high place in the world of letters, a place that is now forgotten somewhat except by the few, but which will certainly be re-discovered and assured to him. Discursive in the treatment of their various themes, they give an unforgettable impression of Highland life and ways, marvellous character sketches, pages of description as vivid and as felicitously worded as any of Stevenson's, and without showing so much the labour of the file and the polisher as Stevenson's often do. It is impossible to attempt more than a hearty recommendation of this volume, one of the two (the other being his "Dream-thorpe") by which Alexander Smith still survives among the public of to-day. Forgotten, and too carelessly forgotten, are his "Life Drama," his "City Poems," his "Edwin of Deira," that rightly charmed our mid-Victorian forbears, but the "Summer in Skye" maintains its popularity. Hasten, you that have not already discovered its enchantments, to buy and revel.

A MODERN PIONEER IN KOREA: THE LIFE STORY OF HENRY G. APPENZELLER.

By WILLIAM ELLIOT GRIFFIS, D.D.
5s net (Fleming Revell)

Mr. Appenzeller (known as "Appie" to his intimate friends) was an ardent American Methodist who laboured for many years as a missionary in Korea, and was drowned at sea in 1902. He has found an enthusiastic and entirely sympathetic biographer in Dr. Griffis, and the result is an unusually vivid picture of modern missionary enterprise, American,

From A History of St. John's Wood
(Chapman & Hall).

THREE TOWNSHEND HOUSE PANELS.

A corner of Sir L. Alma-Tadema's studio
A beautiful St. John's Wood model.
Lady Alma-Tadema's studio and thoroughly up to date. Appenzeller was clearly an attractive and high-minded man; energetic, too, and courageous. With his wife and family and happy domestic surroundings in Korea he was naturally without any particular liking for the methods and personnel of the older Roman Catholic missions in the country, and his point of view is fully shared by Dr. Griffis. A top note of glowing optimism and complete assurance is over all the book, and the author has a vigorous confidence in all things American. For those who can accept the author's style and opinions a good deal of interesting information concerning Korea and the Methodist foreign missions may be found in this life of Henry G. Appenzeller, and it is worth while getting used to his style in order to arrive at his information. A number of photographs, very well reproduced, are included.

POND LIFE.

By the REV. CHARLES A. HALL, F.R.M.S.
With 8 Illustrations in Colour, 14 in Black and White from Photographs, and 28 Drawings in the Text. 1s. 6d. net. (Black)

Messrs. Black's "Peeps at Nature" Series receives a welcome and valuable addition in the Rev. Charles A. Hall's latest volume. The author is skilled in the writing of books of popular science, but he has seldom done better than in "Pond Life," which supplies the reader with an extraordinary number of facts in very handy form. The book is one which is primarily designed for boys and girls, but it should appeal also to the general reader who is anxious to improve his knowledge of a very fascinating subject. The illustrations are both helpful and plentiful, and the book cannot but strike one as remarkably cheap.

Cover-design of A Summer Skye (Nimmo, Hay & Mitchell).

X THE LATEST LIST X

The History of English Patriotism

ESMÉ G. WINGFIELD STRATFORD.
2 vols. 25s. net.

"A splendid record . . . We cannot imagine any Englishman rising from its perusal without renewed pride in his race and a fresh determination to be worthy of the land which gave it birth."—Globe

Changing Russia

7s. 6d. net. Just Out. STEPHEN GRAHAM.

"Mr. Graham writes delightfully of a world in which we gladly follow him as guide, philosopher, and friend. All unconsciously, as we listen to his tales of the open road, we find ourselves idealising the monkish, hating the crass bourgeois, despising drainage and houses that have roofs and doors."—Times.

Memories STEPHEN COLERIDGE.

7s. 6d. net. 2nd Large Impression.

"We have had many a conversation book in the past decade, full of personality and full of smiles and memories, but none more personal or enjoyable than this."—Pall Mall Gazette.

From Studio to Stage

WEEDON CROSSMITH.

16s. net. 3rd Large Impression.

"The altogether delightful autobiography of Mr. Weedon Crossmith."—Daily Chronicle.

The Empress Josephine JOSEPH TURQUAN.

12s. 6d. net.

"The remarkable story of a remarkable woman." Daily Mail.

Sirenica W. COMPTON LEITH.

8s. 6d. net. Author of "Apologia Diffidentis."

"This strange book will stand alone . . . a book which says profoundly and beautifully what no other book has said."—Times.

X NEW FICTION X

Stella Maris

By WILLIAM J. LOCKE. 6s.

"Will certainly be Mr. Locke's most popular book."—Observer.

Myles Calthorpe, I.D.B.

By F. E. MILLS YOUNG. Just Published. 3rd Impression. 6s.

"A story which is moving, tender, profoundly eloquent."—Pall Mall Gazette.

The Governor

By KARIN MICHAELIS. 3s. 6d. net.

The Silence of Men

By H. F. PREVOST-BATTERSBY. 2nd Impression. 6s.

"An interesting new novel . . . There is the same virility and freshness of outlook which pleased us in 'The Last Resort.'"—Morning Post.

Henry Kempton

By EVELYN BRENTWOOD. 2nd Impression. 6s.

"A clever and original work . . . distinctive and striking."—Globe.

Outside the Ark

By ADELAIDE HOLT, Author of "The Valley of Regret." 6s.

"The story is intensely interesting, and Mrs. Stair, the great actress, and Miss Davonant make, with Hugh Inskip, a wonderful trio."—Pall Mall Gazette.

A NEW FORM OF FICTION.

Knowledge & Life

3s. 6d. net. By WILLIAM ARKWRIGHT.

"Phases of thought, strange episodes of travel, and curious fancies." The Times.

"This singularly attractive book."—Globe.

At all Libraries and Booksellers.

JOHN LANE, THE BODLEY HEAD, VICO STREET

Complete Edition of the Novels of MARK RUTHERFORD

Bound uniform in Cloth. 1/- net per Volume.

1. Mark Rutherford's Autobiography.
2. Mark Rutherford's Deliverance.
3. The Revolution in Tanner's Lane.
4. Miriam's Schooling.
5. Catherine Furze.
6. Clara Hopgood.

Published by Mr. T. FISHER UNWIN, London.

ETHEL M. DELL

The best-selling Novels of 1913 are

1. The Knave of Diamonds (27th Thousand). 6s.
2. The Way of an Eagle (16th Impression). 6s.

Read these splendid Novels by ETHEL M. DELL.

ROBERT W. SERVICE

("The Canadian Kipling.")

The best-selling Volumes of Verse

1. Songs of a Sourdough.
2. Ballads of a Cheechako.
3. Rhymes of a Rolling Stone.

Bound in Cloth. 3/6 net per Volume.

RICHARD MIDDLETON

The Collected Works of this brilliant writer, bound uniform in Cloth. 5/- net per Volume.

1. Poems and Songs (First Series).
2. Poems and Songs (Second Series).
3. The Ghost Ship, and other Stories.
4. The Day Before Yesterday, etc.

CONSTANCE SMEDLEY'S NEW NOVEL. NEW WINE AND OLD BOTTLES. 6s.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, Adelphi Terrace, London.

READERS OUT OF REACH

of a good local bookseller, or who live abroad, are asked to write direct to London for their books, which will be sent by return of post, at lowest cash prices, on receipt of remittance with order.

German or French Books (if not obtainable in London) are posted to customers direct from Leipzig or Paris by my agents there, thus saving postage.

LONDON AGENT FOR LIBRARIES ABROAD.

ESTABLISHED
1881

Subscription Newspaper and Periodical Agency for British and Foreign Publications.

List of 1600 Subscription Rates free on application.

CATALOGUES SENT POST FREE

1. Reference Book Catalogue of 146 pp. of Standard Literature.
2. Remainder Catalogue of over 1000 Titles of Publishers' Remainders, in good condition as issued, at from 30% to 80% off published prices.
3. Colonial Librarian's Handbook, indispensable to Librarians outside Europe, with complete list of Colonial Editions, etc., etc.
4. Price List of Subscription Rates for British Periodicals abroad, with a selection of the most popular American, French, German, and Spanish periodicals.

ALFRED WILSON

Export and Retail Bookseller

18-19 GRACECHURCH STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Telephone: 7463 Central.

Bankers: London County & Westminster (Lombard Street).

3 NEW NOVELS.

THE LOST MAMELUKE.

By DAVID M. BEDDOE. 6s.

A thrilling, vigorous narrative of Egypt in the days of the Mameluke ascendancy.

THE CHARMING OF ESTERCEL.

By GRACE RHYS,

Author of "The Wooing of Sheila," etc. 6s.

Times.—"There is breathless excitement and fun in the tale. The chapter telling how Tamburlaine carries his half-dead master all the way from Dublin to Ardhoroe without a rest is full of a tremendous galloping movement that is overmastering."

Manchester Guardian.—"The real hero, Tamburlaine, is not a man but a horse, quite the most wonderful horse of fiction, none excepted."

DAISY DARLEY; Or, The Fairy Gold of Fleet Street.

By W. P. RYAN. 6s.

Daily Chronicle.—"This is a rare book; a really distinguished achievement."

Daily News.—"A clever, attractive book. Mr Ryan has made a genuine success in his delightful sketches of the subsidiary characters."

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd., 28, Aldine House, Bedford St., W.C.

WYMAN & SONS LIMITED

Largest Installation of Monotype and Linotype
Machines in the Kingdom
Fine Art Mischle and other Presses for best
Bookwork

High-class Rotary Machinery for half-tone
printing and quadruple Presses producing 16, 20, 24, 28 and 32 pp. papers at 30,000 per hour, folded

Newspaper, Book and General Printers and Lithographers

Binding Plant complete, including the latest machines for Case-making and Casing-in

Books set up by Monotype, submitted entire in proof, printed and bound complete

BOOKSTALL CONTRACTORS ON LONDON & NORTH WESTERN, GREAT WESTERN AND OTHER RAILWAYS

Wholesale Booksellers and Newsagents

11 Railway, Press and General Advertising Contractors

LONDON AND READING

AUSTIN DOBSON'S WORKS

COLLECTED POEMS. 6th Edition. With additional Poems and Translations. Crown 8vo. With Photogravure Portrait. 6s.
 "In those 'after days' the poet will be compassed about by a cloud of witnesses."—The Times
 "The Nestor of our living poets, the most eminent survivor of the band of artists in verse who distinguished the fourth quarter of last century."—Morning Post.

OLD WORLD IDYLLS, and other Verses. With Frontispiece. 16th Edition. Elzevir 8vo. Gilt top. 6s.

AT THE SIGN OF THE LYRE. With Frontispiece. 11th Edition. Elzevir 8vo. Gilt top. 6s.

THE STORY OF ROSINA, and other Verses. With 49 Illustrations by Hugh Thomson. Crown 8vo. 5s.

THE BALLAD OF BEAU BROCADE, and other Poems of the Eighteenth Century. With 55 Illustrations by Hugh Thomson. Fcap 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

SELECTED POEMS. With Frontispiece by GEORGE H. BOURGTON, R.A. Fcap 8vo. 1s. 6d. net, leather, 2s. net, leather, extra gilt, 2s. 6d. net, velvet call, in box, 3s. net. (Dryden Library)

EIGHTEENTH CENTURY ESSAYS. Selected and Annotated by AUSTIN DOBSON. With Frontispiece. Elzevir 8vo. Gilt top. 3s. 6d.

The late Prof. DOWDEN'S WORKS

SHAKSPEARE: HIS MIND AND ART. 14th Edition. 8vo. 12s.

STUDIES IN LITERATURE, 1789-1877. 10th Edition. 8vo. 6s.

THE FRENCH REVOLUTION and ENGLISH LITERATURE. 8vo. 7s. 6d.

LIFE OF SHELLEY. With Portraits. Popular Edition. 8vo. 12s. net.

NEW STUDIES IN LITERATURE. 8vo. 6s.

PURITAN AND ANGELICAN STUDIES IN LITERATURE. 8vo. 7s. 6d.

TRANSCRIPTS AND STUDIES. 3rd Edition. 8vo. 6s.

SHAKSPEARE'S SONNETS. In various bindings. 7s. 6d., 6s., 3s. 6d., 2s. net, 1s. 6d. net.

Spring List of New Publications free on request.

KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, TRÜBNER & CO., LTD.,
 Broadway House, 68-74, Carter Lane, London, E.C.

DIGBY, LONG & CO'S
LATEST 6/- NOVELS.A THRILLING ROMANCE OF THE BALKANS.
IRMA OF CARPATHIA

By PERCY J. HARTLEY

(Author of "The House of Diane," &c.)

"A romance of the Balkans will naturally appeal to the reading public of the day, and in "Irma of Carpathia" they will find a charming story of the Stanley Weyman type, which for intrinsic interest would be difficult to surpass. A fascinating tale that grips the reader from beginning to end."

A tale of thrilling and dramatic intensity that places Mr. Hartley well to the front among present-day romancers. —London Journal

"Mr. Hartley belongs to that school of romance for which the name of Mr. Stanley Weyman is a household word. The present volume compares very favourably with his work. Mr. Hartley manages his characters and the situation with unmistakable skill and a true conception of the requirements of this type of romance. He has, indeed, a natural gift for it, and a style which is as perfect as can be." —Belfast Northern Whig

AT WHAT SACRIFICE. By ANNIE O. TIBBITS.
 Author of 'Marquess Splendid,' &c.

"To thousands of readers all over the country the stories of Annie O. Tibbits are well known. This is one of her best." —Irish Independent.

THE WHITE LION. By T. W. ALLEN.

"An exciting and cleverly contrived African romance that should have many readers." —Madame.

A MAID OF METTLE. By 'ALIEN,' Author of 'A Double Blindness,' &c.

"It has been a sheer delight to read "A Maid of Mettle." It is an eloquent story, with a charm that does not depend upon adventurous aids—just a simple, pleasant story which warms the heart." —Liverpool Courier.

THE SKY-LINE. By ETHEL CANNING, Author of 'Sybella.'

"The story is told with great power and possesses an enthralling interest. We feel as we read the book that we are moving in a world of living people whose temptations and loves are real. The book is well worth reading." —Huddersfield Examiner

ON THE FRINGE. By T. W. SPEIGHT, Author of 'Folied.'

"A delightfully told story in Mr. Speight's captivating style." —Sheffield Independent

LONDON: DIGBY, LONG & CO., 16, SOUVERIE ST., E.C.

STANLEY PAUL'S LIST

PRINCESS AND QUEEN OF ENGLAND. The Life of Mary II.

By MARY F. SANDARS. Illustrated. 16s. net.

"An admirable book, and one which not merely is attractive to the general reader, but claims the attention of historical students." —Standard

THE EUROPEAN IN INDIA

By H. HERVEY. Demy 8vo. Illustrated. 12s. 6d. net.

"A book of lively gossip." —Times
 "A series of social pictures of India, which for interest and information it would be hard to beat." —Catholic Times

CALIFORNIA: An Englishman's Impressions of the Golden State.

By A. T. JOHNSON. 57 Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net.

WESTERN MEN WITH EASTERN MORALS

By W. N. WILLIS, Author of "The White Slaves of London," &c. (Preface by R. A. BENNETT, Editor of Truth) Illustrated. 5s. net.

A GREY LIFE

By "RITA" 6s. Fourth Edition

"We have read this novel with the greatest pleasure, and it has at least this distinction—that we intend to read it again. One character ought to live a hundred years. Few modern novels have given us so much genuine pleasure." —Pall Mall Gazette

"A very full and interesting story, varied in character and incident. 'Rita's' many readers may turn to her new novel, confident that they will find it exhibits all the good qualities which they associate with that familiar pen name of an admirable story-teller." —Daily Telegraph

THE STROLLING SAINT

By RAFAEL SABATINI 6s. Fourth Edition.

"Mr. Sabatini is a skilful juggler. The story goes with verve from start to finish. Never was the romance of medieval Italy put to better use than in 'The Strolling Saint.'" —Daily Chronicle

"Mr. Sabatini gives us full measure of variety in his pictures. He knows the value of every accessory, and his atmosphere is extraordinarily effective." —Westminster Gazette

Second Edition.

DOUGLAS SLADEN'S NEW ROMANCE OF EGYPT

At all Libraries, Booksellers, and Bookstalls. 6s.

THE CURSE OF THE NILE

By DOUGLAS SLADEN,

Author of "The Tragedy of the Pyramids," "The Unholy Estate," &c.

LIFE'S LAST GIFT

By LOUIS de ROBERT. 6s. The Great French Prize Novel. Now ready in English.

FIRST REVIEW

"A poignant and convincing narrative, full of sincerity and truth."

THE DESTINY OF CLAUDE

By MAY WYNNE 6s. Author of "Henri of Navarre," &c.

"The best story this author has given us, both in construction and style." —Bristol Times

MRS. GRAY'S PAST

Herbert Flowerdew

GABRIEL'S GARDEN

Cecil Adair

THE FRUITS OF INDISCRETION

Sir William Magnay

CALLED TO JUDGMENT

Coralie Stanton and Heath Hoskin

RALPH RAYMOND

Ernest Mansfield

SIR GALAHAD OF THE ARMY

Hamilton Drummond

THE PRICE OF FRIENDSHIP

E. Everett-Green

CHEERFUL CRAFT (Fully Illustrated)

R. Androm

Author of "The Nun," "Redemption," &c.

THE REDEEMER

By RENÉ BAZIN. 6s.

"Publisher and translator have earned much gratitude for giving this fine novel to the English world." —Observer

Several editions sold in France

THE SHE-WOLF

By MAXIME FORMONT. 6s.

"A powerful and dramatic novel in which history and romance are mingled with a stormy hand." —Graphic

"Vivid sketches of medieval Rome." —Manchester News.

STANLEY PAUL & CO., 31, Essex Street, LONDON.

SECOND EDITION.

"Like all that Dr. Kelman writes, this is a book of high ethical value and great literary charm. It would be hard to mention a subject better suited to his particular talent than that with which it deals—the world-old struggle between paganism and idealism, which is the deepest fact in the life of man, and the story of which, told in one form or another, provides the matter of all vital literature."—Scotsman.

AMONG FAMOUS BOOKS

By JOHN KELMAN,
D.D., Author of "The Faith of Robert Louis Stevenson," etc.

6/-

"No living preacher has done more than Dr. Kelman to introduce young men and women to the world's greatest literature. . . . There is treasure in every chapter for the enriching of mind and heart."—British Weekly. "We have enjoyed his book. Dr. Kelman is widely read, and has a singularly persuasive style."—Athenæum. "An altogether very fine book."—Glasgow Herald. "Dr. John Kelman has written a fascinating book. . . . It is a magnificent subject for treatment, and Dr. Kelman handles it in a masterly way. Only a man of deep spiritual insight could write such a book as this. It will be eagerly read by all lovers of literature and by all who have spiritual vision."—Public Opinion. "Francis Thompson's 'Hound of Heaven' makes a fitting subject for the climax of these illuminating studies."—Scotsman.

Hodder & Stoughton, Publishers, London, E.C.

HAVE YOUR OWN BOOKPLATE.

I specialise in Artistic Original designs to meet individual tastes. Inclusive cost of Design, engraved plate and 100 proofs from 17/6 to several guineas, according to style and detail. Specimens submitted free.

HENRY S. WARD, 49, Gt. Portland St., London, W.

ARNOLD BENNETT'S
NEW BOOK.

THE PLAIN MAN AND HIS WIFE

By ARNOLD BENNETT

Author of "The Old Wives' Tale," "Buried Alive," etc. 2/6 net.

Ready Shortly.

THIRD LARGE EDITIONS OF ARNOLD BENNETT'S FAMOUS POCKET PHILOSOPHIES

1/- net each.

- (1) HOW TO LIVE ON 24 HOURS A DAY.
- (2) MENTAL EFFICIENCY.
- (3) LITERARY TASTE.
- (4) THE HUMAN MACHINE.
- (5) THE FEAST OF ST. FRIEND.

"A remarkable series of shilling books—full of good and brave things."
—Claudius Clear.

"The five titles describe his gospel admirably . . . They form spiritually speaking, one book,—a book on the art of living to-day. His five teachings, like his five towns, pulse with sane, vivid and generous communications. The young man who reads them will have life more abundantly, he will conceive what it is to be "Lord over the Needle."
—Pall Mall Gazette.

HODDER AND STOUGHTON, PUBLISHERS, LONDON, E.C.

First in 1847—Foremost in 1913

Bohn's Popular Library

The pioneer Series of Cheap Reprints in new and distinctive format.

One Shilling Net

First list of 20 Volumes. Just published. At all Booksellers.

1. Swift (J.)—Gulliver's Travels.
- 2-4. Motley (J.L.)—Rise of the Dutch Republic.
3 vols.
- 5-6. Emerson (R.W.)—Works; Vol I.—Essays and Representative Men.
Vol. II.—English Traits, Nature and Conduct of life.
- 7-8. Burton (Sir R.)—Pilgrimage to Al-madinah and Mecca 2 vols
9. Lamb (C.)—Essays of Elia
10. Hooper (G.)—Waterloo: The Downfall of the first Napoleon
11. Fielding (H.)—Joseph Andrews.
- 12-13. Cervantes—Don Quixote. 2 vols
14. Calverley (C.S.)—The Idylls of Theocritus, with the Eclogues of Virgil.
15. Burney (F.)—Evelina.
16. Coleridge (S.T.)—Aids to reflection.
- 17-18. Goethe—Poetry and Truth from my own life. 2 vols
19. Ebers—Egyptian Princess.
20. Young's Travels in France

Write to-day for a copy of the prospectus containing a history of the famous Bohns Libraries from their inauguration
to the present day

G. BELI. AND SONS, LTD
Portugal Street, London, W.C.

PAX BRITANNICA: A Study of the History of British Pacification.

By H. S. PERKINS, M.A., Secretary of the British Committee of the British American Peace Centenary. Demy 8vo, cloth. 5s. net.

SHAKESPEARE IN THE THEATRE.

By WILLIAM POIT, Founder and Director of the Elizabethan Stage Society. Demy 8vo 5s. net

ELLEN TERRY ON "THE RUSSIAN BALLET."

An appreciation by the famous Actress, with decorative drawings by PAMELA COLMAN SMITH.
"Neither in the sanity of criticism nor in the charm of accompanying illustrations have we seen anything half so good as 'The Russian Ballet' by ELLEN TERRY"—Globe Demy 4to 3s. 6d. net

ETHEL SIDGWICK'S NEW NOVEL

A sequel to PROMISE—entitled

SUCCESSION

is now ready. The first large edition was over-subscribed, the second is nearly sold out, and the third is now in the press.
Crown 8vo. 6s.

TIME'S WALLET. By LUCY DAIK and G. M FAULDING. 6s.

"Captures the imagination, interests and stimulates thought"—Scotsman "Delightful commentaries and clever asides"—Sunday Times.
"Should live much longer than the majority of latter-day novels because of its persuasive charm."—Westminster Gazette.

DISCOVERY. By HAROLD WILLIAMS. 6s.

"Discovery" should go well.—Evening Standard "This is a story which will give peculiar pleasure to the cultivated reader, for it has a charm entirely its own."—Daily Telegraph

AN INN UPON THE ROAD. By JANET DODGE. 6s.

"The characters of the three women make the book the remarkable thing it is."—Manchester Guardian

THE THIRD MISS SYMONS.

By F. M. MAYOR. Preface by JOHN MANFIELD.

Imperial 16mo 3s. 6d. net
"An interesting, delicately wrought picture"—Birmingham Post.
"A brief, acute, and charmingly sympathetic study"—Daily Express.
"Mr. Mansfield has formed a high opinion of Miss Mayor's work, but nothing beyond what her art deserves."—Glasgow Herald

FOUR PLAYS. By GILBERT CANNAN

JAMES & JOHN—MILES DIXON—MARY'S WEDDING—
A SHORT WAY WITH AUTHORS. 2s. 6d. net.

"These plays contain the best work he has yet given to the public."—
Scotsman. "As good to read as to listen to, and that is saying much."—
Globe

Adelphi SIDGWICK & JACKSON London

From CHATTO & WINDUS'S LIST.

A BRILLIANT FIRST NOVEL BY A NEW WRITER.

THE EVERLASTING SEARCH

By CECIL DUNCAN JONES. 6s.

"The delicacy and yet breadth of the book is extraordinary—the people are all real—the finish of style is admirable. Here is not merely a new novelist, but a new and distinguished writer."—Daily News

SECOND IMPRESSION NOW READY.

A "YOUNG LADY." A STUDY IN SELECTNESS.

By HORACE W. C. NEWTE, Author of "Pansy Meares," &c. 6s.

GEORGE DU MAURIER.

The Satirist of the Victorians. By MARTIN T. WOOD.

With many Illustrations. Sm. fcap. 4to. 7s. 6d. net.

CAMBRIDGE FROM WITHIN.

Demy 8vo, Cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

By CHARLES TENNYSON. With 20 Plates in Colour and Sepia. By HARRY MORLEY.

MOZART'S OPERAS. A Critical Study.

By EDWARD J. DENT. With Illustrations and Musical
Examples. Demy 8vo, Cloth, 12s. 6d. net.

LONDON: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, ST. MARTIN'S LANE, W.C.

TYPEWRITING.—MSS. of every description
copied accurately and promptly 9d. 1,000 words (postage inclusive). Testimonials from Authors, &c.

Miss JACOBS, 18, Statham Grove,

Clissold Park, N.

(Kindly note change of Address).

TO AUTHORS. The best offers for original
MSS. are secured by THE SURREY
LITERARY AGENCY. Novels, Short
Stories, and Articles read and placed.
Beginners' work a speciality. Write for free prospectus to "Locksley," Presburg Road, New Malden, Surrey.

TO ARTISTS and LITERARY GENTLEMEN.
TO BE SOLD.

An old Vicarage situate among the Hampshire Hills, 6 miles from Station on G.W.R. Contains Accommodation for a Family, and has Stabling and old-world Garden and surroundings.
Delightful Summer or Week-end Retreat. Price £300 only.
A. W. NEATE, Land Agent, Newbury, Berks.

INFANT BIBLE READER.

By Mrs. NATHANIEL L. COHEN, with coloured Illustrations by Louise Jacobs.

Price 1/6.

WERTHEIMER, LEA & CO., Clifton House, Worship Street, and 46 & 47, London Wall, London, E.C.

The aim of the book is to make children familiar with the beautiful stories of the Bible, and to give them some knowledge of the eternal truths of human life and character.

GLAISHERS' PUBLISHERS' REMAINDERS.

Supplementary List No. 394 Now Ready.

Including all the latest Remainder Book Purchases, priced at great reductions from the original cost.
Gratis and Post Free.

WILLIAM GLAISHER, Ltd., 265, High Holborn, London; and at 14, George Street, Croydon, Surrey.

MACMILLAN'S LIST.

Life of Octavia Hill as Told in her Letters. Edited by C. EDMUND MAURICE. Illustrated. 8vo. 16s. net.

A Small Boy and Others. By HENRY JAMES. With Frontispiece. 8vo. 12s. net.

The Nation — "Those who know the Henry James language will find in his new book a masterpiece, not only of self-portraiture, but of psychological study of the interesting world of a small boy — an exciting tale of the minute adventures of one who, even as an infant, was a pre-destinate and inextinguishable observer."

St. Paul and his Companions. By F. BASIL REDLICH, M.A. (Cantab.), Assistant Curate, Parish Church, Hampstead, and Assistant Diocesan Inspector of Schools in the Diocese of London. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

NEW WORK BY MAURICE HEWLETT.

Lore of Proserpine. By MAURICE HEWLETT. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

* A book of essays on what are commonly described as supernatural subjects. Their interest is greatly increased by the fact that, up to a certain point, they assume an autobiographical cast.

SECOND IMPRESSION.

The Odd Farmhouse. By the ODD FARM-WIFE. Crown 8vo. 6s.

The Queen — "The Odd Farmhouse" is as delightful a book as it must be a dwelling. It is written in somewhat the style of 'Elizabeth and Her German Gardener', but, in spite of the excellence of Elizabeth, the Odd Farmwife need not fear the comparison."

SECOND IMPRESSION.

Gitanjali (Song Offerings). By RABINDRANATH TAGORE. A Collection of Prose Translations made by the author from the original Bengali. Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d. net.

The Sphere — "There has been no such prose translation from a poet in our day since Mr. Andrew Lang translated the 'Odyssey.'"

The Inside of the Cup. By WINSTON CHURCHILL. Author of "Richard Carvel," etc. Extra crown 8vo. 6s. [Shortly]

A Prisoner in Fairyland. (The book that 'Uncle Paul' wrote.) By ALGERNON BLACKWOOD, Author of "Jimbo," etc. Extra crown 8vo. 6s. [Shortly]

Father Ralph. By GERALD O'DONOVAN. Extra crown 8vo. 6s.

* A story of modern Irish life, containing a powerful attack on the methods of Catholicism.

AUSTIN DOBSON

LIFE OF FIELDING. Cr. 8vo. Library Edition, 2s. net. Popular Edition, 1s. 6d. Sewed, 1s. Fcap. 8vo, Pocket Edition, 1s. net. [English Men of Letters]

LIFE OF RICHARDSON. Cr. 8vo. 2s. net. [English Men of Letters]

LIFE OF FANNY BURNETT. Cr. 8vo. 2s. net. [English Men of Letters]

DE LIBRIS. Prose and Verse. Illustrated by Hugh Thomson and Kate Greenaway. New Edition, with additional chapter. Ex. cr. 8vo. 5s. net.

DIARY AND LETTERS OF MADAME D'ARBLAY (1778-1840). As edited by her niece, Charlotte Barrett. New Edition with Preface and Notes by Austin Dobson. With photogravure portraits and other illustrations. Six vols. 8vo. 10s. 6d. net each.

THE DIARY OF JOHN EVELYN. With Introduction and Notes by Austin Dobson. 3 vols. Illustrated. 8vo. 31s. 6d. net. Edition de Luxe, printed on hand-made paper. £3 3s. net.

THE DIARY OF JOHN EVELYN. With Introduction and Notes by Austin Dobson. Globe Edition. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d. Limp Leather, 5s. net.

MACMILLAN & CO., Ltd., LONDON.

MR. HEINEMANN'S LIST of New and Recent Books

THE PRINCE IMPERIAL

By A. FILON. Beautifully illustrated. 15s. net.
"Has enriched contemporary annals with a tender, grave, and profoundly human book." Pall Mall Gazette.

SURVEY OF THE WOMAN PROBLEM

From the German of R. MAYREIDER, by HERMANN SCHEFFAUER. Demy 8vo. 5s. net.

"Pages packed with thought and thoroughness."

—CITY HAMILTON in the Daily News.

RUE AND ROSES

By ANGELA LANGER. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.
A Woman's remarkable analysis of her emotional life.

DAUBER

By JOHN MASEFIELD, Author of "The Everlasting Mercy." Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

PAUL I. OF RUSSIA: Son of Catherine the Great. By K. WALIZEWSKI. 15s. net.

THE MEN AROUND THE KAISER.

By F. T. WILE. Crown 8vo. With portraits. 6s. net.

Ars Una: Species Mille

The History of Art throughout the Ages.
By leading European Experts. 600 Illustrations. 6s. net.

ART IN EGYPT (just out)

Vols. previously issued FRANCE, GREAT BRITAIN and IRELAND, N. ITALY. Ready shortly. SPAIN, FLANDERS.

THE LOEB CLASSICAL LIBRARY

Edited by T. E. PAGE, M.A., and W. H. D. ROUSE, Litt.D.

A Series of Greek and Latin Texts with English Translations on the opposite page. 5s. net, cloth; 6s. net, leather.

5 NEW VOLUMES NOW READY.

- (1) Apostolic Fathers II. (2) Apollonius III. (3) Julian I.
(4) Sophocles II. (5) Quintus Smyrnaeus.

Please write for Prospectus giving full details of the Series and new vols. for 1913.

Latest Novels. 6s.

THE AMBASSADRESS By William Wriothsley GOSLINGS - - - J. D. Beresford

THE WEAKER VESSEL - - - E. F. Benson

THE LIFE MASK By the Author of "He Who Passed"

GROWING PAINS - - - Ivy Low

WHERE ARE YOU GOING TO . . . ? (2nd Imp.) Elizabeth Robins

READY EARLY IN MAY.

JAMES HURD - - - R. O. Prowse

VIRGINIA - - - Ellen Glasgow

LU OF THE RANGES - Eleanor Mordaunt

THE KINGDOM - - - Harold Goad

JOHN CHRISTOPHER.

6s. each Volume.

VOL. I., DAWN AND MORNING; VOL. II., STORM AND STRESS; VOL. III., JOHN CHRISTOPHER IN PARIS; VOL. IV., JOURNEY'S END.

"A book that has given to the world something definitely new in form, in spirit, and in ideal. . . . No one should miss the opportunity of reading it and keeping it to read again."

—The Spectator.

Heinemann's Shilling & Sevenpenny Novels are the best. Write for List.

WILLIAM HEINEMANN, 21, BEDFORD STREET, W.C.

The Bookman.

"I am a Bookman."—James Russell Lowell.

No. 260. VOL. XLIV.
Subscription rate 11s. per annum post free.

MAY, 1913.

PRICE SIXPENCE.
Published Monthly.

CONTENTS.

NEWS NOTES .. .. . 55-60	Modern Drama. By HAROLD MASSINGHAM .. .. 84	"Stella Maris " By F G BERTANY .. .. . 95
THE BOOKMAN GALLERY —	Half-Lengths .. .. . 86	The Spirit of Christmas. By KATHARINE TYNAN .. .. 95
Austin Philips By EDWARD WRIGHT .. .. . 60	Swinburne on Dickens .. .. 86
THE BOOKSELLERS' DIARY 62	A Study of a Great Soldier. By STANLEY PORTAL HYATT .. .. 87	NOVEL NOTES -
THE READER —	The R. L. Stevenson Originals .. .. 87	Nevertheless Growing Pains
Austin Dobson. By FRANCIS BICKLEY .. .. . 65	The Complete English Socialist. By JOSEPH CLAYTON .. .. 88	-- Willie in the Isle of Man
The Art of Hugh Thomson. By J. P. COLLINS .. .. 77	Victorian Verse By THOMAS SECCOMBE .. .. . 89	Tremendous Daphne in Paris—The Temptation of Tavernake --The Arnold Lip
Good Company. By WALTER SCHILL .. .. . 80	A City of Ghosts. By EDWIN PUGH .. .. . 89	--A Necessity of Life--
PRIZE COMPETITIONS .. 72	More War Books By PERCEVAL GIBBON .. .. . 90	Lady of the Night Sanna of the Island Town .. 96-98
NEW BOOKS —	The Dramatic Hot-Gospeller. By ROBB LAWSON .. .. 91	THE BOOKMAN'S TABLE -
William Watson's New Poems. By A. ST. JOHN ADCOCK .. 83	Knowledge à la Carte. By PROFESSOR JOHN ADAMS .. 92	A Little Book of Courage -
Wagner without Tears. By GEORGE SAMPSON .. .. 84	The World of London .. .. 93	Loeb Classical Library -
Bohn's Library .. .. . 84	A Tale of Two Interests .. .. 94	The Woman Movement--
	Problems of Imperialism .. .. 91	Sir Keneilm Digby—Lacordaire .. .. . 98-99
		NOTES ON NEW BOOKS .. 100

NOTICES.

All communications intended for the Editor must be addressed to the Editor of THE BOOKMAN, ST. PAUL'S HOUSE, WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

A preliminary letter of inquiry should be sent to the Editor before any manuscript is submitted for his consideration taken specially for THE BOOKMAN by Mr. E. O. Hoppé.

Katharine Tynan (Mrs. H. A. Hinkson) has written a first volume of her "Memoirs," and the book will be published shortly by Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co.

News Notes.

The June BOOKMAN will be an Edmund Gosse Number, and will contain a special article on Edmund Gosse by Thomas Seccombe. Other important articles in this Number will include "Swinburne," by Professor Saintsbury; "A Lyric Love," by George Sampson; "From Both Sides," by Stanley Portal Hyatt; "The Mystic Way," by Darrell Figgis; "Dickens in America," by W. Roberts; "The Positive Evolution of Religion," by James Moffatt, D.D., D.Litt.; and an article on the late Professor Dowden.

The portrait on our cover is from a photograph by Paul Laib of the portrait of Mr. Austin Dobson painted by Mr. Frank Brooks, of Ealing. Our presentation plate portrait of Mr. Dobson was Miss L. Lind-af-Hageby, whose speech in her anti-vivisection libel action recently won golden opinions from Mr. Justice Bucknill and the press and public in general, has written a critical life of August Strindberg, which Mr. Stanley Paul is publishing immediately. This is the first life of Strindberg to appear in the English language.

Mrs. Humphry Ward has written a new novel, a love story of to-day, which is to commence its serial appearance in the May Number of Harper's Magazine.

The picture of Miss Viola Meynell in our April issue was from a portrait-study by Mr. Sherril Schell, the talented American artist, who has opened a studio for the season at 116, St. George's Square, and has lately made a very interesting series of studies of literary celebrities.

"Mr. Laxworthy's Adventures," a new book by Mr. E. Phillips Oppenheim, will be published this month by Messrs. Cassell. As a writer of sensational stories, Mr. Oppenheim is among the most popular of living English novelists. He confesses that as a writer of fiction his chief aim is to make his stories real stories of adventure, and to keep the feminine interest entirely wholesome. His vogue in America is, if anything, greater than it is in England. He has recently gone to the South of France on a two months' holiday, and is staying again at the "Paradise Hotel" where the Laxworthy stories were written, and he says that if he feels like it he will forget he is on holiday and write another series of them.

Photo by Lajaville, Dublin.

The Late Professor Dowden,
on whom we are publishing a special article in next month's BOOKMAN.

Mr. Oppenheim began life by taking a hand in his father's leather business at Leicester, but he had already been writing stories, because it amused him to do so, since he was eighteen. The leather business was so successful that Blumenthals, the big American and Paris leather people, bought it over and made him their director at Leicester. His business experience has stood him in good stead; it not only helped him with material for his stories, but it was through the American head of Blumenthals that he had his chief incentive to the writing of the type of story that has made him a successful novelist. This gentleman introduced him to the proprietor of the Café de Rat Mort, the once famous Montmartre haunt, for Mr. Oppenheim was whose new novel "A Little World" (George Allen), is reviewed in this Number.

Photo by Ad. Lphi Studios, Strand.

Mr. Arnold Golsworthy,

Photo by Fulk, New York.

Mr. E. Phillips Oppenheim.

Mr. Oppenheim, whose novel, "The Temptation of Tavernake," is published by Messrs. Horder & Stoughton, has completed a new book of stories, "Mr. Laxworthy's Adventures," which Messrs. Cassell are publishing this month.

Miss Angela Langer, strange story of her own life, "Rue and Roses," Mr. W.
 H. M. is publishing frequently in Paris on business, and here he acquired his taste for the mysteries of international complications, for the proprietor used to tell him thrilling yarns of political and international adventure. He protests that he does not construct his stories but lets them grow. "Two or three people in a crowded restaurant may arouse my interest and the atmosphere is compelling," he says. "I start weaving a story round them—the circumstances and the people

Gasquoine Hartley
 (Mrs. Walter Gallichan).

gradually develop as I dictate to my secretary the thoughts they evoke. But first of all I must have a congenial atmosphere—the rest is easy."

We have lately had a large number of books upon the position of women written by women, and in many cases their authors' idea of emancipation seems to be limited to a desire for political enfranchisement. Mrs. Walter M. Gallichan (Catherine Gasquoine Hartley) has written an important book, "The Truth About Women," that Mr. Eveleigh

Photo by Scott's Studios, Regent's Park. Mr. W. Pett Ridge, whose new book of stories, "Mixed Grill" (Hodder & Stoughton), is reviewed in this Number

Nash is publishing, in which she examines the position of women from the points of view of biology, psychology and the sexual relationship, and sets herself to prove that the freeing of woman involves very much more than the gaining of the vote. Mrs. Gallichan, under her maiden name of Gasquoine Hartley, is the author of many and various books. Her first novel, "Life the Modeller," was published in 1889, and was followed by "The Weaver's Shuttle," "Stories of Early British Heroes," "The Moorish Cities of Spain," "Stories from the Greek Legends," and "A Record of Spanish Painting," which is recognized as the standard work on this subject. Her books upon Spain and its art and historic buildings are numerous, and include a study of "El Greco," "The Prado," and "Spain Revisited." Last year Messrs. Dent published her "Story of Santiago," in their Mediæval Towns series, and "The Cathedrals of Southern Spain" will be issued shortly by Mr. Werner Laurie. Mrs. Gallichan has written and lectured much upon English painters, and a large volume of hers on "The Pictures in the Tate Gallery" was published a year

Miss Rosamund Napier, whose remarkable novel, "Tamsie" (Hodder & Stoughton) is now in its third edition or two ago by Messrs. Seeley. But her interest in social questions is perhaps even keener than her love of art and literature; she has always been a diligent student of the Woman's Movement, and her latest work, "The Truth About Women," is the result of many years of observation and enquiry.

Mr. Adam S. Melville, senior partner in the famous Australian bookselling firm of Messrs. Melville and Mullen, of Melbourne, is retiring from active association with the business. Mr. Melville was born in Edinburgh, in 1842, and after serving a four-years' apprenticeship to Messrs. Gall & Inglis, went out of the well-known firm of booksellers,

Mr. Adam S. Melville,
Messrs. Melville & Mullen of Melbourne.

to Melbourne in 1861, where he was promptly engaged as assistant by Mr. Samuel Mullins who had opened a book store in Collins Street in 1857. "For fifty-two years," writes Mr. Donald MacLean, the well-known Australian novelist, "Mr. Melville has lived and moved and had his being in the one shop, and from an unknown youth he has gradually risen to be the Grand Old Man of Australian booksellers, in many respects the most picturesque figure of them all." He has been too busy selling books to write many; but he has written an admirable one on China, and a pamphlet tracing the rise and progress of the book trade in Australia that is of peculiar interest and value. Mr. Melville has been the guide, philosopher and friend of many authors, and the warmth of their regard for him is summed up in Mr. MacLean's little note of regret at his retirement: "It is not the writer or the man of affairs we shall miss so much as the kindly, courteous gentleman."

Mr. Stanley Paul.

Mr. Stanley Paul, who started publishing four and a half years ago in Clifford's Inn, rapidly built up such a successful business that two years back he found it necessary to remove into larger premises in Essex Street, Strand. He has now, by way of further development, acquired the business of Messrs. Greening & Co. The firms will not be amalgamated, but the two will henceforth be conducted by Mr. Stanley Paul under their separate names. He is this year issuing no fewer than a hundred and whose new poem, "Dauber," will be published this month by Mr. Heinemann.

Photo by John Trevor.

Mr. John Masefield,

six books for the firm that bears his own name, and intends to add a large number of serious volumes to Messrs. Greening's list; among the first of such additions will be a series of "Memoirs of Secret History" publisher and is to make its appearance this autumn. Other poets will be glad to hear that she was paid fifty pounds for this volume.

Some interesting and sensational eighth edition. Miss Lindsay Russell had spent her life in the bush and the country districts of Victoria until a year or two ago, and was more given to riding, coursing and picnicing than to study in school. She wrote "Souls in Pawn" during a brief visit to England recently, and sold it promptly to Messrs. Ward, Lock, and drew the money for it before she returned home. She has another book, a collection of her poems, called "Road of Yesterday," which is in the hands of an English concerning the French Revolution, the "Recollections of an Officer in Napoleon's Army," and a volume on Madame de Pompadour in the Court Series of French Memoirs.

Photo by Adolphe Denis.

Mr. H. S. Perrie.

Miss Lindsay Russell, whose new novel, "Souls in Pawn," has just been published by Messrs. Ward, Lock, has been described as the Australian Marie Corelli. She is very widely known in Australia as the author of "Straws in the Wind," "The Love Letters of a Priest," and "Smouldering Fires"—the first edition of the latter sold out in a few days, and it is now in its whose new novel, "Souls in Pawn," is published by Messrs. Ward, Lock.

Photo by K. Stewart, Brighton.

Miss Lindsay Russell,

Photo by courtesy of Mr. Eveleigh Nash.

Countess Marie Larisch, whose autobiography, "My Past," has just been published by Mr. Eveleigh Nash.

revelations are promised in the Countess Larisch's Memoirs, "My Past," that Mr. Eveleigh Nash is issuing this month. It will be remembered that in 1889 the Crown Prince Rudolph of Austria and the Baroness Mary Vetsera were found dead at the hunting box of Mayerling, near Allard, but it was never authoritatively stated how they met their end. The secret is to be unveiled now by the Countess Marie Larisch, a niece of the late Empress Elizabeth of Austria. After a silence of twenty years she has decided that the time has come to tell the whole sad and terrible story. In addition to anecdotes and recollections of many other royal and distinguished persons, the Countess gives some full and intimate reminiscences of her aunt, the Empress Elizabeth, and of her cousin, King Ludwig of Bavaria.

Miss Marjorie Crosbie asks us to mention that her book of poems, "Life's Changes," which we reviewed last month, is published in London by E. J. Larby, of Paternoster Avenue.

"Pax Britannica" is the title given to an important book by Mr. Harry S. Perris, which Messrs. Sidgwick & Jackson have just published. Mr. Perris is the Secretary of the British-American Peace Centenary Committee, and has had much experience as a worker for international peace, having served for some years as secretary of the British National Peace Council. His new book embodies, therefore, the fruits of practical knowledge as well as of much historical research.

Messrs. Macmillan have issued a new edition of "Gitanjali" (Song Offerings) by Rabindranath Tagore, of which a limited edition was published last year by the India Society. This remarkable volume, which we reviewed shortly after its first appearance, consists of prose translations made by the author from his poems in the original Bengali, and has an introduction by W. B. Yeats.

The latest addition to the ranks of the London publishing houses is made by the firm of Max Goschen, Ltd., who have started business at 20, Great Russell Street, London, W.C., with the issue of Mr. Douglas Goldring's very successful volume "Streets." The new firm promise some interesting "discoveries," including a new writer, Mr. George Willoughby, whose collection of short stories, called "The Adventures," they announce for immediate publication.

For much assistance with the illustrations in this Number we are indebted to the kindness of Messrs. Kegan Paul & Co.; Messrs. Macmillan; Mr. J. P. Collins; Messrs. Methuen; Mr. Heinemann; Messrs. Alston Rivers; Messrs. Cassell; Mr. Eveleigh Nash; Messrs. Digby, Long; Messrs. Pitman; Mr. Stanley Paul; and Messrs. George Allen.

THE BOOKMAN GALLERY.

AUSTIN PHILIPS.

MAUPASSANT used to say that the ubiquity of the English spinster was the most remarkable thing in Europe. But nowadays it is the British golfer that one encounters everywhere. I sometimes fancy the greater part of the Continent will at last be transformed into links for his benefit. His little alien caddies catch his enthusiasm, and spend their spare time in playing the game among themselves, and teaching it to their grandfathers. So at least a Frenchman tried to make me believe. Some years ago I was breaking, at Dieppe, a wearisome journey from Aragon—happily golf isn't played there yet—and in loafing about the French seaport I met the inevitable golfer, a youngish Englishman, tanned, clean-shaven, with a strong chin and the usual bag of clubs. But, extraordinarily, he didn't want to hold forth about the Dieppe links. He switched our chat on to literary "shop" and kept it fixed there. He was quite enthusiastic about Maupassant's short stories, and eager to get someone to disagree with him and give him an opening for discussion. So I mildly maintained that the tales of Rudyard Kipling were, on the whole, superior to those of the French master of short story-writing. They had more variety of theme, and showed a larger sense of life, and even in regard to the art of composition I was not prepared to allow that Maupassant was the greater artist. Maupassant's trick of getting atmosphere by describing a discussion between one or two men or a group of chatting women, and then leading up to a brilliantly told anecdote from one of the speakers, has always seemed to me a distressing way of starting a tale. Maupassant himself wore the trick clean out, and his innumerable imitators have long since reduced it to an inanity.

"But don't you see Maupassant's real source of strength?" exclaimed Austin Philips. "He is quite free from the modern vice of dissecting a character to death, and analysing it into a tangled something that you cannot grasp. He carves his characters out of the stuff of life, instead of dissecting them into nothingness, like Paul Bourget and Henry James. He doesn't continually stop to explain what his characters think. He makes them reveal their qualities in action, and develop themselves in deeds."

When a man talks like this, one can usually take it that he is either writing tales himself or studying to write them. Austin Philips was doing both these things, and some months afterwards I came across a tale of his in one of the magazines that struck me as being remarkably good. It was a short story about life in the Post Office, written with insight into human nature, and with an intimate knowledge of the inner working of the most successful branch of our bureaucracy which was curiously arresting. It now forms the opening tale in "Red Tape," that Messrs. Smith & Elder published a couple of years ago.

When Austin Philips wrote it he was the Postmaster of Droitwich, with an interesting career behind him. I fancy that one of his long nourished ambitions in life is to arouse public opinion in regard to the organisation of our Postal Service. He wishes to see it so re-ordered that a man of ability in the lowest ranks shall again have an opportunity of making his way by sheer merit to positions of power and importance. He himself was driven into the literary world by a failure, after a struggle of seventeen years, to break through the iron barrier that separates the pariah caste of Post Office officials from the lordly and not always capable Brahmin caste, strictly recruited from crammer's pups in the universities.

Born in 1875 at Lewisham, and educated at Malvern College, Mr. Philips was unable to proceed to a university owing to a lack of means, so in 1893 he entered the Post Office by the back door. He became a sorting clerk at Leicester, where he worked on a night job, from 7.30 in the evening till 4 o'clock in the morning. He hoped that when he had gained practical experience, he would at last get on to the Provincial Inspecting Staff, fine appointments of this sort being then still open to members of the rank and file who proved that they had remarkable capacity. His father had won from the bottom to the top in this way.

It seems to me that Austin Philips must have become a good man at postal work. For after climbing from one small post to another, and going out to Natal for six months, he was taken up by the authorities and trained into a minor sort of Sherlock Holmes. That is to say, he entered the Investigation Branch of the service that deals with all kinds of Post Office crimes. Night after night was spent by him in the secret watching galleries that honeycomb the walls of all the big modern Post Offices. He prepared test letters to catch the thief that he suspected, and came forth as the chief witness at trials in London and the Assize towns of England and Wales.

It was while travelling about the country after criminals, and while sitting in the waiting-rooms at Bow Street and the Central Criminal Court, that he began to entertain himself with literature. Just to occupy his mind while waiting to convict the wrong-doers he had tracked down, he taught himself to read French and German, Spanish and Italian. And then—verse springs eternal in the youthful breast—he took to writing sketches in rhyme. Great was the quantity of them, and a few appeared in the Westminster, Pall Mall and Evening Standard. Usually they were not signed; but Austin Philips often had the dubious pleasure of seeing his name appear in another part of the paper. "High-handed Conduct of a Post Office Official," "Star Chamber Methods at St. Martin's-le-Grand"—such were some of the headings under which the name of Austin Philips was first brought before the public, in connection with the trial of some thievish postman at Bow Street. For Sir Albert de Rutzen was inclined to condemn in open Court the method of questioning suspected wrong-doers which was followed by the Investigation Branch. And as Mr. Philips often had to conduct these private examinations, he came in for a good deal of criticism from the magistrate.

Austin Philips himself profoundly disliked the kind of work he was engaged in. He was well paid, but the wrong-doers excited his pity more often than his sense of justice. He broke down, after going with the police to the room of an auxiliary postman, who, though earning the magnificent wages of seven and sixpence a week, had stolen a letter. For a long time Mr. Philips beat his head against the stone wall that now prevents any official of the lower class from entering the higher branches of the service. "You've no lead in your boots, young man," said one of the Mandarins. "I don't want any lead in my boots," said Mr. Philips, "it isn't much use to a chap who's in a blind alley, and wants to climb the wall."

*Photo by R. H. Phillips,
St. Ives, Cornwall.*

Mr. Austin Philips.

He saw it was a case of recoiling to leap better. He recoiled. At a loss of salary and prospects, he obtained the postmastership of Droitwich, with the help of Mr. Buxton Forman, and he gave his evenings to writing short stories. He sent them out, but, as usual, they were like homing pigeons. One morning—I remember him telling me at our first meeting—he had seven back by the first post. It was then he ceased writing for a while and studied Maupassant, Kipling and "Q." And after three years' practice, his work began to appear in the monthly magazines, and somewhat more than two years afterwards he leaped over the wall he had set himself to surmount, and landed well on his feet in the republic of letters.

In his two first volumes of stories, "Red Tape," and "A Budget of Tares," there are traces of the influence of the three men he sedulously studied. Yet even in his 'prentice work is revealed a fine native gift for story-telling, and the subject matter of many of the tales is fresh and provocative of ideas. Mr. Philips has discovered a world of new interests in the lives of the bureaucracy that is getting a large part of the actual work of Government into their hands. The continual conflict between the democratic element in our Civil Service and the aristocratic corps that comes from the universities, affords him a wonderfully varied amount of dramatic situations, which he handles now in a vivid and memorable manner.

I fancy that in his younger days Mr. Philips was inclined to the Fabian school of Socialism, partly by reason of his discontent with the growth of Mandarinism in the public services of our great democracy, and largely out of general sympathy with all the undermen in our gloomy industrial civilisation. But his personal experiences of the qualities of some of the leading men in the modern movement of intellectual socialism, has transformed him into one of the most vehement and out-spoken opponents of Fabianism in life and art and politics. He expressed his views on the matter with a great deal of personal feeling in "The Common Touch," his first long novel, published this year. One reviewer says of the work: "there is not a fine thought in it," another critic acclaims it as "one of the outstanding achievements of the current year." So it strikes me that Austin Philips has infuriated the persons he attacked and pleased those of his own way of thinking. He is now engaged upon another novel, dealing with the drama of the Investigation Branch of the Postal Service, in which, with the same passion born of personal experience, he depicts the struggle between the lower and higher divisions in our bureaucracy. In the meantime a new collection of his short stories, entitled "Not in the Newspapers," has been prepared for publication. It contains, I think, the best work that he has yet done. His laboriously cultivated talent is ripening into genius, and he is happily young enough to enjoy his popularity. For besides being an artist, he is a reformer with something of importance to say, and the larger his audience becomes, the more fully he develops the fine original side of his nature.

EDWARD WRIGHT.

The Booksellers' Diary.

LIST OF FORTHCOMING BOOKS.

May 1st to June 1st, 1913.

Messrs. George Allen & Co., Ltd.

- BUCKLEY, REGINALD R. and HUTCHINSON, ARTHUR.—Handbook to the Stratford-upon-Avon Festival 1913. With 4 Illustrations. 1s net.
MURRAY, PROFESSOR GILBERT.—"Rhesus" of Euripides 1s net, paper
2s. net, cloth
PETAVEL, J. W.—The Other Great Illusion 6d net
SMITH, F. MONTAGU.—Railway Rate Book. Containing every Station and Siding in the British Isles. 4s 5s. net

Mr. B. T. Batsford.

FELLOWSHIP BOOKS.

- BAX, CLIFFORD.—Friendship 2s. net
CANNAN, GILBERT.—The Joy of the Theatre 2s. net
GUTHRIE, JAMES.—Divine Discontent. 2s. net
RHYS, GRACE.—The Quest of the Ideal. 2s. net.
TAIT, C. J.—Springtime. 2s. net.
THOMAS, EDWARD.—The Country. 2s. net

Messrs. A. & C. Black.

- ADAMS, MRS. HUGH, and BROWNE, MISS E. A. (Editors).—The Social Guide for 1913. 2s. 6d. net.
EUCKEN, RUDOLPH.—The Meaning and Value of Life. Fourth Impression. 3s. 6d. net.
HOME, GORDON.—What to See in England. New Edition. 3s. 6d. net
SIMPSON, A. NICOL.—Reptiles and Amphibians "Peeps at Nature." 1s. 6d. net.
STEWART, A. M.—British Moths "Peeps at Nature." 1s. 6d. net.

Messrs. William Blackwood & Sons.

- CAREY, WYMOND.—No. 101. 1s. net.
HAY, IAN.—A Safety Match. 1s. net.
NOYES, ALFRED.—Tales of the Mermaid Tavern. 6s. net.

Messrs. Cassell & Co., Ltd.

- BASTIN, S. I.—Flowerless Plants 6s. net.
FEUVRE, AMY Lk.—Some Builders. 6s.
GARVIE, CHARLES.—A Girl from the South. 6d.
LE QUEUX, WILLIAM.—The Money Spider. 1s. net
OPPENHEIM, E. PHILLIPS.—Mr. Laxworthy's Adventures. 3s. 6d. net.
PAIN, BARRY.—Eliza's Son 1s. net
Royal Academy Pictures 5s. net and 3s. net.

Messrs. Chapman & Hall.

- GIRVIN, BRFNDA, and COUSINS, MONICA.—The Dancing Child. 6s.
GRIBBLE, FRANCIS.—The Tragedy of Isabella II. 15s. net.
JAMES, WINIFRED.—The Mulberry Tree 7s. 6d. net.
KROPOTKIN, PRINCE.—The Conquest of Bread. 1s. net.
PATON, RAYMOND.—The Drummer of the Dawn 6s.
THOMAS, GILBERT.—The Wayside Altar. 2s. 6d. net.
THURSTON, E. TEMPLE.—The Open Window. 6s.

Messrs. W. B. Clive & Sons.

- ALLCROFT, A. H., M.A., and HAYES, B. J., M.A.—Horace, Odes II. and IV 2s. 6d.
BARLOW, C. W. C., M.A., B.Sc.—Mathematical Physics. Vol. I.—Magnetism and Electricity.
BAUSOR, H. W., M.A.—Preliminary Chemistry (A Simple Course for Beginners). 1s. 6d.
BAUSOR, H. W., M.A.—Senior Volumetric Analysis. 1s. 6d.
COLLINS, A. J. F., M.A.—Shakespeare: Henry IV. 2s.
FRY, G. C., M.Sc.—Senior Geography of North America. 1s.
FRY, G. C., M.Sc.—Senior Geography of Asia. 1s.
SHOOSMITH, H., M.A.—Spelling and Dictation.
WALKER, T., M.A., and RICHARDS, J. F., M.A.—St. Luke's Gospel. 1s. 6d.

Messrs. J. M. Dent & Co.

- BEDDOE, DAVID M.—The Lost Mameluke. 6s.
HOLMES, THOMAS.—London's Underworld. 2s. 6d. net.
NOYES, ELA.—Salisbury Plain. 10s. 6d. net.
RHYS, ERNEST.—English Lyric Poetry. 5s. net.
JAINTSBURY, PROFESSOR.—The English Novel. 5s. net.
ESTELL and TURNER.—The Seashore I Know. 8d. net.

Messrs. Digby, Long & Co.

- BLYTH, JAMES.—The King's Guerdon. 6d.
DELANNOY, HURFORD.—A Studio Model. 6d.
DORNING, CLARE.—Annals of a Lancashire Village. 3s. 6d.
MEADE, L. T.—Bess of Delany's. 6d.
TITSON, MARIE.—The Three Sisters. 3s. 6d.
TRAVERS, HETTIE.—A Stormy Passage: A Historical Romance. 6s.
WARDEN, GERTRUDE.—Heart of Stone. 6d.

Messrs. Heath, Cranton & Ouseley, Ltd.

- ANON.—I Will. 6d. net.
"CABOT."—Musings of a City Clerk. 3s. 6d. net.
CRAIG, DR. ROBERT.—History of Oratory. 10s. 6d. net.
DUTTON, ANNIE V.—Feigning or Folly. 6s.
FRANKISH, H., M.B., B.Sc.—Dr. Cundiffe: Investigator. 6s.
HAYES, BENSON.—From an Umbrian City. 2s. net.
"HERSELF."—Confessions of a Dancing Girl. 2s. 6d. net.
MORRIS, MARY HUSBAND.—The Bastard. 6s.
NAISH, P. L.—Chestnuts Hot and Cold. 2s. 6d. net.
STEWART, B.—The Lecture Year Book. 3s. 6d. net.
"THORMANBY."—The Black Bean. 6s.

Prize Illustration of book-title.
Drawn by Ronald Harley.
(See Prize Competition pages).

Mr. Wm. Heinemann.

GLASGOW, MISS ELLEN.—Virginia. 6s.
GOAD, HAROLD E.—The Kingdom. 3s.
MORDAUNT, ELEANOR.—Lu of the Ranges. 6s.
PROWSE, R. O.—James Hurd. 6s.
WILE, F. W.—Men Around the Kaiser. 6s. net.

Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton.

BARR, ROBERT.—A Woman in a Thousand. 6s.
BEGBIE, HAROLD.—Rising Dawn: Telling the Adventures, Travels and Love Story of Andrew Mallet, sometime Squire to the Duke of Lancaster. 6s.
DIX, BEAULAH MARIE.—The Fighting Blade. 6s.
EDGINGTON, MAY.—The Sin of Eve. 6s.
FUTRELL, JACQUES.—My Lady's Garter. 6s.
HENNESSEY, DAVID.—The Outlaw. 6s.
LANCASTER, G. R.—The Law Bringers. 6s.
SNEDEKER, CAROLINE D.—The Spartan. 6s.
WHITEHEAD, DAVID.—The Little Hour of Peter Wells. 6s.

Messrs. Hurst & Blackett.

FARJEON, R. L.—Blade-o'-Grass. 6d.
FIELDING-HALL, H.—The World Soul. 10s. 6d. net.
HICKEY, WILLIAM.—Memoirs of William Hickey. 12s. 6d. net.
"IOTA."—Dorinda and Her Daughter. 7d. net.
LE QUEUX, WILLIAM.—The Price of Power. 6s.
MITFORD, BERTRAM.—The Secret of the Lebonbo. 6d.
SERGEANT, ADELIN.—Erica's Husband. 6d.
SWAN, ANNIE S.—The Broad Road. 6d.

Messrs. Hutchinson & Co.

ALBANESI, MADAME.—Poppies in the Corn. 7d. net.
BANCROFT, F.—Thane Brandon. 6s.
BENSON, ROBERT HUGH.—Some Average Men. 6s.
BENSON, ROBERT HUGH.—The Coward. 1s. net.
BENSUSAN, S. L.—Wild Life Stories (The Life Story of the Fox, Hare, Rook, Pheasant, Partridge, Fox-Hound, Otter, Sparrow.) Illustrated. 6d. each net.
CONYERS, DOROTHEA.—For Henri and Navarre. 6d.
CROKER, B. M.—In Old Madras. 6s.
HUDSON, W. H.—Adventures Among the Birds. 10s. 6d. net.
HUTTEN, BARONESS VON.—Kingmead. 7d. net.
MALET, LUCAS.—Adrian Savage. 7s. net.
MAXWELL, W. B.—Mrs. Thompson. 1s. net.
MOREUX (THE ABDE).—A Day in the Moon. Translated by A. Hilliard Attridge. 6s.
PATTERSON, ANNIE W., Mus. Doc.—How to Listen to an Orchestra. 5s. net.
REYNOLDS, MRS. FRED.—A Quaker Wooing. 7d. net.
"RITA."—Gretchen. 6d.
SAUNDERS, MRS. BAILLIE.—Lady Q.— 6d.
SCHUMACHER, HENRY.—Nelson's Last Love. 6s.

Messrs. T. C. & E. C. Jack.

BASTIN, HAROLD.—Insects: Their Life Histories and Habits. 7s. 6d. net.
BROTCHIE, T. C. F.—The Battlefields of Scotland. 4s.
HERVEY, ARTHUR.—Meyerbeer. "Masterpieces of Music" Series. 1s. 6d. net.
HIRD, FRANK.—Lancashire Stories. Vol. II. 6s. net.
LANG, JEAN.—North and South of Tweed. 4s. net.
MACDONALD, JOHN.—Czar Ferdinand and His People. 12s. 6d. net.
MACKENZIE, SIR A. C.—Verdi. "Masterpieces of Music" Series. 1s. 6d. net.
SYMON, J. D., and BENSUSAN, S. L.—The Renaissance and Its Makers. 10s. 6d.

Messrs. Jarrold & Sons.

LITTLE, MAY.—Simple Electric Cookery. 1s. net.
MARRIS, ISABEL D.—Mistresses and Maids. 6d.
MATHERS, HELEN.—Joch o' Hazelgreen. 2s. net.
MATHERS, HELEN.—The Lovely Malincourt. 2s. net.
MORTON, LAURENCE.—Sanctuary: An Introspective Narrative of a Home within a Home. 2s. 6d. net.
PIKE, OLIVER G.—Scouts' Book of Birds. Illustrated by the Author with 40 Photographs direct from Wild Nature. 2s. 6d. net.
WORTLEY, ISABEL.—The Elf and Her Friends. 3s. 6d.

Messrs. Herbert Jenkins.

"CHEIRO."—When Were You Born? 2s. 6d. net.
COMPTON-RICKETT, A.—William Morris. 7s. 6d. net.
CONGREVE, A. E.—The One Maid Book of Cookery. 2s. 6d. net.
CRAN, MRS. GEORGE.—The Garden of Ignorance. 4s. net.
DEWAR, GEORGE A. B.—Wild Birds Through the Year. 4s. net.
MONTAGU, VIOLETTE M.—The Abbey Edgeworth. 12s. 6d. net.
STONE, J. HARRIS.—Caravanning and Camping Out. 14s. net.

Mr. T. Werner Laurie.

BLAND, HUBERT.—Olivia's Latchkey. 2s. 6d. net.
BROOME, H. A.—The Log of a Rolling Stone. 12s. 6d. net.
BUMPUS, T. FRANCIS.—The Cathedrals of Southern France. 6s.
HAULTAIN, ARNOLD.—The Correspondence of Goldwin Smith. 16s. net.
KAUFFMAN, REGINALD WRIGHT.—Broken Pitchers. 2s. net.
KAUFFMAN, REGINALD WRIGHT.—Daughters of Ishmael. 2s. net.
LOTT, PIERRE.—Slam. 7s. 6d. net.
MOORE, C. B. (MAURICE GEORGE).—A Gentleman of Ireland. 16s. net.
PAIN, BARRY.—Mrs. Murphy. 1s.
RAY, EDWARD.—Inland Golf. 5s. net.

Messrs. John Long.

A JOURNALIST.—Bohemian Days in Fleet Street. 10s. 6d. net.
BARTON, FRANK TOWNEND, M.R.C.V.S.—Hounds. 5s. net.
CARRIER, ELSE.—A Soul in Shadow. 6s.
FORD, PENELOPE.—A Page in a Man's History. 6s.
FRASER, MRS. HUGH.—The Stolen Emperor. 7d. net.
GERSTENBERG, ALICE.—Unquenched Fire. 6s.
GOULD, NAT.—The Head Lad. 2s. net.
MATHERS, HELEN.—A Man of To-Day. 7d. net.
WALES, HUBERT.—The Spenser. 1s. net.

EDITOR'S OFFICE

"I WILL REPAY"

Prize Illustration of book-title.
Drawn by Michael Teale
(See Prize Competition pages).

Messrs. Longmans, Green & Co.

BESSON, DR. A.—A Text-Book of Practical Bacteriology and Microbiology. Translated from the 5th French Edition, and adapted by H. J. Hutchens.
BOSE, JAGADIS CHUNDER, C.I.E., M.A. (Cantab.), D.Sc. (Lond.) Professor Presidency College, Calcutta.—Researches on Irritability of Plants.
CLEMENTS, E.—Introduction to the Study of Indian Music.
GOULD, F. J.—Moral Instruction: Its Theory and Practice.
HAAS, P., and HILL, T. G.—The Chemistry of Plant Products.
HODGSON, GERALDINE E., D.Litt.—In the Way of the Saints.
JEBB, RICHARD.—The Britannic Question. A Survey of Alternatives.
MAHON, EVELYN, and YATES, L. P.—By the Brown Bog: Stories of Irish Life and Sport. 6s.
PARR, ALFRED.—Principles of Setting-Out Securing and Tooling Operations. With 250 Illustrations.
RAYNES, F. W.—Heating Systems: Design of Hot Water and Steam Heating Apparatus. With Illustrations.
THORPE, SIR EDWARD.—A Dictionary of Applied Chemistry. Vol. IV. Oil-stone—Soda Nitro. 45s. net.
VAUGHAN, RIGHT REV. JOHN S., D.D., Bishop of Sebastopolis. Happiness and Beauty.
WELFION, W. P.—Primary Artisan Education.

Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston & Co.

ERSKINE, PAYNE.—Joyful Heatherbry. Illustrated by M. Leone Bracker. 6s.
MOROSO, JOHN A.—The Quarry. Illustrated by Thomas Fogarty. 6s.
MUNNIK, SENATOR G. G. Major Greville, V.C.—A Tale of the Great Boer War. 6s.
WEDGEWOOD, JOSIAH, M.P.—Staffordshire Pottery and its History. Fully Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Lynwood & Co.

ALTHOUSE, ALBERT.—Amongst the Classes. Cheap Edition. 2s. net.
ANDREWS, MRS. HENNIKER.—An Indian Mystery. 6s.
BARLOW, HILAIRE.—The Mystery of Jeanne Marie. 6s.
BARLOW, HILAIRE.—The Sentence of the Judge. Cheap Edition. 2s. net.
BUNGEY, EDGAR NEWTON.—The Fordington Twins. 6s.
BURKE, EDMUND.—A Cluster of Shamrocks. Cheap Edition. 2s. net.
CRANSON, DOUGLAS.—The Adventures of Lester Grayling, K.C. 6s.
HALES, A. G.—Angel Jim. New and Revised Edition, with New Design. 6d.
HALES, A. G.—Maid Molly. New and Revised Edition, with New Design. 6d.
HALES, A. G.—M'Glusk. New and Revised Edition, with New Design. 6d.
HOLLAND, CLIVE.—A Madonna of the Poor, and Other Stories. 6s.
HOLLAND, CLIVE.—Marcelle of the Latin Quarter. Entirely New and Revised Edition, re-written. 1s. net.
HOLLAND, CLIVE.—My Japanese Wife. 420th thousand. Entirely New and Revised Edition, re-written. 1s. net.
HOLLAND, CLIVE.—The Spell of Isis. Entirely New and Revised Edition, re-written. 1s. net.
HOPKINS, R. THURSTON.—Oscar Wilde: A Study. Second Edition, Revised and Enlarged. 2s. 6d. net.
LEITH, MRS. DISNEY.—Lillian's Widow. A Sequel to "A Black Martin-mau." 6s.
MACNAB, WINIFRED M.—(rowns. Cheap Edition. 2s. net.
MICHELL, CLARA, and KENNEDY MISS H. E.—The Elizabethan Voyagers and Other Poems. 1s. 6d. net.
MUGGE, MAXIMILIAN A.—Darts of Defiance: Sonnets, and Other Poems. 2s. 6d. net.
PERRISS, A.—The Searchlight on the Throne: Reminiscences of an Ex-Ambassador. Cheap Edition. 2s. net.
PERRISS, A.—The Shadow on the Purple: Recollections of an Ex-Attaché. Cheap Edition. 1s. net.
PORTER, T. H.—A Maid of the Malverns. Cheap Edition. 1s. net.
REEKS, H. CAULTON, F.R.C.V.S.—The Taming of the Terror. 6s.
SCOTT, WINIFRED MAY.—The Serpent: A Tale of the Chiltern Hills. Cheap Edition. 1s. net.
"SNOWDROP."—The Truth of the Matter. A Theosophical Treatise on Life and Conduct. 1s. net.
STOCK, RALPH.—The Rope for Rubber: A Fijian Romance. With Illustrations by Norman Lindsay. Cheap Edition. 2s. net.
SYMONS, MAJOR F. A., R.A.M.C.—Prince John of Strephitz. 6s.
YOLLAND, E.—The Struggle for the Crown. Second Edition. Revised. 6s.

Mr. Elkin Mathews.

- AMBLER, A. R.—The Little Inn—The Dream. 2s. 6d. net.
 BOURDILLON, FRANCIS WILLIAM—Moth-Wings (Alles d'Alouettes). 3s. 6d. net.
 JOPLING ROWE, LOUISE.—Poems. With a Portrait after the Painting by Sir J. Everett Millais, P.R.A. 2s. 6d. net.
 MILNES, RICHARD MONCKTON (LORD HOUGHTON)—Good Night and Good-Morning: A Ballad With 6 Drawings by M. M. Gell. 2s. 6d. net.
 PECK, ROBERT BOWMAN.—Perceptions. 2s. 6d. net.
 POUND, EZRA.—Original Work now First Collected in two Volumes. Volume I. Persons—Exultations; Volume II Canzon—Ripostes. 3s. 6d. each net.
 RYVES, EVANGELINE.—Erebus: A Book of Verse. New Edition. 1s. 6d. net cloth; 1s. net wrappers.
 RYVES, EVANGELINE.—The Red Horizon, and Other Poems. 1s. 6d. net cloth; 1s. net wrappers.
 WASON, SANDYS.—Simon Dean, and Other Poems. "Savile Series" 1s. net.

Messrs. Methuen & Co.

- ANON.—Some Secrets of Nature. 1s. 6d.
 ANON.—The Romance of Nature. 1s. 6d.
 BENNETT, ARNOLD.—The Card. 2s. net.
 COX, J. CHARLES, LL.D., F.S.A.—Old Churchwarden's Accounts. 7s. 6d. net.
 HODGKIN, J. E.—A Little Guide to Durham. 2s. 6d. net.
 MAXWELL, W. B.—Hill Rise. 1s. net.
 MORESBY, ADMIRAL J.—Two Admirals. 1s. net.
 MYERS, A. WALLIS.—The Story of the Davis Cup. 1s. net.
 OPPENHEIM, E. PHILIPS.—Master of Men. 7d. net.
 PARKER, SIR GILBERT.—The Pomp of the Lavilletes. 7d. net.
 RICHARDSON, LESLIE.—Vagabond Days in Brittany. 5s. net.
 SUTTON, B. H.—Growth of Modern Britain. 2s.
 TURNER, J.—Romance of British History. 1s. 6d.
 WALKER, G. W. and J. H.—Little Guide to South Wales. 2s. 6d. net and 1s. 6d. net.
 WILMOT BUXTON, F. M.—Pageant of British History. 1s. 6d.

Messrs. Mills & Boon.

- ANON.—About Baby. 1s. net.
 ANON.—Middleground. 6s.
 GRAHAM, WINIFRED.—Sons of State. Cheap Edition. 1s. net.
 LILLEY, ARTHUR A.—Twenty-four Years of Cricket. Cheap Edition. 2s. net.
 MANN, MARY E.—Through the Window. 6s.

Mr. John Murray.

- AITKIN, E. H.—The Five Windows of the Soul, or, Thoughts on Perceiving. Cheap Edition. 2s. 6d. net.
 DN, A. C., C.V.O.—Joyous Gard. 3s. 6d. net.
 FUMBE, RICHARD.—Diary of Frances, Lady Shelley, 1817-1873. Vol. II With Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net.
 FRANCIS, M. E. (MRS. FRANCIS BLUNDELL).—The Story of Mary Dunne. 6s.
 FRASER, MRS. A. Z. (ALICE SPINNEK).—Livingstone and Newstead With Portraits and Illustrations.
 HARKER, MRS. L. ALLEN.—The Fiolhofs of Redmarley. 6s.
 HAVELL, E. B.—Indian Architecture. Its Psychology, Structure and History. With numerous Illustrations.
 HOLT, H. P.—The Mounted Police of Natal. With an Introduction by General Sir George Darnley, K.C.B., Founder of the Corps.
 HURD, ARCHIBALD, and CASTLE, H.—German Sea-Power. Its Rise Progress, and Economic Basis. With Maps and Appendices. 10s. 6d. net.
 LOVE, COLONEL H. D.—Vestiges of Old Madras, 1640-1800. Traced from the East India Company's Records Preserved at Fort St. George and the India Office, and from other sources. In 3 vols. Not sold separately. 30s. net.
 MONTRESOR, MISS F. F.—The Strictly Trained Mother. 3s. 6d.
 MONYPENNY, W. F. (the late).—The Two Irish Nations: An Exposition of Home Rule. 3s. 6d. net.
 ROBINSON, MISS M. FOTHERGILL.—The Spirit of Association. Being some Account of the Guilds, Friendly Societies, Co-operative Movement and Trade Unions of Great Britain. 6s. net.
 The Times Series of Subjects of Popular Interest (1) Labour and Industry, (2) Golf Courses in France. 1s. net each.
 WILLIAMS, SIR RALPH, K.C.M.G.—How I Became a Governor. With Illustrations.

Mr. Eveleigh Nash.

- LARISCH, COUNTESS MARIE (née BARONESS VON WALLERSEF) — My Past. 10s. 6d. net.

Messrs. T. Nelson & Sons.

- DICKENS, CHARLES.—Pickwick. Vol. 2. Collection Nelson. 1s. net.
 GASKELL, MRS.—Sylvia's Lover. 6d. net.
 HUGO, VICTOR.—Torquemada, Les Orientales. Collection Nelson. 1s. net.
 HUGO, VICTOR.—William Shakespeare. Collection Nelson. 1s. net.
 KERR, DR. JOHN.—Leaves from an Inspector's Log Book. 1s. net.
 LE ROY.—Jacques le Croquant. Collection Nelson. 1s. net.
 "Q" (SIR ARTHUR QUILLER-ROUCH).—Lady Good for Nothing. 7d. net.
 VERNEDER, R. E.—The Pursuit of Mr. Faviel. 7d. net.

Messrs. J. Nisbet & Co.

- MAJOR, E.—The Life of Lord Wolseley. 1s. 6d.

Messrs. Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.

- BURRELL, REV. D. J., D.D., LL.D.—Old Time Religion. Foundations of our Faith. 3s. 6d. net.
 BUTLER, REV. D., D.D.—George Fox in Scotland. An Appreciation of the Society of Friends and its Founder. 2s. 6d. net.
 SMITH, GEORGE, M.A. (Oxon).—School Sermons at Merchiston Castle. 3s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Stanley Paul & Co.

- "A.T.K."—Everyday Economical Cookery Book. 1s. net.
 ANDOM, R.—In Fear of a Throne. 1s.
 ANDOM, R.—Neighbours of Mine. 2s.
 BLACKER, J. F.—A.P.C. of Collecting Old Continental Pottery. 5s. net.
 EVERETT GREEN, E.—Defiant Diana. 6s.
 FORREST, A. S.—A Tour Through South America. 10s. net.
 GERARD, DOROTHEA.—The Unworthy Pact. 6s.
 HAMILTON, M.—Mrs. Pett. 6s.
 HARE, CHRISTOPHER.—Maximilian the Dreamer. 12s. net.
 HORN, KATE.—Columbine at the Fair. 6s.
 HUEFFER, OLIVER MADDOX.—Hunt the Slipper. 6s.
 KENEALY, ARABELLA.—The Irresistible Mrs. Ferrers.
 LIND-AY-HAGBERY, L.—August Strindberg. 6s. net.
 MAGNAY, SIR WILLIAM, Bart.—The Long Hand. 6d.
 MARSHALL, ARCHIBALD.—The Honour of the Chintous. 6s.
 PEARCE, CHARLES E.—Polly Peachum. 16s. net.
 "RYA."—Cortana. 6d.
 VYNNE, NORA.—So it is with the Damsel. 6s.

- WODNIL, GABRIELLE.—Drinets at Brighton. 6s.
 WYLLARDE, DOLF.—The Riding Master. 1s.
 WYNNE, MAY.—Brave Brigands. 6s.
 WYNNE, MAY.—Honour's Fetters. 6d.
 WYNNE, MAY.—Henry of Navarre. 6d.

Sir Isaac Pitman & Son.

- BOULGER, DEMETRIUS C.—Holland of the Dutch. ("Countries and Peoples" Series) 34 full page Plate Illustrations. 6s. net.
 GLEN, RANDOLPH A., M.A.—Local Government Case Law. Vol. III. 10s. net.
 HADDEN, J. J. CUTHBERT.—Prince Charles Edward. Illustrated. 7s. 6d. net.
 JESSE, LOUIE.—Babyland Abroad: Being a Series of Geography Stories. 2s. 6d. net.
 JOHNSON, G., F.C.I.S.—Book Keeping and Accountancy Problems. 2s. 6d. net.
 JOHNSON, G., F.C.I.S.—Manufacturing Book-Keeping and Costs. 3s. 6d. net.
 PALMER, REV. DR A. SMYTHE.—The Samson Saga, and its Place in Comparative Religion. Illustrated. 5s. net.
 POLLEY, ARTHUR P.—Federal Systems of the United States and the British Empire. 12s. 6d. net.
 RAYNES, ANNIF, A.C.P.—Helping Mother. A Course of Thirty Lessons on Home-Training for the Little Ones. 1s. 3d. net.
 OLLIVIER, EMILE.—The Franco-Prussian War and its Hidden Causes. Translated by G. B. Ives. 8s. 6d. net.

Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons.

- BURNETT, FRANCES HODGSON.—My Robin. 1s. net.
 CLARKE, GEORGE H.—Silas Deane.
 DOUGLAS JAMES.—New England and New France.
 GREGORY, LADY.—New Comedies. 5s. net.
 HAMILTON, LOUISE NYSTROM.—Ellen Key, Her Life and Works. 6s. net.
 JORDAN, HUMFREY.—Patchwork Comedy. 6s.
 KEY, ELLEN.—Rahel Varhagen. 6s. net.
 LITCHFIELD, GRACE DENIO.—Burning Question. 6s.
 LIVERMORE, COLONEL WILLIAM ROSCOE.—Story of the Civil War. Vol. III and IV. 10s. 6d. net each.
 PARSONS, ELSIE CLIFWIS.—The Old Fashioned Woman. Primitive Fancies About the Sex. 6s. net.
 THOMAS, WILLIAMS.—Fraud and Tramps in Alaska and Newfoundland. 10s. 6d. net.

The Fleming H. Revell Co.

- Bibliography for Missionary Students. Compiled for the Board of Study for Preparation of Missionaries. 1s. net.
 DWIGHT, HENRY OTIS, LL.D.—A Muslim Sir Galahad. A Present-day Story of Islam in Turkey. 3s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Alston Rivers.

- ANON.—A London Girl. Tenth Impression in New Form. With Picture Wrapper in Colour. 1s. net.
 BOLSTER, REGINALD, and O'BRIEN, MAJOR.—The Man Who Paid. 6s.

Messrs. Sands & Co.

- JACKSON, FRANCES (Translated by).—Memoirs of Baron Hyde de Neuville. 2 vols. 24 Illustrations. 21s. net.
 ROCH, FFLORENS.—The Call of the Past: A Novel. 6s.

The Walter Scott Publishing Co.

- BITHFILL, J., M.A.—Life of Maeterlinck. 1s. net.
 NEWMAN, CARDINAL J. H.—Apologia Pro Vita Sua. With Kingsley Newman Correspondence. 2 vols. 1s. net each.

Mr. Martin Secker.

- ANONYMOUS.—The Will and the Power. 6s.
 BOTTOMH, PHYLLIS.—The Common Chord. 6s.
 HANKIN, ST. JOHN, and CALDERON, GEORGE.—Thompson: A Comedy. 2s. net.
 THOMAS, EDWARD.—Walter Pater. A Critical Study. 7s. 6d. net.
 WATT, L. M.—The House of Sands. 6s.
 YOUNG, F. BRETT.—Undergrowth. 6s.

Messrs. Sidgwick & Jackson.

- BULLEN, A. H. (Edited by).—Lyrics from Elizabethan Dramatists. Lyrics from Elizabethan Song Books. 1s. net each.
 FERNALD, C. B.—The Married Woman. A Play. 3s. 6d. net.
 INKSTER, LEONARD.—The Emancipated. A Play.
 NEXO, MARTIN ANDERSEN.—Pelle, The Conqueror. Translated from the Danish. The first volume of the four in which Hler Nexø has studied the development of a Danish boy. 6s.
 RITTENBERG, MAX.—The Cockatoo: A Public School Story. 5s.
 TYLER, ROYALL.—Spain. A Study of Her Life and Art. With numerous Illustrations and Plans. New and Cheaper Reissue. 7s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co.

- AUSTEN LEIGH, WILLIAM and RICHARD.—Jane Austen: Her Life and Letters. 10s. 6d. net.
 DE LA PASTURF, MRS HENRY (LADY CLIFFORD).—Michael Ferrys. 7s.
 HEATLEY, D. P.—Studies in British History and Politics. 6s. net.

Mr. T. Fisher Unwin.

- BENSON, MARGARET.—The Court of the King, and other Studies. 3s. 6d. net.
 BLEASE, W. LYON.—A Short History of English Liberalism. 10s. 6d. net.
 DAUTREMER, JOSEPH.—Burma under British Rule. 15s. net.
 GARDNER, ALICE.—Within Our Limits. 7s. 6d. net.
 GLEIZES, ALBERT, and MEIZINGER, JEAN.—Cubism. 5s. net.
 Hampstead Scientific Society (Members of).—Hampstead Health. Its Geology and Natural History. 10s. 6d. net.
 LEOPOLD, LEWIS.—Prestige: A Psychological Study of Social Estimates. 10s. 6d. net.
 MALLIK, MANMATH C.—Orient and Occident. 10s. 6d. net.
 MEEK, A. S.—A Naturalist in Canniband-Land. 10s. 6d. net.
 ROBINSON, SARAH.—The Soldier's Friend: A Pioneer's Record. 3s. 6d. net.
 SOMBAKT, WERNER.—The Jews and Modern Capitalism. 15s. net.
 STOREY, HAROLD.—The Economics of Land Value. 1s. net.

Messrs. Ward, Lock & Co.

- BOOTHBY, GUY.—The Fascination of the King. 7d. net.
 FORMAN, JUSTUS M.—Bianca's Daughter. 6d.
 FORMAN, JUSTUS M.—The Unknown Lady. 1s. net.
 HAGGARD, H. RIDER.—Ayesha. 6d.
 MAGNAY, SIR WM.—The Red Chancellor. 7d. net.
 MITFORD, BERTRAM.—Averno. 6s.
 PEMBERTON, MAX.—Lella and Her Lovers. 6s.
 PEMBERTON, MAX.—White Walls. 2s. net.
 ROWLANDS, EFFIE A.—The Rose of Life. 6d.
 TRACEY, LOUIE.—One Wonderful Night. 6s.
 WHITE, FRED M.—Hard Fressed. 6s.
 WHITE, FRED M.—Lady Clara. 6d.

THE READER.

AUSTIN DOBSON.

BY FRANCIS BICKLEY.

"MANY days have come and gone" since Mr. Austin Dobson first wooed the English ear with his delicate music. His earliest poem was published in 1864; his earliest volume, "Vignettes in Rhyme and Vers de Société," in 1873. The English ear was deaf at first—the American proving more acute—but it was not long before the poet was recognised as peerless in his kind, the critic as an unique connoisseur of the eighteenth century. The ample, unhurried production of forty years, during the most of which the State as well as art was faithfully served, has secured Mr. Dobson an unassailable niche in the house of English letters. Edinburgh University has given him an honorary degree; the Athenæum has extended to him its stately hospitality under Rule 2; he is a vice-president of the Royal Society of Literature, and one of the small company of honorary members of the Authors' Club of New York. Yet now that his "Collected Poems"* have reached a ninth edition it is made plain that he is still "singing clearly as of old," and that his "numbers are of gold" as unalloyed as ever. In the new poems added to this collection all his well-known qualities are displayed, riper, perhaps, but unwithered. Mr. Dobson has already headed a poem "Threescore and Ten" with autobiographical significance, but when he hints that his singing days are in flight the song itself belies him. The motto which he chose for his edition of Prior—perennis et fragrans—might with greater justice as regards the second epithet and with at least as great, one may prophesy, as regards the first, be inscribed on his own title page. He was not a precocious singer, being, it appears, nearly twenty-five before he saw his handwriting first transfigured in print, and some years older when he became a regular contributor to Temple Bar. It is fitting that a muse whose youth had the maturity of age should in age preserve the freshness of her youth.

In applying to Mr. Dobson phrases borrowed from his own tribute to Herrick no comparison is intended. Indeed, after it had been superfluously pointed out that both poets handled their materials with an unsurpassable lightness of touch, such a comparison would be hard to sustain. Herrick, complain as he might of his exile in dull Devon, was the very spirit of pastoral become vocal, a pagan in every sense. Mr. Dobson, though singing in holiday mood

" Good-bye to the town!—good-bye!
Hurrah! for the sea and the sky!"

is essentially the poet of the urbane; admitting closest kinship with Horace and Prior and Locker-Lampson. Nature, as viewed by Mr. Dobson, always suggests the eighteenth-century conception. Nor is this surprising; for it is from the eighteenth century that his art obtains its chief nourishment.

With what subtlety Mr. Dobson has captured the spirit of the age of his predilection is well illustrated by the following story, which comes from an unquestionable source, the poet himself. It was not always his ambition to become a man of letters. Painting was his earliest mistress, and as a young man he studied at South Kensington. This brought him into daily contact with a copy of the bust of Julia, daughter of Titus, whose youthful head and developed breasts reminded him of the century which already interested him, so girlishly gay and yet so expert in life. Years later Mr. Arthur Symonds, in an essay on Mr. Dobson's poetry, wrote: "In the Capitoline Museum at Rome, in a room filled with busts of the emperors, there is one bust, that of Julia, the daughter of Titus, which has for me precisely the charm and pathos of those fragile things to which this kind of art gives something of the consecration of time. The little fashionable head, so small, eager, curled so elaborately for its life of one fashionable day, and seeming to be so little at home in the unexpected, perpetuating coldness of marble: what has such as this to do with the dignity of death?" The coincidence is curious and significant; but Mr. Dobson's relation with the age of Pope and Johnson calls for definition. It is not enough to say that he has caught its spirit, nor can it be affirmed that he has fled to an idealised eighteenth century as an escape from the reality of to-day. He finds the graces of that age congenial, but remains in normal relationship with contemporary life

Photo by Elliott & Fry.

Mr. Austin Dobson.
(1910).

* Kegan Paul & Co.

Nor has he even idealised his theme; he has sifted it. His attitude is frank and sympathetic, but not too serious and never more than playfully regretful. It may be imagined that if one were to come to the English literature of the eighteenth century with no idea of it but that to be gathered from Mr Dobson's poetry one might well be bitterly disappointed, finding satisfaction, perhaps, only in "The Rape of the Lock" and a few short pieces of Prior's. For while in his prose criticisms he has shown his judgment in operation, in his verse for the most part, he offers only its conclusions. A true artist, he ignores what he cannot use. The eighteenth century is his material, not his inspiration.

Indeed, Mr Dobson's choice, though too happy to be accidental, was not inevitable.

Photo by F. O. Hoppt

Garden of Mr. Austin Dobson's House at Ealing.

Photo by C. Las, Watkins. Mr. Austin Dobson.
An early portrait

There are poems which show that his achievement might have been as admirable in other fields. Beginning to write in the 'sixties, he very naturally came under Pre-Raphaelite influences, and those pieces which suggest Rossetti and Morris are no less authentic Dobson than those which recall Prior and Gay. "The Dying of Tanne-guy du Bois"

"No, I am come too high Whate'er betide,
To find the doubtful thing that fights with me,
Towards the mountain tops I still shall ride,
And cry your name in my extremity,
As Palomyde,

Until the issue come Will it disclose
No gift of grace, no pity made complete
After much labour done, —much war with woes?
Will you deny me still in Heaven my sweet,— Ah, Death—who knows?"

A similar grave music is heard in the poems founded on Greek story—"The Death of Procris" and "The Prayer of the Swine to Circe"—and it is to be regretted that Mr Dobson has done so little in this manner. But he has decided that the higher slopes of Parnassus are not for his feet. "Majores majora sonent" is the motto of his election. Much of the poetry of Rossetti and Morris and Swinburne dealt with life at one remove—that is to say, it was founded on literature, but on literature the source whereof was life. Mr Dobson has gone a step further taking his material from literature itself secondary. It may be admitted that the few pieces—such as "The Child Musician" and "My Landlady"—wherein he has attempted to deal directly with is often justly cited as among his best work, nor are "Palomydes" and the two poems of "Angiola" to be ranked much lower. "Palomydes" for the sake of emphasising its right to a place of honour in the nineteenth century Arthurian concert shall be given here

"Him best in all the dim Arthuriad,
Of lovers of fair women him I prize—
The Pagan Palomydes Never glad
Was he with sweetness of his lady's eyes,
Nor joy he had

"But, unloved ever still must love the same,
And riding ever through a lonely world
When'er on adverse shield or crest he came,
Against the danger desperately hurled,
Crying her name

"So I who strove to You I may not earn,
Methinks, am come unto so high a place,
That though from hence I can but vainly yearn
For that averted favour of your face,
I shall not turn.

75, Eaton Rise, Mr. Austin Dobson's House at Ealing.

Photo by Elliott &amp; Fry.

Mr. Austin Dobson (1889).

modern life, are his least successful, but that he had no small mastery of poetry of the next degree has been amply demonstrated.

There is, moreover, an element of paradox in his close connection with the eighteenth century. For on one conspicuous point he is absolutely opposed to the practice of that age. No one scans his brother man more gently than Mr. Dobson, but on the question of what is fit for the printed page he is a precisian. Unlike Herrick, once more, he has no "unbaptised rhymes" for which advancing years might prompt repentance. He dedicates his poems to the "English Girl, divine, demure," and any of his prose volumes would be as irreproachable a gift. Yet his constant theme is the manners and letters of the age of Prior and Swift, Fielding and Sterne, and he has neither idealised nor belied that. The explanation is, of course, that, as

Photo by Bassano

Mr. Austin Dobson (1895).

Photo by Elliott &amp; Fry.

Mr. Austin Dobson
in his Study (1910).

already stated, he exercises the artist's right of rigid selection. Everything uncongenial is cast aside, including the major and minor improprieties. Even as an editor he has used this discretion, and his selection from Prior is a triumph of tact. For, while his theme is the eighteenth century, and its atmosphere is faithfully if discreetly rendered, the informing spirit is that of his own time. None of his contemporaries was more thorough a Victorian. "We are in the eighteenth century," it has been well written of his work, "but see it through the glasses of to-day, and the soft intercepting sense of change which hangs like a haze between ourselves and the subject is altogether due to the poet's sympathy and sensibility." He has all Grown contented in our oafdom,

Giving grace not all the praise ;
And, en parlant, Arsinoë,—
Without malice whatsoever,—
We shall counsel to our 'Chloe
To be rather good than clever,
For we find it hard to smother
Just one little thought, Marquise !
Wittier perhaps than any other, —
You were neither Wife nor
Mother,
' Belle Marquise ! ' "

There is more of Tennyson than of Pope in these sentiments

But when its cynicism and brutality have been set aside the eighteenth century is far from being beggared, and the qualities remaining are just those with which Mr Dobson is in sympathy. He has discovered brocade to be the wear best suited to a muse whose natural beauties are of the kind which are enhanced by adornment. Wit, grace, polish, the golden mean, what one may call the

The Sun Dial.

Drawn by Hugh Thomson.
' The Story of Rosina, and other Verses ' (Kegan Paul)

Horatian qualities, are to be found in the eighteenth century and there alone in the English record. In France they occur more constantly, and Mr. Dobson, who has French blood in his veins, is akin with the French poets from Charles d'Orléans to Theodore de Banville.
He has their love of form, and has both translated and accepted
Gautier's advice :

" O POET, then, forbear
The loosely sandalled
verse,
Choose rather thou to wear
The buskin—strait and terse "

As is well known, Mr.
Dobson was largely responsible for that fashion of thirty years ago, the results whereof are enshrined in the little anthology—already a classic—entitled
"Ballades and Rondeaus." He was the author of the first pure lection is so often attained or approximated is difficult, but "The Pompadour's Fan" is perhaps the most delightful example of the poet's most artificial manner. The various translations and adaptations from Horace, whether in French or other measures, are also notable. A literary desideratum is an edition of the odes with an introduction by Mr.

Dobson, and these versions gathered into an appendix.

' Sentences the Cure '

The Cure's Progress.

Drawn by Hugh Thomson.
From 'The Story of Rosina and other Verses' (Kegan Paul).

By the door the fingers

Drawn by Hugh Thomson.
From "The Story of Rosina and other Verses" (Kegan Paul).

Mr. Dobson's metrical experiments have not been confined to imitations of Voiture and Banville. He has the science and ingenuity of a Troubadour. "The Masque of the Caliph," for instance, where all the rhymes are double, is a remarkable tour de force; and he has been equally happy with linked and internal rhyme. "In Memoriam" and "An Horatian Ode to the King's Most Excellent Majesty," illustrating the first of these characteristics, and "Threescore and Ten" displaying the second, are a reminder, were any needed, that there is no discord between technical ingenuity and spiritual seriousness.

Though lacking the fragrance and distinction of his verse, Mr. Dobson's prose is easy and pleasant to read, and his essays have many of the characteristics of his poems. Loving letters for their own sake, Mr. Dobson has never been concerned with theories of criticism, and the papers which form the volumes beginning with the first series of "Eighteenth Century Vignettes" and ending, so far, with "At Prior Park," though full of admirable judgments, are rather constructive than analytical. An erstwhile art student, Mr. Dobson is an exquisite draughtsman with words; and "Vignettes," as a generic description of his shorter studies, is a happy choice. He combines, moreover, a scientific accuracy and care for detail with the artist's power of informing his subject with life. Here, possibly, the influence of his French ancestry may be traced, for this combination is very characteristic of French criticism. Mr. Dobson is, indeed, almost as conversant with the life and letters of France as with those of his own country, and he has written nothing better in prose than the dainty and sympathetic studies—published together as "Four Frenchwomen"—of Charlotte Corday, Madame Roland, the Princesse de Lamballe, and Madame de Genlis. His knowledge of the eighteenth century is remarkable. That he has other loves we know:

Montaigne with his sheepskin blistered,
And Howell the worse for
wear,
And the worm-drilled Jesuits'
Horace
And the little old cropped
Molière,

And the Burton I bought for a florin,
And the Rabelais foxed and flea'd . . .

There is also plenty of evidence that he is well read in more modern literature, and has a place in his heart not only for Thackeray and Locker-Lampson, but for Tennyson and FitzGerald. But the first impression left by many of his books is that he has lived exclusively in the days of the Georges. He takes the Gentleman's Magazine as much for granted as other men take The Times, and the wits and letter-writers are his own cronies and correspondents. He has, however, the subtle art of being allusive without being obscure, and instead of bewildering us, he gives us a flattering illusion of equal erudition. He assumes in his reader

"A common taste for old costume—
Old pictures—books . . ."

and hands his snuff-box with no hint of condescension.

Mr. Dobson has written of Carmontelle and Kate Greenaway as sympathetically as of Steele or Goldsmith,

A BROKEN SWORD.

The shopman shambled from the doorway out
And reached it down—
Snapped in the blade! 'Twas scarcely dear, I doubt,
At half a crown.

Useless enough! And yet may still be seen,
In letters clear,
Traced on the steel in rusty damasked—
"Pover Paraclete"

Whose was it once—who manned it once in hope
His fate to gain?
Who was it dreamed his oyster world should ope
To this—in vain?

Perchance with some stout Argonaut it sailed
The Western Seas,
Perchance but to some paltry Nym availed
For toasting cheese!

Or, decked by Beauty on some morning lawn
With silken knot,
Perchance ere night for Church and King 'twas drawn—
Perchance 'twas not!

Who knows—or cares? To-day 'mid foils and gloves
Its hilt depends,
Flanked by the favours of forgotten loves—
Remembered friends,—

And oft its legend lunds in hours of stress
A word to aid,
Or like a warning comes in puffed success
Its broken blade

but his attitude towards art has an unmistakably literary flavour. His interest is in portraiture and genre, rather than in landscape or "expressionism." He is unashamedly concerned with the subject of a picture, which he has the not very common gift of being able to describe in a telling manner. His first full-length biography was a life of Hogarth, which has been several times reprinted and elaborated. He is also the author of a book on Thomas Bewick and his pupils, a note on Holbein's "Dance of Death," which inspired him besides to a stately chant royal; and an introduction to an edition of Reynolds's "Discourses."

As a biographer Mr. Dobson is conspicuous for sympathy and impartiality. His study of Horace Walpole, for instance, is a model of how to treat an unheroic theme. Without seeking to canonise the worldly Horace, he has vindicated him against the rhetorical malevolence of Macaulay, and has set the story of the Chatterton affair in proper perspective. Since the publication of his life of Fielding in the English Men of Letters Series, just thirty years ago, he has been an unwearying champion of the great novelist's reputation. Only the other day there appeared in the National Review a "New Dialogue of the Dead," in which the author of "Tom Jones" meets his first biographer, Arthur Murphy, in Shadow-Land, and reduces him to a salutary, if tardy, speechlessness. "Mr. Austin Dobson," said James Russell Lowell in his address at the unveiling of the bust of Fielding at Shire Hall, Taunton, in 1883, "has done, perhaps, as true a service as one man of letters ever did to another by reducing what little is known of the life of Fielding from chaos to coherence by ridding it of fable, by correcting and co-ordinating dates, by cross-examining tradition till it stammeringly confessed that it had no visible means of subsistence, and has thus enabled us to get some authentic glimpse of the man as he really was. He has rescued the body of Fielding from beneath the swinish hoofs which were trampling it as once they trampled the Knight of La Mancha, whom Fielding so heartily admired."

This is generous but not excessive praise; and by a pleasant chance the verses which its recipient had written for the occasion on which it was to be uttered, are among his happiest efforts whether as a poet or as the friend of Fielding.

Mr. Dobson has not entered into competition with his great contemporaries. As critic he has never aspired to the prophetic mantle of Ruskin or Arnold; nor as poet to the laurels of Browning or Swinburne. Rightly or wrongly, he has shunned the higher seriousness. But within the limits set by his modesty he is a singer not only of infinite grace and courtesy, but of real feeling and a fundamental earnestness. Peerless as a writer of vers de société, he could not, if he would, be that only. And if—to indulge once more the convenient habit of finding the apt quotation in the matter in hand—we may say of him and his poetry that "It will last till men weary of pleasure

In measure!
It will last till men weary of laughter
And utter!"

we may as truly add (though abst omen!) that

"He held his pen in trust To Art,"

and has ever been the faithful servant of an exacting ideal.

Mr. Austin Dobson.

From a portrait painted by Miss Sylvia Gosse (May, 1899). Reproduced by kind permission of the artist

"THE BOOKMAN" PRIZE COMPETITIONS.

MAY, 1913.

Answers to these competitions (each on a separate sheet bearing the name and address of the sender) should be forwarded not later than the 15th of the month to

"The Prize Page," THE BOOKMAN, Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton, Warwick Square, E.C.

The date fixed above for sending in answers does not apply to competitors resident abroad, except in the case of competitions Nos. 1 and 3; answers from Foreign or Colonial readers for competitions 2, 4 and 5 (the subjects of these being the same each month) will be admissible to the first competitions that are adjudicated upon after the date of their receipt.

Each competitor may send in any number of attempts provided each attempt is written on a separate sheet of paper.

I.—A PRIZE OF ONE GUINEA is offered for the best original ballad in not more than forty-eight lines. Will Colonial and Foreign competitors please note that we shall offer the prize next month for the best original sonnet instead of for a ballad.

II.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best quotation from English verse applicable to any review or the name of any author or book appearing in this number of THE BOOKMAN. Preference will be given to quotations of a humorous nature.

III.—A PRIZE OF THREE NEW BOOKS is offered for the best original epigram on any current literary topic or recent literary development

IV.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best review in not more than one hundred words of any recently published book. Competitors should give the names of Authors and Publishers at head of their reviews.

V.—A copy of THE BOOKMAN will be sent post free for twelve months to the sender of the best suggestion for THE BOOKMAN Competitions. The Editor reserves the right to use any suggestion submitted.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT: TWENTY-ONE GUINEAS PRIZE POEM COMPETITION.

A First Prize of Five Guineas and a Second Prize of Two Guineas will be given for the best and second best original lyric.

A First Prize of Five Guineas and a Second Prize of Two Guineas will be given for the best and second best original sonnet on Shakespeare, Milton, Chaucer, Keats, Shelley, Burns, Scott, Byron, Wordsworth, Wellington, Nelson, Gladstone, Disraeli, Darwin, or any other famous Englishman.

A First Prize of Five Guineas and a Second Prize of Two Guineas will be given for the best and second best original humorous poem in not more than forty lines.

All Poems should be addressed to the Editor, and should reach the offices of THE BOOKMAN, St. Paul's House, Warwick Square, London, E.C., not later than the first post on the 2nd June next, if sent from any part of the British Isles, and by the 1st July if from the Colonies, India, or elsewhere abroad. Envelopes should be marked Twenty-one Guineas Competition.

The name and address of the competitor must be written on each M.S., and will be published in the event of a Prize being awarded to him. Any competitor who wishes to do so may add a pseudonym, to be used instead of his own name if his poem is printed but does not receive a prize.

The awards will be announced in THE BOOKMAN for August next, and in addition to the winning poems a large selection of the best of the others sent in will be published in a Special Supplement to that Number.

RESULTS OF COMPETITIONS FOR APRIL.

I.— The PRIZE for the best original Ballad is again divided, and we are sending HALF A GUINEA to D. K. Boileau, of St. Croix, Bath, and HALF A GUINEA to E. A. Potter, of Sutton Road, Erdington, Birmingham, for the following :

FINULA.

Finula was my princess
That dwelt by the Northern sea.
Finula's raven tresses
Hung down below her knee
And it's, oh for my dark-haired lady,
The fairest among them all —
For she sings no more at her window,
Nor dances adown the hall.

Finula was my princess
Proudly she wore her crown,
And the tread of her passing footstep
Was lighter than thistle-down
And it's, oh for my lovely lady —
For her little feet he still,
And she cometh no more to meet me
When I ride up the Castle hill

Finula was my princess
She sang like the birds in
May,
And the sound of her blithe-
some laughter,
Made music all the day
And it's, oh for my tender lady—
For the blue of her eyes is dim,
And her hands are like carven lilies
That lie at the river's brim

Finula was my princess
I loved her in years gone by,
And I wooed her in early spring-time,
In winter did she die
And it's, oh for my winsome lady—
In her grave by the Northern sea—
For she sleeps where the winds are calling,
And the sea-wave tosses free

D. K. BOILEAU.

THE PEACE OF CHRISTMAS

There came a grim sea-rover,
While Christmas wassail rang
In the Saxon's hall, where serf and thrall
Of Christ the Saviour sang.

"A boon," he cried, the Norseman,
Whose hands with blood were red,
"That in His Name Whom ye acclaim
I may be sheltered"

Up rose the Saxon franklin,
In bitter scorn he cried
"Aye! when our Lord in sweet accord
Bids Judas to His Side!"

"Our blood is on your long sword,
Our lives are on your hand;
For vengeance dread cry out our dead
Throughout the English land!"

"For tale of blazing roof-tree,
For rape, and wrong, and raid,
By gallows tree I'll pledge to thee
The welcome thou hast made!"

Then scoffed the hardy rover.
"By Odin, brave, and Thor!
How dare ye raise glad hymns of praise
Save to red gods of war?"

"I hear your Christ cry: 'Pardon!'
I hear your lips breathe 'Slay'
The peace He gave, the grace I crave,
Your passion sweeps away!"

The priest set down his wine cup:
"Blasphemer!" fierce he cried,
And swords outsprang and loudly rang
The spears on either side

But, "Peace!" brake in the Franklin,
"There's truth in every word!
Faint through the sound of earth around
The holiest Voice is heard."

"Do good to them that hate you"—
Drink from my cup, O Dane!
Eat of my bread, rest on my bed,
And pass in peace again

"But judge not of His Mercy
By the poor grace I bring
To meet the claim of the High Name
Of Christ, the Heavenly King!"

That night the Franklin's vision
Beheld, a wonder sweet,
In glory shine the Christ Divine,
With Judas at His Feet.

E. A. POTTER

HOUSEHOLD ART

"Mine be a cot" for the hours of play
Of the kind that is built by Miss GREENAWAY,
Where the walls are low and the roofs are red,
And the birds are gay in the blue overhead
And the dear little figures, in rocks and mills,
Go roaming about at their own sweet wills,
And "play with the pup" and "reprove the calves,"
And do nought in the world (but Work) by halves,
From "Hunt the Slipper" and "Kiddle me no!"
To watching the cat in the apple tree

O Art of the Household! Men may prize
Or then ways "artless" and "Idyllic" —
They may soar on their wing of sense and float
To the au fait and the dim remote,
Till the last sun sink in the last lit West
In the Art at the Door that will please the best,
To the end of Time (will be still the same,
For the Earth first laughed when the children came!

A BALLAD OF THE CLOISTER.

They robe her all in bridal white—
 (Her eyes are like the summer seas,)
 Her golden hair, with pearls bedight,
 Ripples like fire to her knees,
 As forth she steps, with stately tread,
 Attended by her maidens seven—
 A Bride of Christ, about to wed—
 A fair and virgin Spouse of Heaven

They lead her to the Altar-rail—
 (Her eyes are calm as moonlit skies,)
 About her filmy bridal veil
 The clouds of incense cling and rise;
 Her thoughts are with her Lord above,
 Till suddenly, there meets her glance
 A face she might have learned to love—
 And lips she might have kissed, perchance!

They bear her up the winding stair—
 (Her eyes are passionate as flame,)
 They cut off all her golden hair,
 Her former glory now her shame,
 They robe her in funereal black,
 To hide her grace from loving eyes
 And then in silence lead her back,
 A form that none may recognise

They take her to the convent cell
 (Her eyes seem carven out of stone,)
 They bid her pray till Vesper bell,
 And then they leave her all alone.
 Her fingers stray among her beads—
 She falls upon her bended knees—
 But all the while her spirit bleeds,
 And all the while—one face she sees!

Her tears are frozen ere they fall—
 (Her eyes are like incarnate woe,)
 "Ah Christ!" she cries, "I gave Thee all,
 And wherefore should this thing be so?
 I pray Thee tell me, of Thy grace
 Wherefore this evil thing should be
 That this dread vision of his face
 Should creep between my soul and Thee?"

Then softly steals a Spirit Voice
 (Her starry eyes through tear-drops shine,)
 "Weep no more, daughter—but rejoice
 Thy soul and body still are Mine.
 Yet in My Father's House above,
 Close to My feet the saints prepare
 A place for him whom thou dost love
 For thou shalt save his soul by prayer!"

(Violet D. Chapman, "Sorrento," Burnham, Somerset.)

Mr. Austin Dobson (1895).

From a portrait drawn by William Scott, as found in Mr. Austin Dobson's "Poems" (London, 1895).

We also select for printing:

WHERE THE DERWENT MEETS THE SEA.

Heard you the wind in the night, my lads,
 Where the Derwent meets the sea?
 The foam on the rocks is white, my lads,
 And as wild as the furies be
 We raced through the wind of the gale,
 When our masts were stript of the sail,
 And the foul winds sang,
 And the breakers' clang
 Was louder than Death's own hail!

Saw you our boat in the night, my lads,
 Where the Derwent meets the sea?
 As swift as the swallow's flight, my lads,
 Through the seething foam went we.
 Our rudder was gone, the tempest bore
 Our boat to the howling, rocky shore,
 With a sightless dash,
 And a grinding crash,
 We sank, and we rose no more!

Hear you my tale in the night, my lads,
 Where the Derwent meets the sea?
 O, I am the captain's sprite, my lads,
 And I haunt where the breakers be;
 When whistles the wind of the rising gale,
 I rise from the rocks with my ghostly hail;
 And I cry: "Beware
 Of the wild reel there,"
 And the sea gives an answering hail (Berwick Sayers, 65, Avondale Road, South Croydon).

This competition has been a little disappointing in quality, but very good ballads have also been sent in by Winifred Cook (Birkenhead), Joan Adair (Dublin), D. Tweeddale (Birkdale), E. W. Higgs (Clapton), Marjorie W. Crosbie (Wolverhampton), Millicent Gibson (Liverpool), Vernon H. Porter (Clapton), Doris Rochefort (Stoke Newington), Alexander R. C. Eaton (Forest Gate), Geo. R. Blake (Greenock), F. N. Jellicoe (Stockwell), M. D. Baynes (Teignmouth), H. Douglas Hamilton (Bristol), K. Elsie Hunt (North Shields), E. Price (Birmingham), Miss M. Christmas (Sevenoaks), Alice D. Neal (Elland), Noel D. Braithwaite (Ashton-under-Lyne), Austen H. Pennington (Oldbury), Horace W. Walker (Beeston), John MacTaggart (Edinburgh), Frank Dale (Saxmundham), Rev. J. Shone (Bangor), A. S. Hume (Birkenhead), Hadley Ford (Clifton), Margaret Dunn (Hammer-smith), John H. Gladwell (Worcester), Margaret E. Painter (Wimbledon), Ernest F. Seymour (Kilburn), Will Loudon (Dunfermline), Alice W. Linford (S. Tottenham), Margaret McDonnell (Glasgow), Florence Bagster (Kendal), Maud Marion Burnell (Ashford), G. M. Hennings (St. Albans), Edward H. Bucknole (Boscombe), Richard P. McCoy (Gillingham), R. Cogger (Dartford), R. B. Ince (Jarvis Brook), H. M. Warthman (Chudleigh), Chris. W. Martin (Plumstead), M. A. Newman (Framlingham), J. C. Church (Castleford), Cyril G. Taylor (Heswall), Beatrice Craig (Straidarian), Eveline Emily Iffe (Plumstead), Mrs. C. P. F. Ferrier (Glasgow), E. Irene Seaton (Boxmoor), Edith Leadbeater (Birstall), Marjorie Ogle (Colne), Rev. J. A. S. Wilson (Edinburgh), R. B. Matson; Gwendoline

Mrs. Primrose and her family.

Drawn by Hugh Thomson.

From "The Vicar of Wakefield," with Preface by Austin Dobson and illustrated by Hugh Thomson (Macmillan).

D. Harold (High Barnet), D. M. Keimode (Coventry), W. H. Hamilton (Aberdeen), Gladice Vivian (Penarth), Evelyn Simms (Brighton), Stanley Simpson (Birkenhead), H. R. Smith (Newcastle-on-Tyne), M. Pickthall (London, W.), E. M. Northcott (West Kirby), Mrs. A. E. Wise (Leicester), William Morris (Sheffield), A. W. Jay (Devonport), E. Summers (Dukinfield), Dorothy J. Smith (Gravesend), Archibald J. A. Wilson (Rondebosch, Cape Town), Constance Goodwin (Clapham), Lorna Fane (St. Anne's-on-Sea), Marion Cowall (Murrayfield), Doris Dean (Bromley), Emily Cornell (Upper Norwood), Joseph Poole Addey (Kingston-on-Thames), Marcella Whitaker (Dewsbury), E. Love Langton (Burton-on-Trent), Theodore Maynard (London, W.), B. Vickery (Bradford), W. A. McPhail (Glasgow)

II. - The PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best quotation is awarded to Miss Marion F. Brown, of 7, Central Road, Gloucester, for the following :

THE PORCELAIN LADY BY FRIDERICK NIVEN
(Martin Secker)

"Take her up tenderly,
Lift her with care"

T. HOOD—Bridge of Sighs

We also select for printing :

THE AMATEUR GENTLEMAN BY JEFFERY FARNOL
(Sampson Low)

"You'll find him working muddly at the Bar
After a touch at two or three professions"

SIR W. S. GILBERT—To My Bride

(E. A. Pearson, Noss Mayo, Fleet)

A QUAKER WOOLING BY MRS. FRED REYNOLDS
(Hutchinson)

"Some little talk awhile of Me and Thee
There was"

FITZGERALD—Omar Khayyam

(Charles Powell, 290, Oxford Road, Manchester.)

FORTUNES FOR FARMERS BY BERNARD GIBBERI

"That must depend on the weather."

LEWIS CARROLL—The Hunting of the Snark

(W. McC. Miller, Straidarran House,
Co. Londonderry.)

PRISON SONGS AND POEMS BY J. ROBERT CLARK
"Labour we must, and labour hard"
HERRICK—Labour

(A. C. Laughton, 4, Hatfield Street, Wakefield)

WHERE ARE YOU GOING TO? BY E. ROBINS
(Heinemann)

"Ask me no more"

FENNYSON—The Princess

(Irene Pollock Lalonde, 14, Forester Road, Bath)

THE WOMAN MOVEMENT BY ELLEN KAY (Putnam)

"Break, break, break"

FENNYSON

(Thomas Hufington, 8, Granby Road, Headingley, Leeds)

III - The PRIZE for the best original drawing illustrating the title of any book mentioned in last month's BOOKMAN, is divided, and we are sending Two NEW BOOKS to Mr. Ronald Harley, of Wentworth Road, Four Oaks, Birmingham, and Two NEW BOOKS to Mr. Michael Teale, of The Red Cottage, West Park, Leeds, for the drawings reproduced on pages 62 and 63. We specially commend the drawings received from J. H. Fletcher (Tottenham), Henry G. Dowling (Portsmouth), W. E. Dodsworth (Sheffield), Doris Dean (Bromley), Rose Reynolds (Christchurch, Hants), W. Hawkins, Jun. (Sheffield), Alfred Victor Waller (Sunderland), E. S. Heron (Chester), J. N. Pickthall (London, W.), R. F. Reynolds (Lanbedr)

The Cap that Fits.

Drawn by Bernard Partridge

From "Picce in Porcelain" by Austin Dobson, illustrated by Bernard Partridge (Kegan Paul & Co.)

IV.—The PRIZE OF HALF A GUINFA for the best review in not more than a hundred words is awarded to Mr. R. W. King, of "Deepdene," Catford Hill, S.E., for the following:

THE VICTORIAN AGE IN ENGLISH LITERATURE

By G. K. CHESTERTON.
(Williams & Norgate.)

To a psychologist studying the mind of "G. K. C.", this book would be absorbingly interesting. To the literary student it is rather curious. Considerably more than half deals with politics and religion, rather than with literature in any aspect. Even when "G. K. C." does treat of pure literature, he says a great many more clever things than true ones. His well-known sturdy independence of opinion is, we fear, in serious danger here of becoming aggressive bigotry; and the mere student is thus hard put to it to resist being "carried off his feet" by its many splendid, but scarcely trustworthy, paradoxes.

We also select for printing:

GROWING PAINS By IVY LOW (Heinemann)

In an age of introspection we are all apt to analyse Life till we find it in pieces at our feet, and then to lament because we cannot put it together again. And thus it was with Gertrude, the heroine of "Growing Pains." Evincing considerable powers of observation and psychological insight, Miss Low gives us a well-drawn picture of middle-class London girlhood which, redeemed by a certain lightness of touch from a tendency to morbidity, is well worth reading, but which leaves us with a strong desire to take the neurotic Gertrude out for a long walk in the rain.

(Edgar Fiere, Author's Club, 2, Whitehall Court, S.W.)

THE COMMON THAT I LOVE

By W. PERCIVAL WESFLE, F.R.S., and HENRY E. TURNER
(Dent)

Fascinating always, Nature Study has now become a fashion. From the noise of the commercial world, and from the smell of the petrol, the city man now joins—in the spirit—with the little child of the Board School standards, to enjoy the unspeakable, and yet speaking, things of the earth and sky. This little handbook, one of a series, is a wonderfully useful practical guide to those things that one knows there are around, but yet knows them not. The illustrations are plain, the language simple, and all combined to read like—like Life.

(A. E. Gowers, 12, Broad Street, Haverhill, Suffolk.)

THE WEAKER VESSEL By F. F. BENSON
(Heinemann)

Harry Whittaker finds that the elusive elf called "Inspiration" appears only when he is under the influence of alcohol. Without its stimulus the doors of his dramatic genius remain obstinately barred. To Eleanor, the stronger vessel, a character drawn with unusual insight, falls the task of fighting her husband's battles. Her weapons are love and an infinite capacity for understanding. And never once do those weapons become dulled; not even in the big crisis of her married life. Mr. Benson's style is admirably restrained, and he writes with a quiet strength that "gets there" by reason of its very unobtrusiveness.

(Cyril G. Taylor, Fair Hall, Heswall, Cheshire)

MOONSEED By ROSALIND MURRAY
(Sidgwick & Jackson)

Any new writer, saddled with an illustrious parentage, is heavily handicapped, inevitably, too much is expected. There are, however, two points for congratulation in

Mr. Austin Dobson's Bookplate.

Miss Rosalind Murray's "Moonseed"; the plot-construction is so good that one does not foresee the end, and the minor characters are excellently done. But Miss Murray should make her people do something, feelings alone become wearisome. She should cultivate a sense of humour, and, when describing a well-known place like Amalfi so accurately that it can be recognised by anyone who has not been there, she should give it its own name.

(Florence G. Fidler, 131, Abbey Road, London, N.W.)

THE VICTORIAN AGE IN LITERATURE

G. K. CHESTERTON (Williams and Norgate)

This book exemplifies the inevitable result of setting upon a work that is primarily critical a mind that is primarily constructive. The essence of criticism, as Arnold insisted, is that one should make transparent the window of one's own perception. Mr. Chesterton has shown us the Victorians through the stained-glass of his own highly individualised personality. It is an account rather of Mr. Chesterton than of Victorian literature. Nevertheless men, books, movements, characteristics, and tendencies, he hits off in phrases, similes, and sentences of a felicity that compels the consent of his bitterest opponents in art, politics and religion.

(J. H. Dugdale, Jesus College, Oxford)

We specially commend the reviews sent in by Ernest S. Heron (Chester), Doris Baker (Eastbourne), F. W. Lawfield (Cambridge), Irene Pollock Lalonde (Bath), Miss Mackechnie (St. Andrews), Robert B. Boswell (Bassett, Southampton), A. A. Chadwick (Derby), Lucy G. Chamberlain (Llandudno), G. D. M. Allinson (Hampstead), Claude L. Penrose (Woolwich), Edna Smallwood (Highbury, N.), Miss J. A. Jenkins (Liverpool), S. A. Doody (Boscombe), J. B. Boulkes (Mellor, Derbyshire), Gwendolue Jones (Swansea), L. Cargill (Wallington), Gertrude M. Elwood (Grimsby), Mary Kingdom (Leamington, Spa), Miss L. Mugford (South Norwood Hill), L. H. Cooke (Heaton Moor, Lancs), W. H. Gillman (Devizes), Miss Van der Pant (Highgate, N.), Mrs. Hooper (Wanstead), W. J. Hollman (Rhyll), Miss L. J. Benham (Colchester), Ernest F. Seymour (Kilburn, N.W.), M. M. M. (Glasgow, W.), Alan C. Fraser (Dodington, Bridgewater), Frances D. Watson (Heaton Moor, Stockport), W. McC. Miller (Londonderry), Miss C. Wilson (Aberdeen), Muriel M. B. Aikman (Kelvinside, Glasgow), M. A. Newnan (Framlingham), Ronald Harley (Birmingham), N. Raghunathan (Kumbakonam, S. India), G. M. Northcott (West Kirby, Birkenhead), Edith Chadwick (Derby), William F. Spalding (Palmer's Green, N.), F. S. Alexander (Stoke Newington, N.), Enid Fletcher (Nottingham), Marcella Whitaker (Dewsbury), Sybil Waller (London, S.W.), Arnold S. Walton (Newcastle-on-Tyne), Miriam Kirkby (Dore, Sheffield), H. Francis Young (Bow, E.), and James A. Richards Tenby).

V.—The PRIZE OF ONE YEAR'S SUBSCRIPTION TO "THE BOOKMAN" is awarded to Mr. H. Helsby, 55, Kingsley Road, Liverpool.

Drawn by Hugh Thomson.
Heading from "The Old Sedan Chair" in "The Ballad of Beau Brocade and other Poems" (Kegan Paul)

THE ART OF HUGH THOMSON.

By J. P. COLLINS.

THE association of Mr. Dobson's muse with the art of Hugh Thomson, is the most natural thing in the world. It comes as easily to the mind as to couple Keats with Severn or Dickens with Cruikshank and "Phiz." One of the most beguiling of Mr. Dobson's essays is written in praise of Hugh Thomson, "an artist (he says) whose hand is never so happy as when it works in the half-light of a bygone time." There, in a phrase, lies the note of sympathy, and all the other notes follow in due harmony. Both poet and artist came into their own at a time when the Victorian era was growing too self-centred, too consciously moral and instructive, too intensely modern as modernity counted twenty or thirty years ago. It costs an effort in this later day, perhaps, to talk of the 'eighties as crude and pre-occupied with novelties, but one may take leave to doubt if this age of cinemas and hydroplanes ever takes itself quite so seriously as did the period that hailed the bicycle and the "bun" and rang with the exploits of the late Charles Peace.

To correct and leaven that self-importance of the 'eighties, there was no better influence than a revival of the essence of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, and it fell to Mr. Thomson to remind our generation that the costume and tradition of Hogarth's time has still "potency of life" in it. All that is demanded in the process of resurrection is that the artist shall have humanity and freshness enough. The wire of contact is there if enough current comes to quicken it; and the application of this simple rule is the only secret underlying Thomson's work. He began with all the aptitudes and a true eye, of course—these were essentials, but the rest of his achievement has been simply the pouring of his own rich nature into the channels of fancy and interpretation. Sooner or later in this field he was bound to chance upon the lyrics of Mr. Dobson, and we may count it a happy fortune for us all that the chance came early.

Mr. Thomson's first start in life—barring his birth at Coleraine, of course—was in the linen mills of Belfast. It was another kind of mill that Longfellow was thinking of when he wrote his famous line, but at any rate the linen mills went far too slowly for a lad whose bent was all for drawing. One day his inaptitude for textiles and trade showed an active phase, for he took the trouble to warn a client in his choice of a material, and as this piece of advice cost the firm a modicum of gain per yard, they concluded in all good humour that they would rather part with their pupil than with their profit. Just about this time the uncommercial youth was illuminating an address for his old schoolmaster on retirement, and this labour of love was shown by some one to the principals at Marcus Ward's, the chief art publishing firm in Ireland. To the novice's delight they offered him a post in their designing office, and the lad who had shown himself so undesigning in trade soon excelled expectations as a draughtsman. He put in a four years' term of apprenticeship, and another four years after that. As he says himself, had it not been for a re-arrangement of the firm, he might have been contentedly at Belfast until now.

Thus early in the 'eighties and his own twenties, Thomson came to London, and his first experiences were not of a sort to inflate young hopes, humble as they were. He persevered in his siege of a big illustrated paper until he had captured the heart of the art editor, when of a sudden the proprietor snuffed his ambitions there by a blunt refusal. A very few years later that decision was loftily overlooked and the artist invited to contribute to their columns; this time, the curt refusal came from Mr. Thomson. For things at last had begun to be more encouraging. He had gained a footing on the staff engaged by Mr. Comyns Carr for the new English Illustrated Magazine, and no one who has watched the evolution of our art periodicals will forget the thrill it caused by its determined and successful attempt to set up a standard which has not been beaten since. Its first volumes, in spite of thin paper and an air of feeling then way, still proclaim the most distinctive bid for perfection in our magazines that the last century produced, and no British periodical can show a higher proportion of contributors who have risen to eminence since. One of these was Mr. Dobson, already famous for his inimitable verse, and it was to accompany his prose papers in the magazine that Mr. Thomson was first asked to use his pencil as an illustrator.

The first venture was a misadventure, in a way. The artist was told to turn out a few drawings to adorn an article on Covent Garden. Unfortunately no period was nominated in the bond, and this led up to a divergence of a century or so. Mr. Thomson, seized with a resolve to be up-to-date, drew a series of studies of the Garden as it is to-day—or existed then—and it was not until delivery that he learned Mr. Dobson's pen was occupied with Covent Garden of the eighteenth century. With his usual resource and amiability, Mr. Comyns Carr procured a few old prints, and it was with this unco-ordinated series of pictures that the paper made its appearance, to the satisfaction of nobody, perhaps, and the puzzled surprise of the discerning reader. At any rate, the occurrence taught

Photo by F. O. Hoppé

Mr. Hugh Thomson.

Specially taken for THE BOOKMAN.

The Weekly Instruction in the Tunes of the Psalms.

Drawn by Hugh Thomson.

From "Days with Sir Roger de Coverley" (Macmillan).

its lesson, and the courtly tone of Mr. Dobson's muse found no departure in time—no syncopation, shall we say?—from his favourite illustrator after that. They became firm friends, and it would be hard to say of whom Mr. Thomson's memories are the kindlier, Mr. Dobson or Mr. Comyns Carr. Certainly no editor could have been readier in courtesy or patience to a beginner, or less prone to confuse, as some editors have been known to do, testiness for taste, and arrogance for authority.

Men have praised Mr. Thomson's dexterity, but dexterity is a bagatelle. Even the Post-impressionists have that,—or some of them had it once. The cultivation or possession of a physical faculty like drawing

The Little Bridal Procession.

From "Silas Marner," by George Eliot; Illustrated by Hugh Thomson (Macmillan)

The Young Lady enters the Pump Room.

From "Evelina," by Fanny Burney (Macmillan).
Drawn by Hugh Thomson.

Lady Teazle.

From one of Hugh Thomson's colour illustrations to "The School for Scandal."
(Hodder & Stoughton)

"Say they're lost, and call me to bear witness."
Miss Neville, Mrs. Hardcastle and Tony Lumpkin.

From one of Hugh Thomson's colour illustrations to "She Stoops to Conquer."
(Hodder & Stoughton)

is a poor thing in itself, unless it has illumination behind it. "Unless you see visions," Dean Church used to say to his curates, "I despair of you." Mr. Thomson has had the happy knack throughout of passing his visions on to others. From his first magazine attempts, and the time when he made his bow to the spirit of Caldecott, up to the delicate height and perfection of his pen work in "Cranford," and "The Vicar," he took his own way, and in his own vein, just as his countryman Goldsmith did, and with something of the same resulting bounty to mankind. He has done no less in his pencilled landscapes in the "Highways" edition (landscape has always been his favourite field), and the coloured plates of the later series. He has never been content with textual embellishment or the mere objective transcript. Like Abbey, he has found his starting-point in the spirit and conception of the author, and the rest has followed easily. As Traherne sings, he has "... wandered over all men's grounds,

And found repose."

Everything of his bears the impress of serenity, touched with the genuine love of nature and the hues of health and beauty, and open to every influence save the morbid and the trite. They say the age is returning to the spiritual, for the same reason, perhaps, that the cynic recommended the policy of honesty—it has "tried bo'h." But it seems to me that our generation can never wholly have lost touch with the things that are of good repute, since it has never forfeited its admiration for the gaiety and grace and genius of Hugh Thomson.

Fisher-folk at Folkestone.

Unpublished Sketches from Hugh Thomson's note book.

GOOD COMPANY.*

BY WALTER SICHEL.

ESSAYS should be companions who show country cousins the sights. And in the circle of this volume a brilliant friend speaks to us, intimately revealing not only the recesses of his own mind, but the very core of his striking themes. Nor are these, though diverse and even contrary, unrelated; they are not, that is to say, of the kind that makes us wonder—as about the “fly in amber”—“how the devil they got there.” They belong to one broad era or at least to sections of it, and, much as they differ in tone and temperament, they are all more or less imbued with the sixteenth or seventeenth century atmosphere—that of Renaissance and Reformation. One of them indeed has an earlier birthday—and with him we shall begin—but even he, the noble John Tiptoft, Earl of Worcester, is steeped in an Italy that brought forth Machiavelli. And furthermore, like the rest of his comrades, he is an adventurer by birthright. If it be objected that prosaic John Stow (of “The Survey”), Sir Thomas Browne (of the “Religio Medici”), and that brocaded Duchess of Newcastle (the sole woman of this fellowship) cannot strictly speaking so be called, our answer must be a courteous dissent. The first was a cantankerous citizen who longed to be a scholar and a gentleman but could never become either, and yet by a sheer enthusiasm for antiquity lost himself in an enduring work. If this was no adventure, what then is? The second—a secular saint—was eminently an adventurer of the spirit, a “spiritual Don Quixote” who, by virtue of that absorbing faculty, has poeticised our prose. And the third was throughout a fantastic of the first order, the sharer, moreover, of a queen’s tragedy and exile. Each of them voyaged after the unknown, and of all adventurers Jason in his good ship Argo seems the eternal type. But though the golden fleece be Jason’s quest, he is not necessarily a commercial traveller. Always he is a man of destiny and his ocean is a magic pathway. Indeed all who vividly give themselves out and venture much, however quietly, are adventurers. And of this valiant crew our author is assuredly a glad and gallant captain. Still, however, we have not yet reached our John Tiptoft. But a last prefatory comment remains, Mr. Whibley has the art, or rather the instinct, of playing round the persons portrayed, of giving us variegated glimpses both of character and circumstance. He can make a world out of a room, that is a great test, and the result is not a series of miniatures, but a biographical drama. Both by what he says and by what he leaves unsaid, he bodies forth the past till it moves before us, and his observations on its movements almost appear to be our own.

* “Essays in Biography” By Charles Whibley (as net. (Con- table))

“Miss Jenkyns used to say.”

From “Cranford,” by Mrs. Gaskell; illustrated by Hugh Thomson (Macmillan).

Balliol has long enjoyed a manifold prominence, but which of her nurslings can rival Tiptoft, created Earl of Worcester when he was twenty-five, traveller, scholar, writer, all-accomplished although “the Butcher of England”; at once the protector of humanities and the impaler of his foes; always brave, praised by scholars and soldiers though barely skilful with sword or pen? A Yorkist, he was yet first exalted by the Sixth Henry and so journeyed Jerusalem-ward simply to avoid the dilemmas of regard and allegiance. Gorgeous and capricious, he next betook himself to Italy where he joined and patronised the throng of wandering scholars—a strange and often ragged chivalry. He studied Latin at Padua and Greek at Florence, he translated Cæsar and

The Bookstalls in Charing Cross Road.

Drawn by Hugh Thomson.

From “Highways and Byways in London” (Macmillan).

Cicero (and also, by the way, Buonaccorso's "Declaration of Nobleness"). And he returned to mete out savage vengeance to King Edward the Fourth's enemies, and to be handed down as the Italianate Englishman—"a kind of bogey." He served as "Guardian of the Sea." As Irish Deputy, he slaughtered the Desmonds ere he became Lieutenant. The budding Renaissance lent him no illusions, and the sentimentalist would have killed his kinsmen for his King. But loyal he remained to that restless fratricide. The close will be best conveyed as Mr. Whibley tells it:—

"The pomp and pageantry of his life did not desert him. Tried before the Earl of Oxford, whose father and mother he had sent to the block, he met with as little mercy as he had been wont to give . . . As he went along one of the friars who accompanied him, an Italian of the order of St. Dominic, a kindly fellow and bountiful of speech, said to him 'Sire, you are brought here by your unheard-of cruelty,' to which the Earl made answer that what he had done he had done for the State. But the garrulous friar gave him no peace, saying that only just and honest things should be done for the State. . . . Tiptoft bore even the friar's impertinence with an equal mind, and when the time came for him to lose his head, he bade the executioner cut it off in three strokes as a courtesy to the Holy Trinity."

Was this irony? It must be hoped not. But at any rate it was characteristic. And so he lies buried at All Hallows, Barking, while his effigy—the tribute of a friend—adorns Ely Cathedral. Truly, as Mr. Whibley moralises, "two souls inhabiting one body." The problems of Hyde and Jekyll haunt the whole vista of the Renaissance, nor are they always absent from the longer view of the Reformation.

But if we desire—as all the young-hearted should—a full array of melodrama, surely we must turn to the reign of James the First and the typical course of

H. Thomson
1898

Mercery Lane.

Drawn by Hugh Thomson
From "Highways and Byways in Kent" (Macmillan)

Stella's Cottage in Moor Park.

Drawn by Hugh Thomson.
From "Highways and Byways in Surrey" (Macmillan).

Sir Thomas Overbury. The whole art of the Adelphi is here. There is the radiant adventuress in high places—Lady Essex with her paramour Rochester; the false and exploiting friend—Robert Carr; the fair sorceress (it was the age of witchcraft)—Mistress Turner, with her accomplice the magician Forman; the conspirators with the dark figure of Lord Northampton in the background; the intriguing influence, too, of Francis Bacon (who in this instance can never be accused of being Shakespeare); the slippery, slobbery King with his coup de main ready to fall on the favourite's head; and, to crown this whirligig of surprise and catastrophe, Sir Philip Sidney's daughter, the Countess of Rutland, as the victim's lady love. The age had indeed declined when the daughter of such a pattern could be found in such a galley! And then comes the lingering poison of a torturing death, the hopes against hope, the final gasp—nor least in the chapter of vicissitudes, the nemesis that eventually overtook the villainess, dressed "in black tannet, a cypress chaperon, a cobweb lawn ruff and cuffs," tried for murder in Westminster Hall. From such curdling scenes of crime and colour, Mr. Whibley gently leads us, as is his wont, to Overbury's book of "Characters," which best preserves his name—the herald of a long succession, from which, however, is here omitted Halilax's famous "Character of a Trimmer."

"It was Edward."

From "Sense and Sensibility," by Jane Austen; illustrated by Hugh Thomson (Mcmillan).

Scholar and schemer, such was the century's combination! And perhaps one of the most interesting among these studies is that of the Admirable Crichton, some of whose gloss becomes a trifle soiled in the process. For Mr. Whibley is apparently of opinion that this tour de force incarnate depended somewhat on a prodigious memory for his invention. Yet, with every discount, what an amazing career was there. Everywhere, in grace, in fealty, in acrobatic learning, in colossal advertisement, he prevails. He outruns his century. Everywhere he is "interviewed." His progress through Venice and Padua reads like that of a modern "star" in America. The tournament of words is immense. What was Sheridan's "Begum" Speech of under two hours in comparison with three livelong days of refutation by James Crichton the incomparable Scot? And in the end, for such careers at that epoch—fatality! Nothing can be more tragic than the way in which, after his homage to Gonzaga, he was foully done to death in the Mantuan alley. A gipsy scholar indeed. Far less so—though he roved afield—is the nomad licentiate George Buchanan, the glory of the North, the wonder of the South. Mr. Whibley thinks more of him as a troubadour, perhaps, than in our ignorance can we. Nor, as regards his Latin lyrics, do we feel quite sure that his Neæra and Eleonora were so unreal. Mr. Whibley inclines to give Buchanan Rabelaisian affinities both of acquaintance and temperament. Buchanan was doubtless a sage who could rollick, but save in persistence, there seems to have been little of the giant about him. Rabelais, surely, on the other hand, must have been a very leviathan of spontaneous strength, splashing hugely in the salt waterspouts of his humour. But in one thing there is a near resemblance, the encounters between what another of these characters well describes as "Captain Necessitie and Cosyn Povertie."

Space forbids us to linger over Stow, the literal surveyor; or Edward Hall, the Worshipper of King Hal; or that most fascinating "Queen of Sheba" (one thinks of Sterne's), Margaret, Duchess of Newcastle, who explored all worlds, revered her husband as a miracle and, second to him, her own works. Of these happily does Mr. Whibley observe, "the web of nonsense, which she spun like a spider from her brain, was yet able to enmesh the fly of flattery."

And now, after all, what time is there for Mr. Whibley's fascinating study of Sir Thomas Browne, the most Montaignesque (though with more piety) of Englishmen? As we read, we seem to be culling simples from Hymettus—yet Hymettus, notwithstanding, was only seventeenth century Norwich. Browne's "solemn gaiety" and wondering acuteness is a landmark in our style. "Above all," well comments Mr. Whibley, "he was not merely an inventor of harmonics; he was an inventor of the words to which these harmonies are composed." He was natural though self-conscious. "He was one who thought in images." "And so it is that though he writes what is called prose, he was always a poet, a poet working in careless disregard of the rules, yet never failing to achieve the effect at which he aims."

Had we more space it would have been a pleasure to have instanced also Mr. Whibley's excellent humour. He never takes himself or his subject too seriously, but always he respects the dignity of the past, and always he desires it for the present. Nor does he ever forget to pay the compliments that are due from history to human nature.

Covent Garden—The Avenue in the Afternoon.

From a drawing by Hugh Thomson, illustrating "The Tour of Covent Garden," by Austin Dobson, in The English Illustrated, 1884.

New Books.

WILLIAM WATSON'S NEW POEMS.*

The poets are always the finest of politicians—so long as they keep clear of party politics. We have great national songs, but we have no great Tory or Liberal songs, and there never shall be any; for it is inevitable that your party-politician does, in a manner, make the parish his world instead of the world his parish. Poetry breaks its wings within such narrow limits; the poet stultifies himself when he gives up to party what was meant for mankind, and nowhere is the Muse so utter an exile as in the House of Commons. But, happily, that is not the atmosphere into which Mr. William Watson's Muse has been banished. There are only three or four political poems in his new volume, and one only wishes them away because he is too true and fine a poet to be wasting his time in transitory faction fights. When he inveighed with such passion and splendour against the iniquities of the Sultan he was not speaking as a party politician, but as a humanitarian; and for my part, in spite of his three or four political poems here, I will no more give Mr. Watson over to the Unionist Party than I will whittle Shelley down and call him a Radical. Those badges are too small to go round the necks of poets without stifling them.

Mr. Watson feels that the Muse is exiled in a different and a larger sense. He says, in a preface to his "The Poet's Place in the Scheme of Life," that in this country poetry has of late "appealed with constantly diminishing force to the audience which it addresses," that the need for the poet "is felt by but few persons in our day. With one exception there is not a living English poet the sales of whose poems would not have been thought contemptible by Scott and Byron." The exception is Kipling, apart from him "England's living singers succeed in reaching only a pitifully small audience." But I fancy it was always so. When Byron and Scott pleased large audiences, Keats, Shelley, Wordsworth had to be content with the appreciation of the few; whilst Tennyson charmed the multitude, Browning, Arnold and others sang to comparatively small circles; when Hayley was selling his thousands nobody was buying Blake. The explanation is that one style of work happens to suit the taste of the moment and the other does not. Anyhow, I think the Muse is no more in exile now than she always has been; but I am glad Mr. Watson thinks otherwise, if it is only because he has thus been moved to write the poem that gives the title to this book. He laments that the Age banishes the poets from her heart

"To a distant, desert province of her thoughts,
A region grey and pale; or, crueler still,
Gives them, at times, gusts of applause, and then Remands them to new frosts of unconcern;"

but he foresees the coming of a better day:

"For in Life's midmost chamber there still burns
Upon the ancient hearth the ancient fire,
Whence are all flame-like things, the unquenchable Muse
Among them, who, though meanly lodged to-day,
In dreariest outlands of the world's regard,
Foresees the hour when Man shall once more feel
His need of her, and call the exile home"

Rarely has Mr. Watson written so spontaneously or with a more exquisite simplicity and tenderness than in some of the lyrics here—"The Three Givers," "Dublin Bay," "Part of My Story"—and many a magic phrase and stately verse testifies that he has lost none of his old cunning in building the lofty rhyme and breathing into it that deep-toned, swelling organ-music of which no living poet has a higher mastery than he. Take the lines on "The Centenary of Dickens," the great fighter in the cause of truth and right;

"A knight on whom no palsyng torpor fell,
Keen to the last to break a lance with Hell.
And still undimmed his conquering weapons shine;
On his bright sword no spot of rust appears;
And still, across the years,
His soul goes forth to battle, and in the face
Of whatsoever is false, or cruel, or base,
He hurls his gage, and leaps among the spears;
Being armed with pity and love, and scorn divine,
Immortal laughter, and immortal tears."

Or "A Full Confession," with its magnificent picture of Niagara, as it "... takes the infernal plunge,

And out of the grey rage of the abyss,
Out of the torment, everlastingly
Upbreathes what seems, when sunlight touches it,
The smoke of Hell lost in the smile of God."

I am not going to complain of the partisanship that rages in "Ulster's Reward" when it comes in the same volume with "Moonset and Sunrise," that touches imaginatively and with such power and uplifting earnestness on the tardy victory of the Cross over the Crescent in Eastern Europe:

"Enough, if hands that heretofore
Labour'd to bar His road,
Delay henceforward nevermore
The charioteers of God,
Who halt and slumber, but anon,
With burning wheels, drive thundering on."

If there is nothing in "The Muse in Exile" that surpasses what Mr. Watson has done in the past, there is much that soars at the same high level and has the characteristic beauty of thought and loftiness of utterance that make the peculiar charm of his work.

A. St. JOHN ADCOCK.

Harry and Dick the Soldier.

From "Samor" with an introduction by Austin Dobson and illustrations by Hugh Thomson (Macmillan)

* "The Muse in Exile." By William Watson. 3s. 6d. net. (Herbert Jenkins.)

WAGNER WITHOUT TEARS.*

Messrs. Reeves are just now publishing some capital Wagner volumes. Here, for instance, are two, containing the famous treatise "Opera and Drama" in a size grateful to the hand (albeit a little heavy) and dignified enough even for the shelf of favourite music books. Older Wagnerians, contemplating the monumental row of prose works, may think that there was scarcely need for another translation; but they forget that time has gone on—gone on so fast indeed, that some who were once "advanced" in their musical appreciation have become hard-shell conservatives, so loyal to Richard the First that the mere name of Richard the Second makes them foam (journalistically) at the mouth. It seems not so very many years ago that Wagnerians in England had more opportunities for reading his prose works than for hearing his music dramas; but a new generation has arisen since then, and the operatic repertory has so far changed that many who know "Tristan" and the "Ring" by heart are now looking forward to the revival of "Lohengrin" and "The Flying Dutchman" as interesting novelties.

The young enthusiasts of to-day really know very little, at first hand, of Wagner's prose. To them these volumes can be strongly recommended, especially as the edition possesses some very helpful features. Wagner (alas, that we should have to say it!) was terribly long-winded. Everything he wrote is one-third, or even more, longer than it should be. In the case of the "Meistersinger" we are prepared to endure the heavenly length for the sake of the music; in the case of (say) "Rienzi" we are not. This misguided energy of production is seen at its worst in his prose works; for while in music he knew just what he wanted to say, his prose treatises are often little more than a protracted process of making up his own mind, involving lengthy and obscure arguments with himself about his own meaning.

"Opera and Drama," for example, is a torrential essay entirely without form, though certainly not void. Wagner the aesthetician shared the natural impulse of German philosophers towards complete unintelligibility, and the present treatise is not to be read without much wrestling. Now Mr. Edwin Evans, the translator, not only writes very clear and intelligible English (as Wagnerian translators sometimes do not), but he has very bravely broken up the matter into sections and paragraphs with appropriately epitomized headings; and so, "who will may hear Sordello's story told."

No doubt the aboriginal Wagnerites will be horrified at this rational handling of a congenially obscure treatise, but the normal lover of music will be grateful; for this book, like the "Lao'oon," is an æsthetic essay of real constructive value, and, in conjunction with Wagner's own practice, it has dramatised the opera for ever.

Reading it now, in the light of our present familiarity with the once anathematized music, we observe with interest that, while some of it is rather suspiciously like special pleading in favour of Wagner's own predilection for Teutonic myths, some of it indicates an ideal that he certainly did not reach himself. Something near it has been recently attained, not in an opera, but in a ballet, the "Pétrouchka" of Stravinsky, where the absence of speech seems not so much a deficiency as a positive addition.

That by the way. What, perhaps, the reader of to-day will enjoy most in the book is not so much the main thesis as the by-the-ways of rich constructive criticism, the thoughts of a musician about musicians. I wonder, sometimes, if we recognize how much of our admiration for the greatest masters we owe to the flaming hero-worship and militant zeal of Wagner. In the land where all discords are resolved, Beethoven surely recognizes a great apostle as well as a fellow-prophet.

GEORGE SAMPSON.

BOHN'S LIBRARY.*

It is almost superfluous nowadays to write anything in commendation of Bohn's Library. Carlyle uttered the general verdict when he said, some fifty years ago, "In regard to all manner of books, Bohn's Publication Series is the usefulest thing I know." Henry G. Bohn founded his famous Library in 1847; in 1864 it was taken over by Messrs. Bell, and throughout the sixty-six years of its existence it has retained its high place in the esteem of every lover of good books. The student soon came to know that he could depend upon Bohn's edition of any English classic, and that if he bought a translation of any foreign classic in that series it was sure to be a sound and a scholarly one. As the prices of books went, too, a generation ago, the volumes were remarkably cheap, and for this reason also the average book lover had a warm corner in his heart for the name of their publisher.

Recent years have brought us a vast and ever-growing variety of excellent reprints that are cheaper still. Bohn's well-printed, well-produced books at three-and-sixpence were accounted miracles of cheapness; but to-day the popular price has fallen to a shilling, and in a happy hour, and in the right enterprising spirit, Messrs. Bell have at length resolved on a cheap reissue of the great series that has so long been associated with their firm, and the first twenty volumes are already published. They are a varied and attractive selection ranging from Coleridge's "Aids to Reflection" to Fanny Burney's "Evelina"; from Goethe's "Poetry and Truth" to Fielding's "Joseph Andrews"; from Calverley's translation of Theocritus to "Gulliver's Travels." There is Motley's "Dutch Republic" in three volumes, and "Don Quixote," Emerson's works, and Burton's "Pilgrimage to Al-Madinah and Meccah," each in two. Lamb's Essays, Ebers's "Egyptian Princess," and Arthur Young's "Travels in France," make up the twenty. Print, paper and binding—they are bound quietly and tastefully in cloth—are all that the most exacting reader could desire, and we have no hesitation in forecasting that Bohn's Library in its new form will be as deservedly successful and as general a boon as it was in its old.

MODERN DRAMA.†

Without a doubt, the playwright, who is faithful to the principles of dramatic art, has the advantage of his artistic brethren. He can afford to be catholic and cosmopolitan about views, theories, missions et hoc genus omne, provided that his own are concentrated upon the one criterion of valuable self-expression—the play's the thing. He may thirst after Utopias; he may cleave to the traditions of his ancestors; he may be pragmatist or pantheist, but whoso shall counsel him to employ the stage as a dray-horse for his opinions is a pestilent advocatus diaboli. If he write plays, he must stick to his last; he has one canon, the realisation of men and women in dramatic relation with one another. If he conceive the canon as an incentive to the dour craftsmanship of Aristotelian unities and "well-made plays," he has only interpreted it in the spirit of the pedagogue. Mr. Fox's "This Generation" has carefully forgotten this. George Tremayne, an idealist manufacturer of cheap cigarettes, disgusted with modern social conditions, takes the plunge and a newspaper shop with an income of one hundred a year, as the residue of his great possessions. His commonplace wife and children naturally suffer, and his industrial partners prosper exceedingly. Mrs. Tremayne goes back for her children's sake and finally invigiles Tremayne himself back into a plutocratic environment seven devils worse than the first. Revolt is futile, and the "loving hands of wife and children close

* "Bohn's Popular Library." First Twenty Volumes. 1s. net each. (G. Bell & Sons.)

† "This Generation." A Play by S. M. Fox. 2s. 6d. net. (Fisher Unwin).—"The Great Adventure: A Play of Fancy in Four Acts." By Arnold Bennett. 2s. net. (Methuen.)

* "Opera and Drama." By Richard Wagner. Translated by Edwin Evans, F.R.C.O. 2 Vols. 10s. net. (William Reeves.)

"The Curé's Progress."

"Monsieur the Curé down the street Comes with his kind old face."

"The Idyll of the Carp."

"The scene is in a garden, where you please,
So that it lie in France . . ."

"Une Marquise."

"As you sit there at your
O Marquise!
And the men flock round your knees Thick as bees."

"Au Revoir: A Dramatic Vignette."

"If Madame [I omit] will be
Beside the Fountain-rail at Three
Then Madame—possibly—may hear
News of her Spaniel. JOLICAUX.
Monsieur denies his note?"

the golden prison house upon him." Now, here is no conflict of character, but of ideas masquerading as characters. We know perfectly well that the individuals of the play would and would not do certain things, just as well as we know that Hamlet would never have killed the king, had he been a Tolstoyan Pacificist. They have no option. The ideas see to that. The style of the play is indeed Jonsonian, with this difference—that the types are not selected from life itself, but from life as the reformer scans it, the novelist's stock-in-trade on the one hand and they that are gathered into the fold on the other. There are no cross-divisions. Behind the shifting panorama of conflicting social theories and interests, the dramatis personæ are effigies, with inscriptions. From the point of view of social service, of course, it does matter whether the Ayes or the Noes have it, but from that of dramatic presentment, it does not. Mr. Fox has allowed a clarified social conscience to obfuscate his dramatic conscience. While selecting a modern trend of play, which has uncharted possibilities, he has ignored its exigencies, which are to illustrate the reaction of personality upon environment. But Ibsen's characters never parade as sandwichmen and Shakespeare's problem-plays, "Measure for Measure," and "Troilus and Cressida," for instance, are an arena for tremendous dramatic fluctuation and development. The pity of "This Generation" is that, for all its sincerity and conviction, its abstractions have stultified vitality.

In spite of the reviewers, people are beginning to open their eyes to the fact that Mr. Bennett is the very Merlin of modern letters, able at will to metamorphose himself into the most diverse forms. It is a singular tribute to his elasticity of mind, for who would have imagined that the diarist of life, who wrote "The Old Wives' Tale," and "Clayhanger," with such meticulous accuracy of detail and observation, and with such provincial sobriety of treatment, could have leaped astride a sportive Pegasus and performed the most entertaining convolutions. It is hardly respectable, but the erudite Faust, we remember, was prone to all sorts of queer tricks. Mr. Bennett's new play—"The Great Adventure," catches him in his fantastic undress—a cap and bells motley which fits him exquisitely. It is an extravaganza, sliding now and again into pure farce and burlesque, but conceived with rare felicity, wit and sagacity. The theme of mistaken identity is as old and indeed as trite as Hein's sun, which was only an "old warmed-up jest," but Mr. Bennett has manoeuvred it into a jeu d'esprit, as fresh and jocund in fancy as all his artistic acumen and dexterity could create. The conception of a great artist half gleefully, half from the press of circumstance, impersonating his dead valet, who is buried in Westminster Abbey, with all the fanfare of publicity, because he left a state donation of two hundred thousand pounds, is fertile enough in satiric suggestion. Still more so is it, when the pseudo-valet, dragged remonstrating from his idyllic domesticity at Putney, is free to return with his wife to their suburban Hesperides, because "the policy of hushing-up things," is "the cornerstone of England's greatness." Had the satiric motive of England's decorous hypocrisy and mercenary Philistinism been deepened and fortified, the jeu d'esprit, as such, must have been marooned. As it is, it serves as a brilliant, but incidental flash-light. The characterisation in the play is centred upon the artist's homely and competent wife, whom he met, thanks to the industrious matrimonial activities of his valet. But if the other characters are only passable, that hardly detracts from a clever piece of slight-of-hand.

HAROLD MASSINGHAM.

HALF-LENGTHS.*

The late Justin McCarthy, in the "History of Our Own Times," devoted one of his last chapters to a political retrospect, and, in noting the men whose parliamentary career had been interrupted, mentioned Mr. Russell as one of those who, "it may be hoped, will not be content, and not even be allowed, to remain long out of the House of Commons." In a letter to Napier, in July, 1838, Macaulay wrote: "I am sick of the monotonous succession of parties and long for quiet and retirement. To quit politics for letters is, I believe, a wise choice." Presumably Mr. Russell shares Macaulay's views, for he has retired from the dusty arena of political conflict for some years, and we have grown accustomed to expect at least one volume a year from his pen. One of the most interesting chapters in "Half-Lengths" is an autobiographical sketch of Mr. Russell's connection with the Manchester Guardian. It appeared in that paper on July 6th, 1912, and is entitled "A Silver Wedding." We learn that in 1897 Mr. Russell contributed some articles, which were afterwards published under the title of "Collections and Recollections." The origin of this well-known book is very typical of its author.

* "Half-Lengths." By the Right Hon. G. W. E. Russell. 2s. 6d. net. (Grant Richards.)

"My friend, James Payn, was then alive," he writes, "but confined to his house by crippling illness. I used to visit him pretty regularly, and did what I could to amuse him. One day he said that, if I would put on paper all I had told him, it would make a book, which his firm (Smith, Elder) would publish. . . . James Payn died on the 25th of March, 1898, and the book which I had hoped to place in his hand I could only dedicate to his memory."

Any reader of "Collections and Recollections" will have no difficulty in imagining what a delight Mr. Russell's visits must have been to poor James Payn. And what a host of invalids have benefited by that fortuitous illness! The present writer placed "Half-Lengths" and a recent eminent theological work at the bedside of an ailing Dissenting divine. It was no surprise to find later in the day that the gospel according to Mr. Russell had proved the more acceptable fodder of the two.

"Half-Lengths" is, we believe, the sixth book the author has made, principally from his articles in the Manchester Guardian. There are not many writers who can profitably publish their fugitive journalistic pieces in volume form, but the absolute freedom that Mr. Russell enjoys in the famous paper enables him to indulge his fancy in any and every direction. The bent of his tastes is sufficiently well known by now, and no one will be surprised to hear that Gladstone and Kingsley, and the Wilberforces, and Oxford and Cambridge appear in his latest book. One would think that repetition is unavoidable, and indeed Mr. Russell does not always escape it, but where he recognises it he quotes Lord Morley's excuse: "A man may once say a thing as he would have it said, he cannot say it twice." Some of the most delightful chapters in the book are concerned with "Relationships," and in these the author is seen at his truest and best. Almost uncannily apt in quotation, he roves over the literature of the world and brings forth from the storehouse of his wonderful memory the things that were written for our learning. Now with playful satire and now with impressive simplicity he writes of the sacred relationship between mother and son, and no one can fail to respond to the noble emotions which the author engenders. The book also contains two long reviews, which were well worth reprinting, of Newman's "Life" and Bernard Holland's book on the Duke of Devonshire, and there is a capital sketch of the late Mr. Labouchere, who, we are not surprised to learn, was never an intimate friend of Mr. Russell's.

I. P. N.

SWINBURNE ON DICKENS.*

Every lover of Swinburne and of Dickens will welcome this reissue of the two essays (of two naturally cohering and forming one essay) that Swinburne contributed to the Quarterly, and to the American edition-de-luxe of "Oliver Twist." To many who did not know him except through his poems it has seemed a little strange that Swinburne should have been such a whole-hearted admirer of Dickens and taken such unbounded delight in the Dickensian humour, but to those who were intimate with him there was never anything strange in it at all. Only now and then, in certain irresponsible parodies and joyously satirical trifles, does the note of humour sound in his writings but, says Mr. Watts-Dunton here, in a charming and deeply interesting preface :

* "Charles Dickens." By Algernon Charles Swinburne. Edited, with Preface and Illustrative Notes, by T. W. Dunton. 3s. 6d. net. (Chatto & Windus.)

"I verily believe that few men ever lived whose temperament was more humorous than Swinburne's—I know that none ever could have lived whose nature was more genial—I might say, joyous. After his shattered health had become restored at 'The Pines,' the joyousness increased with advancing years, and was the most notable feature of his character. . . . It was his humour, indeed, combined with his ebullient spirits, that helped to make him the most delightful of all companions."

Mr. Watts-Dunton goes on to show how Swinburne's adoration of Dickens dated from the days of his childhood ; how, later, when a friend was ill, he "used to walk over to Wimbledon with a novel of Dickens in his pocket to comfort and amuse the invalid by reading out to him ;" and "scores of visitors to 'The Pines' will recall that nothing awakened his anger so much as any undue disparagement of 'Boz.'"

Echoes of that anger with Dickens's detractors ring challengingly in this essay—an essay that is one of the noblest tributes ever paid by one man of genius to another. Not that the praise is indiscriminate eulogy ; Swinburne was too fine and subtle a critic for that : he puts his finger unerringly on Dickens's weaknesses of style and sentiment, but there is nothing petty or niggling in his censures, and how gladly and gloriously he lets himself go when he comes to the big things—the things that are beyond and above true criticism and that it were more folly to do more than wonder at and be thankful for. He ranks "David Copperfield" and "Great Expectations," as the greatest of Dickens's novels ; thinks "A Tale of Two Cities" is "doubtless the most ingeniously and dramatically invented and constructed of all the master's works" ; but that in "that unequal and irregular masterpiece," Martin Chuzzlewit, "his comic and his tragic genius rose now and then to the very highest pitch of all." Even the fascinations of Quilp, Mr. and Miss Brass, Mr. Swiveller and the Marchioness, the charm of Mrs. Jarley and the magic of Codlin and Short cannot, he says, "mesmerise or hypnotise us into belief that 'The Old Curiosity Shop' is in any way a good story," but he touches incisively on the qualities that nevertheless make the book a great one ; and the crudities of "Our Mutual Friend" can take nothing from his quick appreciation of Rogue Riderhood and his ecstatic joy in him : "When the genius of the immortal creator said 'Let there be Riderhood,' and there was Riderhood, a figure of coequal immortality rose reeking and skulking into sight." He revels in the humour of Mrs. Gamp, Mrs. Harris and Betsey Prig, till his gratitude overflows and "we think of all this, and of more than all this, and acknowledge with infinite thanksgiving of inexhaustible laughter and of rapturous admiration the very greatest comic poet or creator that ever lived to make the life of other men more bright and more glad and more perfect than ever, without his beneficent influence, it possibly or imaginably could have been."

Any little critic can find fault ; it needs a great man to rise to such glowing and ungrudging appreciation as that. Mr. Watts-Dunton owns in his preface that he thought of omitting Swinburne's violent strictures on Matthew Arnold and Andrew Lang, but we are glad he resolved to leave them in ; for they are, as he remarks, "so characteristic of his warm, impetuous nature. In a word, they must be taken simply as boy-like expressions of Swinburne's resentment against all those who did not fully agree with him as to the transcendent excellence of Dickens." With its editor's preface and illustrative notes, the essay is at once one of the most profoundly interesting and most valuable of the countless criticisms that have been written on Dickens and his work, and Mr. Watts-Dunton has conferred a real boon upon Dickens students by releasing it in this cheap and handy form.

A STUDY OF A GREAT SOLDIER.*

It is a daring thing for a civilian to write a book about a very great soldier within a few months of that soldier's death, whilst the memory of that soldier's campaigns is still fresh in the mind of every other military man ; yet Mr. Stanley Washburn has attempted the task, and, what is more essential still, he has succeeded.

"Nogi : A Great Man against a Background of War" is most excellently done. The professional will find nothing in it at which he can cavil—the author has been most careful not to pose as a military critic—whilst the man in the street cannot fail to be fascinated by the extremely clever study of the personality of one whom most of us had hitherto regarded merely as a terribly efficient portion of the Japanese war machine.

Mr. Washburn tells us, and proves to us, that Nogi—the general who spent a hundred thousand lives at Port Arthur—was, after all, human. He knew the Japanese commander well. He was with him during those appalling days of the siege, and again during the Moukden campaign. Nogi, calmly giving orders for the crowning horror of the assault on 203-Metre Hill, knowing that his only surviving son must be in the very front of the line, and Nogi, as a gentle old man in slippers, taking half-an-hour off duty to discuss the English translation of his poems—could any contrast be stranger ?

We are prone to look on the Japanese as a democratic nation, mainly because, as usual, its democrats form its noisy and inefficient portion. But the great man of Port Arthur was, above all things, a great aristocrat. One can picture the manner in which he would have put down a rebellion against the rule of his Emperor. Napoleon's "whiff of grapeshot" would have paled into insignificance beside his measures. He lived for Japan, and—certainly after the loss of his sons—for Japan only.

As the author says, "his own desire for life went out when his two sons were sacrificed on the altar of the nation at Nan-Shan and Port Arthur," and he adds, "his whole life was simply the personification of the duties which his ideals set before him." It is a splendid thing to say of a man, and yet, after reading Mr. Washburn's book, you feel it is perfectly true.

And he died for Japan, as truly as did any of those hundred thousand whom he "spent" at Port Arthur. It is difficult, almost impossible perhaps, for a European to analyse accurately the motives of an Oriental ; but one thing is certain : it was not sheer grief at his Emperor's death, not a desire to escape those sorrows which life might yet have in store for him, but a feeling that the sacrifice of himself might help to awaken the old idealism of Japan, which led the greatest of the latter-day Samurai—and perhaps the last of them—to commit suicide.

There is only one fault about this unusually good book—it is too short.

STANLEY PORTAL HYATT.

THE R. L. STEVENSON ORIGINALS.†

Those who eagerly look for any additional information about Robert Louis Stevenson, and their name is legion, will be glad of this book by Miss Simpson, the sister of Sir Walter Simpson, one of Stevenson's old and tried friends from his student days, and his comrade on the famous canoeing expedition where he figured as the "Cigarette." Miss Simpson's aim was to group together and indicate the circumstances, the places, the doings and the people who came into Stevenson's life and influenced or found a place in his books, or to whom can be traced characteristics appearing in the fictitious people of the Stevenson kingdom. An interesting subject, and one capable of most fruitful and instructive handling if dealt with exhaustively. There is much in Miss Simpson's book that is already familiar—of Stevenson's remarkable father and mother, of the Manse at Colinton, of "Cummy," of the childish days and doings of aunts and illnesses, of boyhood and its literary ventures, of student life and the friends he made then, of his two earliest "originals," John Todd, the shepherd, and Robert Young, the gardener, both neighbours of his at Swanston, of Alan Breck and the Appin Murder, of a hundred and one things and folk that good Stevensonians know well by repute and hearsay. The most interesting chapters are those describing the close friends and comrades of Stevenson, his cousin R. A. M. Stevenson, Ferrier, Charles Baxter, Sir Walter Simpson, who was "Athelred" in Talk and Talkers and the "Cigarette" of the Inland Voyage, and W. E. Henley. It is good to read a word of defence for Henley with regard to the unfortunate essay on Stevenson that has called forth so much wrath and distress. Miss Simpson regrets that it should have been published after Stevenson's death, but insists that it contained nothing that Henley would not have said to his friend's face.

* "Nogi." By Stanley Washburn. 3s. 6d. net. (Andrew Melrose.)

† "The R. L. Stevenson Originals." By E. B. Simpson. 6s. net. (T. N. Foulis.)

The book is printed noticeably well, in well-chosen type, and is prettily illustrated with portraits and pictures of places. Altogether it is an attractive and pleasant volume and will give pleasure to the adorers of Stevenson, for whom indeed it is intended. For the information is rather rambling and jumbled, and presupposes a very considerable knowledge of Stevenson's life and of his writings in the mind of the reader—otherwise it would be hard to comprehend and piece together. Is it permissible to enter a protest against the habit of referring to Stevenson as "R.L.S." ? It is a very common one and very disagreeable. To find these initials used everywhere, in season and out of season, as a substitute for the name is irritating and disfigures a page of print. This is not a complaint against Miss Simpson's book specially, but against this vexing trick, of which Mr. George Bernard Shaw also is a victim. One grows sick of seeing "G.B.S." and "R.L.S." quoted and referred to constantly in this curtailed and discourteous fashion. It is affectionate, and perhaps those who practise this way of writing think

"nothing is amiss
When simple love and duty tender it."

But what may pass in speech and in familiar conversation is not always in place in writing, and in type it is an ugly thing. But with this grumble we return to Miss Simpson's book, which is not an ugly thing, either within or without, and will be added with gratitude to many a Stevenson shelf.

F. M. A.

THE COMPLETE ENGLISH SOCIALIST.*

Mr. H. M. Hyndman is not only in these pages the complete English Socialist—advocate, judge, and lord high executioner, so that without his certificate of good character not one of us ought properly to be counted of the Socialist faith—he is also the most amazing Mark Tapley of the movement in this country. Withal he proclaims, and boisterously enough, how much in common he has with the typical, genial, healthy-minded British Philistine of the nineteenth century. Friends and foes alike are brought up for judgment before "H. M. H.", and rarely do they leave the court with reputation unblemished. For censure, scorn, and utter condemnation are distributed without fear or favour. Even for persons of good repute, and counted as the author's friends, approval is generally tempered with some kindly disparagement. Michael Davitt, for instance, "at times manifested some little self-consciousness in regard to the important part he had played" (and this from Mr. Hyndman !)

Mr. Bernard Shaw "as a playwright and satirist is doing good work of the destructive kind. Shaw as a Fabian (with him, Webb and others) is an obstructionist and reactioner of the more conservative variety."

*"Further Reminiscences." By Henry Mayers Hyndman. 15s. net. (Macmillan.)

"Meredith also was never able to resist the temptation of straining for effect, when it was wholly unnecessary for him thus to impress his intellectual brilliancy upon the men around him."

"Whistler in society was chiefly remarkable for conceit and ill nature, and he was as sordid in his view of money in relation to his own art as Meissonier." To this summing up Mr. Hyndman adds: "I never had any but pleasant intercourse with him myself, so my judgment of him as an individual is quite unprejudiced."

Of a certain American—a Socialist and a friend—we are told that he "has since earned for himself a widespread unpopularity among American Socialists by inducing them to embark in unfortunate mines."

As for the Northampton Socialists of Mr. Hyndman's own party, "they have proved themselves to be the most incompetent and provoking lot of blunderers in politics to be found from one end of Great Britain to the other."

After that we are not surprised to hear that Mr. J. Ramsay Macdonald, M.P., is a "smart middle-class manipulator," and that the Labour Party in the House of Commons "has become a creature of compromise and intrigue—a medley of selling out and surrender."

The dead are not allowed to escape Mr. Hyndman's asseize. The late General Booth, in Mr. Hyndman's opinion, "was no more than a dexterous old charlatan, who had used religion to beguile people to their economic hurt."

W. T. Stead "was that not uncommon variety of self-conscious ascetic, a Puritan chock-full of guile, and in his way utterly unscrupulous." Only "Stead's fine end in the midst of all the muddle and mismanagement of the terrible disaster to the Titanic showed that below all his self-advertisement and charlatanry was a cool courage and self-sacrifice which all must admire."

Henry George is dismissed as "well-meaning but ignorant."

And so the tale of man's imperfection goes merrily on in these 500 odd pages. And Mr. Hyndman is quite cheerful and happy through it all, the incurable optimist that he is. Rejected many times for Parliament by the working-class electorate of Burnley he "ventures to predict that the day is not far distant when it will be considered rather odd" that the various gentlemen who defeated him—"not one of whom has ever said, or done, or written anything which anybody can remember, or would remember if he could—should all have been preferred to me as the Parliamentary representatives of a purely industrial constituency such as Burnley." Laying this flattering unction to his soul there is no repining over defeat.

Mr. Hyndman is now seventy-one. His seventieth birthday was celebrated with great goodwill by a large number of persons in London last year, and in spite of defections amongst his followers, and a general refusal in this country to take the British Socialist Party any more seriously than the old Social Democratic Federation was taken, the old veteran comes out as strong as ever, and has no notion of modifying or readjusting his principles to suit the times.

Whilst these "Reminiscences" are full of reproof, a few people come in for whole-hearted praise, notably Lady Warwick, Mr. Walter Crane, and Mr. Robert Blatchford.

And there are several good stories, too, told, as often as not, at the author's own expense.

Apart from economics and politics, Mr. Hyndman shares the average opinions in art and letters and diet, and expresses these opinions with characteristic heartiness. Ibsen is just "one of the most overrated men of our day," whose "plays bore me to death." Vegetarianism is the root of Mr. Bernard Shaw's failings in literature.

Mr. Hyndman has met a considerable number of people of importance, and has talked to them all for their good. Possibly his "Reminiscences" might have been more interesting had he occasionally listened. One thing, however, stands out clearly—a passionate insistence that the poor are robbed of the good things of life—and it is this insistence that redeems Mr. Hyndman's soliloquies from futility.

JOSEPH CLAYTON.

VICTORIAN VERSE.*

The splendid vista of modern English poetry afforded in Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch's volume reminds me of the naval pageant of 1889 following the scare of a few years earlier, and of Mr. Punch paddling his canoe down the serried ranks of warships with a complacent smile on his face, exclaiming: "Not so very bad after all." To turn the thousand pages of this admirable anthology—worthy companion of the "Oxford Book of Verse"—is both to learn and enjoy much. It bears somewhat the same relation to its fellow as the Tate Gallery does to the National, it is thoroughly representative, it is full of poignant contrasts, it aims at breadth rather than intensity, it is characteristic of a succession of poetic ideals superimposed, it is distinctive of its compiler, too, and no one but he could have so satisfactorily achieved it. Living poets are kittle folk to deal with, and it needed a Paladin of poetic nerve to assemble such a gathering under the dark blue gable. A book like this is creative, it will help to form the texture of the flag which "Victorian Verse" will fly as it drifts down the ages. It shows a remarkable contrast, too, between the Dii Majores, who exhausted all the poetic nutriment of the early period, and the dense cluster of small stars who, unabashed by the proximity of planets, illuminate the later years. In many respects of style and form it must, I think, be conceded that the 'star-matter' of the third generation greatly surpasses that of the first.

A collection which starts with "Rose Aylmer" and "Mine be a Cot," and ends with Ezra Pound and Lascelles Abercrombie, is beyond all things catholic, and catholicity is a supreme quality for such a work. Critics have said that for economy's sake the anthologist should have omitted the great gods altogether. A more ridiculous or parochial suggestion than this it seems to me impossible to conceive. The book is not for connoisseurs of minor poetry but for travellers and men of action, who come from far, or who cannot be bothered with a load of poetry, and want, in a rapid turn, to encounter the best. Sir Arthur has wisely given primacy to the primates, and has not hesitated to give "Crossing the Bar" a page to itself.

One rejoices to find not only "Tears, Idle Tears" but "Bury the Great Duke," the noblest of modern odes. Personally, I could have spared Dizzy's rival lucubration (p. 110), containing the notable line:

"In all thy actions I do find exact propriety."

There seems to me no objection to long poems by the greatest masters (another stock criticism), but the inclusion of long poems by such writers as Mangan and Ferguson seems certainly hazardous on the score of economy. "Eileen Aroon," "Dark Rosaleen," and the "Bells of Shandon" are very well, but there is much—some will assert rudely, far too much—of this tinkling guitar, Christy Minstrel type of ballad melody, recalling the sentimental ecstasies of "Wait for me at Heaven's Gate, Sweet Belle Mahone." Album-verse is pretty, and I am rather susceptible to "Funicoli Funicola," and the "ting-a-ling-a-ling" of banjo verse generally, but whether there is not rather too much of it (No 78, for instance) in the first half of this anthology, is the most serious question one has to propound to the compiler.

It is a sad pity, not attributable in any way to Sir Arthur, one feels sure, that the finest sequence of poems of his generation or mine should be totally unrepresented in this volume, noble as its proportions are. Forbidden fruit, I suppose, and, like all forbidden fruit, subacid, but delicious. One could easily sacrifice a good many of these rhymes about the Bosphorus, relevant though they may seem to the politics of the hours, for

"In summertime on Breydon
The bells they sound so clear;"

for that is somehow the poetry of the native-born. Or, again—

"What thoughts at heart have you and I
We cannot stop to tell;
But dead or living, drunk or dry,
Soldier, I wish you well."

* "The Oxford Book of Victorian Verse." Chosen by Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch. 6s. net. (Clarendon Press.)

Social and other difficulties arise in a compilation of this sort; then there are the impossible loyalties to poems one has ranted in the long ago, and the like. These impede a free choice. Everyone has his idiosyncrasies and taboos—think of Jeffrey, the greatest critic of 1830, when these elegant extracts begin, compiling an anthology of the period 1780-1830! I have made incisive notes without number. Why so much female verse—Christina, Elizabeth Barrett, George Eliot, "Baby's Kiss!" Halleck, etc., etc.—Why? "The North Easter," "Wreck of the Hesperus," "Armada," Swinburne's "Hounds of Spring" chorus, Scawen Blunt's "Chanctonbury Ring," Collins's "Maidenhead Thicket," Trench's "Almond Tree"—Why for no? There is little point in dilating on this inevitable divergence of cupidities, though I hope someone will agree with me that Sir Arthur's selections in Kingsley and Longfellow are the reverse of happy!

But, to be short, it is the selection as a whole with which we are concerned, and of the opulence of that it is really hard to get an idea (imagine the whole of "The Forsaken Merman," "Thyrsis," "The Scholar Gypsy," "Love in the Valley," "Rabbi Ben Ezra," Swinburne's "Hymn to Proserpine," "The Blessed Damozel," together with sonnets hard to come at, such as "Letty," and the best ballads, lyrics and sonnets of Yeats, Belloc, Kipling, Davies, Cory, Newbolt, Lionel Johnson and fifty others!) without turning and tasting every page of this priceless six shillings-worth.

THOMAS SECCOMBE.

A CITY OF GHOSTS.*

I have only one fault to find with Mr. Wilfred Whitten's book: it makes me feel so dreadfully old. For, though I am a younger man than Mr. Whitten, my memories of "A Londoner's London." By Wilfred Whitten. Illustrated by Frank L. Emanuel. 6s. (Methuen)

Bookellers' Row.

From "A Londoner's London," by Wilfred Whitten (Methuen).

London extend further back into the past. He can recall how, in 1886:

"Hampstead Heath was the beginning of the country, as it has now no claim to be the end of the town. Itself a 'garden city,' it is being encircled by jerry-built suburbs and planetary tram-cars. I knew Parliament Hill as a place of hedges and hay-making and trespass-boards. Now it is a park—an open one—but still a park, and the boys who play cricket on it were not born when I walked over its solitudes on moonlight nights, gazing at the far-off silvered dome of St. Paul's."

But I can recall an earlier Parliament Hill than that. I can remember when prize-fights and dog-fights and cock-mains were fought in a certain triangular meadow abutting on the deep cutting of the North London Railway, and sheltered from too familiar observation by thick hedges of wild rose and hawthorn. I can remember when the old wooden bar blocked the entrance to Fleet Road, and when all that region north of Mansfield Road—where now lives a population of a quarter of a million—was a tumbled wilderness of brickly fields, through which the old Fleet River meandered, and where on Sundays labouring men went to snare birds and to course their dogs. I can remember when there were rabbits in the sand-pits beyond the Spaniards Road, and primroses and bluebells were common as dandelions in Highgate Woods. Many other things do I remember which Mr. Whitten came too late to London to see for himself; for he came only just in the nick of time to see anything of that wild rusticity. A year or two later and he would have missed it all. For even at the time of the first Jubilee great changes had taken place in the aspect of these northern heights, and where I had once gone blackberrying as a boy the jerry-builder was beginning to lay waste the land.

Mr. Whitten seems to see London as a city of ghosts. And the thought occurs to me that very likely most men who beheld London for the first time with the eyes of visionary youth do see it in that dreamy half-light: its streets peopled with shades of the great departed, its dim nooks and corners haunted by the spirits of the mighty dead, its misty vistas faintly luminous with the light of other days, its dingy courts and shabby old houses made glorious by quaint or precious, noble or picturesque associations.

In this beautiful, wonderful book of Mr. Whitten's there is not one page that does not reveal some new phase of London to at least one Londoner. I know all the scenes our author describes, but now that I have read his description of them I realise that I have known only their outward seeming, after all, and that their inner meaning has somehow escaped me. Of course there are as many ways of looking at London as there are people to look at it. Moreover, there are so many different Londons, as Mr. Whitten is quick to perceive; for in his preface he says:

"I delay to begin only to explain that the London of these pages is not the measureless town of the guide-books; that London on which a hundred and fifty years ago Horace Walpole began a book, only to faint and fail; that London which, still earlier, had been called a county covered with houses, a description which has passed from metaphor to fact. The Londoner's true London is smaller. It is the sum of his own tracks in the maze, the town in which, by hap, he has most often eaten his bread and thought his thoughts. Samuel Butler remarks in his published note-books that he was more in Fetter Lane than in any other street of London, and that Lincoln's Inn Fields, the British Museum, the Strand, Fleet Street, and the Embankment came next. This is a very small London, to which my own adds the City, the northern suburbs, and those more national regions of Westminster and the Parks which may be called Everyman's. Although the reader's intimacies and my own will not be identical, they will generously overlap. . . . While my limiting clue has been some sort of preference or eager frequenting, I have not tried to exhaust the associations of any street or district, being satisfied to follow those great scribes who, when their subject overflowed, passed on with the useful remark that all the rest is in the book of Jasher, or in the book of Iddo the seer concerning genealogies."

This last is a cryptic saying, but if it means that Mr. Whitten knows as much more about his London as he tells us in this book then I sit dumbfounded, flabbergasted, at the immensity and profundity of his erudition, as I sit enraptured and charmed by the simple beauty of his English.

In a book of this kind it is particularly difficult to keep clear of the Charybdis of mere repetition whilst at the same time avoiding the Scylla of journalness. But Mr. Whitten rises superior to these difficulties. Indeed, he seems to exult in them. One could imagine—if the book were not something vastly better—that it had been written in order to show how such a book may be written by one who knows the right use of words, how to make them march and to sing as they march, how to make them dance and to glow as they dance, how to reflect in their stately cadences the tones and colours of great music and great painting. For, above all things, is Mr. Whitten a supreme literary artist.

Therefore I venture to commiserate with him on the sad bad error in grammar—which is obviously not his fault—on page 30; and, whilst I am in this carping vein, to question whether he is right in saying that Russell Square is the largest square in London. I think Vincent Square is larger.

EDWIN PUGH.

MORE WAR BOOKS.*

As long ago as the South African war it was clear to many people that the day of the war correspondent was over and his sun gone down amid the cloudy crowns of generals. It was even clearer in the Russo-Japanese campaign, and Tripoli was a mere emphasising of the fact. Yet when Bulgaria prepared in October last for her blow against Turkey there were over eighty special correspondents who secured passes at Sofia and submitted themselves to the censorship, besides those who accompanied the Servians, the Montenegrins, the Greeks and the Turks. Among those who took the field in Thrace with the Turks was Mr. Ellis Ashmead-Bartlett, who represented the majesty and volume of the Daily Telegraph, and furnished in his methods and their results a sufficient rejoinder to those who would say that war-corresponding is no more, a trade trodden under in the progress of military science and organisation.

"With the Turks in Thrace" (Heinemann) is the record of his experiences and successes, beginning with the decisive battle of Lule Burgas and ending with certain of the operations before the Chatal'dja lines when the armistice was already imminent. Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett is not one of those men who look upon copious equipment as an obstacle to efficiency. Before leaving Constantinople he had worked out the conditions under which he would have to campaign to the last foreseeable emergency, and in the end he took the field in a manner worthy of Mr. Kipling's Nilghai. He shared with Mr. Donohoe, of the Daily Chronicle, a motor car which cost them £700.

"I had two rides in it," he relates, "and Donohoe two also, and as the price paid for these rides was over £700, they were the most expensive journeys we had ever taken, or ever wish to take."

The car was eventually left at Rodosto, where it disappeared, never to be heard of again; but before it vanished it had made possible the great dispatches in which the story of Lule Burgas was told to the readers of the Chronicle and the Telegraph. Two months' provisions and various horses also went to complete Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett's arrangements, and besides a chauffeur, a dragoman and others, he was accompanied and assisted by his brother, Mr. Seabury Ashmead-Bartlett, whose excellent photographs are a feature of the book.

There will always be a part in warfare for chroniclers of the calibre of Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett. To great energy and a supreme knowledge of the needs and limitations of his newspaper he joins discretion and that honesty which is the first quality of a great correspondent. His story of how the news of Lule Burgas was secured and sent away must ever rank high in the history of war-journalism. To get to the front was not easy: to get back to Constantinople was exceedingly difficult. Thence he had to smuggle himself away by steamer to Constanza, in Roumania, where there was no censorship and he was free to wire unvarnished truth and the whole of it. From midday on a Monday, through Tuesday, and for two further hours on the Wednesday he worked at his typewriter, pouring the sheets as they were finished through the cable to Fleet Street. How many words were there, and what did they cost? He does not say, and when a news cable of such worth is in question it does not matter. He shared with Mr. Donohoe the chief success of the campaign, and his book, in which Mr. Seabury Ashmead-Bartlett has collaborated, is a monument worthy of his labours.

* "With the Turks in Thrace." By Ellis Ashmead-Bartlett. 10s. net. (Heinemann.)
 "A War Photographer in Thrace." By Herbert E. Baldwin. 5s. net. (Unwin.)
 "Letters from the Near East." By Maurice Baring. 3s. 6d. net. (Smith, Elder.)

Mr. H. F. Baldwin represented the Central News as a photographer, and it is natural that his book, "A War Photographer in Thrace" (Fisher Unwin), should be specially excellent in regard to its illustrations. His photographs have the brisk momentary quality which photographs must have if they are to express reality. His "Refugee Women," for example, are not lined up in face of the camera, but trudging wretchedly past through the Thracian mud; and his picture of the retreat from Lule Burgas, which furnishes the book with a frontispiece, is one of the finest war photographs I have seen. A really striking illustration is entitled "Beaten." It shows a Turkish infantryman labouring over an empty road, his rifle slung across his shoulders, his middle-aged, bowed and bewildered face expressing all the weariness and humiliation of defeat. It has that quality of a picture which photographers strive for and so rarely get, and is the more remarkable in a photograph taken and developed under difficulties such as Mr. Baldwin had to contend with.

In "Letters from the Near East" (Smith, Elder & Co.) Mr. Maurice Baring republishes nine articles from the Morning Post and The Times, of which five were written in 1909 and the remaining four in 1912, when the events of the earlier year were bearing their strange but inevitable proof. In a preface he explains that he first visited Constantinople in April, 1909, when the credit of the Young Turks was at its zenith. He came with a blank mind and was snared into enthusiasm over the new regime. It was then that he wrote of the Young Turks: "they are now the only hope of salvation for the country; the only element which deserves the encouragement and support of Europe." From that standpoint he declined along the slope of "a gradual disillusionment." On May 19th he is asking: "How can progress and Islam be combined?" On June 21st he says of certain Young Turk doings that "such acts savour more of despotism than of liberty." His disillusionment, therefore, was not so gradual after all. The four final letters are written in the light of the war, and the last is a vivid picture of the cholera at San Stefano.

PERCEVAL GIBBON.

THE DRAMATIC HOT-GOSPELLER.*

Mr. H. A. Jones' latest jeremiad dealing with the current dramatic situation, quite unconsciously impels me to remember a little essay by Sarcey on "The Decadence of The Theatre." One day the French feuilletonist picked up in the Salle St. Sylvestre a series of brochures, all of which were devoted to this burning subject. They dated respectively, 1768, 1771, 1807, 1828, 1841, 1842, 1847, 1860, 1866, 1871, 1876 and 1880—so that evidently the French drama had been in a healthy state of decay for over one hundred years. The reflection is apropos because the title of the last-named brochure summarises the purpose of the present volume, which is "How to Save the Drama." Mr. Jones may fairly claim to be the only missionary who, for the past sixteen years, has consistently preached the way of salvation to the dramatically moribund. I say so advisedly, because his practice has been otherwise—he is too good a man of business and too expert a dramatic technician to allow his theatrical Quixotism to deprive English and American audiences of his vastly entertaining plays. It is quite by the way that he seems unable to do the fullest justice to the manifestations of modern drama as exhibited, let us say, in the works of Bernard Shaw, John Galsworthy, Granville Barker, John Masefield, and the examples of the Irish Literary Theatre, which surely deserve greater recognition than they get. That omission may, of course, be necessary to the proper conduct of his arguments. Here and there one catches the rhetorical swing of the author who wrote one of the finest soliloquies ever presented on the stage—I refer to the hero's vision in that best of melodramas, "The Silver King"—and here and there, we recapture the rapture of the visionary as exhibited in the author's own masterpiece, "Michael and His Lost Angel." Indeed, the trouble that troubles Mr. Jones seems to be pretty well of the same nature that came to St. Paul (quoted on p. 183) "That which I do, I allow not: for what I would, I do not, but what I hate, that do I."

It is only fair to state that these pages comprise a collection of lectures, essays and speeches written during a period of sixteen years, and that will explain why a good many of the themes dealt with are repeated ad tedum. One of the objections of the author seems to be that none of our present plays possess merit enough to take a permanent place in English literature. I take leave to traverse that statement, and claim that going no further afield than among the work of the authors I have mentioned, we have a fair nucleus for a literary English drama, that is, if it be admitted that a literary drama is one of the essential equipments of a progressive nation. The initial mistake that most dramatic students make is in conceiving that what is really a closet play, or to give it its proper title, a non-commercial play, is necessarily a literary play. The supreme test of a play is public presentation—if a playwright succeeds in representing a given portion of human life to an audience, with all the illusions of truth, then conceivably the author has attained his purpose. The question whether it is literary drama may safely be left to posterity. Molière achieved that standard because he built his observation on the bedrock of human nature and, because the truths he exposed were universally applicable, his drama is literature. Where the literary man so frequently fails is in imagining that the presentation of acute psychology will ever appeal to the theatre crowd, who, precisely because they are a crowd, demand the broad basic human passions.

But what, one may well ask, are the foundation-stones upon which the author will lay his National Theatre? According to Mr. Jones there are nine points to be considered, if we are to have an English drama. We must distinguish and separate our drama from popular amusement. This might just as easily be said of English literature as distinguished from popular reading, so there is little to be looked forward to upon that plea. The second point is that we must institute a national or repertory theatre where high and severe literary and artistic standards must be set. Such a system takes no account of the failure of the Comédie Française as a National Theatre, nor does it make any theatrical provision for the thirty million provincials who presumably must trudge to London if they would be saved dramatically, least of all does it take account of the fact that no amount of recommendation from literary doctors will ever make an audience like a play they dislike. The third point is to insure that the dramatist shall be recognised and rewarded when and in so far as he has painted life and character, and not when he has so far merely tickled and bemused the populace. It is difficult to gauge what the public want, and such a reward might be useful; but if the dramatist is incapable of appealing to the public, is not this a method of raising false hopes and sowing keen disappointments? The fourth aim of the author is to bring our acted drama again into living relation with English literature, and to bring about a general habit of reading plays such as prevails in France. The only method of producing the first result is to produce dramatic literature, an aim which obsesses a good many of our dramatic authors, and which has already borne fruit, judging by the increasing output of printed dramas. A fifth exordium implores us to inform the drama with a broad, sane and profound morality—a purpose with which everyone will immediately agree. The vapid indecencies of popular farce and musical comedy are as much to be deprecated as the present craze for the apotheosis of the crook, as in "Raffles," "Ready Money," "Officer 666," and "Get-Rich-Quick-Wallingford." Exigencies of space do not permit of our dealing at length with the remaining four corner-stones of National Drama, such as adequate training of actors and actresses, the system of long runs, the saving of the artistic play and establishing the Drama as a fine art. Surely there is little need for Mr. Jones to leave it to the grave and solid judgment of England. Already something has been done and is being done towards the foundation of our much-abused Drama. In Manchester, Liverpool, Glasgow, Birmingham and elsewhere, Repertory Theatres have sprung up. To-day, in London, the public refuse to bow any longer at the feet of the Star, and demand instead a play of real human interest, with the result that the actor manager has been driven occasionally, in his despair, to the music-hall stage. As for acting, the standard was never higher than it is at present. And I, for one, refuse to be depressed, Mr. Jones, with so many eager, promising dramatists about and the present rapidly advancing public taste in dramatic art.

* "The Foundations of a National Drama." By Henry Arthur Jones. 7s. 6d. net. (Chapman & Hall.)

ROBB LAWSON.

KNOWLEDGE À LA CARTE.*

For keeping one's humility in repair there is nothing more effective than to run through half a score of the "Cambridge Manuals of Science and Literature." These dainty twelpennyworths of knowledge make one realise the vast range of things one does not know. At first sight it would appear rather a sensible thing to attack the realm of knowledge province by province. But in actual practice the process is found to be somewhat jolting. There are wiser ways of mastering a language than by learning the dictionary. Still only a reviewer is called upon to face the music of the whole sixty volumes of the series, and even he has them mercifully split up into doses of ten at a time. The ordinary reader will, of course, pick and choose. He will use the series as he uses the dictionary: he will select only one or two matters at a time, and will be grateful to discerning editors who arrange knowledge in such a form as to permit of perfect freedom of choice.

The purpose of the series is to supply information on particular subjects from the pens of reliable authorities on those subjects. The books aim at being at once popular and either scientific or scholarly according to the subject. The degree in which they combine the two aims is the measure of their success. They must be so written that the plain man who has no other qualification than a good general education may read them with both interest and profit. In most cases the writers must not expect a special background against which to project their material: they must supply their own background. In certain cases a more or less special previous knowledge may be legitimately assumed. Thus, in the volume on "The Physical Basis of Music" Mr. A. Wood obviously expects to be backed up by a certain knowledge of and interest in music as such. Only readers who satisfy this condition can be reasonably supposed to desire to read the book. The work is mainly mathematical, no doubt, but the treatment has always a clear reference to things that concern music. The unmusical reader should be warned off this volume, just as the musical reader may be confidently recommended to master it.

The same cannot be said for the volume on "Ancient Babylonia." The student who knows enough about this subject to appreciate this book would probably desire something more technical, while the plain man who has only a general interest in the subject will find that the treatment is too technical to have much attraction for him. It is at least doubtful whether it is possible to treat such a subject popularly in a volume of 132 small pages. All that can be given is a summary, and even the learned author of this volume cannot make a summary live. "The Vikings" volume suffers to some extent in the same way, but since the field is narrower, and the matters dealt with are more within the range of the ordinary Englishman's experience, this book has been made much more attractive to the general reader. The same considerations apply to a still greater degree in the case of "The Icelandic Sagas," where Mr. Craigie has been able, without any loss of thoroughness, to present his matter in such a way as to attract as well as to instruct. An excellent subject for the style of treatment adopted in this series is "Ancient Stained and Painted Glass." In this volume Mr. Eden takes nothing for granted at the beginning beyond a knowledge of geography and a familiarity with the general appearance of churches and cathedrals. No doubt as he proceeds he has to assume a knowledge of certain details of architecture, but these details are introduced piecemeal, and are such as can be mastered by a reference to any good dictionary. A reader has no right to object to having to look up the meaning of a few terms: but he has a right to resent in a book an atmosphere so foreign to all his ordinary reading as to make it impossible for him to find his bearings at all.

When we come to the two volumes "The Earth" and "The Atmosphere" we again find an appeal to the plain man with no specialty. Both of these begin at the beginning. No doubt the volume on the Earth, since it concerns itself with its size, shape, weight and spin, has to demand some knowledge of mathematics, but the demand is not exorbitant, and the treatment is quite within the range of the ordinary intelligence. In dealing with the atmosphere Mr. Berry wisely adopts the historical method with the result that the plain man can follow the lines along which his predecessors passed in their pursuit of the knowledge we now possess. The last chapter in this volume is of special interest from the skill with which the present, the past and the future of the atmosphere are correlated.

"The Modern Warship" is treated in a way that tends rather to damp the impression of the man in the street that he could at a pinch take command of the Channel Fleet. Mr. Attwood tells us much that most of us can understand, and puts us right on a great many points on which we thought we knew the truth. The volume that most resembles the old-fashioned type of information book is Mr. T. B. Wood's "The Story of a Loaf of Bread." It recalls a kind of lesson that used to be popular in our elementary schools, and that in competent hands always greatly interested the youngsters. Those who feel attracted by this subject will find themselves excellently treated at the hands of Mr. Wood.

In Dr. Jevons' "Comparative Religion" we have an example of an excellent subject admirably treated from the point of view of this series. He carries his learning lightly, but is able to interest without the slightest loss of solidity. Only very rarely does he dally with philosophical refinements that no plain man can be expected to understand. For the rest he gives such a clear and convincing statement of matters in themselves obscure as cannot fail to win the gratitude of his readers.

JOHN ADAMS.

* "Cambridge Manuals of Science and Literature":—
 "Ancient Babylonia," by C. H. W. Johns; "The Earth," by J. H. Poynting; "The Atmosphere," by A. J. Berry; "Icelandic Sagas," by W. A. Craigie; "Physical Basis of Music," by A. Wood; "The Modern Warship," by E. L. Attwood; "Comparative Religion," by F. B. Jevons; "The Story of a Loaf of Bread," by T. B. Wood; "Ancient Stained and Painted Glass," by F. S. Eden; "The Vikings," by A. Mawer. 1s. net each.

THE WORLD OF LONDON.*

If you want to form an accurate idea of the great changes that have come over London and its people in the last two hundred years or so you should go to the novelists—they have been, and are, London's truest and most fascinating historians. London and the Londoners as you find them in the pages of Dickens, Thackeray, Trollope, Disraeli, are as unlike the London and Londoners that Fanny Burney, Fielding and Defoe knew as they are unlike the London, and the Londoners that live in the pages of H. G. Wells, Arthur Morrison, E. F. Benson, Pett Ridge, Edwin Pugh, and other of the numerous living novelists who find in London's motley world the scenes and characters of their stories. It is not only that sedan chairs, coaches, debtors' prisons, the pillory, public executions, and other such picturesque details have passed away; the topography of the town has altered almost beyond recognition, and the habits, manners, speech, the spiritual and material outlook of the Londoner have undergone such wonderful developments that he is as a new man living in a new London. The great novels of Gissing are the strongest links between Dickens and our own time. Something of the London that Dickens and Trollope knew and much of Gissing's London survives, of course, in the novels of to-day, but only as the superficial likeness of an ancestor may survive in a descendant.

Here are six new stories about London that will bring this home to you, if you are at all familiar with those novelists of the past: they deal mainly with the lives of the middle and lower classes; the only glimpses of upper-class life that are given to you are in Keble Howard's "London Voices," and in Morley Roberts's mingling of fantasy and realism, "Gloomy Fanny." Certain aspects of London's underworld, and of the lives and characters of its clerks, male and female, and its workmen and small shopkeepers, have never been more sympathetically or more faithfully presented than they are by Pett Ridge, and there are tales in "Mixed Grill" that for their humour and pathos and their insight into character will compare with the best of his work. Always his stories are coloured with his own temperament; like Whistler, he shows you London, not as you would see it in a photograph, but as he sees it himself, touches of kindness and humour lending a relief of light and laughter to its dark places, a glamour of romance making its misery and ugliness beautiful. He has never done anything finer than "The Wonderful Start," that compresses a life-history into a few poignant pages of "Mixed Grill" with the vividest and most exquisite art. In Marjory Hardcastle's "Halfpenny Alley" you have eighteen admirably realistic studies of life among the poorest of the poor in South London. Miss Hardcastle worked as a nurse for six years amidst the people she has pictured, and the women, and particularly the children, of her alley are as veritably human creatures as were ever clothed in printed words. They are quaint, they are now and then unpleasant, they are amusing, but they are drawn with such sympathy that even your laughter at their oddities is mingled with a sense of pity that the burdens they bear so cheerfully should be so heavy, the narrow lives in which they contrive to be happy so squalid. Miss Hardcastle's work is of more value to the social reformer than blue-books and statistics are, because it reveals the inner as well as the outer condition of the people, and makes you interested in them, not as economic problems but as human beings.

The same might be said of "Punch and Judy," but Edwin Pugh works on a larger scale and with a more cunning artistry. The critics, I believe, did ample justice to "A Man of Straw," "Tony Drum," and other of his novels, but I doubt if even yet the general public has given him half the recognition that is certainly his due. A Londoner born, he writes of London from an intimate inside acquaintance with it, and if his sombrely powerful stories have hints of bitterness and cynicism in them, there is an abounding kindness, tolerance, charity, and a fund of sparkling humour in them too, a charming understanding of the nature of children, and an almost terribly sensitive feeling for the sadness and pathos underlying the happiness of the very poor. Soho is a natural home of romance, take it how you will, and into this shabby, squalid, glamorous Soho Mr. Pugh takes his hero, Crispin Pix, and settles him in two rooms on the second-floor of a house full of lodgers, there to work and win, if possible, wealth and fame as a composer of music. While Fame delays, Love comes to him there, and Life in various guises, and many adventures. The girl Una, with all her faults, is a fine character very finely drawn; one can realise the fascination she had for such a man as Crispin, and is disposed to regret that she loved him well enough to send him from her to the girl of his own class who loved him and could make his life better, where Una would have ruined it. The foreign element of Soho is reproduced with remarkable skill; the characters having parts in the story are numerous and varied, and each one is sharply defined and has his or her own marked individuality. A good many readers will suspect that the daringly paradoxical author, Bartholomew Dale, genial, shrewd, fantastic, hugely stout, is modelled on a famous living original, and that his conversation should glitter with epigrams and paradoxical utterances of which that original would have no need to be ashamed is one of Mr. Pugh's triumphs.

Only one of the three stories in Morley Roberts's "Gloomy Fanny" is a London story, but that is the one that fills more than half the book to which it gives its name. "Fanny" is a man; he is, moreover, a member of the peerage. A disappointment in love has thrown him into a melancholy, gloomy humour, and certain frivolous friends of his scheme to pique him into a wager that he dare not leave his club with only a shilling in his pocket and live by the work of his hands for one week in Whitechapel. "Fanny" resentfully takes up the challenge, and the resulting story is conceived and written in the lightest, most whimsical spirit of burlesque. The Whitechapel surroundings, the shop in which "Fanny" gets employment and the people he comes in contact with, are thoroughly realistic; but the tale is sheer farce, edged with romance. It is a capital extravaganza, broadly funny and delightfully amusing. "A Little World" is equally entertaining, though it is a slice of real life cut from the suburbs of London. Lime Tree Gardens is a row of small suburban houses, each of which has a high-sounding name instead of a number; it is a typical suburban street, and the people in it are the actors in Arnold Golsworthy's comedy. The pretentious ambitions and small snobberies of the place are revealed minutely, truthfully, with quiet irony and occasionally mordant sarcasm, and the effects of this snobbery on the character of pretty Mary Delland, who was so eager to get into the petty genteel circles that had looked down on her because her father was in trade, are traced unflinchingly, but sympathetically, to a conclusion that would have been entirely disastrous but for the chivalrous love of the crippled author, John Hacker, who brings a breath of idealism into Mary's broken romance and makes an idyllic close possible. Mary's father and mother, a simple, honestly vulgar pair, loving her, and keen on her social advancement, are drawn with no little insight. Everybody who has sojourned in the suburbs will recognize the truth of Mr. Golsworthy's pictures of certain types of suburban resident and the lives they live.

"London Voices" contains eight series of those crisp and airily witty dialogues in the writing of which Keble Howard is always peculiarly happy. He gives you, through this medium of flippant, easy, natural conversation, little sketches of how love is made in high life between Lord Bobby and a girl who is lunching with him at the Ritz; between an average suburban man and girl at Finchley;

* "Mixed Grill." By W. Pett Ridge. 3s. 6d. (Hodder and Stoughton.)

"Halfpenny Alley." By Marjory Hardcastle. 5s. net. (Smith, Elder.)

"Punch and Judy." By Edwin Pugh. 6s. (Chapman and Hall.)

"Gloomy Fanny." By Morley Roberts. 6s. (Eveleigh Nash.)

"A Little World." By Arnold Golsworthy. 6s. (George Allen.)

"London Voices." By Keble Howard. 6s. (Chapman and Hall.)

and a low-life Cockney and his "donah" in the East-End; between the same classes of lovers in a taxi, in a railway train, and on a bus. In like manner he presents you with all sorts and conditions of Londoners talking together under every variety of circumstance—about business, pleasure, domestic or public affairs, passing opinions on the hundred and one little current problems, incidents, events, ideas and experiences that make up the everyday lives of most of us. Here and there are touches of a pathos that is more suggested than spoken, and whose effect lies in its delicate elusiveness; but the keynote of the dialogues is humour—a gay, whimsical, irresistible humour—that is half cynical at times and at times wilfully irresponsible, but invariably good-humoured and delightfully entertaining. Moreover, there is a deeper knowledge of life and of human character behind Mr. Howard's light flippancies than you shall find in most work that makes serious pretence to those qualities. It is a brilliantly clever book, whose laughter, like Touchstone's, has a world of meaning in it.

D. F. R.

* A TALE OF TWO INTERESTS.*

Considering the opportunities that actors have for giving us the sharp and vivid reflex of the lighter aspects of our age, it is singular how slender is the dramatic contribution to our shelves of memoirs, much less of permanent biography and history. Success in the higher walks of the stage connotes possession of certain obvious gifts of observation and presentiment that ought to be of the highest service in descriptive literature; and the acting profession shows in a thousand ways how steady a touch it keeps upon the pulse of society. Few men have had a closer association with many interests at once than Mr. Weedon Grossmith, and it is small wonder, therefore, that his recollections are well above the dramatic average.

* "From Studio to Stage." By Weedon Grossmith. 16s. net. (John Lane.)

His father was a well-known writer for the Press, his brother was a shining light at the Savoy and on the monologue platform, and our author himself has a marked proficiency with the brush. We get examples in this book of his powers of portraiture, and they compare well with Mr. Forbes Robertson's more famous paintings of Phelps and old Lyceum triumphs. These popular painter-players have another bond in common; they both came into fame as colleagues of Henry Irving, and many of the best of Mr. Grossmith's stories hang upon the great man's eccentricities. The chief of these anecdotes, however, show that he shrank from the criticism of mimicry, and when Mr. Grossmith caricatured Irving on his own stage, he earned a curt rebuke. It might have led to rupture if tact had not come to the rescue, and Mr. Grossmith had not put the rehearsal in the way of success. The success was that of "Robert Macaire," and since that rattling play made the Lyceum rafters ring, Mr. Grossmith has filled many parts. But the higher he mounted in popular favour as a character artist, the less material he seems to have found for giving character to this work. It is a tribute to the heyday of the old Lyceum, set in a framework of recollections of the double interest conveyed in the title. Here it rarely rises above the level of a "conversation" book, and while it gives us capital chapters on the Savage Club and other institutions, it hardly does justice to Mr. Grossmith's own sterling and salient individuality.

PROBLEMS OF IMPERIALISM.*

Of all the volumes in the All Red series this must have been by far the most difficult (as it was also, probably, the most interesting) to write. Sir Bampfylde Fuller's qualifications for the task which he has so ably carried out will be familiar to most people, and if, here and there, one seems to detect traces of the retired Indian Civilian, these traces are but few in number, and the book is written in a broad, generous and liberal spirit which goes far, in itself, towards explaining the general success of our administration in the Indian Empire. The range of subjects covered is extraordinarily wide. Part I., dealing with the country, gives a good survey of its physical aspects, of its natural history, of that agriculture which is the very life-blood of the Indian peoples, of the famines which periodically devastate the country and of the measures taken to combat them, as well as an account of Indian manufactures and commerce. To the general reader the Second Part, which describes the people, will undoubtedly be the more interesting. One does not readily tire of reading about the many races and castes by which the people as a whole are so sharply divided, of their manner of life, of their religious beliefs and observations and of the effect upon them of English education. To this vitally important question of education Sir Bampfylde Fuller pays considerable attention, and references to it are to be found in many places outside the excellent chapter specifically allotted to it. Nothing better shows how much remains to be done than his words: "When we come to enquire how far the new learning has generally modified Indian

Photo by Hoffmann, Calcutta.

Street Scene, Delhi, with view of the great Mosque.

From "The Empire of India" (Pitman).

* "The Empire of India." By Sir Bampfylde Fuller. 7s. 6d. net. (Pitman & Sons.)

views or conduct, we are surprised to find how small has been the change, compared with that which Western knowledge has brought about in Japan within the space of a generation, or has effected within the small Parsi community." Sir Bampfylde Fuller, however, appears to derive some hope from the recognition by the Government of the dangers of the grant-in-aid policy and from its determination to accept a larger responsibility in future for the direct provision of education in institutions of its own, and he points to the growing opinion that Universities should be more numerous, smaller in size, and concerned with teaching as well as with examining; that a higher standard should be set to provide institutions by the maintenance by Government of more colleges and schools; and that the habits of good conduct should be more effectually instilled by the students being removed from outside influences and being lodged under supervision in hostels or boarding-houses. The two concluding parts of the book are devoted to "The Government" and to "Future Prospects" respectively. The latter, in particular, is worth careful consideration, and, if his statement that the British rule "may, without exaggeration, be described as unpopular," his forecast of what would happen in India if that rule were withdrawn should spur on all those who are in any way actively concerned to even greater efforts than they have made in the past.

"STELLA MARIS."*

We all love fairy tales, provided they are adapted to our years. Whether it is more difficult to write them for a youthful or for a sophisticated audience is an arguable point. At any rate, the old are less easy to please, for they want to be made to forget their knowledge of life and yet to feel that they are not entirely out of touch with its grimmer realities. Fairy princes, sleeping beauties, witches with malevolent designs must adopt the masquerade of every day costume before they can win the suffrages of age. But in the guise of modern Quixotes, who love unselfishly, and child-women innocent of guile or reckless in devotion, heroes and heroines may still prove acceptable, especially if crime fills the rôle of bad fairy. Fantasy and sentiment can be as potent dealers in magic as youth's make-believe; chivalry can lead to as strange adventures as any enchanted robe, the ugly features of civilisation can be as effective a background for romance as any giant's castle that ever set the hair of a youngster on end with delighted terror. It is Mr. W. J. Locke's happy gift to be able to invent fairy tales which fascinate the grown-up reader. Graces of style, the adornments of scholarship, an allusiveness eloquent of wide acquaintance with the arts and good literature, irony which betrays the experienced and critical observer are, in this novelist's case, combined with a view of life that is consistently poetical. His eyes are fastened on the heroic aspects of humanity and refuse to allow more than a subordinate place to its views. His men are quixotic alike in love and friendship. Sentiment sways their actions and determines their resolves. Says one of the rival heroes of his newest story, "This affectation of despising sentiment makes me sick," and he sings loudly the virtues and the achievements of the condemned thing.

Walter Herold lives up to his profession of faith and, for the matter of that, so does John Risca, the journalist friend whom he rebukes. Both men let their lives be shaped by a little bed-ridden girl to whom they pay fervent homage. A David and a Jonathan such as they are, rivals in love and service to their invalid lady, and rivals also in all the generousities of friendship, would of themselves lend a romantic tenderness to the novel in which they figure. But the goddess of their cult, the titular character of "Stella Maris" is an even more attractive creation. Condemned throughout her girlhood to lie on her back watching sea and weather from her room, which has a Channel prospect, Stella Blount rules her tiny court with a sweetness of temper never marred by complaints of her imprisonment, and seemingly incurable state, and responds instinctively to her atmosphere of affection. In her we have a veritable fairy princess, indeed, a sleeping beauty, for, doomed as she appears to be to lifelong exile from the life of actuality, John Risca and her housemates have encouraged her to believe that all the virtues reign triumphant over earth, and that sin is an anachronism. Hence the tragedy of her recovery. Mr. Locke, by the way, rather strains our willingness to be credulous when he asks us to suppose that a victim of spinal disease, such as is Stella, would, thanks to the sea-breezes which blow in through her windows, develop her so that she is as normal in physique as other women, and much more lovely and prettily shaped than most when she is cured. But his story would not be a fairy tale if she were fretful or deformed, or if John and Walter, the actor and the journalist, did not both fall captives of her beauty. As a princess, it is not wonderful that she grants her love almost unasked, and bestows it on that sturdy fighter against odds, John Risca, whom she has endowed with the title of "Lord High Belovedest." But Risca has a vulgar wife from whom he had parted long before she shames him by being concerned in a cruelty charge. The woman has maltreated a little orphan, Unity Blake, and when she is sent to prison, Risca, like more than one of Mr. Locke's heroes, takes on the duties of a guardian and adopts the child as his ward. His wife it is who puts the finishing touch to Stella Maris's disillusionments with the world. Stella has already made woeful discoveries as to the amount of sorrow and wrongdoing that prevail outside her paradise; but when this convict woman claims John as her husband and weaves a tissue of lies round him and his ward, her whole universe seems to come down with a crash. Nay, more, she is caught into a very riot of melodrama, and only after she has had time to forget scenes of murder and suicide is her faith in her kind restored. Then it is to the "Lord High Favourite," Walter Herold, her lifelong confidant, and the one man who can enter into her whimsies, that she gives her heart. Her change of allegiance is dexterously managed, and the novelist contrives to divide our affections pretty impartially between her suitors, both of them impulsive idealists, but differentiated with the nicest art. Unity, too, who tries to cut the knot of her guardian's troubles, is picturesquely if melodramatically conceived. But Stella's portrait is the triumph of the novel. It is an ideal or idealised portrait, but Mr. Locke has lavished upon it all the wealth of his charming fancy.

F. G. BETJANY.

THE SPIRIT OF CHRISTMAS.*

Of late years a good many writers have tried their hands at the Carol, not always with success. It is as difficult to recapture the heavenly simplicity of the ages of faith as it is to catch the spirit of one of the early Italian painters. Here is a poet who has succeeded. There is a beautiful simplicity, an adoring awe, in these little poems that make the book as precious as it is small. Purity, reverence, intimacy, join to make "Agnus Dei" a holy thing among the masses of books that come tumbling from the printing-presses. One sees the young mortal mother moving through these delights with veiled hair and hidden eyes, worshipping through her own baby the little Baby of Bethlehem. There is no naïveté here, no forced note of innocence, for there is perfect innocence. The great things of this world are often debased by the low-minded and the fool. In one of these exquisite things a poor woman meets a stranger on the road, who is the Angel Gabriel. He hails her as "Great Queen!" and she answers humbly that she is a poor woman. He tells her:

"Do you not know
That all who carry what you bear
Like great queens go,
So proudly moving to and fro?
And from where
I come they mark the burden well,
And say, 'Look there!
Mary to Bethlehem doth fare.'"

* "Stella Maris." By William J. Locke. 6s. (John Lane.)

"Agnus Dei." By Nancy Campbell. 6d. (Maunsell.)

In another poem the son of Cytherea and the Son of Mary meet.

"I lie among soft roses all the day Or with my mother's milk-white doves I play," says the small Eros; and the little Jesus:

"Their thorns are sharp and heavy round my head, White souls like birds come to me to be fed."

Again, Mary and Joseph talk on the road to Bethlehem. Mary says:

"Already is the angelic crowd
Awakening in the sky,
But still on nothing fine and proud
God's Son and mine shall lie.
And though he comes a-conquering,
Salvation to impart,
First he will be a little thing
That cries upon my heart"

It was Coventry Patmore who talked of:

"... the simple female sort
Apt to see Him in husband and in son."

Through her own little son this youngest of the poets has seen Heaven and worshipped in the Stable.

KATHARINE TYNAN.

Novel Notes.

NEVERTHELESS. By Isabel Smith. 6s. (Alston Rivers.)

This is an ably written novel with a very natural present-day heroine and a problem of more than passing interest. It depicts a woman torn between conventional promptings and natural inclinations, between the call of conscience wife in a mad-house beyond all hope of recovery. The law allows no escape for the young husband. "Here am I, a comparatively young man, with my life before me as you may say, and yet unless I go without the law, I am doomed to perpetual celibacy. Is that right or natural?" Sara agrees that the law is unjust, and the inevitable temptation follows. At first she shrinks from putting herself "beyond the pale," and clings desperately to convention; then she decides to yield. The powerful scene in which she offers herself to Hiram at the moment when, unknown to her, he has just heard of his wife's death, is an effective piece of work. "Nevertheless" contains a number of interesting minor characters, ranging from a conventionally smug and conventionally religious matron at one pole to a platform champion of woman's rights at the other.

GROWING PAINS. By Ivy Low. 6s. (Heinemann.)

While it is to be hoped that Gertrude is not a normal English girl, there can be little doubt that she is fairly representative of her type. The trouble with her was that when once she had left school there was nothing whatever for her to do. Hyper-sensitive and unpractical as she is, she does not get into serious difficulties. The book ends, in fact, about as happily as it could; but one cannot describe it as a cheerful novel, for Gertrude is unhealthy and unattractive (fascinating though she may have been in the flesh). Miss Low, who is blessed with a keen sense of humour and a power of maliciously amusing narrative which is decidedly fascinating, has, indeed, been almost too frank and too outspoken. Nobody can possibly like Gertrude, though most people will be grateful for this extraordinarily clever account of her girlhood. The only thing that bothers us is that we are uncertain whether or not to regard the book as a warning.

WILLIE IN THE ISLE OF MAN. By Arthur Fetterless. 6s. (Blackwood.)

Mr. Fetterless announces on the title page of his novel that the book is a summer tale, and if this be meant to convey that it is lightly and easily read we find ourselves in hearty agreement, but it possesses this excellent difference from most fiction written in an easy style, as it also supplies much food for thought. The scene runs on ordinary lines, merely consisting of the description of a young and inconsequent Scotchman, who spends a holiday in the Isle of Man and does all the things which one expects a member of the "purple-socked-brigade" to do: drinks a little; plays a little; and flirts a great deal. The gist of the story, of course, leads us through the great flirtation which ends his bachelor days, but it is all naturally told—no harrowing situations—no heroic or sentimental speeches—just commonplace episodes and the idle irresponsible chatter of youth. This makes up the charm of "Willie in the Isle of Man," in which is much that is exceptionally funny and many a laugh will the reader enjoy; yet behind all he will feel that Mr. Fetterless is recounting incidents from real life and not merely chronicling the imaginings of a clever brain. Smith, the funny man of the tale, is a delightful character and his final conversion to matrimony makes a delicious epilogue to a spirited and vivacious story.

TREMENDAX. An Optimistic Record. By Necrede Malo. 5s. net. (Herbert & Daniel.)

Here is an author who hates pathos and says so. "Blessed be the man who invented jokes," he exclaims with fervour, and sets himself to the task of writing a cheerful book. Into the pages of "Tremendax" he has filtered the sunny anecdotes, random jottings, impressions and observations of an adventurous life in all quarters of the globe. Spurning the fetish of "continuity of story," he chats leisurely on any topic which happens to spring to the surface, be it a London cheap-jack or a Barcelona and the call of love. Sara Gale, poor and past her first youth, encounters the great adventure of love. But her new-found joy receives a rude blow when she learns that her lover, Hiram Martel, is a married man with a young bullfight. Whatever the subject, he invariably has something to say, and say it he will. The book abounds in humorous anecdotes gleaned from the smoking-room, ashore and afloat, and from the author's own experience, and contains in addition a storehouse of informative gossip and downright opinions on debatable subjects. Thus, the reader may pass on from some provocative views on education and "the lower orders" to a detailed recipe for haggis (introduced à propos of a Court of Admiralty yarn) or to some remarks on the theory of aviation (suggested by the author's first glimpse of a flying fish from the deck of the brigantine on which he ran away to sea). A volume as companionable and versatile as "Tremendax" is just the thing for a man in search of a sociable evening.

Photo by Gubell.

Mrs. Isabel Smith.

DAPHNE IN PARIS. By the Author of "Daphne in the Fatherland." 6s. (Melrose)

Work like this calls for the immortal remark of a certain nurse at St. Bartholomew's that "there is no sich person." For Daphne is simply the author's mouthpiece for venting a knowledge of Paris and its less noxious gaieties, together with all those lights and aspects and impressions which the gayest of capitals touches off in a susceptible and highly modern feminine mind. Daphne finds an excellent companion in Betty, a kindred spirit; and a still better destination on the tolerant and manly bosom of Hugh, the appropriate fate that awaits her after a flirtation with her French adorer, Achille, and her persecution by a duke. It is all very volatile and good-humoured and conversational, but all rather obvious as well, and we hardly see how we are to face another volume of Daphne in Egypt unless Daphne is married, and Daphne in a matrimonial aspect will seem amazingly like someone else. But as "there is no sich person" in any case, perhaps this hardly matters.

THE TEMPTATION OF TAVERNAKE. By E. Phillips Oppenheim. (Hodder & Stoughton)

Unlike most of the many alluring characters in Mr. Oppenheim's masterly new novel, there is no mystery about Leonard Tavernake. A clerk in an estate agent's office, he is a stolid, matter-of-fact young man whose one ambition is to make more and more money, not so much for the love of money itself, but for the power that goes with it. Consequently, when he takes upon himself the blame of a boarding-house theft in order to shield a shabbily dressed American girl, and further goes out of his way to rescue the same girl from a suicide's grave and to provide a home for her, it is only natural that Tavernake, who does not count benevolence among his good qualities, should be somewhat at a loss to explain his actions. "Your sex," he insists, "has nothing to do with it. As to your appearance, I have not even considered it. I could not tell you whether you are beautiful or ugly. . . . What I have done, I have done because it pleased me to do it." Whatever his motive may have been, Tavernake soon realises that he has placed himself on the threshold of a great mystery connected with his protégée's unscrupulous and amazingly beautiful sister, whose wealthy libertine of a husband has suddenly disappeared. The story is adroitly constructed, and the situations develop with hypnotic rapidity. The reader will find Mr. Oppenheim at his very best in "The Temptation of Tavernake."

THE ARNOLD LIP. By C. E. Lawrence. 6s. (Murray.)

Mr. C. E. Lawrence calls it a sort of a comedy: it strikes one as a philosophical farce with a good deal of sound sense behind the bustling amusement. In the drawing of the characters especially there is just that touch of exaggeration which makes for fun: it is a jolly book suggestive of thought. The Arnolds are a suburban pillar of the state, and the father, a man of pompous ability, has a peculiar sort of lip which his children inherit. They are prouder of this family trait than are probably the Hapsburgs of a similar characteristic feature. It makes them look interesting and distinctive, and above all it is the symbol of their worldly success. The fact is the Arnolds are a type of the successful family of the upper middle class. They have, as the Americans say, the art of getting there on both feet. Unhappily the eldest boy, Hugh, lacks the Arnold lip and the spiritual qualities of which it is the outward sign. He does not care for the comforts of life with which he is wrapped up; he wants elbow room and a taste of hardship by way of a change. In particular the atmosphere of ready-made success, in which he and his sister and brother are brought up, stifles him. He is the bad boy of the family, and comes to the worst of ends. An appearance in the Divorce Court or in the dock at the Old Bailey might perhaps have gradually been overlooked. But Hugh does the one unforgivable thing: he mixes with Radicals and Socialists, and begins to practise social reform by adopting an unfortunate hussy's neglected baby. All this is told in a very lively and humorous way. The scenes at the family gatherings at which Hugh's mad, scandalous conduct is discussed are joyfully satirical. Some of the figures are, it is true, caricatures; but there is a lifelikeness still about them that makes the story an actual as well as an amusing thing. It is a serious study of life done in a light, witty manner. Hugh revolts from the standard of the Arnolds just in time to save himself from moral disaster. His father and mother are killing him with kindness. In their desire to smooth and embellish his path, they are sheltering him from all that makes a young man's life interesting and real. When Hugh is disinherited by his angry father and left to fend for himself, he shows that the absence of the Arnold lip in his case does not signify that he cannot make his way in the world. At the close of the story, he is indeed able to come to the help of his family. The fact is that his parents—like many successful persons of the upper middle classes—cannot see that their wealth and position oblige them to alter the training of their children, instead of trying to extend to them through manhood the loving care lavished on them in childhood, for this merely deadens their sense of responsibility and hinders the development of their powers.

Photo by E. O. Hoppe

Mr. C. E. Lawrence.

A NECESSITY OF LIFE; And Other Stories. By Betty van der Goes. 6s. (Macmillan)

One of these twelve stories describes the superstitious terror which came over a French Revolutionist who found himself alone one night in a desecrated church. But this does not show the authoress at her best. It is in the eleven other stories, describing phases of love between men and women before or after marriage, that her undoubted skill is seen. She has a crisp, near touch, rather a knack of dialogue, and some insight into feminine character. The stories with a dry note of humour are perhaps the happiest in the volume, particularly "Clever Theodora," which is a decidedly clever sketch of a man and two girls on a Sunday afternoon. The authoress has caught the French trick of ending a story with a sort of flick, and this suits her treatment of these light situations. But in a story like "A Man of Business" she proves that she can probe more deeply into character. There are also one or two tales of pathos, delicately managed, like "The Past is Past." Irony is one of the assets of the writer of short stories; it is safer than pathos, which is apt to run over even in careful hands. This again the authoress has used to some purpose, and, as in the story which gives the title to the volume, irony and humour hold pathos in a strong solution. Altogether, this is a book with variety enough to interest most readers, even those who have a stubborn objection to short stories. Miss van der Goes knows her craft evidently, and there is a literary quality about her stories which lifts them above the ordinary magazine tale. At least five of these twelve stories are enough to float the others.

LADY OF THE NIGHT. By Benjamin Swift 6s. (Eveleigh Nash)

An amusing couple of hours can be spent in the reading of this fantastic trifle. Vivian Darsay, a young man of great physical beauty and financial prospects, has been hit on the temple by a cricket ball, and the blow has caused temporary aphasia coupled with the inability to express himself in writing and to understand written, printed and spoken language. The situation is peculiarly distressing, because his mother and Lady Mawkes have virtually arranged an engagement between him and Evelina Mawkes, and the wretched youth is struggling to explain that he has no love for Evelina. The requisite emotion which restores his lost faculties is provided by the arrival in England of Ysmyn Veltry, whom he had met some years previously in France. Ysmyn is the daughter of a famous French parfumeur, who is induced to open the Maison Merveille in Bond Street, and complications arise because Evelina, who has been taken by her mother to undergo a thorough course at that Palace of Vanity, has her hair burnt off just at the moment when Vivian is able to announce to her that he does not love her. However, he has enough strength of character to marry the woman he wants, and so the tale ends happily enough. The most amusing passages in the book are those which describe the Maison Merveille. The pseudo scientific jargon with which the principal assistants in that establishment bewilder their clients is, we dare say, not greatly exaggerated, but it appears very unlikely that such charlatans would ever be allowed actually to practise their inexpert hands upon patients and to cause such damage as was done to the unfortunate Evelina. Mr. Swift has, in fact, been too lavish with his imagination. The course of the story is not materially affected by the burglarious part of the assistants aforesaid, and their attempts at smart and epigrammatic conversation are frankly exasperating.

SANNA OF THE ISLAND TOWN. By Mary E. Waller. 6s. (Melrose.)

"It's plain sailin' for her just as long as she ain't in love—but you mark my words, 'Ivvie Landers, there'll be rocks an' rips an' shoals a-plenty to steer clear of if ever she does fall in." Aunt Ploomie's forecast proves correct. The love story of Susanna Oceana Landers, one of the most captivating and cleverly-drawn of Miss Waller's delightful heroines, is strewn with "rocks an' rips an' shoals." Sea-born, she lives on the sea-girt Island of Dukes and with her mother, grandmother, and great-aunt Ploomie occupies a small grey shingled cottage in a lane running down to the shore. Sanna, as her friends on the Island call her, is puzzled by the attention of no less than three aspirants for her hand. One of them is of lowly birth, a playmate of her childhood, and now the sturdy young keeper of the Great Cocheeset Light; another is high born, belonging to the oldest family on the Island; the third, Peter Franham, comes a stranger to the Island, and the mystery veiling his parentage provides the pivot of the story. "Sanna of the Island Town" is emphatically a fine novel; it contains, as do all Miss Waller's books, a host of lovable characters, each with a hidden patch of sentiment which peeps out sooner or later in the course of the story, and the workmanship throughout is distinctive and thorough. In a word, this novel is a worthy and brilliant companion to the author's "Flamsted Quarries," and "The Wood-carver of 'Lympos."

The Bookman's Table.

A LITTLE BOOK OF COURAGE. Compiled by Annie Matheson. 2s. 6d. net. (Gay & Hancock)

Miss Matheson has compiled with great skill and nicest judgment a little book that should be sure of a wide welcome. She has aimed at supplying a kind of breviary or armoury of high and heartening thoughts for the lonely, the troubled, the sad, for any who in some hour of disappointment, depression or self-distrust may feel the need of strong and uplifting words of counsel and cheer; and she has fulfilled her aim most admirably. She has selected her poems and poetical and prose passages from a very wide variety of authors, ancient and modern. Her book, as she says, "is not meant to be read on end, nor to include only what is most perfect and unquestioned as literature. On the contrary, it contains names at which 'the superior person' will lift an eyebrow, and more than hint, perhaps, that their mere proximity is desecration to the classics of all ages with whom here they mingle." Well, even if we were half-tempted to raise an eyebrow at one, or possibly two, of her latter-day authors, we should thank her heartily for including so fine a poem as "The Jewish Soldier," by Alice Lucas, and we see without the smallest qualm that an extract from Epictetus immediately follows it, for of the two items we would sooner have written the poem. Miss Matheson has rightly drawn sparingly on the Bible and other familiar sources, and so has made room for inspiring and beautiful things from lesser-known writings. Vaughan, Traherne, Pater, Landor, Quarles, Robert Bridges, Whitman, William Watson, Tennyson, Browning, Bunyan, Keats, Shelley, Arnold, Carlyle—these and many another she has laid under contribution, to say nothing of certain thoughtful verses, initialled "A.M.," that are charming enough to grace any anthology. The book is tastefully produced, and the contents are conveniently and lucidly classified in an index at the end.

LOEB CLASSICAL LIBRARY. Edited by T. E. Page and W. H. D. Rouse. 5s. net each volume. (Heinemann.)

The five new volumes in the Loeb Library are the third and fourth instalments of "Euripides," the second of "Appian," the first of "Lucian," and the whole of "Catullus" and "Tibullus" printed with the "Pervigilium Veneris." Dr. Way's translations of "Euripides" are already well known. For this series they have been revised, for "closer fidelity to the original and a greater lucidity in expression." Dr. Way is not a poet, nor has he almost made himself one, like Professor Murray, by translating Euripides. A prose rendering like Mr. Ernest Myers' from Pindar, or Professor Kuno Meyer's from the ancient Irish poets, would perhaps have been more difficult, but certainly more pleasant to those who like poetry but not verse. Dr. Way's translation is very careful, and few could have kept so near to the original words in an equal number of lines; but lovers of poetry cannot enjoy it, while the rest can only be confirmed in their condition by tolerance of what is so far astray. Mr. Cornish's "Catullus" was first published in 1904. The text has been revised, and Dr. Rouse has paraphrased a number of poems, which apparently Mr. Cornish preferred to leave alone. There are still some passages omitted in text and translation. The English is very good, poetical neither in vocabulary nor in rhythm, yet clearly indicating poetry. The same may be said of Professor Postgate's "Tibullus," which, however, is now for the first time published. Dr. Mackail's "Pervigilium Veneris" is also new and in prose. It is not equal to the others. The refrain, for example, is rendered by "To-morrow shall be love for the loveless, and for the lover to-morrow shall be love." It is not literal, yet is at best as far from poetry as a crib. Elsewhere terms like "wedlock-band," "make accord," "flowerage," and "bridegroom-shower," point to a poetic intention which is unfulfilled. Mr. Hermon's "Lucian" is on the whole easy, idiomatic, possible to read continuously with pleasure to anyone who does not object to a phrase like: "Alcidamas stayed right there." The version is new; nor can we forget that Messrs. Fowler's version for the Clarendon Press is only a few years old and can stand a rival. Dr. White's "Appian" is new, and also thoroughly readable. Here and there perfection might be served by reconsidering such a phrase as "At this juncture," where the Greek uses three letters instead of three words, but the Illyrian, Syrian and Mithridatic wars are matters that will perhaps drown such considerations. Each volume is about five hundred pages in length, and, as usual, the text and translation are on opposite pages.

THE WOMAN MOVEMENT. By Ellen Key. 6s. (Putnam.)

Whatever views we may have on the Woman Movement, there is no denying that it is one of the most significant and most momentous developments of our times. It is not a new movement, but it has entered on a new phase, and it is mainly with that new phase of it that Ellen Key deals thoughtfully and with remarkable ability in this important volume. She is unable to see, as Mr. Havelock Ellis puts it in his Introduction, "why a woman's hands need be more soiled by a ballot paper than by a cooking recipe. But she is far indeed from the well-intentioned but ignorant fanatics who fancy that a vote is the alpha and omega of Feminism; and still less is she in sympathy with those who consider that its importance is so supreme as to justify violence and robbery, a sort of sex war on mankind generally and the casting in the mud of all those things which it has been the gradual task of civilization to achieve, not for men only, but for women." The power of the book lies not in any charm of literary style, but in the breadth and reasonableness of its outlook, in its sound, logical common-sense argument. Ellen Key sees that what women need is increased opportunities of self-development; that "domesticity leaves many wishes unfulfilled," and that woman must have a life outside the home as well as within it, that one way or another she is bound to realise her righteous claim to share actively in shaping the destinies of the nation whose children she has borne. The claims of Feminism are fully and clearly set forth in Ellen Key's pages; those that are extravagant she dismisses forcibly, but those that are just and righteous she justifies vigorously and convincingly. This is the fairest, most judicial statement of the case for Women that we have yet read, and we strongly recommend the book alike to supporters of the movement and to its opponents.

SIR KENELM DIGBY AND GEORGE DIGBY, EARL OF BRISTOL. By H. M. Digby. 7s. 6d. net. (Digby, Long.)

From the great interest Mr. H. M. Digby takes in tracing the descent of the two brilliant men of the seventeenth century whose lives he relates, it seems as though he too belongs to the famous Digby family. But, in spite of the fame they won, neither Sir Kenelm nor Lord Digby are

Sir Kenelm Digby.

From "Sir Kenelm Digby and George Digby, Earl of Bristol" (Digby, Long).

ancestors that a man can be very proud of. They were cousins, tall, handsome, and admirable swordsmen, but neither was remarkable for moral courage. Sir Kenelm is the better known, for he handled a pen with the same bravura as he used a rapier, and he has celebrated his own virtues in his books. There were some of the merits of the Elizabethan gentlemen adventurers about him; but he was born somewhat late for the rôle, and he acted it rather than lived it. He certainly did not play the part of the perfect knight when, after the execution of King Charles, he submitted to Cromwell because he was weary of starving in exile in France. His kinsman, Lord Digby, a turncoat from the Parliamentary party, and the most mischievous of King Charles's advisers, managed to get a good living while exiled on the Continent. He was not a thrifty man, even in misfortune: a fierce, extravagant gambler and a man of vehement gallantry, he was constantly in need of large sums of money. And the amazing thing is that he usually got the money he wanted. Sometimes it was the French, sometimes it was the Spaniards upon whose treasury he made a subtle and sudden assault. He could capture a town for them, or conduct some political intrigue on their behalf. Selfishness was ever his sole motive in life, and he was one of those men who thirst for power without being able to use it in a masterly way. So his personal successes were disasters for his king and country. Mr. Digby describes him in a fresh and vivid way, neither hiding his faults nor exaggerating his merits. Both the great Digbys stand out as highly picturesque figures in an age that was not wanting in picturesqueness. They had that grand thing—personality.

LACORDAIRE. By Count d'Haussonville. Translated by A. W. Evans. 3s. 6d. net. (Herbert & Daniel)

In adding another to our monographs on the greatest of modern preachers, the Count d'Haussonville writes in the filial spirit of a co-religionist and a colleague (across half a century) in the French Academy. The book is the product of that spirit of renovation inside the Roman community which is always wrestling with authority, and at a time when Newman is being so freely discussed over here it was inevitable that the liberal spirits in the orthodox French laity should give the same honour to Lacordaire which they have lately been giving to Montalembert and Chateaubriand. Lacordaire suffered the same ingratitude and repression from his official superiors which baffled Newman and his reforms, and though he had not a great and dramatic conversion to make him a romantic figure, he renounced with an equal picturesqueness his last worldly ambition when he took the cowl of a Dominican friar. This act was well in keeping with a man who constituted himself the antagonist of Erastianism, and though Lacordaire would have welcomed the repeal of the concordat, had he been living to-day, what thunders of eloquence we should have had from him over the recent dissolution of the religious associations!

The Count presents to us not merely a modern Athanasius, but a very human figure, with a true gift for friendship. We already have nine volumes of Lacordaire's correspondence with Mme. Swetchine and the Comtesse du Pin, and now the Count promises us shortly another windfall of epistolary piety and exhortation in the shape of the letters he wrote to Mme de B. All we can say is that we shall welcome them. No Christian can be proof against the appeal of the man who could write like this to cheer and admonish a decrepit old woman:

"It is remarkable in the lives of the saints, that almost all have felt that melancholy of which the ancients said that there was no genius without it. In truth, melancholy is inseparable from every far-reaching mind and from every heart that has depths. This is not to say that we ought to take pleasure in melancholy, for it is a malady that enervates us when we do not throw it off, and it has only two remedies—Death or God."

On the whole, Mr. Evans has given us the ease and temper of the original in a smooth and excellent translation, but we suspect words like "confession" for "confessional" on p. 41, "in its own designs" (p. 22) as meaning "for its own purposes," "frock" for "habit," and so on. In the imitation of St. Paul, on p. 88, it would have been well to use the accepted English "So am I . . . So am I . . . I am more," rather than a translation of the weak French version. One other point. The passage on contempt, which on p. 114 is attributed to the Psalmist, occurs of course in Proverbs xviii. 3; and though the slip may be due to the original French, and we have no copy by us at the moment, the translator might have put us on our guard. These are but suggestions for another edition, and other editions there are sure to be, for the work is an excellent performance, scholarly, discreet, and absorbing.

Notes on New Books.

MESSRS. HEATH, CRANTON & OUSELEY.

If a man settles down to tell his reminiscences, he can generally, if he has travelled and kept his eyes open, prove himself interesting to those who have done the same. Mr. Percy L. Nash has travelled, has hunted, has golfed, has motored; and in his book, The Killings of a Mossless Stone (5s. net), he reminds us amiably from his doings at the age of sixteen to his latest motor tour in France; after which he quotes Whyte Melville: "I have lived my life, I am nearly done." The book is a pleasant gossip of life in several countries, with a welcome interlarding of anecdote.

MESSRS. STANLEY PAUL & CO

This year sees the first issue of an exceptionally interesting book, The Suffrage Annual and Woman's Who's Who (6s. net), which will fill a long-felt want. It contains a deal of useful information concerning the numerous Suffrage Societies in Great Britain and Ireland; International Woman Suffrage Alliance, Men's International Alliance for Woman Suffrage; Where Women are Enfranchised, Dictionary of Dates, etc., etc., besides about a thousand biographies. The foreword states: "Many biographies—through difficulties experienced in getting into communication with their authors—having arrived too late for inclusion, a second edition may, therefore, be issued at an early date. For it, and for the 1914 enlarged production, we shall be pleased to receive communications as soon as convenient to contributors." The book is a significant sign of the times, and will prove invaluable to all Suffragists—to all Anti-Suffragists as well.

MR. W. J. HAM-SMITH.

Heroes, pirates, paladins and lovely women are among the chief of the dramatis personæ in Captain Gambler's intensely dramatic story, Gurth (6s.). In fact, the dramatic element seems to us more apparent than the probability, for the author, like his own hero, displays a true nautical dexterity in the tying and untying of knots. The schooners with the requisite characters aboard keep arriving at the South Pacific Island of Vatu neither a moment before nor a moment after they are required by the necessities of the plot. In the end the valiant Gurth escapes, with his beautiful companion of the deserted island, while the iniquitous pirate, Black Dog Baker, is last seen "pirouetting and whirling through the air high above the rolling masses of smoke."

MESSRS. DIGBY, LONG & CO.

There are certain novelists who can always be depended on for a good, readable, interesting story, and one of this pleasant company is "Alien" (Mrs. L. "Alien" Baker). Her new novel, A Maid of Mettle (6s.), has those same qualities of readability and interest, and may be warmly recommended to her many admirers—it is a pleasant love tale, the heroine of which, Dijsa Danvers, is at the outset a piquant, strong-willed little maid of thirteen, bent on keeping the gentle, widowed mother from marrying again, and at the close you find her a few years older, mellowed by various experiences, on the verge of marriage herself, having come to that happy ending through much of suspense and uncertainty and exciting adventure. A book that girl readers in particular will greatly enjoy.

MESSRS. HOLDEN & HARDINGHAM.

It is not the fault of our didactic novelists that there is still an Eurasian question. The subject is forcibly, if not very freshly, presented in the history of The Nan Macdonald by Kate Helen Weston (6s.). The main story is really that of John McGarvie, who from quixotry and pressure of circumstances is induced to marry a beautiful Eurasian Flora Macdonald, daughter of the man who had wrecked his own promising career in similar fashion. The moral, therefore, is twice enforced; but the author has not entirely had the courage of her opinions, inasmuch as she allows death in both cases to save the happiness of her heroes.

MESSRS. WARD, LOCK & CO

In a series of chapters, each complete in itself, Mr. Justus Miles Forman tells the sensational history of The Harvest Moon (6s.). "The Harvest Moon" was "a great pink pearl, pear shaped, and it seemed to glow as if there were fires inside it. Its mother might have been a pearl and its father an opal." "It was like something alive, something with evil fires within; it seemed to breathe as it lay, to stir—palpitate gently upon its bed." No one will be surprised to know that there was a peck of trouble brought about by that pearl. "The Harvest Moon" was by no means the only thing that palpitated. Everyone palpitated who looked upon it, and a considerable percentage died violent, very violent, deaths. Mr. Forman has skilfully contrived that each of his eight chapters shall hold its own definite interest; and his final chapter, where Miss Linden, who had cruelly sent a love-sick boy in quest of the jewel, is tortured by remorse and plays the dignified part of a modern Cleopatra, is intensely dramatic. The happy ending is a boon.

MESSRS. HODDER & STOUGHTON.

An excellent story in the Business Orczy vein—with a dash of Seton Merriman—is Shipper Ains (6s.) by Marian Bower. The plot concerns itself principally with a projected invasion of England by Napoleon, but there is also a strong love interest. Miss Bower writes with much spirit, and by an unconventional ending proves also that there is a strong dash of originality in her literary make-up. It is a dramatic and exciting tale really well treated.

MR. HENRY FROWDE.

Thorough knowledge, combined with an interesting and unpedantic style, marks the new book on bells which Mr. H. B. Walters, M.A., F.S.A., has produced, Church Bells of England (7s. 6d. net). The author knows his subject from top to bottom, from early to late; and he writes here of the history of bells, the casting of them, the ringing of them, the decoration of them, and many another point connected with them. This is a volume full of varied fascinations, not the least of these being the numerous illustrations, which appear in every chapter. This is certainly the Bell's Biography; a book for serious reference or pleasant recreation.

Oxford University Press

ENGLISH CLASSICS. Some Recent Editions.

The Works of Thomas Deloney. Edited by F. O. MANN. 8vo, 18s net

Westminster Gazette—"The novels abound in vivid detail. . . . Deloney's 'novels' have interested us, and would, we believe, interest any intelligent reader who cares to read of the habits and speech of our ancestors."

Donne's Poetical Works. Edited from the Early Editions and many MSS. by H. J. C. GRIERSON 2 vols. 18s. net.

Times—"By hard thinking and unbounded cheerfulness in the pursuit of difficulties Mr. Grierson has succeeded in producing an edition which at once antiquates all others, and will remain, we believe, the standard edition of Donne's poems for many years. . . . A better text than they have ever enjoyed since they were written."

The Works of George Savile, Marquess of Halifax. Edited by Sir WALTER RALEIGH. 8vo, 7s 6d net

Pall Mall Gazette—"All who care for English letters and the history of English politics owe a debt of gratitude to Sir Walter Raleigh for this scholarly edition."

Townshend's Poems and Masks. Edited by E. K. CHAMBERS. Printed on linen rag paper with Fell type 5s. net. [Tudor and Stuart Library.

Early English Tragedies. Edited with introductions and notes by J. W. CUNLIFFE. Crown 8vo 7s 6d net

Nation—"Professor Cunliffe's exhaustive edition is a monument of careful erudition. The apparatus criticus, particularly the annotation, is of masterly thoroughness."

Morgan's Character of Sir John Falstaff, 1777. Edited by W. A. GILL. F'cap 8vo, 2s 6d net lamb skin, 3s. 6d net. [Oxford Library of Prose and Poetry

Tennyson's Poems, 1842. An Exact Reprint. F'cap 8vo, 2s. 6d net; lambskin, 3s. 6d. net [Oxford Library of Prose and Poetry

Burns' Poems, 1786. An Exact Reprint. F'cap 8vo, 2s 6d. net, lambskin, 3s. 6d net [Oxford Library of Prose and Poetry.

Complete Catalogue (160 pages) post free on application.

LONDON: HUMPHREY MILFORD, OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS, AMEN CORNER, E.C.

THE OXFORD POETS.

Large crown 8vo, cloth 3s. 6d. on Oxford India Paper, from 5s. Each volume contains a Photogravure Portrait.

NEW VOLUMES NOW READY.

Poetical Works of Robert Bridges. Excluding the eight Dramas.

The Poetical Works of Edmund Spenser. Edited by J. C. SMITH and L. Dr SELINCOURI

The Ring and the Book, by Robert Browning. With an Introduction by EDWARD DOWDEN and 4 Facsimiles

The Poetical Works of Samuel Taylor Coleridge. Including Poems and Versions of Poems now published for the first time. Edited, with Textual and Biographical Notes, by E. H. COLERIDGE

Poems of James Russell Lowell. (Containing the Vision of Sir Launfal, A Fable for Critics, The Willow Papers, Under the Willows, and Other Poems)

The Poetical Works of Geoffrey Chaucer. Edited, with Introduction, by the late Prof. W. W. SKELTON

THE WORLD'S CLASSICS.

(Cloth, 1s net Sultan red-leather, 1s 6d net) Over 170 volumes now ready NEW VOLUMES.

Blackmore's Lorna Doone. Introduction by T. H. WARREN.

Eliot's Felix Holt. Introduction by VIOLET MEYNELL

Eliot's Romola. Introduction by VIOLET MEYNELL

Galt's The Entail on the Lairds of Grippy. Introduction by J. AYSCOUGH

Selected Poems of Lord Byron.

Selected Poems of Percy Bysshe Shelley.

The English Poems of John Milton.

The Volumes of Poetry in the World's Classics can also be obtained in the new series of THE OXFORD POCKET POETS. Cloth, 1s net per volume. Leather, from 1s 6d net or

WYMAN & SONS LIMITED

Largest Installation of Monotype and Linotype Machines in the Kingdom
Fine Art Mische and other Presses for best Bookwork

High-class Rotary Machinery for half-tone printing and quadruple Presses producing 16, 20, 24, 28 and 32 pp. papers at 30,000 per hour, folded

Newspaper, Book

and

General Printers

and Lithographers

Binding Plant complete, including the latest machines for Case-making and Casing-in

Books set up by Monotype, submitted entire in proof, printed and bound complete

BOOKSTALL CONTRACTORS ON LONDON & NORTH WESTERN, GREAT WESTERN AND OTHER RAILWAYS

Wholesale Booksellers and Newsagents

|| Railway, Press and General Advertising Contractors

LONDON AND READING

The Greatest New World Novel of the Season

THE LAW BRINGERS

The Great Nobel by

G. B. LANCASTER

Author of "Sons o' Men," "The Spur to Smite," etc.

IT SATISFIES every requirement of the most CRITICAL novel reader.

IT DEALS with elemental forces—with those immortal things, the souls of men.

IT MANIPULATES an intricate plot so cleverly—

IT PENETRATES to life's uttermost depths so acutely—

IT GRIPS the reader so tenaciously—that EVERYONE must agree that

It is far and away The GREATEST NEW WORLD NOVEL of the Season.

THE
LAW BRINGERS

A Tale of the North-West Mounted Police

Price 6/-

From PITMAN'S LIST.

IMPORTANT NEW BOOKS.

THE FEDERAL SYSTEMS of the UNITED STATES and the BRITISH EMPIRE:

Their Origin, Nature, and Development. By ARTHUR P. POLEY, B.A., of the Inner Temple and Midland Circuit, Barrister-at-Law. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 12/6 net.

This is a comprehensive work written in a popular style which places before the reader for the first time an account of the history, nature and development of the four constitutions of the United States, Canada, Australia and South Africa, showing their past and present connection with the United Kingdom.

THE TRUTH ABOUT HOME RULE.

By PEMBROKE WICKS, LL.B., Barrister-at-Law. With a Preface by the Rt. Hon. Sir EDWARD CARSON, K.C., M.P. Crown 8vo, cloth, with illustrations, 8/6 net.

MRS. GASKELL: HAUNTS, HOMES, & STORIES.

By Mrs. ELLIS H. CHADWICK. New and Cheaper Edition, with Additions and some New Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 34 illustrations, 5/- net.

WHO'S WHO IN MUSIC: A BIOGRAPHICAL RECORD OF CONTEMPORARY MUSICIANS.

Compiled and Edited by H. Saxe Wyndham and GEOFFREY L'EPINE. Large crown 8vo, cloth, 6/- net, leather, 8/6 net.

THE EMPIRE OF INDIA.

By SIR BAMPFYLDE FULLER, K.C.S.I., C.I.E., formerly Lieutenant-Governor of Eastern Bengal. Demy 8vo, with 5 full-page plate illustrations and map. 7/6 net.

THE FRANCO-PRUSSIAN WAR AND ITS HIDDEN CAUSES.

By ÉMILE OLLIVIER. Translated with Introduction and Notes by G. D. IVES. Demy 8vo, cloth, with illustrations, 8/6 net.

HOLLAND OF THE DUTCH.

By DEMETRIUS C. BOULGER. Author of "Belgium of the Belgians." With 3 full-page plate illustrations. 6/- net. This book contains a faithful portrait of life and society in all its aspects and modern complexities in this interesting country. It is uniform with others in the same series on FRANCE, GERMANY, ITALY, BELGIUM, RUSSIA, SPAIN, SWITZERLAND, SERBIA and JAPAN.

THE IMMOVABLE EAST: STUDIES OF THE PEOPLE AND CUSTOMS OF PALESTINE.

By PHILIP J. BALDENSBERGER. With Biographical Introduction by FREDERIC LEES. With 24 full-page Plate Illustrations and Map. 7/6 net.

OF ALL BOOKSELLERS.

LONDON: SIR ISAAC PITMAN & SONS, Ltd., 1, Amen Corner, E.C.

JUST PUBLISHED. 2/6 net.

ARNOLD BENNETT'S NEW BOOK.

THE PLAIN MAN AND HIS WIFE

By ARNOLD BENNETT.

THREE LARGE EDITIONS of

ARNOLD BENNETT'S FAMOUS POCKET PHILOSOPHIES

1/- net each.

- (1) HOW TO LIVE ON 24 HOURS A DAY
- (2) MENTAL EFFICIENCY
- (3) LITERARY TASTE
- (4) THE HUMAN MACHINE
- (5) THE FEAST OF ST. FRIEND

"A remarkable series of shilling books—full of good and brave things."—Claudius Clay.

"The five titles describe his gospel admirably . . . They form a spiritually speaking one book—a book on the art of living to day. His five teachings, like his five towns, pulse with sane, vivid and generous communications. The young man who reads them will have life more abundantly, he will conceive what it is to be 'Lord over the Noddle'!"—Pall Mall Gazette.

HODDER AND STOUGHTON, PUBLISHERS, LONDON, E.C.

AUTHORS' AGENCY. The SURREY LITERARY AGENCY place MSS. promptly and obtain the best possible terms, because it is conducted on literary lines and business principles. SPECIAL FACILITIES FOR PLACING NOVELS, Etc. Prospectus free on application to "Strathmore," Westbury Road, New Malden, Surrey. (Kindly note new address.)

INFANT BIBLE READER.

By Mrs. NATHANIEL L. COHEN, with coloured Illustrations by Louise Jacobs.

Price 1/6.

WERTHEIMER, LEA & CO., Clifton House, Worship Street, and 46 & 47, London Wall, London, E.C.

The aim of the book is to make children familiar with the beautiful stories of the Bible, and to give them some knowledge of the eternal truths of human life and character.

Revue des dix Mondes. 1862 to 1867; 1872 and 1874, 1903, 1904 and 1907. Bound Boards, 6 vols. to year, unused since bound. Offers. Snell, Langdale, Harrow.

GLAISHERS' PUBLISHERS' REMAINDERS.

Supplementary List No. 394 Now Ready.

Including all the latest Remainder Book Purchases, priced at great reductions from the original cost.

Gratis and Post Free.

WILLIAM GLAISHER, Ltd., 265, High Holborn, London; and at 14, George Street, Croydon, Surrey.

MACMILLAN'S LIST.

Vol. III. Just Published.

Trans - Himalaya : Discoveries and Adventures in Tibet. By SVEN HEDIN.
Vol. III. With Illustrations and Maps. 8vo. 15s. net.

A further instalment of Dr. Sven Hedlin's account of his latest great journey.

* * * Previously published. Vols. I. and II. 30s. net.

The Fringe of the East : A Journey through Past and Present Provinces of Turkey. By HARRY CHARLES LUKACH.
Illustrated. 8vo. 12s. net.

The Seine from Havre to Paris. By SIR EDWARD THORPE, C.B., F.R.S. Illustrated. 8vo. 12s. net.

Vol. IV. Just Ready.

Lollardy and the Reformation in England. By Dr. JAMES GAIRDNER, C.B.
Vol. IV. 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

* * * Previously published. Vols. I. and II. 21s. net.
Vol. III. 10s. 6d. net.

Life of Octavia Hill as Told in her Letters. Edited by C. EDMUND MAURICE.
Illustrated. 8vo. 16s. net.

DAILY MAIL.—"There are so many dull, pompous, or pretentious lives published that it is a real pleasure to read one which is simple, full of interest and warmly human."

Lore of Proserpine. By MAURICE HEWLETT.
Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

SUNDAY TIMES.—"Deep thoughts are here and beautiful writing, revelations of the human heart and its secrets, as well as flights of Puck-like fancy."

The Inside of the Cup. By WINSTON CHURCHILL, Author of "Richard Carvel," etc. Extra crown 8vo. 6s.

A Prisoner in Fairyland. (The book that 'Uncle Paul' wrote.) By ALGERNON BLACKWOOD, Author of "Jimbo," etc. Extra crown 8vo. 6s.

Father Ralph. By GERALD O'DONOVAN.
Extra crown 8vo. 6s.

THE DAILY NEWS.—"It takes both courage and conviction to write a novel like this. It takes also a burden of experience to write it so well. . . . His character-studies are strong and finely finished. . . . Whether it is false or true, it must be read by anyone interested in Ireland and Catholicism."

EDMUND GOSSE

EIGHTEENTH CENTURY LITERATURE, 1660-1780.
Cr. 8vo. 7s. 6d.

LIFE OF THOMAS GRAY. Cr. 8vo. Library Edition, 2s. net. Popular Edition, 1s. 6d. Sewed, 1s. Fcap. 8vo. Pocket Edition, 1s. net. [English Men of Letters]

LIFE OF JEREMY TAYLOR. Cr. 8vo. 2s. net. [English Men of Letters]

LIFE OF SIR THOMAS BROWNE. Cr. 8vo. 2s. net. [English Men of Letters]

THE WORKS OF THOMAS GRAY IN PROSE AND VERSE. Edited by Edmund Gosse. In four vols. Globe 8vo. 4s. net each. [Eversley Series]

MACMILLAN & CO., Ltd., LONDON.

The Works of EDMUND GOSSE

From "The Spectator"

" . . . Mr. Gosse's literary criticism has ever and again been illuminated by portraits of writers drawn by his pen from life, which have proved candles, by whose light it has been delightfully amusing, and often subtly profitable, to read their works. A reader familiar with Mr. Gosse's skill in hitting off human peculiarities cannot refrain from coupling his name with that of the greatest master of the art of painting with the pen. He does not, of course, deal in Carlyle's chiaroscuro; the features of his subject do not start forth from such tragic shadows, nor are they lit by such flaring lights of enthusiasm, nor are they distorted by the force of poetic laughter. They are vividly alive and their traits are noted by an eye which seizes as readily upon what is imposing, and every observation is recorded by a hand skilful in composition."

BIOGRAPHY AND CRITICAL ESSAYS

PORTRAITS AND SKETCHES
Crown 8vo. 6s. net.

FATHER AND SON : A Study of Two Temperaments.
Foolscap 8vo. Portraits 2s. net. Leather, 3s. net.

THE NATURALIST OF THE SEA-SHORE : The Life of Philip Henry Gosse. By HIS SON. Demy 8vo. Portrait. 6s.

GOSSIP IN A LIBRARY
(Limited Large Paper Edition) Small 4to. 25s. net.

SEVENTEENTH CENTURY STUDIES : A Contribution to the History of English Poetry.
Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

QUESTIONS AT ISSUE
(Limited Large Paper Edition) Small 4to. 25s. net

POETRY

COLLECTED POEMS Foolscap 8vo. 5s. net.

ON VIOL AND FLUTE
Foolscap 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

FIRDAUSI IN EXILE AND OTHER POEMS
Foolscap 8vo. Frontispiece. 3s. 6d. net.

THE AUTUMN GARDEN
Demy 8vo. 5s. net.

THE SECRET OF NARCISSE : A Romance. Crown 8vo. 5s.

HYPOLYMPIA : or, THE GODS IN THE ISLAND. An Ironic Fantasy. Foolscap 8vo. Parchment. 5s. net.

KING ERIK : A Tragedy.

With an Introductory Essay by THEODORE WATTS. Foolscap 8vo. 5s. net.

LITERATURE

By Richard Garnett and Edmund Gosse

ENGLISH LITERATURE

An illustrated record. In four volumes. Imperial 8vo. £3 net. Half Leather. £4 4s. net.

I. From the beginnings to the age of Henry VIII.

II. From the age of Henry VIII. to the age of Milton.

III. From Milton to Johnson.

IV. From the age of Johnson to the age of Tennyson.

By Edmund Gosse

MODERN ENGLISH LITERATURE

A Short History. New and revised edition. With 72 plates. Large Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

WILLIAM HEINEMANN, 21, BEDFORD STREET, W.C.

The Bookman.

"I am a Bookman."—James Russell Lowell.

No. 261. VOL. XLIV.
Subscription rate 11s. per annum post free.

JUNE, 1913.

PRICE SIXPENCE.
Published Monthly.

CONTENTS:

NEWS NOTES .. .. 101-104

THE BOOKSELLERS' DIARY 105

THE BOOKMAN GALLERY—
David Whitelaw. By A. ST.
JOHN ADcock .. .. 107

THE READER—
Edmund Gosse. By THOMAS
SECCOMBE .. .. 109
Swinburne. By PROFESSOR
SAINTSHURY .. .. 113
Dickens in America. By W.
ROBERTS .. .. 119
Edward Dowden. By THOMAS
SECCOMBE .. .. 121

PRIZE COMPETITIONS .. 116

NEW BOOKS—
Mr. Masfield's "Dauber." By
JOHN DRINKWATER .. .. 124
Michael Fairless .. .. 125
Forgotten Paths .. .. 126
Sir Herbert Taylor. By
LEWIS MELVILLE .. .. 126

Chance and the Novelist. By
FRANK SWINNERTON .. .. 127
Folk-Drama .. .. 128
India and the Indians .. .. 128
A Suburb in Bohemia .. .. 129
A Poet, a Playwright, and Others. By KATHARINE
TYNAN .. .. 129
The Romance of the Roth-schilds. By J. MIDDLETON
MURRAY .. .. 130
A Valiant Woman. By J.
CLAYTON .. .. 131
In Lands Afar By STANLEY
PORTAL HYATT .. .. 131
Modern Grub Street .. .. 133
W. E. Henley .. .. 133
A History of Europe .. .. 134
A Human Boy and Another.
By DAVID HODGE .. .. 134
Strindberg Again. By RICH-ARD CURIE .. .. 135
A Lyric Love By GEORGE
SAMPSON .. .. 135
From Both Sides .. .. 136
The Positive Evolution of Religion. By JAMES MOFFATT,
D D., D Litt. .. .. 137

Latin America .. .. 137
Of Honest Report. By DAR-RELL FIGGIS .. .. 138

NOVEL NOTES—
Rising Dawn—The Dancing
Child—An Inn Upon the Road—The House of Spies
—Ineffertual Fires—The Silence of Men—A Balkan
Prince—Is and Ans—The Fringe of the Desert—
Minna—The Outlaw—The Curse of the Nile—Candlelight Days—The Life Mask
—The Honey-Star—Napoleon Boswell—Roadknight—
Carnacki the Ghost-Finder.
138-142

THE BOOKMAN'S TABLE—
Lore of Proserpine—Peace
Theories and the Balkan War—Steps to Parnassus—
A British Borderland—Unruly Daughters—Saint Alban the Martyr, Holborn—Peeresses of the Stage .. 142-144
NOTES ON NEW BOOKS 144

NOTICES.

All communications intended for the Editor must be addressed to the
Editor of THE BOOKMAN, ST. PAUL'S HOUSE, WARWICK
SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

A preliminary letter of inquiry should be sent to the Editor before any manuscript is submitted for his consideration.

News Notes.

The portrait of Mr. Edmund Gosse on our cover is from a photograph taken by an American artist in August, 1904; and our plate portrait is from a drawing by Frank Dicksee, R.A., made for Grillon's Club in 1912.

Mr. Heinemann is publishing in the Autumn an edition de luxe of Mr. Edmund Gosse's powerfully realistic study in autobiography, "Father and Son." A number of hitherto unpublished portraits and photographs will be included among the illustrations.

The July BOOKMAN will be a Laurence Sterne Bi-Centenary Number, and will contain a special article on Sterne by Professor Saintsbury; "Goldwin Smith's Correspondence," by Alexander Mackintosh; "Our Village," by W. E. A. Axon; "The Woman of To-day and Yesterday," by M. P. Willcocks; "War or Peace," by J. E. Patterson; "Jane Austen," by W. H. Helm; "Mary Wollstonecraft," by Roger Ingpen; "Mrs. Meynell's Poems," by Katharine Tynan; "A New Novelist and Some New Novels," by Edwin Pugh; "Stane Street," by F. E. Green; "Roses and Rue," by Wilfrid Whitten, etc.

Mr. John Masfield has been revising and adding to his collection of sea-stories, "A Mainsail Haul," and the revised volume will be issued during June by Mr. Elkin Mathews, who is publishing, uniform with this book, a new edition of Mr. Masfield's delightful "Salt Water Ballads," which has for some time past been out of print.

A little while ago we made some reference to the clever continuation of "The Mystery of Edwin Drood" that was written and published several years back by Mrs. Newton (Gillan Vase). Mrs. Newton has now carefully revised her novel, and a new edition of it, with a preface by Mr. Stanley Jevons, will be published shortly by Messrs. Sampson Low & Co., under the title of "The Great Mystery Solved."

Messrs. Whitcombe & Tombs have just published "The Collected Verses" of Mr. Arthur H. Adams. The book includes a large selection from Mr. Adams's first volume and a number of poems that he has reprinted from various English and Australian magazines, but takes in nothing from his two books, "The Nazarene" and "London Streets," that were published over here a few years ago when he was trying his fortune as a London journalist. Mr. Adams is the most considerable of New Zealand's living poets; he is a Sydney Bulletin man, and has for some time past been editing the Lone Hand.

Another distinguished Australian author, Miss Edith Howes, has lately completed a new book of "Maoriland Fairy Tales," which Messrs. Ward, Lock are publishing shortly; she has collected the ancient Polynesian legends and written them up in it as stories for children. Miss Howes, who is best known in this country for her two charming volumes, "The Sun Babies," and "Rainbow Children," which are published by Messrs. Cassell, is one of the most popular writers of New Zealand, where she is a school teacher, and has done much admirable work, especially on natural history and educational subjects. She has, at present, escaped from schooling and is away on leave for a year, the first six months of which she is spending on Stewart Island, where she is studying shore life, with a view to a book on sea things, also to be written up in whose "New Irish Comedies" (Putnam) is reviewed on page 128.

Photo by E. O. Hoppé.

Lady Gregory.

Miss Lind-af-Hageby.

whose "Life of Strindberg" (Stanley Paul) is reviewed on page 135.

the "fairy tale" style for children.

Mr. W. H. Helm will, on the 5th of this month give a lecture recital on "Jane Austen and her Novels," at the Grafton Gallery. The lecture will be illustrated with some fifty portraits and pictures of places associated with the novelist and scenes from her stories that will be shown as lantern slides.

Mr. Herman Scheffauer's drama, "The New Shylock," has been translated into German by Leon Schalit and has just been published by Messrs. Oesterheld & Co., of Berlin, where the play is to be staged this autumn.

Mr. G. B. Burgin sails next month for Canada, on a visit to the old Happy Hunting Grounds whence, in other years, he has brought home material for some of his best stories.

Mr. W. Percival Westell is to be congratulated on the attainment of a sort of literary jubilee. This year alone he will have ten books published: six of them, his "Rambles in Spring," "Summer," "Autumn," "Winter," "On the Seashore," and "Under the Stars," by Messrs. Nelson; and "The Seashore I Know," by Messrs. Dent. He will follow these with "The Oxford Nature Book," "The Wonders of Bird Life," and "Bird Studies," and with the latter completes a list of fifty volumes to his name. A critic on the World remarked a little while back that since the death of Frank Buckland "no one has done more to popularise Natural History than Percival Westell," and everyone who is acquainted with Mr. Westell's work knows that this tribute has been fully earned. As a Natural Science student, author and lecturer he has had a very distinguished career. Born at St. Albans in 1875, he was educated at King Edward VI.'s Grammar School there, and in 1900 was, on the introduction of the Hon. Walter Rothschild, elected a member of the British Ornithologists' Union, in recognition of his work as an Ornithologist; and in 1907, on the introduction of Lord Avebury, was admitted a Fellow of the Linnean Society of London. He was an active member of the Selborne Society for and Instructor in Nature Study to the Cambridgeshire County Council, having organised and carried out a term's course of Nature Study Classes numbering a hundred and fifty teachers; he is visiting Master in Botany, Zoology and Nature Study at a number of local schools; and for long past has lectured on Natural Science at many of our principal public schools and institutions.

Mr. Percival Westell. Lecturer

But to cover the wide field of Mr. Westell's varied activities in a paragraph or two is out of the question. He was one of the founders and is still a patron of the School Nature Study Union; and nowadays he is well-known also as Editor and Honorary Secretary of the Young Naturalist's League, which has over six thousand members in all parts of the English speaking world. In 1909 and 1910 he was awarded Diplomas for Botany and Entomology by the National Society of Acclimatization of France, only two other Englishmen having been thus honoured. In addition to his fifty books, he has contributed numerous articles on Natural Science to the Scientific Journals and to the more popular magazines. Of late years, the value of a knowledge of natural science has become generally recognized as a potent force in our educational system, and in this direction perhaps no living teacher has rendered more valuable service than Mr. Percival Westell. His first volume, "British Breeding Birds," was issued in 1899, so he has rounded off his literary jubilee in rather less than a quarter of a century.

Photo by David Morris.

Miss M. P. Willcocks,

whose new novel, "The Power Behind," Messrs. Hutchinson are publishing shortly.

Miss Sheila Kaye-Smith.

From a drawing by Miss Dorothy Furniss.

Miss Kaye-Smith, already well known as the author of three admirable books, "The Tramping Methodist," "Sir Iren" and "Spell-Land," has written a new novel, "The Isle of Thorns" (Constable), which we review on page 127.

Photo by Rita Martin.

Miss Meriel Buchanan,

whose first novel, "White Witch," has just been published by Mr. Herbert Jenkins, is the daughter of Sir George Buchanan, British Ambassador at St. Petersburg.

Mr. B. T. Batsford has commenced the publication of an attractive series of "Fellowship Books," that

Mrs. Arthur Stratton.

Editor of "The Fellowship Books" (Batsford).

are to form "a new contribution by various writers toward the expression of the Human Ideal and artistic Faith of our own day." The first six volumes are "The Quest of the Ideal," by Grace Rhys; "The Country" by Edward Thomas; "Friendship," by Clifford Bax; "Divine Discontent," by James Guthrie; "Springtime," by C. J. Tait; and "The Joy of the Theatre," by Gilbert Cannan. The books are beautifully produced; printed in clear type, on good paper, and in very dainty and artistic bindings. The general editor is Mrs. Arthur Stratton and we congratulate both editor and publisher on having made so excellent a beginning on what promises to be a charming and very interesting series.

"Austria, Her People and their Homeland," an admirable travel book by Mr. James Baker that was published from the Bodley Head last Autumn has met with considerable success, and the author is revising the proofs for a new edition.

Mr. Rowland Hill,

whose blank verse historical drama, "Christopher Columbus," is to be published this month by Messrs. Sampson Low & Co.

Miss Ethel Carnie, who started her career as a half-timer in a Lancashire factory and published a striking little book of "Songs of a Factory Girl," has written a novel of Manchester industrial life which is to appear serially in the Christian Commonwealth before it makes its appearance between covers.

Messrs. Sampson Low & Co. are publishing a new novel, "Joyful Heatherby," by Mrs. Payne Erskine, whose earlier books "When the Gates Lift up their Heads," and "The Mountain Girl," have had an enormous vogue in America. The first of these, her first novel, dealt with the Southern race problem and brought a storm of criticism about her head, the book being banned in the South until the anger against it was somewhat abated. Mrs. Erskine was born near Racine, Wisconsin; her mother was an American descended from Puritan and French Huguenot ancestors, but her father was an English artist who went to America from Warwickshire. No violently controversial matters enter into her latest story, "Joyful Heatherby," which is the chequered but idyllic love story of a brilliant young artist and a girl who misunderstood and for a while distrusted him.

HALFOUR, ANDREW.—By Stroke of Sword 7d net
 BENNETT, ARNOLD.—The Regent 6s
 DITCHFIELD, P. H.—The Parish Clerk 1s net
 DIX, BEULAH MARI.—The Gate of Honor 6s
 GIBBON, EDWARD.—The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire Edited with Notes, Appendices and Maps, by J. B. BURY, M.A., LL.D., Regius Professor of Modern History at Cambridge In Seven Volumes. With many Illustrations and Maps Vol. VII 10s 6d net
 HARPER, CHARLES G.—"The Autocar" Road Book In four Volumes With Maps Each 7s 6d net Vol. IV North of England and South of Scotland.
 HENDERSON, R. W. WRIGHT.—A Goddess of Stone 6s
 HODGKIN, J. E. Durham With 32 Illustrations, 3 Maps, and 3 Plans. Cloth 2s 6d. net; leather, 3s 6d. net
 NELSON, PHILIP.—The Ancient Painted Glass in England, 1170-1500 7s. 6d.
 net
 PHILPOTTS, EDEN.—The Human Boy 7d net
 PICKTHALL, MARMADUKE.—Said the Fisherman 1s net
 ROHMER, SAX.—Fumanchu.—The Harbinger of a Yellow Dawn 6s.
 WODEHOUSE. P. G.—The Little Nugget 6s certain sinful pride in the fact. If a quite recent relative of his had been hanged for murdering an unimportant neighbour he would be ashamed to mention it; but he has not the least shame in being descended from the remote gentleman who took part in that sixteenth century crime at Saint Andrews Castle; partly because the victim was a great Cardinal, partly because he deserved his unpleasant fate, but mainly because the incident is long enough ago to have been so transmuted that it shines from far off with a natural glory of romance. You have no such help from the cunning years when your tale is one of your own day; and yet, for any man who has the temperament and the imaginative vision to see the flower in the seed the possibilities and suggestion of romance lie in every person we pass upon the street, in every incident that happens in the everyday life around us. It was the seeing a mild little city clerk leaning over London Bridge, watching with dreaming eyes a vessel making its way down stream towards the open sea and all the wonder of unknown lands, that gave Mr. Whitelaw the idea for his story of "Princess Galva." Walking one night, more recently, through Bloomsbury he crossed Bloomsbury Square; snow was falling; a thin powder of white covered the Square, and nobody else was abroad in it except a solitary turbaned Indian gentleman under an umbrella. The very sight of him there seemed to turn all Bloomsbury into a province of romance, and it supplied Mr. Whitelaw with a hint that he elaborated into his last year's novel, "The Girl from the East." One other such instance—some years back Mr. Whitelaw used to go occasionally to the Covent Garden balls; more than once he came from them and passed through Covent Garden about day-break, before the market had wakened into life, when the place to be soon so roaringly busy was silent, lonely, shadow-haunted. Remembering it lately as he had seen it on those mornings, and the sense of mystery and sleeping romance that brooded over it at such an hour, he felt it was the predestined scene of the picturesque events with which he opens his latest romance, "The Little Hour of Peter Wells." Peter is a clerk in the market; he used to ride to it every morning from Holloway on his bicycle, and one morning as he is riding early into its quiet and still lonely square he nearly runs over a strange foreigner, dressed as a buck of the Georgian period, and evidently coming from a Covent Garden ball. He apologises to the ungracious masquerader, passes on, lets himself in to the yet unopened warehouse, climbs to his small back office and proceeds to dust things. The back office overlooks a narrow cul de sac in which his employer stacks part of his stock, and presently, throwing up the window to shake his duster, Peter glances out and is shocked to see what looks like the dead body of a man who is dressed like a pierrot lying beside some small crates of oranges. Pulling himself together, he hurries down and out and finds that, though there is blood on the man and his fantastic clothing is torn as if in a struggle, he is not dead. This is the glamorous beginning of the one great romance that broke upon Peter's otherwise drab existence; and before the end of it, he had been dispatched by this second masquerader, who died before he could give Peter his final instructions, on a secret mission overseas, and had taken a stirring and dazzling share in a gallant conspiracy to restore a king to his throne. Incidentally, whilst he is involved in these great happenings, Peter sees and loves a high-born lady, and this phase of the story is handled by the author with most delicate skill and tactfully shaped to its probable, most matter-of-fact conclusion. There is to be no aristocratic bride for Peter; that would have exaggerated the romance and spoilt it; he is back in England before she marries one in her own sphere, and the only sight he has of the wedding procession is when it appears on a cinematograph screen at a picture palace he is visiting in the Upper Street, Islington, and—a delightfully natural touch—he is so carried out of himself by his enthusiasm as he watches the movements of the familiar figures that he is ejected from the theatre for creating a disturbance. The whole story is steeped in sheer romance, and is the more romantic because it centres on the commonplace person of Peter Wells, and so much of actual present-day life enters into its composition. It is certainly the high-water mark of Mr. Whitelaw's achievement, and full of promise that it will not remain so.

Most of Mr. Whitelaw's novels have appeared serially in the Morning Leader, Melbourne Argus, Sydney Times, Sydney Morning Herald, and other papers in England and the Colonies; two were translated and appeared serially in the Corriere della Sera, and translations of all of them, in book form, have been published in France, Germany, Norway, Sweden, Spain and Italy. He has written, too, a good many short stories for the Story-Teller, the Red, and other of the monthly magazines. He has travelled much on the Continent and as far afield as New York, but nowadays, though his business as a journalist brings him to London every day, he lives in a pleasant house on the cliff outside Brighton, where he has fixed up a big telescope and makes a hobby of Astronomy. He has made some progress with a new novel that begins and ends in modern Paris but draws its story out of the French Revolution; and his amateur stargazing has supplied him with a very remarkable idea, the nucleus of a story that when it is written and makes its appearance is likely to cause something of a sensation and raise a storm of controversy. Still a young man—I had almost said a very young man—with a real enthusiasm for his work and a surely growing skill in the doing of it, to say that Mr. Whitelaw has his world before him is to state a literal fact, and to add that he will go far in it is to venture upon a safe prophecy.

A. ST. JOHN ADCOCK.

THE READER.

EDMUND GOSSE, C.B.

BY THOMAS SECCOMBE.

A PART from the poet and "humanist" (as the subject of this brief appreciation likes at times to be called) the name of Gosse cannot have been wholly unfamiliar to many middle-class people who happened to be born in the sixties of the last century. The mezzotint engraver, Thomas Gosse, does not suggest anything very definite to my recollection; but the works of his son, Philip Henry Gosse, F.R.S., the naturalist of rotifers and sea anemones, were extremely favourite gift books and prize books in the early seventies. A bright red book by this sea-adept, entitled "The Ocean," was often visible in those days as a "table-book," and excited hopes which it failed to fulfil only because the work was pervaded by a breath of edification exceedingly repugnant to the youthful mind. The poet subsequently enshrined the memory of his father in a memoir which is a work of art and deserves a much higher place as a biographical record, and as a model of natural and unaffected English, than it has yet received. Mr. Gosse performed the same service on a much smaller scale for another member of his family who has contributed permanently to the annals of natural history. I refer of course to his aunt, Lizzie Brightwen, whose astonishing success in appealing to the friendly instincts of animals is responsible for a book, "Wild Nature Won by Kindness," so ingenuous and at the same time so fascinating that it has come to rank with "Black Beauty," "The Lives of the Hunted," and "Billy and Hans," among the "animal classics."

As an autobiographer of boyhood Mr. Gosse is as prolific as Mr. Henry James. He sits down to scribble a few jottings and before he has reached the age of fifteen discovers that he has filled a shapely octavo volume. It is doubtful to me whether since the days of Edward VI. any English boy has ever had such a thorough Protestant bringing-up as Mr. Gosse. If he had been educated in a spare corner of his pillar by St. Simeon Stylites he could not have been more effectually elevated and isolated above his species. It is this isolation which makes the unparalleled history of his youth so deeply interesting. At seventeen, however—happily for all concerned save one—the young Edmund declined from his high sainthood, studied successfully in London, passed the Civil Service examination and entered the Printed Books Department at the British Museum as an assistant. The British Museum was then and for some time after a nest of singing birds, including such songsters as Patmore, O'Shaughnessy, Garnett, and now Gosse. The bibliographers dissolved at four and reformed themselves into small committees for the reading and registration of poetry. Romantic poetry was a sweet intoxication to them. Dr. Garnett has told me how in these days he walked north or west with Coventry Patmore absorbed in Browning or it may be Shelley and, like them, confident of the imminent regeneration of mankind through the medium of immortal verse. Mr. Gosse may occasionally have been of the company. He has told us how often in these days he would bump up against Swinburne threading his way like a somnambulist amid the traffic of the Gray's Inn Road in which environment the poet's large brain seemed to weigh down and give solidity to a frame otherwise as light as thistledown, a body almost as immaterial as that of a fairy; but his beautifully elaborated and balanced delineation of the poet deserves exact transcription.

"He was short, with sloping shoulders, from which rose a long and slender neck, surmounted by a very large head. The cranium seemed to be out of all proportion to the rest of the structure. His spine was rigid, and though he often bowed the heaviness of his head, lasso pupaverat collo, he seemed never to bend his back. Except in consequence of a certain physical weakness, which probably may, in more philosophical days, come to be accounted for and palliated, he seemed immune from all the maladies that pursue mankind. He did not know fatigue, his agility and brightness were almost mechanical. I never heard him complain of a headache or of a toothache. He required very little sleep, and occasionally when I have parted from him in the evening after saying 'Good-night,' he has simply sat back in the deep sofa in his sitting-room, his little feet close together, his arms against his side, folded in his frock-coat, like a grass-hopper in its wing-covers, and fallen asleep, apparently for the night, before I could blow out the candles and steal forth from the door."

At the Museum, too, Gosse also saw, vidit tantum, the Golden Shepherd and God of the Golden Bow, then

Photo by E. O. Hoppe.

Mr. Edmund Gosse.

(Specially taken for THE BOOKMAN.)

Poet Laureate. His ambition was aflame already to escape from the dead weight of prose and rotten morocco in the entrails of the Bloomsbury palace. He was always a scorner of prosaic fact, and by 1871 he seems to have formulated a plan of escape. A good linguist, he designed to take his holidays in Copenhagen and Christiania and with the aid of the knowledge thus acquired to make a strenuous bid for a Translatorship or Interpretership. In all this he was eminently successful. He reached Copenhagen in romantic mood in July, 1872, and soon found his way to the heart of the susceptible Danes. One of the generation of aunts in the society to which he had attached himself, described the newcomer as a very old-fashioned and poetic young man. Her souvenirs of the Denmark of a past age are thus entertainingly rendered.

"When my brothers and I were growing up, young people seemed to live for nothing but poetry, painting and music—yes, and, in Copenhagen, for the theatre. We used to long so for moonlit nights and walks in the beech-woods. There has been such a complete change in the mode of life in Denmark. My brother says we were all too sentimental in those days, but it was the fashion to be very quiet. People were poor, and there were few amusements, but everyone could afford to read poetry. I remember, when I was a girl of sixteen or seventeen, walking to and fro in the park at Frederiksberg, with my sister, for hours in the hope of seeing Oehlenschläger go by; and when he came, we did not see him, because we had involuntarily closed our eyes in reverence. That spirit is all gone—it is like a fairy-tale. But I think you are a very old-fashioned young man and a little sentimental, too; so here we sit and read Paludan-Müller's verses aloud! It seems as though it were forty years ago, and Paludan-Müller himself, who is now, so old and frail, was a handsome young man, just come back from Italy with the manuscript of Adam Homo in his valise."

In my opinion Mr. Gosse has written very little superior in charm and veracity to his "Two Visits to Denmark."* By some intimate quality or magic the author manages always to convey and preserve the light and atmosphere which attaches somehow to all authentic work about the Scandinavian latitude. The two visits of '72 and '74 enabled him to obtain a valuable working synopsis of Northern letters. He became a frequenter of Gyldendal's bookshop, which was at Copenhagen what Allan Ramsey's was formerly at Edinburgh. He met veterans such as Grundtvig, Madvig, Hans Andersen, Paludan-Müller, Martensen and Munch, who dwelt with singular unction for their guest's benefit upon the grotesque blunders and inconsistencies of the English, and above all Georg Brandes whom Mr. Gosse tried in vain to convert to the cult of Laus Veneris, Dolores and the Fleurs du Mal. Brandes in this instance was delightfully obstinate and refused to see in Beaudelaire anything but un sale monsieur. E.G. had to suffer vicariously for his country from some of these stark Northerners, such as the Norse novelist Camilla Collett, who (egged on by her host the remorseless Munch), observed aggressively to our humanist across a full table "You belong, young sir, to a nation of shopkeepers." Dauntless in his championship of our nationality Mr. Gosse sought in 1874 to naturalise the Plum Pudding in Scandinavia, this dainty being regarded by all Northern readers of Dickens as an almost sacred symbol and emblem of the great Yule festival. A feast was organised to celebrate its introduction. Unfortunately

Mr. Gosse when he handed the pudding to the cook had forgotten to mention that it must be boiled in the cloth. What happened was that, between the fish and the joint, a large tureen appeared in the doorway, and was handed to each person, who ladled out a small portion in the porcelain saucer in front of him. Having been taken out of the pudding-cloth to be boiled, it was now served as a purée, eaten in microscopic quantities, declared to be delicious, and pronounced by a gushing lady to "bring the dear English people so near to her."

The guest on this occasion repaid the generosity of his Danish friends by becoming, in season and out of season, an advocate of Northern Lights. Later on he became sponsor of Ibsen and Björnson, as at present he sang the praises of Tegner, Winther, Vigfusson, etc. He was justified in his enthusiasm for these Northern languages by his appointment in 1875 as Translator to the Board of Trade. He now became not only a cultivator, but, to an increasing extent, a patron of poets. He discovered one, as is well known, in the precincts of Whitehall itself, and contributed in no small measure, by his sympathy and encouragement, to the unfolding of Mr. Austin Dobson's delicate poetic endowment. The Board was no grim task-master, and Mr. Gosse, the critic, was diligent at his desk from 8.30 to 10.30 before he had from 11 to 5 to translate himself into a Board of Trade official. He had already produced a slim volume in 1873, "On Viol and Flute," and these verses were followed in turn by "New Poems," 1879, "Firdausi in Exile," 1885, and "In Russet and Silver," 1894. In these volumes, as represented in his "Collected Poems" of 1911,† no great development is traceable, and indeed, it was the author's conviction that a verse-writer "learns his business suddenly at the dawn of manhood, and that he continues in a state of metrical equilibrium till his Edmund Gosse and his Father (1857).

From "Father and Son," by Edmund Gosse, of which Mr. Heinemann is publishing an edition de luxe this Autumn.

* Smith, Elder.

† Heinemann.

Photo by Francis R. Etwell,
Weston-super-Mare.

May, 1873.

Photo by W. Widger, Torquay

1862.

Photo by Robert Faulkner & Co

Nov. 1877.

Three early portraits of Mr. Edmund Gosse.

skill as a craftsman falls from him." Mr. Gosse was always an admirer of musical sound, colour and technique, and a keen discriminator of metrical forms. His own poetic inspiration, if dependent ultimately upon the initiative of the great masters, was none the less genuine. In such a title as "Firdausi in Exile" he seems to me to have out-Browninged Browning. The inspiration of such a stanza as the following again, is not particularly remote:

"My England, where the grass is deep,
And burns with buttercups in May,
Whose brookside violets nod in sleep
Washed purer purple by the spray;
My England of the August corn,
The heavy-headed waving gold,
Sweet blossoming land
from bourne to bourne Whose name and speech I hold."

But his best work of all, perhaps, is done in the form of the sonnet of Historic Circumstance, which Hérédia later, in "Les Trophées," made peculiarly his own — good examples being "The Bath," with its very striking sestet, and the better known "On a Lute found in a Sarcophagus."

"What curled and scented sun-girls, almond-eyed,
With lotus-blossoms in their hands and hair,
Have made their swarthy lovers call them fair
With these spent strings, when brutes were deified,
And Mammon in the sunrise
sprang and cried,
And love-words smote
Bubastis, and the bare
Black breasts of carven
Fasht received the prayer
Of suppliant bearing gifts from far and wide!

This lute has out-sung Egypt; all the lives
Of violent passion, and the vast calm art
That lasts in granite only, all lie dead;
This little bird of song alone survives,
As fresh as when its fluting smote the heart,
Last time the brown slave wore it garlanded."

As an essayist the taste and enthusiasm of Mr. Gosse have stood him in good stead, but always as a student of personalities, or at any rate on the borderland between literary history and biography, rather than as a pure scholar or thinker. Thus there is, in most of his best critical writing, a strong touch of modern irony, of sly malice, and of garrulous indiscretion, of course in the very best sense. In his exploration of dry-as-dust material or abstract subject-matter, he soon shows signs of fatigue. When he is really observing the subject-matter, no critic can be more subtle or more adroit than he. As a causeur on literary topics he is full of humour, with very often a gleam of allusive pleasantry in the highest degree agreeable. Though not unconscious of these limitations, his knowledge has not precluded him from invading the often arid realms of research. Small discoveries have lured him into dangerous quagmires, and perhaps no commentator of recent days has been more severely taken to task than he, no bitter more savagely bitten. This was especially the case, of course, with his books on Seventeenth Century Studies, dealing with the transition "From Shakespeare to Pope," the "Jacobean Poets," and the compendious

Mr. Edmund Gosse.

From a photograph taken in New York, by G. C. Cox, in December, 1884.

"Life and Letters of Dr. Donne," 1899, based upon materials originally collected by Dr. Jessopp. All these have a value of their own, but none of them seem quite likely to be able to stand the wear and tear of rival research or close critical investigation. Geography, Mr. Gosse tells us, was always his strong subject as a boy. There is no doubt that chronology has always been his bane, and indeed it might almost be said of him, as Disraeli once said of his wife, that he was never quite certain which came first, the Greeks or the Romans. Despite his genius, therefore, in the matter of glosses and conjectures, his critical and historical work is always liable to deduction for minute errors in points of cold physical fact, and especially in some of his most suggestive work, dealing with the Jacobean poets, Waller, Gray, Thomson, the author of "John Bunce," and even Swinburne. His light-hearted indifference to the iron laws of time and circumstance has always hampered him. In some respects he bears a curious resemblance to Andrew Lang. Both of them are far better as chroniclers and contemporary biographers, than as serious philosophic critics or historians, both at their best when the vein of humour was most buoyant, light, gay, spontaneous, or mocking. But no, they were not content with this, and would never rest until they had set up as cyclopædists. It is as difficult at times to imagine why they should have done this, as to imagine a delicate barb endeavouring to adapt itself to the burden of a camel, or if we may for a moment adopt a simile derived from the categories of the prize ring, the incongruity would be no less than that of a featherweight setting himself up to figure as a "light-heavy." But let us by no means incur the imputation of seeking to bards witty remarks with Mr. Gosse, a writer of persiflage and ridicule, who has no living rival. What we are seeking to emphasise is that his best work is not to be found amid the ponderosities of literary history, or full-length biography, but among the lighter literary vignettes scattered among his Critical Essays, collected under such titles as "Gossip in a Library," "Questions at Issue," "Critical Kit-Kats," and "Portraits and Sketches." Some of his contemporary portraits are quite inimitable, such as this wonderful little miniature of Andrew Lang, the more felicitous because, like most good descriptions, it contains a good deal of the describer:

"The charm of Andrew Lang's person and company was founded upon a certain lightness, an essential gentleness and elegance which were relieved by a sharp touch; just as a very dainty fruit may be preserved from mawkishness by something delicately acid in the rind of it. His nature was slightly inhuman; it was unwise to count upon its sympathy beyond a point which was very easily reached in social intercourse. If any simple soul showed an inclination, in eighteenth-century phrase, to 'repose on the bosom' of Lang, that support was immediately withdrawn, and the confiding one fell among thorns. Lang was like an Angora cat, whose gentleness and soft fur, and general aspect of pure amenity, invite to caresses, which are suddenly met by the outspread paw with claws awake. This uncertain and freakish humour was the embarrassment of his friends, who, however, were preserved from despair by the fact that no malice was meant, and that the weapons were instantly sheathed again in velvet. Only, the instinct to give a sudden slap, half in play, half in fretful caprice, was incorrigible."

Now, all Mr. Gosse's best critical work is done when it is affiliated to live portraits of this kind. He attaches himself as gossip and interpreter to authors of, for preference, a rather precious idiosyncrasy of their own, such as Pater, Rossetti, Patmore, Ibsen, Swinburne, Browning, FitzGerald or Stevenson, and then, with the minuteness of an Aubrey, he furnishes a mental, moral, and physical résumé, the nicety and subtlety of which are bound to astonish the most incredulous person. His work on the literary personalities of the past is at its best when it approximates most to this method, as in the cases of Donne, Browne, Taylor, Congreve, Gray and Keats. But the fullest scope of all for his powers is seen in the different varieties of autobiography, and if he publishes "A Diary," it will not only be the crown of his work, but the one live commentary for all time of the critical era of the transit of Victoria.

An extremely literary person seldom leaves much permanent fruit behind him. Take Leigh Hunt, for instance; for all the literary instruction he gave to his age, he has left nothing fine enough in quality to be reverently preserved to-day. Mr. Gosse has been a great virtuoso of polite Letters, and a volatile Mercury from one literary nation to another—interpreter to degenerate descendants of the Songs and Sagas of the Vikings of to-day. But it may well be doubted whether as a literary critic pure and simple, he has enough weight and metal to stand pre-eminent. Like Spence, he has known poets, and has collected many anecdotes about them; some at first hand are exquisite, others, perhaps, are rather too good to be true, like the story of the man at the opening of the Marlowe Memorial at Canterbury, who went about anxiously enquiring what had been done for the widow, and when it was gently conveyed to him that there was no widow, avowed that he had made a mistake, having imagined that the monument erected was in honour of Marwood, inventor of the long drop!

Mr. Edmund Gosse.

From a portrait by John S. Sargent, R. A., printed in February, 1896.

The literary life of our Atticus was in certain respects one of inevitable unrealities. But there was, as it proved, a background to it, a background of strong and absolute sincerity, engendered by a growing and progressive dislike of the dogmatic religion in which he had been nurtured. His good genius directed him at all hazards to exploit this living stream, which gushed up from the bottom of the well, and the result was, as is widely recognised, one of the unmistakable masterpieces of Letters. Masters of fiction, from Charles Dickens to H. G. Wells, have written autobiographically about their own childhood, but not one of them had the advantage of having being reared in a Calvinist cloister, and venerated at the age of ten as "an infant Samuel." Mr. Gosse has a small plot of ground all to himself. A critic, it must be seen, is a superior person who gains a hearing by selecting, interpreting, and judging other writers. He cannot be expected to outlive the authors he seeks to justify. Unless indeed his criticism be a model for all successive ages, such as the volume of badinage which Anatole France directs with such pitiless force against the "Volonté" of Mons. Georges Ohnet. But in "Father and Son,"* we have the revelation, not of a superior being, but of an absolutely normally human boy. The conflict of creeds between the two generations is an experience which literally thousands now living have traversed. But in this case the conflict assumed from the first an acute form. The dawning of the realisation by the son that his father is not omniscient, and the mixture of slyness, discretion, and boyish innocence give an opportunity for a nuanced, but candid and most delicately humorous narration of which the author takes the fullest possible advantage. Of living writers, there are only two or three at most (e.g. Laurence Housman) who would be capable of anything of this kind, and not one of them has ever had such an unrivalled opportunity as that afforded to Mr. Gosse by his unique upbringing.

Since 1904, to the elegant regret of some of his admirers, Mr. Gosse has been caught up into a world of light, having ascended into the upper sphere; he has become what Dr. Johnson called "a wit among lords"; he mingles easily with the supernal beings who are authors without toil, and prose-writers without tears. No more does he organise victory for young poets; no longer is the mirth of his "Twelfth Night parties" heard in Kensington; he is still, no doubt, a beacon of light to foreign artists and bookmen of distinction. To some extent, however, he is withdrawn from the conflicts of taste and the conceits of opinion, in which he once took such unequivocal delight, and now watches the efforts of the double-flute players of the Poetry Shop in a more detached manner, from a serener air. By these young singers he is no longer regarded with quite the same intimacy of affection as one of the shepherds on Parnassus. One feels, in a moment of sympathetic illumination, that here should have been found the President of an English Academy. The De Goncourts would have found in Mr. Gosse a President after their own heart. In the department of "The Graces," to which Lord Chesterfield did so much homage, he stands pre-eminent. His English prose, suave, caressing and bland gives him a strong claim to act as president and chief spokesman, wherever prose de circonstance is in request. As a delineator and designer of character, amid a long succession of illustrious draughtsmen and pastellists since the days of Earle, Overbury and Clarendon, he stands to-day probably without a rival, and, where necessary, he is quite capable of blending some of the acid of Hervey or Pope, should the pigment on his palette require any qualification of that kind. His graceful criticism is keenly appreciated in France. Mr. Davray, the well known Anglo-French critic of the Mercur and translator of Père et Fils, has recently held a brilliant reception in Mr. Gosse's honour in his fine old house in the Rue Servandoni. Mr. Gosse almost literally exhales tact on an occasion like this. As an ambassador of English Language and Literature abroad he is absolutely Premier Choix.

Mrs. Edmund Gosse.

From a painting by T. Blake Wirgman.

require any qualification of that kind. His graceful criticism is keenly appreciated in France. Mr. Davray, the well known Anglo-French critic of the Mercur and translator of Père et Fils, has recently held a brilliant reception in Mr. Gosse's honour in his fine old house in the Rue Servandoni. Mr. Gosse almost literally exhales tact on an occasion like this. As an ambassador of English Language and Literature abroad he is absolutely Premier Choix.

SWINBURNE.†

BY PROFESSOR GEORGE SAINTSBURY.

IT so happened that after the present reviewer had read Mr. Drinkwater's book with considerable, if not unmixed, satisfaction, and in the interval which it is always desirable to interpose between reading and reviewing (in order that things may have time to "cook" in the mind), he came across the judgment of a brother of the craft on the book. In it there occurred, after a citation, the words "He means" - with a para-

Heinemann.

† "Swinburne." By John Drinkwater. (J. M. Dent & Sons.)

phrase following. The expression was quite evidently not "meant sarcastic," for it appeared that this critic also was satisfied with the book; nor did it perhaps bear the same interpretation as that which, here at least, will be put on it. But it is certain and it is about the only fault, or the only serious one, which will be found with the book here—that Mr. Drinkwater is by no means seldom in need of an interpreter; and that not merely to dull or prejudiced understandings. The mere fact, indeed, that without either biographical detail (not that we desiderate that) or elaborate account of the contents of the various books (which also may quite well be wanting) he has devoted two hundred pages to a critical study of one who, both as poet and as prose writer, is so much "of a piece" as Swinburne, will almost speak for itself. One cannot but think that an essay of twenty or thirty pages—of forty or fifty at most—would not only have been sufficient for the purpose, but would have caught up that purpose and driven it home with infinitely greater alacrity, vigour and effect than a book, even if not a very large book, of two hundred. But as it used to be a complaint years ago that people boiled down folios into duodecimos, so it seems now to be the hour of watering out articles into duodecimos themselves, if not into something bigger.

That it would be quite possible to write two hundred well-filled pages about the almost always delightful and often glorious work of the poet's half century of composition in both harmonies, no one could admit or assert more cheerfully than the present writer.

But can this sort of thing be said to be good "filling"?

"Words, when the poets are writing thus, stand tiptoe with all kinds of strange adventure calling on them. They may at any time be put to some unaccustomed yet perfect use. The words themselves, separate and not yet quickened, the poet holds in his deliberations; but their flowering into language is a ritual of which the poet himself can tell nothing until its consummation. And the divine visitation that invests the veriest drudge among words with something more than royalty, will as readily use one true poet to its purpose as another."

Now what "he means" here need not task even the plain man much. His meaning is identical with, and, of course, quite legitimately derived from, Tennyson's "flowering in a lonely word," and he has worked up this poetic thought into Paterio-Meredith-esque expression in a dozen lines (a dozen inoriginal) of prose. But would it not have been quite as effective if it had been put at a quarter the length? and if we had been spared this curious pot-pourri of things which "stand tiptoe" apparently before they are quickened; which—unquickened but tiptoe and listening to adventure—are somehow "held" by the poet; which then (but we suppose by this time quickened) tiptoe, listening, and held, "flower," so that having been previously "drudges" they are "invested with royalty" while the whole proceeding is "a ritual," of which the said poet can (and no shame to him!) "tell nothing until its consummation?" We may put aside the point that the position which this language is intended to support—that the most extraordinarily beautiful passages of the greatest poets are not specially characteristic of them—is a very doubtful one. But is not the language itself perilously near galimatias? And if this be thought too harsh, is it not at least evident that the force and drive of what is, after all, a piece of something like polemic, must be to no small extent slackened and blunted by this wrapping of the meaning in swathes of even pleasantly coloured cotton wool? If one did not agree with Mr. Drinkwater's general purpose one might be thankful for the handles he has thus given to criticism; but when one does agree with him in the main, it is annoying.

His chief thesis, though a fanciful and even a whimsical one, is ingenious, and there is a certain amount of truth in it, though it requires, in his hands, postulates and axioms which one may be loth to grant. The common charge of the enemy against the author of Poems and Ballads is, of course, always has been, and probably always will be, that he is a poet of words, not of thought. Now, Mr. Drinkwater either fears or refuses to swing himself up into the high and impregnable places, which neither the waves of such attack nor even the foam of them can reach—the position that poetry is a matter of the Word. He is very anxious to prove, and he accumulates fair arguments to prove, that Swinburne has plenty of thought, plenty of life, plenty of other things. But he admits, or rather advances, a theory that the poet having, by divine assistance, discovered a marvellous form of words, of which he was master, proceeded to use it, generally in accordance with a worthy mood or meaning, but sometimes without "a high agreement between the life which is in the imagination and the life which is in the language." This is ingenious—very ingenious—but we rather fear that if the Accuser (as he

By kind permission of Fredk. Hollyer.

Mr. Edmund Gosse
(1899).

generally does) exercises his right of reply, he will simply observe "Thou sayest it." "There is no trace," says Mr. Drinkwater elsewhere, "of imaginative fusion behind the marvellous felicity of phrasing." "Translated into plain English," the Devil's Advocate, we fear, will reply: "that means there is no thought behind the words."

* The real point is, however, that Mr. Drinkwater is on the side of the defence and the angels, even if his manner of conducting the case sometimes resembles that of Mr. Phunky rather than that of Sergeant Snubbin. One may think indeed that—especially towards the end of the book—he takes the attack itself far too seriously. Somebody, it seems, has said that Swinburne is "of quite minor importance as a poet." Now, before taking any count of this opinion it is desirable to know what is the importance of the person himself as a critic. There seems to be "a new generation of critical opinion which protests against Swinburne." But we have seen so many new generations of critics; and their protests have so often had so very little importance in them! So many dogs have barked; and what has become of the barkings? That Swinburne, with very definite faults and flaws such as most, if not all, the great poets have had, is of those poets, no one who has a catholic knowledge of poetry is at all likely to deny, though one judge may put him higher and another lower. What the other people say simply does not matter. It tells one something about them; nothing about their subject. "They say. . . . Let them say"—the intermediate position "What say they?" being really superfluous.

In the estimation of his faults and his views, however, there may be endless and profitable difference of opinion. That Mr. Drinkwater, while admitting that Swinburne never wrote a good drama, and while criticising his plays at rather surprising length, credits him with actual dramatic faculty to no small extent, may seem strange. The explanation is probably that, having a great admiration for his author, and (as is evident) a great liking for the drama, he thinks that Swinburne ought to have been a great dramatist. Indeed, one of the most curious passages of his book upbraids not merely his actual hero, but Tennyson, Browning and Morris, because while they "have moments of dramatic poetry that might have made a new golden age" they did not make it. It is true that he sets down the main fault to the unfortunate "Victorian" theatre. "Shakespeare's theatre contributed largely to the formative excellence of his plays." Did it? One would rather say that the poets from Peele and Lyly, through Marlowe and Shakespeare himself and Jonson onwards, made

Mr. Edmund Gosse in his Library at Hanover Terrace, Regent's Park.

From an etching by Miss Sylvia Gosse, an exhibition of whose drawings was recently held at the Catfax Gallery.

the Elizabethan theatre; that the Georgian theatre, admirably as it was manned from Garrick to Charles Lamb's days, failed to make dramatic poets; and that putting these two facts together, and adding the actual practice of Tennyson, Browning and Swinburne (it is surely impossible that Morris could ever have been a dramatist), the conclusion at which arrival seems most reasonable is—well, not Mr. Drinkwater's.

His book, however, so often excites sympathy and even applause, that one is unwilling to cavil at it. Even the singular prudery (Victorian, surely, quite Victorian) with which he deplors Swinburne's prolonged dallying with that Circe or Calypso the anapaest, shall not provoke us much. It is true, of course, that the anapaest is the wand (to change the metaphor but little) of which Mr. Swinburne is the magician; that he has got such effects out of it as never were dreamt of in English poetry before, and have not been approached in fifty years, nor are likely to be improved upon in five hundred. But let that pass—Mr. Drinkwater is not only a generous praiser of Swinburne, but he is a generous admirer of Morris too; and there is hardly a possibility of a man admiring both, from the poetical side unless he has the root of the poetical matter in him. He seems, indeed, altogether inclined to praise rather than to blame; and that, unless it be done with a "foolish face" which is not his, is, after all, the best test of a critic. Any fool can find fault, not merely with another fool but with a wise man; it is only some fools, and those seldom of the worst kind, who can admire with anything like a genuine admiration. Neither let us end this review with any talk of fools at all, for Mr. Drinkwater is certainly not one; he is a critic and writer of worth and promise who has only the usual measles of fashionable jargon to recover from and out-grow.

THE BOOKMAN PRIZE COMPETITIONS.

JUNE, 1913.

Answers to these competitions (each on a separate sheet bearing the name and address of the sender) should be forwarded not later than the 15th of the month to

"The Prize Page," THE BOOKMAN, Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton, Warwick Square, E.C.

The date fixed above for sending in answers does not apply to Competitors resident abroad, except in the case of competitions Nos. 1 and 3; answers from Foreign or Colonial readers for competitions 2, 4 and 5 (the subjects of these being the same each month) will be admissible to the first competitions that are adjudicated upon after the date of their receipt.

Each competitor may send in any number of attempts, provided each attempt is written on a separate sheet of paper.

- I.—A PRIZE OF ONE GUINEA is offered for the best original sonnet.
- II.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best quotation from English verse applicable to any review or the name of any author or book appearing in this number of THE BOOKMAN. Preference will be given to quotations of a humorous nature.
- III.—A PRIZE OF THREE NEW BOOKS is offered for the best twelve lines of verse giving advice to young poets against the use of false rhymes, such as dawn, scorn, joy, sky, etc.
- IV.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best review in not more than one hundred words of any recently published book. Competitors should give the names of Authors and Publishers at head of their reviews.
- V.—A copy of THE BOOKMAN will be sent post free for twelve months to the sender of the best suggestion for THE BOOKMAN Competitions. The Editor reserves the right to use any suggestion submitted.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT: TWENTY-ONE GUINEAS PRIZE POEM COMPETITION.

A First Prize of Five Guineas and a Second Prize of Two Guineas will be given for the best and second best original lyric.

A First Prize of Five Guineas and a Second Prize of Two Guineas will be given for the best and second best original sonnet on Shakespeare, Milton, Chaucer, Keats, Shelley, Burns, Scott, Byron, Wordsworth, Wellington, Nelson, Gladstone, Disraeli, Darwin, or any other famous Englishman.

A First Prize of Five Guineas and a Second Prize of Two Guineas will be given for the best and second best original humorous poem in not more than forty lines.

All Poems should be addressed to the Editor, and should reach the offices of THE BOOKMAN, St. Paul's House, Warwick Square, London, E.C., not later than the first post on the 1st July from the Colonies, India, or elsewhere abroad. (The time for receipt of poems from residents in the British Isles expired on 2nd June.) Envelopes should be marked Twenty-one Guineas Competition.

The name and address of the competitor must be written on each MS., and will be published in the event of a Prize being awarded to him. Any competitor who wishes to do so may add a pseudonym, to be used instead of his own name if his poem is printed but does not receive a prize.

The awards will be announced in THE BOOKMAN for August next, and in addition to the winning poems a large selection of the best of the others sent in will be published in a Special Supplement to that Number.

RESULTS OF COMPETITIONS FOR MAY.

- I.—The PRIZE OF ONE GUINEA for the best original Ballad is awarded to Mr. Cyril G. Taylor, of Farr Hall, Heswall, Cheshire, for the following:

BALLAD OF THE WINDING ROAD..

I am the Road, the Winding Road,
And this is the song of me:
In rain or shine, I twist and twine
As far as the eye can see.
And though men may rest on my cold, white breast,
I stretch to Eternity!

Edmund Gosse.

From a water-colour sketch made early in 1850, when he was only a few months old.

I am the Road, the Silent Road,
The symbol of Right and Wrong!
I'm old and hard, and my face is scarred
By the feet of the ceaseless throng;
By the winds that lust for my wanton dust:
By the skies which have proved me strong!

I am the Road, the Gleaming Road,
That calls to the sons of men
To quit the toil of their native soil
For the cities beyond their ken.
And I lure the pride of the countryside
From mountain and moor and fen!

I am the Road, the Gay Young Road,
That leads to the haunts of Fame!
My hedgerows ring with the songs of Spring,
And the west wind breathes my name!
And the sun's warm glance sets my pools a-dance
Till my heart is a big, white flame!

I am the Road, the Sorrowing Road,
That lies at the feet of night!
I hide my hurts in her trailing skirts,
And I shrink from the fierce moonlight
That makes gaunt ghosts of my finger-posts,
And powders my milestones white!

I am the Road, the Old, Old Road,
And nobody holds me wise!
But a man has debts—and a man forgets
When the road behind him lies.
Oh I've seen disgrace on a woman's face,
And death in her staring eyes!

I am the Road, the Winding Road,
And this is the song of me:
In rain or shine, I twist and twine
As far as the eye can see.
For a man must play, and a woman pay,
And a road wind eternally!

CYRIL G. TAYLOR.

We also select for printing:

NERINA.

How sweet she was when the June light was gleaming
On the rich masses of her raven hair.
A shadow deep in her dark eyes lay dreaming,
Telling my heart love waited prison'd there
How sweet she was, so thoughtful, true, and tender,
With crimson velvet roses on her breast
I painted her amid the summer splendour,
My beautiful Nerina, purest, best!

Dear were those hours beside the golden river,
Till one gay laugh my pulses set on flame
In the warm light I saw Nerina shiver,
And then her pale face flush'd with sudden shame—
When Melra came

How pale she seem'd when the June light was waning:
The shadow in her eyes had deeper grown
I painted her the while my heart was paining:
Did she still dream my love was all her own?
Then Melra's laugh I heard it softly ringing,
Somehow my brush fell at Nerina's feet
I saw two tears on her black lashes clinging,
My beautiful Nerina, pale and sweet!

Dear were those hours beside the golden river,
Till one gay laugh my pulses set on flame
In the warm light I saw Nerina shiver,
And then her pale face flush'd with sudden shame—
When Melra came.

How sweet she look'd when from the water chilly,
They laid her down beneath the moonlit skies
As lovely as a fragile water lily,
Her long black lashes veil'd her lustrous eyes.
I call'd her name, and dried her raven tresses,
I kiss'd her smiling lips and cold white brow,
And cried: "In death thy gentle spirit guesses Nerina! thou hast learnt I lov'd thee now."

* * * * *

I have her picture Till my life's day closes,
Her face alone will seem most fair to me.
Upon her breast are crimson velvet roses,
And in her eyes a shadow dark I see
Yet, now I hear a gay laugh softly pealing, Melra is with me. Ah! I love her too.
And yet for thee I held the deeper feeling,
My beautiful Nerina, proud and true.

Can I forget her by the golden river,
That sets my pulses wildly yet on flame.
In the warm light I feel my heart-strings quiver—
I see Nerina near me just the same—
Ere Melra came.

(Marjorie W. Crossbie, "Earlswood," Avondale Road, Wolverhampton, Staffs.).

THE YOUNGEST DRUMMER.

Tantarara, Tantarara,
On the heights above Assaye,
Left to wait the picket's coming,
Sat the youngest drummer drumming,
Tantarara, Tantarara,
Just before the day.

Mr. Edmund Gosse, with his favourite cat "Mopsiman."

From a photograph taken about 1908.

Tantarara; Tantarara;
Propped against a stone he lay,
Chilled with mist and slowly bleeding,
Numb with pain, yet all unheeding,
Tantarara; Tantarara;
Ere the dawn was grey.

Tantarara; Tantarara;
Far away and far away,
Stood the selfsame call repeating
Rang the vibrant, steady beating,
Tantarara; Tantarara;
Beating without stay.

Tantarara; Tantarara,
Drowning in its swell dismay,
Full and rich and grown consoling
Went the stately music rolling,
Tantarara, Tantarara,
Down to hid Assaye

Tantarara; Tantarara,
When the picket came that way,
Where he sat a grave they made him,
By his silent drum they laid him,
Tantarara, Tantarara,
In the sodden clay.

Tantarara; Tantarara;
Haply still at times you may
Hear a ghostly echo coming,
Hear the youngest drummer drumming,
Tantarara; Tantarara;
Just before the day.

(B. R. M. Hetherington, Wide-open-Dykes, Carlisle.)

Very good ballads, several of equal merit with the two we have selected for printing, have been sent in by Violet D. Chapman (Burnham), John D. Smith (Milngavie), S. M. Northcott (West Kirby), M. A. N. Marshall (Oxford), H. A. Wood (Aberdeen), Eveline Emily Ife (Plumstead), Sybil Waller (Boscombe), M. D. Baynes (Teignmouth), Marcella Whitaker (Dewsbury), W. Morris (Bodmin), Mrs. C. P. F. F.; Constance Goodwin (Clapham), Elija Summers (Dukinfield), M. A. Newman (Framlingham), R. F. Reynolds (Llanbedr), B. M. Morris (Bath), B. Vickery (Bradford), Ivan Adair (Dublin), Miss Tootal (Kensington), J. D. Martin (Leeds), E. Irene Seaton (Boxmoor), M. St. Clare Byrne (Hoylake), Maud Marion Burnell (Ashford), Miss E. Bourne (Seaford), R. B. Ince (Jarvis Brook), Ernest A. Kersten (Thornton Heath), A. J. Killoran (Balham Hill), William Kerr (Fraserburgh), Bernard McEvoy (Ilfracombe), Winifred A. Cook (Birkenhead), A. W. Jay (Devonport), Eveline H. Swanson (East Finchley), Alex. Tealby (London, W.C.), Frank Brebner, Jun. (Aberdeen), R. W. Fenton (Birstall), Gwendoline D. Harold (High Barnet), Violet Gillespie (Forest Hill), Rev. J. Wesley Houchin (Shenfield), H. Douglas Hamilton (Bristol), Enoch Daniels (Newcastle), Miss E. F. Parr (Clifton), Emily Cornell (Norwood), G. M. Faulding (Bayswater), Mrs. A. E. Wise (Leicester), E. W. Higgs (Clapton), W. S. Chesterfield (London, W.), A. J. Brooks (S. Mersham), Doris Smith (Burton-on-Trent), M. McDonnell (Glasgow), Frank Dale (Saxmundham), Alexander R. C. Eaton (Forest Gate), Rev. F. Hern (Rowlands Castle), M. C. Jobson (Middleton-one-Row), Irene Rathbone (Wootton), Marjorie Christmas (Sevenoaks), Frank L. Jellicoe (Stockwell), Doris Dean (Bromley), Claude W. Cundy (Nottingham), Austen H. Pennington (Oldbury), Miss Stockton (Leamington Spa), A. C. Laughton (Wakefield), G. von Tunzelmann (New Zealand), T. Scharf (London, E.).

II.—The PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best quotation is awarded to Mr. A. S. Barnard, of 5, Victoria Terrace, Walsall, for the following:

THE COMPLETE ENGLISH SOCIALIST
Review by JOSEPH CLAYTON

"He seized his clarion straight."

W. S. GILBERT—The Troubadour

We also select for printing:

A MAID OF METTLE. By MRS. L. "ALIEN" BAKER.
(Digby, Long.)

"She was gold, all gold, from her little gold toe,
To her organ of Veneration!"

T. HOOD—Miss Kilmansegg.

(Maud Marion Burnell, 6, Wellesley Villas, Ashford, Kent.)

THE GREAT ADVENTURE. By ARNOLD BENNETT.
(Methuen.)

"An'—wal, he up and kist her."

LOWELL—The Courtin'.

(Charles Powell, 290, Oxford Road, Manchester.)

SURVEY OF THE WOMAN PROBLEM.
By MAYREDER AND HERMAN. (Heinemann)

"I give it up"

LEWIS CARROLL.

(C. A. Bayley, 120, Main Street, Bangor, Down.)

A NECESSITY OF LIFE. By BETTY VAN DER GOES.

"... his pocket-handkerchief."

LEWIS CARROLL—The Walrus and the Carpenter.

(Elsie Bradfield, Oaklands, Warminster.)

WAGNER WITHOUT TEARS. REVIEW BY GEORGE SAMPSON.

"An onion will do well for such a shift"

SHAKESPEARE—The Taming of the Shrew.

(Doris Dean, 55, College Road, Bromley, Kent.)

III.—The PRIZE OF THREE NEW BOOKS for the best original epigram on any current literary topic or recent literary development is awarded to Miss E. M. Cooke, of The Poetry Bookshop, 35, Devonshire Street, Theobald's Road, London, W.C., for the following:

EPIGRAM ON A RECENT LITERARY DEVELOPMENT.

ON THE REDUCTION OF THE PRICE OF "THE TIMES" TO TWOPENCE.

Cheap things, 'tis said, are in the end most dear.
That they are "cheap" at all events is clear!
The Times, it seems, was dear and cheap as well—
'Twas cheap to buy, and yet too dear to sell:
(Though most men grant there's nothing "cheap" about it
And hold it far too dear to do without it),
And, now, to make the matter still more queer,
Its cost is nearly halved, and it is doubly dear

Good epigrams have also been sent in by Headley V. Storey (Brighton), J. Richard Ellaway (Basingstoke), E. F. Seymour (Kilburn), Miss Evelyn M. Abbott (Old Malton), H. R. Smith (Newcastle-on-Tyne), M. McDonnell (Glasgow), Frank Dale (Saxmundham), Rev. F. Hern (Rowlands Castle), E. S. Heron (Chester), E. A. Pearson (Fleet), Annie Jones (London, W.C.), Mrs. C. P. F. F. (Glasgow), A. Lee, Jun. (Southport), Miss A. M. Strickland (Farnham), Winifred M. Rich (Battersea), J. Drummond C. Monfries (London, S.W.), Vernon H. Porter (Clapton.)

IV.—The PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best review in not more than a hundred words is awarded to Mr. G. E. Wakerley, of 19, Chaworth Road, West Bridgford, Notts, for the following:

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF FREDERIC SHIELDS.
Edited by ERNESTINE MILLS (Longmans)

Mrs. Mills has made a contribution of real value to the history of British Art. The life-story of Frederic Shields, from the poverty of his youth, through the drudgery and striving of early manhood—dominated by a passion for Art—to the culmination of his work in the Chapel of the Ascension in Bayswater Road, makes a fascinating record. A character of strange moods and austeries, and great devoutness; a Puritan in life and outlook; his friendships were catholic in the extreme, including intimate relations with Rossetti and Madox Brown, and Dr. Alexander Maclaren, of Manchester.

We also select for printing:

THE MAN WHO WOULD NOT BE KING.
By SIDNEY DARK. (Lane)

Slavingtonville is a "model" town where Peptonized Soup has been manufactured by generations of puritanical Slavingtons. On to the throne of this unimaginative kingdom is pitchforked the unworthy Fenimore, the last of the male Slavingtons, and, incidentally, the first really human one. Slavingtonville irritates him. It is too perfect to be genuine. He knows his subjects for humbugs and machines. It is a "servile city" over which he rules. Laudably, though unwisely, he seeks to alter it. Disaster follows; and the King, to save his kingdom, cheerfully abdicates. An original, wittily-told story, written with a purpose, notwithstanding its author's disclaimer.

(Cyril G. Taylor, Farr Hall, Heswall, Cheshire.)

STELLA MARIS. By W. J. LOCKE. (Lane.)

Believed to be suffering from an incurable illness, Stella Maris lies, overlooking the sea, in a room which, by tacit consent is regarded as a sanctuary into which none of life's evils may penetrate. Her friends build for her an imaginary world where goodness holds undisputed sway, but an unexpected cure causes this dream world to fall at her feet in ruins, and she sees things as they really are. Mr. Locke treats the situation with consummate art, and if the charge of sentimentalism is brought against him, it should add to, rather than detract from, the laurels he has already won.

(Dorothy M. Horne, 29, Great James Street, Bedford Row, W.C.).

THE WEAKER VESSEL. By E. F. BENSON.
(Heinemann.)

"The Weaker Vessel" is one of Mr. Benson's best novels. The character-drawing is good, and the interest well-sustained. Harry Whittaker, though a slave to self-indulgence, holds our sympathy, while his artistic, strong-willed and loyal wife fascinates us. Louis Grey, the unselfish and high-souled actor-manager, is an ideal creation. We recognise the commonplace, Mrs. Ramsden with her faculty for making people uncomfortable; but Mr. Benson exaggerates the commonness of the simple, kindly, albeit shrewdly "climbing" Wilkins family, as is his custom in portraying the nouveau-riche. The proof-reading might have been more careful, and there are examples of loose and unidiomatic English.

(M. H. Menzies, Hackney College, Hampstead, N.W.).

THE INN OF TRANQUILITY By JOHN GALSWORTHY.
(Heinemann.)

The appeal of these essays, allegories and sketches is very various, yet strangely identical. Discursive as they are, and sometimes slight of theme, a single steadfast interest underlies them all, growing, as we read, until it becomes absorbing. This interest resides in the disclosure of the author's personality—subtle, tender, sympathetic, impassioned yet controlled; an idealist subduing revolt into luminous irony but never stooping to acquiescence. The influence of a singularly lovable temperament is impressed on every page, and remains with us long after the book is closed and its incidents have grown misty in the mind.

(Ernest A. Carr, Lyndall, Park Crescent, Tonbridge, Kent.)

We specially commend the reviews sent in by Margaret J. Laird (Belfast), M. M. M. (Glasgow, W.), Alan C. Fraser (Bridgwater), Miss B. Kirby (Hoylake), A. W. Jennings (Devonport), Miss J. A. Jenkins (Liverpool), Rev. A. Brewin (Loughborough), Muriel M. B. Aikman (Glasgow, W.), Marcella Whitaker (Dewsbury), Miss V. Huish (Derby), Sybil Waller (Boscombe, Hants.), M. A. Newman (Framlingham), Beatrice McC. Smith (Acton, W.), James A. Richards (Tenby), Frances A. S. Holbrow (Harrietsham, Kent), Frances D. Watson (Heaton Moor, Lancs.), F. J. Overton (Sutton Coldfield), E. T. Sandford (Saltash), H. Elrington (Monkstown, Co. Dublin), Robert Bruce (Giggleswick), Hannah Shaw (Toledo, Ohio), D. Pratt (Chatteris), Joseph Hanton (Arbroath), Ernest F. Seymour (Kilburn, N.W.), Miss E. F. Parr (Clifton, Bristol), M. Nicklin (Winscombe, Somerset), Lottie Hoskins (Moseley, Birmingham), Mary Kingdom (Leamington Spa), S. A. Doody (Boscombe, Hants.), L. H. Cooke (Heaton Moor, Lancs.), William F. Spalding (Palmer's Green, N.), Ernest S.

Photo by Ernest H. Mills

Mr. Edmund Gosse.

From a photograph taken in the Library of the House of Lords (1909).

Heron (Chester), Leonard Blake (West Ealing), Mary J. F. Bittleston (Tilford, Surrey), Mrs. Hooper (Wanstead, Essex), G. M. Fenwick (Hampstead, N.W.), K. I. Kyle (Belfast), M. St. Clare Byrne (Hoylake), J. Drummond C. Monfries (London, S.W.), Lucy C. Chamberlain (Llandudno), Charles Powell (Manchester), Donald M. (Antigua).

V.—The PRIZE OF ONE YEAR'S SUBSCRIPTION TO "THE BOOKMAN" is awarded to Mr. Conway Hastings, of 10, Sandwell Mansions, West Hampstead, N.W.

DICKENS IN AMERICA.

BY W. ROBERTS

DICKENS'S hold on American collectors has never been more strikingly demonstrated than at the exhibition of his works and of Dickensiana, opened at the Grolier Club, New York, on January 23rd, which I was privileged to visit through the kindness of my friend, Mr. A. F. Jaccaci. Apart from the Victoria and Albert Museum, this Grolier Club exhibition is one of the most interesting displays of its kind ever got together, its special strength being, not unnaturally, in American editions of Dickens's works and ana generally.

John Forster's forethought has preserved to the English nation most of the MSS. of Dickens's novels. There is, therefore, no possibility of any one person forming a large collection of such things. Yet the committee of the Grolier Club has had the good fortune to bring together for a few weeks the manuscripts, either entire or in part, of "The Pickwick Papers," "Sketches of Young Gentlemen," "Nicholas Nickleby," "A Christmas Carol," "The Battle of Life," "Out of Town," "The Best Authority," "His Brown Paper Parcel," "Hunted Down" and "A Holiday Romance," besides outline drafts of several short stories and so forth, apart from a number of autograph letters. Perhaps the earliest and the least known of these MSS. is the original petty cash book kept by Dickens when employed as a lawyer's clerk in the office of Edward Blackmore, Gray's Inn, with entries dating from January 5th to March 16th, 1828.

The portraits of Dickens range over a period of forty years. The earliest is a miniature on ivory by Mrs. Janet Barrow (the novelist's aunt) and is claimed to be the earliest known portrait, having been painted in 1830. The two latest, both in oils, are dated 1869 and 1870 respectively, the earlier being by William B. Myers, who was the young son-in-law of a Virginia friend of Dickens;

Photo by E. O. Hoppé.

Specially taken for THE BOOKMAN.

Mr. Edmund Gosse.

the artist's widow is still living and remembers that her husband made ad vivum sketches of Dickens from which this portrait was done. The later portraits, signed "E. P." and dated 1870, came from J. L. Toole's collection. In addition to various pencil sketches by H. K. Browne, 1836, by Maclise, 1840, and Charles Martin, 1843, there are seven by Pierre Morand, 1842, a fellow passenger of Dickens during his first voyage to America; these sketches show Dickens in various attitudes on the deck of the Britannia, and at the Tremont House, Boston, whilst the interest of the whole is greatly heightened by the fact that on the back of each is written an account of the circumstances under which it was made.

Practically every edition of Dickens is represented in this exhibition by the earliest, and in every "collectable" sense, the most desirable form; the monthly parts of such as were issued in that form including the original wrappers with the old advertisements. It is not necessary to specify any of the English editions of these exhibits. One of the earliest American editions of Dickens is the copy, in original brown boards, of "The Tuggs's at Ramsgate and other Sketches," issued at Philadelphia in 1837; the volume includes "The Pantomime of Life" which first appeared in Bentley's Miscellany of March the same year. It will be seen that Dickens's popularity in England found an almost immediate echo in the United States; so that in 1839 when Chapman & Hall issued the first complete edition of the two series of the "Sketches by Boz" in twenty monthly numbers, the Philadelphia firm brought out one in ten numbers in quarto with the twenty Cruikshank plates redrawn by Yeager; all the wrappers are dated 1838, and the edition contains two stories not in the English edition.

"The Pickwick Papers" (1836-7) had two rival American editions, one in Philadelphia in five small volumes and the other in New York in twenty-six monthly numbers in octavo, and both editions are here. The same may be said, indeed, of all the subsequent works of Dickens, several of which are also represented by early French, Dutch and German editions. To the English collector of Dickens the most attractive feature of the exhibition will be its extraordinary wealth, not merely of early American editions of Dickens, pirated and otherwise, but the wealth of publications of all descriptions called into existence by the novelist's visits to the United States. These things are very rarely seen in England: all are important to a complete collection of Dickens. For instance we have here a copy of "The Josephine Gallery," edited by Alice and Phoebe Cary and published in New York in 1859, to which Dickens contributed a story of seventeen pages entitled "Suburban Romance," which does not seem to have been printed separately. Much more interesting and important is the set of The New York Ledger of August 20th and 27th, and September 3rd, 1859, in which the story "Hunted Down" first appeared, and for which The Ledger paid $5,000; the story was not reprinted in England until August, 1860, when it came out in All the Year Round. The original MS., also here on loan, extends to fifteen pages quarto and is written in blue ink. Another story which Dickens wrote for an American magazine—The Atlantic Monthly—"George Silverman's Explanation" is here in its first printed form; whilst yet another story "A Holiday Romance," is likewise here, not only in the original MS. (with the original envelope, addressed to Ticknor & Fields, in which it was transmitted) but also Our Young Folks, January to May 1868, in which it first appeared. For each of those stories Dickens received £1,000 for the American rights.

Personal relics form another feature of the Exhibition. There are several books from Dickens's library with his book-plate and label, his seal, his ivory paper-knife, a chair from his dining-room at Gad's Hill Place, and the calendar which stood upon his desk at the time of his death. In contrast to the English custom of loan exhibitions, the names of the various owners are not given, but it is known that those who have contributed much to the success of the exhibition include Mrs. George D. Widener, the late Mr. J. P. Morgan, Mr. George Barr McCutcheon and Mr. F. R. Kaldenberg.

The admirable catalogue forms a record of permanent and scholarly value.

EDWARD DOWDEN.

BY THOMAS SELCOMBE.

ENGLISH literature has sustained a sensible loss by the death of Edward Dowden, a professor, scholar and critic, who possessed what may be deemed special claims upon the affectionate remembrance of readers of THE BOOKMAN. He was point-device the litterateur of a past age. He looked the part thoroughly, and his conversation, though not scintillating, was saturated with literary allusion and reminiscence. He was a great collector of books, and was never in a state of more obvious elation than when he had just made a find upon the parapets of Seine or Liffey; and his books, in a sense, kept open house. No connoisseur who was also a professorial authority was more accessible than he—community of interest in literary themes was quite sufficient to enlist his enthusiasm. He seldom failed to answer literary enquiries and curiosities, sometimes of a nature bordering upon the impertinent, and no one was more generous in his acknowledgment of assistance. His introductions for this reason are valuable as anatomies, showing the extraordinarily varied and circuitous manner in which literary history has often to be built up by a sort of coral-insect industry of queries and annotations. This friendliness, accessibility, and profound belief in the need for good fellowship in the republic of letters, certainly rendered him one of the best beloved litterati of our time. A bookman himself, he contributed the best account we have of the Primus of the Species, the bookman par excellence of another age, in his beautifully finished and sympathetic, though necessarily far from exhaustive, contribution on Southey to the "English Men of Letters." He was a great idealist in literature; he believed in elevating the subject to a lofty plane and in imputing nobility of purpose, wherever possible, to the noble army of authors. He seemed like a survival of the pre-mercantile era in letters, and he was undoubtedly one of the last of the Romanticists, to whom the summits were always aglow with the exquisite tints of sunset. Books were his passion, and literature his romance, full of those "sensations sweet, felt in the blood and felt along the heart." The morbid, cynical, mediocre and microscopic aspect of personalities and things appealed to him but faintly. He was always on the side of the angels. In literature his approach was essentially æsthetic and always æsthetic, generally optimistic. And he was a stylist by natural and elective affinity. To him it was always imperative to write about beautiful things beautifully, and, when his spirit was aflame with the emotion of fine poetry, to write finely and poetically. Some consider that in his essayistic work he carried this to preciosity; but the failing was not common with him, and no deduction whatever has to be made for it in estimating his two principal works. In these Dowden has another claim upon our gratitude, by grappling greatly—not with the peripheries and tenebrosities of English literature—but with two of the greatest, most central and most difficult of men of genius, Shakespeare and Shelley. Nor must it be inferred from what has been said that Dowden was in any sense precious or effeminate in his personality. Far from it, his proclivities were in some respects strongly athletic. He was himself a fine swimmer, was interested in athletic skill, himself a fine, well-proportioned figure and a strong upholder of the Hellenic ideal of balance between the physical and intellectual development. His gentleness of temper, it is thought, caused him to be preyed upon to a certain extent by the small fry of dilettante and literary quidnuncs. His affability gave a welcome for all who frequented the Sunday salon in his house in South Dublin, within three miles from "The Pillar." His discursive talk among people who sympathised with his enthusiasms was extremely delightful, and nearly always literary. But his interests, of course, were by no means exclusively "belle-lettristic." He was a strong advocate of Trinity College's attitude of aloofness from the scheme of a national university, and, on the larger issue, he was a convinced and almost bigoted anti-Nationalist. He was a dexterous and at times very effective public speaker. For many years his eloquence and persuasive charm were constantly at the disposal of the platforms of the Irish Unionist Alliance. He worked for the association from its formation in 1896 until his death, and occasionally acted as president. He was himself in the nineties asked to become a nominee for the representation of Dublin University, but stood aside to make way for Sir Edward Carson. Strong pecuniary temptations were held out to him to desert Dublin, and it was politics always that proved the determining factor in resolving him not to abandon his post. Perhaps he took his political influence a little too seriously. However that may be, Dublin was distinctly the gainer. His roots had sunk deep there. His European reputation and proficiency in the difficult science of comparative literature served as a magnet to many students; and there was surely never a professor of such world-wide standing who did more by the attraction of his character and the homely ease of his manner to remove the diffidence of the modest student. He would correct the mistakes of an undergraduate with the same courtesy that he would use towards an eminent opponent, and his intimate conversational manner showed no consciousness of the weight of his judgment.

"It must be admitted that his lectures were delivered in circumstances unworthy of a European reputation. In a small book-lumbered room just inside the gates of Trinity College the Professor of English Literature addressed each term a very small class of undergraduates and an old Roman Catholic priest: a privileged and regular attendant. He talked rather than lectured . . . and would turn aside from his subject to paint, with an odd mixture of official caution and Celtic temerity, a spirited portrait of some enfant perdu of literature or politics. Such digressions revealed the breadth of his humanity, the wide sweep of his sympathies, and the delicacy of his imagination."

He was the confessor and counsellor of many of his pupils and post graduates, who came to him for sympathy and advice in all matters concerned with literary history and criticism. He generally told them not to take the new Irish School and its reticent Theatre too seriously. But for Irish historical, literary and local studies of the old school he was a generous sponsor, as may be seen in his very appreciative introduction to his friend "Cæsar L. Falkiner's Essays relating to Ireland."

Edward Dowden's external history was exceptionally uneventful, even for a scholar, the stages of whose earthly progress have often enough to be traced exclusively in his successive publications and appointments. But Dowden never migrated at all. His translations were never of the kind which Swift described as the best. He came up to the Irish capital from Cork, where he was born on May 3rd, 1843, at the age of eighteen, won numerous prizes for English prose and English verse, and at the extraordinary age of twenty-four was appointed Professor of English Literature in his university—a chair which he held for over forty-six years, and from which he was removed only by sudden death.

Within ten years of his appointment Dowden had published the first of the two books by which he was to become best known—"Shakspeare: His Mind and Art," a book which had so much fine appreciation, originality and strength in it that it marked Dowden out at once as one of the half-dozen serious critics of his day. Carlyle himself thought well of the book, which was soon translated, and obtained the usual compliments of literary success, copious imitation and quotation. John Richard Green, who was then editing Macmillan's primers, at once secured Dowden to do the "Shakespeare Primer," and for twenty years at least this little book had an enormous vogue. "Shakspeare: His Mind and Art" thoroughly deserved its fame; it blew away the yeasty clouds of German symbolism and Dutch allegory which had collected round the great summit, discerned the superiority of Coleridge as an interpreter, and endeavoured to work out an intelligible evolution of Shakespeare's mentality as reflected in his dramas. The book created a school which, in the hands of such artists as Brandes and Stopford Brooke, has done really constructive work, and it was for a time regarded as the ne plus ultra of Shakespeare criticism. I find my copy, untouched, I am afraid, for well-nigh a score of years, deeply scored and underscored. And many of these passages are quite admirable—indeed, one might say much more—from the pen of a young man of thirty or thereabouts. Sometimes the author writes as though he were perorating, or as is now irreverently said, "talking through his hat," as where he remarks that:

"Shakspeare reaches the ultimate truths of human life and character through a supreme and indivisible energy of love, imagination and thought"

But he cordially recognises the rich feeling of the Elizabethans for concrete facts if he does not quite appreciate their tendency to rhetoric.

"Poetry in this period," he writes, "is put upon a purely human basis. No fate broods over the actions of men and the history of families; the only fatality is the fatality of character. Luck, an outstanding element helping to determine the lives of mortals, and not reducible to known law, luck good and bad, Shakspeare readily admits; but luck is strictly a thing in the course of nature. The divinity which shapes our ends works efficiently but secretly. Men's lives in the drama of Shakspeare are not disorganised and denaturalised by irruptions of the miraculous. The one standing miracle is the world itself. A vigorous and mundane vitality—this constitutes the basis."

Now this is well said, and throughout the book I find things to match it which convince me that Dowden's book, in spite of its faults, its preconceived notions of Shakespeare's personality, its over-solemnity of tone—as if criticism of Shakespeare were a religious rite—and its relative neglect of Shakespeare as a maker of light comedies—in spite of these things I predict that Dowden's book will live, and outlive most of its acclaimed successors and pretenders to sovereignty in this particular dominion. At the present moment, it is true, Dowden's rockets no longer startle us, and most of his stars have been stolen by subsequent commentators. At the end of the 'nineties Sidney Lee came along with his theory of the impersonality of Shakespeare's art—the antithesis of Dowden's theory, the antidote to his prescription. Dowden, however, took the matter in very good part, and wrote a generous and quaint tribute to his successor (and in a sense superseder) in the form of a sonnet, which does more credit on the whole, I think you will agree, to his heart than to his head. By the kindness of Sir Sidney Lee I am enabled to quote the apocalyptic poem:

TO MR. SIDNEY LEE,

that bestowed upon me a coppie of his "Life of Shake-speare."

"Swete Boye, whose name revives dead Astrophell, Fame through her goolden trumpe now blows it wide
With his who, gazing in Conceit's deepe well,
Saw Life and Death, and Love yew-crown'd, star-eyed.
O be thou too a wrestler with old Time,
Blunt his dread sickle, scatter his red sand!
Let men of Inde in their outlandish ryme
Rename thee queinte to men of Samarcand!
One globe brawn-shouldher'd, broad-hipp'd Herc'les bore!
Lightly thou liftest two of dreame and deed:
Is't not enough, but thou wilt venter more.
And roll reverting stones that ditches breed?
Leave II and W., Hall and Thorpe for me,
Who love them not, yet love this fruitfull Lea.

"EDWARD DOWDEN.

"[November, 1898]"

In the "Shakespeare Primer," Dowden, as it seems to me, in simplifying carries his theory as to the possibility of reading a man's history in the sequence of his published works almost to the verge of caricature. He had by this time, too, I imagine, been enmeshed in the ideas of another Shakespeare theorist, Dr. Furnivall; and although for the moment the world was fascinated by the novelty of the metrical tests and the symmetry of the 'schoolroom,' 'playtime,' 'in the depths,' and 'on the heights' categories, Shakespeare criticism proceeded, thenceforward on different and perhaps rather saner lines.

Of the interstitial work between his two main edifices, though much of it was good, there is not room to say much here. Dowden did two highly agreeable books on Browning and Montaigne, the last a labour of love into which he concentrated much reading and much of himself. He edited "Hamlet," "Cymbeline," "Romeo and Juliet," Shakespeare's sonnets, Southey's "Correspondence with Caroline Bowles," "The Lyrical Ballads of 1798" and Browning's "The Ring and the Book," but he was possibly rather too anxious and indecisive to make a heaven-sent editor. He was, however, a delightful essayist. In "Transcripts and Studies" and "The French Revolution and English Literature" (the substance of lectures given originally to Princeton University) he is perhaps a trifle academic, but in "Puritan and Anglican" (studies of Browne, Hooker, Vaughan, Hilton, Taylor, Baxter and Bunyan), and in the recent "Essays Modern and Elizabethan" (including Pater, Ibsen, Heine, Goethe, Cowper and Hayley, De Marsay, Shakespeare, "The Masque," "Elizabethan Romance," Lady Winchilsea, Dr. Farmer and other old Shakespeareans), his vintage is seen at its best. His short "History of French Literature" is thoroughly readable, essayistic, in fact, rather than compendious.

In his magnum opus, "The Life of P. B. Shelley" (2 vols., Kegan Paul, 1886) Dowden had to swim in a difficult medium. The life of Shelley is very controversial; no life during its brief period of activity has been so intensively studied or worked at by so many strong competitive biographers. The contemporary lives are ample and brilliantly written by such performers as Hogg, Peacock, Trelawny, Medwin, Leigh Hunt. Dowden was to write the official "Life" from copious material which had been accumulating for more than a generation, and as the mouthpiece of the Shelley family. To some extent it may be admitted that he suffers under the disabilities of all official biographers. He has to pay the price of exclusive information, and he cannot wholly evade the imputation of writing as a partisan. Shelley believed that if certain external tyrannies could be removed the life of human beings might straightway be made perfect, or all but perfect. Not selfishly, but with blind wilfulness and utter lack of experience, he took upon himself to believe that the institution of marriage was wholly superfluous and an obstacle to human progress. Acting upon this, for he was never afraid to act upon his theories, he married a girl of sixteen, when he himself was nineteen, without any conception whatever of the primary responsibilities thus incurred. Three years after marriage he had a misunderstanding with his girl wife—the misunderstanding, which was mainly upon his side and complicated by hallucinations to which he was prone, would have yielded to sane handling with time and a little experience of life. Shelley, however, without giving it a chance, yielded to the first prompting of the polygamous instinct implanted in most men and ran off with another girl of sixteen, treating the injury to his lawful spouse as little more than a harmless joke. Shelley atoned for this fatal error by bitter suffering. Henceforth the story of his life and art is one of advance—his character improving almost as much as his art, and the excellences of both far outweighing the defects. Now it is the plaidoyer of the Shelley family and its literary advocates to endeavour to condone this fatal flaw in Shelley's life, and it is a flaw which never ought to be and never can be condoned. Dowden tries to be fair, but he is subtly undermined by influences inimical to absolute veracity of statement. In this one point he errs, as it seems to me, by a suppressio veri. In other respects his book is well within the range of being pronounced a masterpiece—one of the very few masterpieces of English biography. It is already a rarity in its original form. The abridged and revised issue of eleven years later is in some ways a more perfect and a fairer performance. As a literary and critical biography it is almost beyond criticism, and my conviction is that it will carry Dowden's name along with Shelley's down the broken, changing, much tormented stream of literary fame.

Matthew Arnold in a famous article in the Nineteenth Century, dated January 1888, complained of Dowden's "Life" as a disservice to Shelley. The Professor, he maintained, held a brief for the Shelleys, his pleading for the poet is constant, and he does more harm than good to Shelley by it. On the other hand, says Arnold, Dowden's treatment of Harriet is not worthy of either his taste or his judgment. Shelley's misconduct to Harriet, his want of humour, his self-deception, stand out and are revealed in Dowden's biography for the first time. It is harder after this "Life" than it was before it to win back to the ideal Shelley of the lovely lyrics and

Professor Dowden

From a pencil drawing kindly lent by Miss Emily C. Devine.

the radiant soul,—the beautiful, if ineffectual angel. Arnold's "What a Set!" article struck a note which was followed in the main by Stephen, Traill, Churton Collins, Andrew Lang, and Professor Freeman, who coined the phrase: "chatter about Harriet." Impassioned and even bitter as he often was on the political platform, Dowden was ordinarily serene and suave in literary controversy. He replied with becoming gravity to Arnold in the Athenaeum, with more warmth (in the same weekly) to the aspersions of Churton Collins in the Quarterly Review. Dowden was at times, without doubt, needlessly stilted, sophistical, homiletic, and sentimental, but he always endeavoured to be absolutely fair. The retrenched version of the book is the truer and the saner. A better response to Arnold than the biographer himself could formulate was made in the able article on "Shelley contra mundum," contributed to the Nineteenth Century of May, 1908, by Mr. Arthur P. Nicholson, in which the difference between poet and critic is summed as that between the man with ichor in his veins and the man with ice. Allowing a little for bias, Dowden's judgment of Shelley the poet stands the test of time better than Arnold's. Dowden first treated the Shelley records with the pious solemnity of a gospel narrator, and he will probably go down to posterity as the foremost of the Shelley synoptists.

New Books.

MR. MASEFIELD'S "DAUBER."

The clearest distinction of Mr. Masefield's art is its intense and eager perception of tragic idea. Pity, as contrasted with curiosity, presides over his temper, and he is far more deeply moved by the struggle of man with external circumstance and his own primal passions than by subtleties of character, which means that his instinct is for tragedy rather than for comedy. And whilst comedy, the analysis of character in conflict, may find complete expression in prose, whilst indeed prose may often be its aptest medium, since it enables the artist to heighten his delineation by means of a familiar flavour of speech, tragedy, the analysis of passion or emotion in conflict, aiming not at all at external distinctions but intent only on elemental idea, needs the more urgent and stricter convention of verse for its fulfilment in art. It is a very significant fact that the greatest of our modern prose dramatists, Mr. Galsworthy, with his admirable precision, calls "The Silver Box," in spite of its relentless severity, "a comedy," whilst he calls "Justice," which is not a whit more uncompromising in its austerity of temper, "a tragedy." The distinction is perfectly just. In "The Silver Box" the central interest is not in the opposition of a malign social machinery to Mrs. Jones and her husband, but in the operation of Mrs. Jones's clearly defined character in the catastrophe brought about by this opposition, whilst in "Justice" the central interest is in a tragic idea, for the expression of which Falder is merely a symbol. In the one case character is everything, in the other it is of relative unimportance; and a subtle artistic principle is illustrated in the fact that Mr. Galsworthy's comedy is a perfectly achieved work of art, because we feel that he has found an exact medium for its expression and that no revision of the artist's method could intensify the final result, whilst his tragedy leaves us feeling that the motive has not been exhausted, and that it needed a greater imaginative pressure and consequently a more pregnant utterance wholly to liberate it. In other words, prose satisfies us in the comedy of character, however fierce the comedy may be, but it fails us in the tragedy of idea.

Every artist has his own special difficulties to overcome, and some lack of clearness in Mr. Masefield's perception of this principle would seem to be the particular defect which he has yet to discipline. "The Tragedy of Nan," is one of the great achievements of contemporary literature, one of the half-dozen things that warrant some renewal of our pride in our theatre, but it ought to have been greater. Nan herself is not a character, but the central symbol of a noble tragic idea, and she called earnestly for the high rhythmic expression which Mr. Masefield could certainly have given her. The speech of the play is lovely as it is, the witness of a new imagination, but it should have been the highest kind of speech, the incontestably supreme medium for poetry, verse. And the reverse side of Mr. Masefield's yet unsolved problem as an artist is discovered in "Dauber" and the other poems which have deservedly been so much discussed and praised during the last two years. Reading through this poem again on its publication in book form, we are more than ever grateful for an intensity of tragic vision such as has very rarely been excelled in our poetry. That is an emphatic thing to say, but it is said with the most careful deliberation. The young painter seeking so earnestly to find expression for himself, without guide and in the midst of an indifference that is terrible in its self-certainty; the savagery and beauty of the sea in all its moods; the strange impersonal courage of ships and the almost brutal heroism of the shipmen—these are changeless things seen anew by this poet, and transfigured by him into the symbols found by a new temperament for as changeless a tragic idea. And Mr. Masefield's utterance, while it is concerned with this its chief and what should be its only purpose, is here magnificent:

"And then one day I had a job to do
Down below bridge, by where the docks begin.
And there I saw a clipper towing through,
Up from the sea that morning, entering in Raked to the nines she was, lofty and thin,
Her ensigns ruffling red, her bunts in pile,
Beauty and strength together, wonder, style.

"So the night past, but then no morning broke—
Only a something showed that night was dead.
A sea-bird, cackling like a devil, spoke,
And the fog drew away and hung like lead.
Like mighty cliffs it shaped, sullen and red;
Like glowering gods at watch it did appear,
And sometimes drew away, and then drew near.

"They smeared the paint with turpentine until
They could remove with mess-clouts every trace
Of quick perception caught by patient skill
And lines that had brought blood into his face.

"And then the night fell dark, and all night long
The pointed mountain pointed at the stars,
Frozen, alert, austere; the eagle's song
Screamed from her desolate screes and splintered scars."

Writing like this is not flawless, the strain imposed by the chosen stanzaic form shows itself here and there. But that we are in the presence of poetry of a rare and vivid kind there can be no doubt. And these passages are not of outstanding excellence. They represent the normal level on which the poem moves whenever its purpose is towards the expression of tragic idea, which it habitually is. Artistic cause and effect are marked throughout "Dauber" with astonishing intensity. As long as the impulse is strictly and essentially poetic, poetic expression comes to Mr. Masefield with unerring certainty; his profound sense of pity always brings with it a high passion of speech surely compelled into the strict beauty of verse. But running parenthetically through the sustained pity of "Dauber" there is a curiosity as to subtleties of character, which is not an impulse essentially poetic, and whenever this is allowed to assert itself the sinews of the work are relaxed and we get something which is not poetry at all. It may not be without admirable qualities in other directions, but in art an admirable thing in the wrong place violates form and loses all its virtue. A striking example of this weakness is the passage in which Dauber, after the fierce long struggle with the storm, "torn by his frozen body's lust for heat," is offered his mug of grog with his mates, and remembers:

"A promise long since made at home
Never to taste strong liquor. Now he knew
The worth of liquor; now he wanted some.

'Please, sir, I'm temperance.'

The moment jerks us rudely to a readjustment of our imaginative perception, and our first instinct is to say that here is false sentiment, a wilful transition from poetic splendour to a rather weakly pathos. But this is not the real explanation. The passage shows a quite acute perception of an interesting subtlety of character. By itself it is a piece of external realism as justly realised as Mrs. Jones's plea to the magistrate:

"And of course, your worship, he had had very little to eat all day, and the drink does go to the head when you have not had enough to eat. Your Worship may not know, but it is the truth."

But whilst Mrs. Jones moves us in her curiously poignant revelation of character, Dauber merely irritates us in his equally poignant revelation, and the reason is that the one comes in its right artistic context and the other does not. Shakespeare's distribution of prose and verse is directed almost entirely by this artistic necessity. Analysis of the externals of character as distinguished from fundamental passion and idea is not a thing poetic in itself, and to impose a poetic expression upon it is both to destroy the value of the analysis and to rob rhythmic speech of its right significance. Mr. Masfield has written a poem full of memorable beauty, exercising a vision for which we cannot be too grateful, but he has not achieved a perfect whole, because he has attempted at intervals to set down without modification of form things which, whatever their values may be, do not belong to poetry. To say that all things are in the province of poetry is to speak a dangerous half-truth. There is nothing but may be distilled into poetry, but there is much which in its particularised form is too local and too dependent on accidental instead of common factors to be transposed directly into poetry. The emotion behind Dauber's "Please, sir, I'm temperance," might justly be subdued by the poet to his purpose, but when it is particularized in this way its poetic value is lost in the dust of external association. Poetry should concern itself as little with the accidental as with the abstract, and it is as dangerous to confuse the one of these as the other with the concrete.

To philosophy the abstract, the accidental to the comedy of character, and to poetry passion and idea, man's tragic or delighted perceptions of the world. Mr. Masfield's faculty as a poet is not easily to be measured. It has already brought him wide recognition, and the affection of all who care for poetry and are eager for its health and sanity. When he purges it of this one uncertainty of instinct which, as it seems, at present hinders its complete fulfilment, he will do yet greater things for the art he serves. To so fine an instrument nothing is impossible.

JOHN DRINKWATER.

MICHAEL FAIRLESS.*

In a little prefatory note to this volume, Mrs. A. H. Haggard, the eldest sister of "Michael Fairless," remarks that it has always been a matter of wonder to her "that the affection of the public for a favourite author should stop short of observing his wishes. Michael Fairless most straitly charged those who would represent her to abstain from the publication of her identity;" but the public has been so insistent in its demand for knowledge of her that it has, at length, become necessary to disregard her sincere desire and publish the simple truth in order to put an end to the dissemination of false, and half-true and wholly imaginary accounts of her. Now, I cannot see that there is anything to wonder at at all in this curiosity of the public; it is so far from being a blameworthy curiosity that I think there is something fine in it, it is a sign of grace, and I should have thought the less of a public that had never manifested it. To have read "The Roadmender," to have felt the charm of its writing, the spiritual beauty of its quiet philosophy, and to have laid it down and gone on knowing and caring nothing about the personality of the thinker and writer of so unique a book, would have argued just that shallow carelessness, that selfish indifference in the public which I, for one, should have felt was ungrateful and unworthy in them and to be condemned. It is difficult to be grateful to an abstraction, it is impossible to be subdued by the spell of "The Roadmender" without feeling something of gratitude and affection for the exquisite, gently wise spirit that lives in its pages, and if the public had exhibited no desire to come somehow into some sort of personal touch with the very human author of it, then you might have been sure the book had taken no deep hold on them and its life could not have been long. The public shows little enough interest in the average author, even when it is buying his books by thousands; there is no demand for his biography, and it would not sell if it were published. Their interest and their curiosity concerning Michael Fairless is every way a good sign. I am glad it has compelled the publication of this brief record of her, and having read it, I realise that the public was doubly right, and the book was a necessity. It is written with such complete and sympathetic understanding and so reticently that Michael Fairless herself could scarcely, in the circumstances, have wished a word of it had been left unsaid, moreover, it throws light on her own work and helps to a fuller comprehension of it.

Knowing now the conditions under which "The Roadmender" was written you find new and more poignant meanings in much of it, you realise the whole significance, especially, of the second and third parts, "Out of the Shadow," and "At the White Gate." Perhaps it would be better if we remained in ignorance of the lives of some authors—they square so little with their works; but in this case it is far otherwise. Nearly two thirds of the book are devoted to an intimate and admirable critical study of the writings of Margaret Fairless Barber by her friend and literary executor, Mrs. Haggard, in the other third her sister, Mrs. Scott Palmer, tells the story of her life, and it is all that a reading of her three volumes, "The Roadmender," "The Gathering of Brother Hilarus" and "The Grey Brethren," might have led you to anticipate—the story of a shy, sensitive, beautifully human and indomitably brave personality. She only turned to writing when her health was so broken that she could no longer follow more active pursuits: "When she became too ill to go on with her modelling, she began to write, when her writing could not be done in a sitting position, she propped the paper on her chest and wrote lying down; by and by the right hand could no longer be used, so she wrote with her left, a beautiful legible script. When increased physical weakness made writing in every way impossible, she dictated." She had already entered the Valley of the Shadow when she commenced "The Roadmender"; it was written in suffering and difficulties that could never shake her courage or ruffle her patience; it was finished only a day or two before the end, and published after her death. Brief as the biography is, it is sufficient; it is a delicate sketch, with enough of detail filled in to make it a necessary and illuminating commentary on the author's work. It tells you what "The Roadmender" omits; and with this small addition "The Roadmender" becomes her best and fullest biography. Which is as it should be; the public, I repeat, was right to want that, and it was right that so much should be given to us.

A.

* Michael Fairless: Her life and Writings. By W. Scott Palmer (M. E. Dowson) and A. M. Haggard. With two portraits by Elinor Dowson. 2s. 6d. net. (Duckworth).

FORGOTTEN PATHS.*

Until the nineteenth century hemmed large numbers of people out of sight of green fields and flowing rivers, nobody bothered very much about scenery. The grandeur of the Highlands appalled Dr. Johnson as every other visitor, and it is safe to say that few travellers, until the nineteenth century, mused over the silver lochs. There was more musing in Fleet Street taverns in the good old times.

And then came what intelligent persons refer to as "the industrial revolution," and long, low streets of dingy, red-brick houses, crushing in their dead monotony. The countryside was eaten up by these miserable legions of dwellings. Smoke began to hang in foul clouds over miles of drab squalor. Tall, hideous chimneys erected their heads like veritable steeples of commerce.

And so people took to the road again. But not as the Briton, running bare-foot along the Icknield Way—nor the Anglo-Saxon herding his droves, nor yet, to take a stride, as the rumbling coach flinging the white dust heavenwards. For none of these had learned the secret of the road. It came rather as a grand discovery by those who had eyes to see that Nature held the true beauty of life, and contrast found its greatest treasure-trove on the broad highway.

Borrow, Wordsworth, Burroughs, Whitman, Stevenson, Jeffries and many others set the fashion of wandering.

And so, too, Mr. Belloc, and Mr. Edward Thomas.

We do not propose to discuss whether Mr. Thomas is in the right when he states that Icknield was the generic name for a road.

"The Icknield Way," he says, "is sufficiently explained as the chief surviving road connecting East Anglia and the whole eastern half of the regions north of the Thames with the west and western half of the south of England."

We are mildly interested but we do not care. What this very pleasant book has done for us is to picture in our minds the romance that even the most ordinary lane may possess to recall for a moment or two the travelling steps that have been gathered into silence over the hill. Each road has individuality—

"Some roads creep," says Mr. Thomas, "some continue merely; some advance with majesty, some mount a hill on curves like a soaring sea-gull."

Mr. Thomas (despite the heat of it) loves the road, as we all do, and when he can put his catalogue of facts in his pocket, is as charming and pensive and rollicking a companion all in the proper place as any one could want. Read his racy description of the man he chats with in the train, the fellow who knew "men's rouls, and what each farm cost when it changed hands last. He knew also the men living and dead, and the lives they lived, what they were worth, and whose bed they died in."

* "The Icknield Way." By Edward Thomas. 7s 6d net (Constable & Co.)

Grand Junction Canal.

From "The Icknield Way," by Edward Thomas. (Constable.)

But Mr. Thomas is, above all, a stylist. He can write in the reflective vein of Mr. A. C. Benson, just as he can write with the sort of dry humour of Mr. William Caine in the "Angler at Large."

The following, in reference to the desolate home of a dead villager, is charged with atmosphere:

"The silence of the house and road was like a sea suddenly expanding infinitely about me. As I turned away the child's sob, the song of the robin, the scream of the swifts fell into that black silence without breaking it, like tears into a deep sea."

Grave and gay Mr. Thomas takes us by the hand along the Icknield Way. May it not be long before we set out with him again.

SIR HERBERT TAYLOR.*

General Sir Herbert Taylor is to-day nothing more than a name to most people. Yet in his life he was a person of very considerable importance, albeit, like the permanent officials of the great Government departments whose decisions to a great extent control the country, he never bulked largely in the public eye. His influence was that of the power behind the throne, and while he sowed wise advice, others reaped the benefit and the credit. Born in 1775, he entered the Foreign Office at the age of seventeen, and at the end of the year was appointed secretary to Sir James Murray, whom he served on the Continent until the close of the campaign of 1793. Always inclining to a military career, he became a cornet in the 2nd Dragoon Guards in the spring of 1794, and in fourteen months was promoted captain in the same regiment. His talents were so remarkable, and he had so thoroughly taken advantage of the opportunities of acquiring information offered while he was with Sir James Murray, that he was singled out for special duties; and acted during 1794-5 as assistant-secretary to the commanders-in-chief in the Netherlands, the incapable Duke of York and his successor, Sir David Dundas. After the close of the campaign, the Duke of York, who had a great admiration and liking for him, made him his assistant secretary at the Horse Guards, and later his private secretary. In this latter capacity he was brought into touch with other members of the Royal Family, and in 1805 he became private secretary to George III.—a position he occupied for five years, when the King became mad. The Regency being established, he filled a similar post under Queen Charlotte until her death in 1818. He was an executor of the Queen's will, and later of the King's will. He represented Windsor in Parliament from 1820, and was military secretary to the Duke of York from that year until 1827, when for a short time he held the same post under Wellington, who had succeeded the Duke as Commander-in-Chief. For a short time in 1828 he was Surveyor-General of the Ordnance and then Adjutant-General to the Forces; and on the accession of William IV. became the private secretary of that monarch, a position he retained throughout the reign.

A man who had held so many and such varied positions in the Army and at Court, and especially one who had been private secretary to three monarchs, must have seen much that was interesting. Sir Herbert, however, was a man of great discretion, and he carried his cautiousness to the extent of ordering his official memoranda to be destroyed after his death, thereby, no doubt, consigning to eternal silence many curious phases of unwritten history.

"Other papers and letters of interest were, however, put aside—and a selection of these, together with his reminiscences, are introduced in the following pages," the able and careful editor, Mr. Ernest Taylor, states. "They range from the close of the eighteenth century to 1838 [the year preceding Sir Herbert's death], many of them portraying, I think, to a considerable extent, the personality of the man who found himself constantly centred near the throne, and typifying certain social and military aspects of the period in which he played his part."

* "The Taylor Papers: being a record of certain reminiscences, letters, and journals in the life of Lieut.-Gen. Sir Herbert Taylor, G.C.B., G.C.H." 15s. net. (Longmans).

The editor does not put the value of the book too high, and, though it makes its principal appeal to those well versed in the history of the period, the general reader will find it interesting, albeit the absence of explanatory footnotes will sometimes hamper him. Did space permit, many extracts could be made from these pages. For example, there is a brief account of the King of Naples:

"General Murat was also at Cannes previous to embarking in the attempt which cost his life. He was for a fortnight at Pimichinat's, his chief attendant being General Pignatelli. During this period he mixed readily with the natives, talked freely, chiefly in abuse of Buonaparte, and appeared cheerful and unconcerned, though his pecuniary resources were small. There is a small grass plot below the road, near the inn where the natives assembled in the evening to dance. Here he would be on the grass, looking on and smoking, and occasionally singing Barcarolles."

We also get a glimpse of Napoleon at Cannes, shortly after he landed in France after his escape from Elba.

"During this period the troops he had brought with him—remarkably fine men of soldier-like appearance—formed three sides of a square, in which he and his officers stood, the fourth side being open and accessible to the people of the town and country who crowded to see him from curiosity rather than from any interest in his undertaking. Some of these told me the weather was cold, and that they kept their hats and cloaks on, and were amused at seeing the Prince of Monaco, whom Buonaparte had summoned from the neighbourhood, standing in the square in grande costume, silk stockings, chapeau bras, bowing and shivering. At length Buonaparte dismissed him with a sneer, saying, 'Mon Prince, votre Altesse peut retourner dans ses états.'"

LEWIS MELVILLE

CHANCE AND THE NOVELIST.*

"The tune of chance," according to Mr. and Mrs. Castle, in the preface to a new volume of short stories, "subdued or assertive, can be heard through every story that pretends to portray human life." In the sense, of course, that every story has to deal with a series of events or happenings, this is undeniable, for a story, however psychological or philosophical may be its ground-work, is the merest dead machine if nothing ever happens in it. And every happening is by way of being a matter of fortune, good or ill, to the persons who for the moment are presented to the reader. So it seems to me that Mr. and Mrs. Castle were enunciating a wise truism, of which we may sometimes, in our preoccupation with other things, lose sight, rather than revealing a particularly subtle truth. But in the sense that chance, in a romance, is some swift adventure, their preface is singularly appropriate to their own work. Here are gay and sometimes tragic adventures, to the number of nine, the first a characteristic and well-handled story of a past time, in which the turns are rung upon French wit and English courage, vengeance and constancy, concluding with an astonishing but (in view of the preface) entirely credible interposition of the elements to prevent fratricide. The other stories are military, historical, and modern Irish, all good and competent, and just what we expect from such accomplished practitioners as Mr. and Mrs. Castle—some long enough to have the swagger almost of full-dress novels, others for the delight of a few moments only.

Mr. Ernest Mansfield takes Chance very seriously indeed, for his story is a heaped-up treasure of surprising incidents, from ruby- and gold-mines in India to jealous murder, wrongful accusation, flight from prison, and the final rectification of all misunderstandings. One may question the accuracy of Mr Mansfield's accounts of legal processes, but his story is exciting, and he has a genuine knowledge of prospecting and loyalty to prospectors which does not fail to interest.

* "Chance the Piper." By Agnes and Egerton Castle. (Smith, Elder.)—"Ralph Raymond." By Ernest Mansfield. (Stanley Paul.)—"Patchwork Comedy." By Humfrey Jordan. (Putnam.)—"Pebble." By R. G. Behrens. (Duckworth.)—"Isle of Thorns." By Sheila Kaye-Smith. (Constable.)—"White Witch." By Meriel Buchanan. (Jenkins.)—"The Ambassador." By William Wriothlesley. (Heinemann.)—"Mr. Flight." By Ford Madox Hueffer. (Howard Latimer.)—"Father Ralph." By Gerald O'Donovan. (Macmillan.)—"Succession." By Ethel Sidgwick. (Sidgwick & Jackson.) 6s. each.

Both Mr Humfrey Jordan (in "Patchwork Comedy") and Mr R. G. Behrens (in "Pebble") deal with women whose unconventionality sometimes arouses our suspicious, and they both deal in rather ingenuous style with dissolute husbands who have wrecked or almost wrecked the lives of their young and attractive wives. Whereas Mr. Jordan boldly makes his heroine a sparkling young woman of spirit, Mr. Behrens is—as a note to the book implies—more considerably occupied with events which have their root in facts. But the element of chance is very strong in both books, or they would never have ended as pleasantly as they do. Neither book impresses by its literary quality.

It was a remarkable chance indeed that sent Miss Kaye-Smith's heroine tramping on her own account in Sussex, that made her further the innocent mistress of a rather promiscuous Scotsman, and that introduced her to Raphael Moore. But Miss Kaye-Smith is a romantic artist, and she deals with somewhat outré and startling events. It is unusual for heroines to stab men, but it is still more unusual for them to have as much debate about going to prison for the crime as Sally had with her lover. The artificial conclusion of the story gives its remissent glow a disappointing quality, because Miss Kaye-Smith is so obviously able to create in the easiest imaginable style a picture of natural beauty hard to forget. All the more pity, therefore, that with so much talent she should have wasted it upon an unconvincing theme, and upon a heroine of whose vulgarity she seems hardly to be aware. This all arises from a fear of being feminine and ramby-pamby, a fear which carries Miss Kaye-Smith into an exaggerated unconventionality of situation and language. But of the beauty of much of the book there can be no two opinions; it would be remarkable for that alone.

"White Witch" is a story of titled Germans, who seem a little obsessed by sentiment. It is terribly hard that two sisters should both engage themselves to the wrong men, when a little bluntness at a crucial moment might have saved them the inconvenience. As it is, the one manages to marry the man of her heart, while the other only achieves happiness in her marriage to an Englishman after some harassing experiences. More convincing, perhaps, in its handling of foreign notabilities, is Mr. Wriothlesley's "The Ambassador." Mr. Wriothlesley seems to know a great deal about the way conversation is sustained in diplomatic circles, and gives a very realistic (and not too dazzling) picture of an interesting kind of society. Here again there is a matrimonial misunderstanding—the over-zealous lovemaking of a spendthrift who discovers in time that his divinity has no money. It is, perhaps, hard to feel convinced that the two women whose new novel, "Patchwork Comedy" is published by Messrs. Putnam.

Mr. Humfrey Jordan,

(both coolly and strongly drawn) could have been deceived by a man in whom the author never for one moment allows us to believe; but, on the other hand, the love-making has an air of truth, and the background of society has all the conviction that arises from a hard adherence to observed fact. Chance, in the shape of the sudden accident to an amusing little boy, an accident which allows the heroine self-respectingly to remain unmarried, is worked rather obviously, which is a pity, considering that the quality of the book is high enough to stand above mere device.

Mr. Ford Madox Hueffer's latest novel is a cynical romance of a Jewish soap-maker, blessed with millions, who aspires to political and social eminence. Mr. Hueffer handles "Mr. Fleight" (with his friends Mr. Blood and Miss McPhail) as though it were the easiest matter in the world to write an extravaganza. And it is remarkable that the fun, although not always in the best of taste, never flags. From the moment when Mr. Fleight correctly guesses Mr. Blood to be calculating the proportion of motor- to horse-vehicles passing his club on Derby day, to the moment of Mr. Fleight's achievement of the first great triumph of his progressive career, there is no doubt that Mr. Blood is an extraordinarily original character. He and his motley gang of beneficiaries are, without doubt, the most delightful persons in a book which is truly amusing.

Very different from "Mr. Fleight" is "Father Ralph," a sober and dignified study of the childhood, youth, and manhood of a young Irish priest who has in the end to forsake his calling. The book is written with intense sympathy which never seems to degenerate into prejudice. It contains a series of portraits—of priests and laymen alike—which, however slight, are all recognizable for those of persons who are more than shadows. And it gives, very simply, an appalling picture of the young priest's growth to detestation of the forces which combine to shatter his dream of "vocation." The book is hardly a story; it is a serious human narrative, depending upon no chance, but upon the honesty and virtue of its own conviction.

The present reviewer is not one of those who were so fortunate as to read Miss Ethel Sidgwick's "Promise"; but the further growth of Antoine Edgell, as described in Miss Sidgwick's new novel, "Succession," has an engrossing power of unusual quality. It is the story of a young musical genius, studied, as it were, with conscientious moderation. Miss Sidgwick's work is tremendously expert—so expert that the conversations, of which there are many, seem almost overpoweringly competent. They have a compression and a dove-tailing that is Meredithian, allied with an air of naturalness that might almost deceive an unsuspecting reader into supposing them exact. Somehow one carries from the book a sense of expertness rather than of vivid life; but it seems ungrateful to insist upon this aspect when the book as it stands, whatever the shortcomings produced by its competence, is so decided an achievement. For Chance has no hand here, so cunningly is Chance handled. All Chance is made so veracious and so apparently not Chance at all, but mere recital of essential action and reaction, that Chance seems to have lost its occupation, until we gloss it as Nature.

FRANK SWINNERTON.

FOLK-DRAMA.*

The portrait which prefaces Lady Gregory's new volume comes as an illumination, because it helps one to understand the author's outlook. The uplift in the eyes portends the acute vision of the confirmed idealist, while the soft kindly humorous mould of the lips gives a look of tender worldly wisdom to the face. The Celt is the spoilt darling of the human race—he, alone, can play pranks with the serious things of life—he alone can approach the holy things of the spirit with a levity that soils no halo—he also can make merry with the things of the soul. Upon that attitude towards reality rests the fact that the Irish school of dramatists have succeeded in raising the common-places of life into the realms of poetry. Thus, it happens that out of the most banal materials, the Celt, with child-like freshness, will evoke a soul that will blossom into poetry as easily as though it were common speech. Here is Cracked Mary, a "natural," speaking:

* "New Irish Comedies." By Lady Gregory. 3s. net. (Putnam.)

"All bad things quieten in the night time, and the ugly thing itself will put on some sort of a decent face."

And all through these five plays, you will find the common folks saying the grand things, with a sanctified simplicity that might easily be the despair of a minor poet. Through each play the shapes change, and I confess I find myself wondering sometimes whether they do take on the form of reality. It may be that I have seen too many examples of the Irish National Theatre—and somehow have learnt the trick of them—but occasionally, in this volume, the usually pure sense of abandon—the joy of life—becomes astonishingly infrequent, as though the inspiration had halted on the way. Perhaps it is that the material of Irish drama is confined to a range of self-conscious individualists who seem always to act "in the limes." "The Bogie Man," a duologue between two chimney sweeps, is delicious in its humour, always provided you allow the possibility of the situation. Two "harmless driftly lads" meet and discuss an expected meeting with their well-doing cousins, Dermot and Timothy, whose names have been dinned into them as models of virtue—only to discover that they are themselves respectively the cousins referred to.

"The Full Moon" is welcome, because it re-introduces us to that delightful rascal, Hyacinth Halvey, and shows how he managed to clear out of Cloon and of the excellent character he had been trying to lose, under the pretence that he had been bitten by a mad dog. The humour here is unforced, and like all the best humour, the characters are unconscious of it.

"Damer's Gold" has a half revealed vein of tragedy in it that lends a special savour to its dialogue. But for sheer throbbing beauty, a beauty that hurts just as it heartens, I like most of all "McDonough's Wife." The famous wandering piper came home from a carousal, in which he had spent all his earnings, to find the dead body of his wife. Neither in house nor pocket is there a penny left to save her from a pauper's grave. The artist in him calls out—his art will call the people to his side and he will conquer.

"And as to the rich of this world, I would not humble my head to them. Let them have their serving men and their labourers and messengers will do their bidding. But the servant I myself command is the pipes that draws its breath from the four winds, and from a wind that is beyond them again, and at the back of the winds of the air. She was a wedded woman and a woman having my own gold ring on her hand, and my own name put down with hers in the book. But she to have been a shameless woman as ye make her out to be, and sold from tinker to tinker on the road, it is all one! I will show Galway and the world that it does signify; that it is not fitting McDonough's wife to travel without company and good hands under her, and good following on the road. Play now, pipes, if you never played before! Call to the keeners to follow her with screams and beating of the hands, and calling out! Set them crying now with your sound and with your notes, as it is often you brought them to the dance-house."

The moral that art conquers all at the last is eminently satisfying to the artist. Lady Gregory's New Comedies are certainly a notable contribution to the Irish Folk History plays.

R. L.

INDIA AND THE INDIANS.*

Books about India are almost invariably interesting, and this book is no exception to the rule. It was written after many years spent at missionary work in the vicinity of Poona; it gives evidence of close and careful observation. But I think the title is somewhat a misnomer; Poona and its environs may be representative of the Deccan, but one could hardly generalize about Sind from experience gained.

* "India and the Indians." By Edward F. Elwin. 10s. 6d. (John Murray.)

exclusively in Bengal, or draw conclusions regarding Rajputana from a study of the ethnology of Madras. And it is just this sort of thing which Mr. Elwin does. Had he restricted the application of his theories to the central Deccan and given the book an appropriate name, it would have been far better. "India is really waking up, but she is doing it in her own way." Is this really the case, or is Mr. Elwin unconsciously misled by the immediate local (and possibly impermanent) results of his missionary labours? Have we indeed reached the end of the period during which the myriads between Cape Comorin and "The Abode of Snow" have been content to "let the legions thunder past"—to regard material things as less important than the things of the spirit? According to the author the sea of thought to which the Indian mind was wont to plunge, no longer exists, but this view seems to do but scant justice to the Indian intellect. Surely that mind-plasm of which the Vedic Hymns are perhaps the noblest result, cannot have become absolutely sterile. Can India wake up effectively? Because the Baboo furnishes his house with cheap European furniture, because the pilgrim uses the railway, and the gramophone squeals at the village feast, are there not abundant evidences that those strange, unmoral cults, so incomprehensible to the Western mind, are held to by the mass of the people as tenaciously as ever. Can the bonds of caste be thrown off? We have seen Japan break the chain of the Shogunate and arise like a freed giant, but the Shogunate was like a single chain, whereas caste might be compared to a multitude of tiny fibres, strangling every blood-vessel and compressing every nerve. But whatever may be thought of his conclusions, everyone must admire the painstaking and conscientious observation which Mr. Elwin has spent on the people to whose welfare he has apparently devoted his life.

W.C.S.

A SUBURB IN BOHEMIA.*

This is the best way to go to work in writing about London—to devote a separate volume to each district of it. So vast a place, so rich in every variety of interests, cannot be adequately dealt with in any other fashion. Mr. Eyre has found more than enough material in St. John's Wood alone to fill a large and well produced volume, he has the advantage of coming of a notable family that has been intimately connected with the neighbourhood for more than two centuries past, and he has the right historian's interest in everything concerning its origins, its growth, its famous houses and the haunts of its celebrities. He frankly admits that its reputation has not always been so respectable as it might have been, and gives entertaining accounts of some of the "fair dwellers in the Wood," who were responsible for that reputation, the most important of which is the record of the beautiful Miss Howard, who played such a prominent part in the career of Napoleon III., both during his exile in England and after he had made himself Empe or of the French.

But St. John's Wood has a multitude of better memories, all of which Mr. Eyre recalls for you. Hood lived there, and Mary Lamb, the Howitts, Shelley's Jane Williams, Jefferson Hogg, Huxley, Spencer, Tyndall, Shirley Brooks, George Eliot, Mrs. Henry Wood, Douglas Jerrold, and many another; above all it was and is the home of great artists. Some of Mr. Eyre's most delightful anecdotes are about Landseer, Leslie, Alma Tadema, Phil May, Frith, Sidney Cooper, and the members of the St. John's Wood Arts Club. Lord's Cricket Ground is duly honoured, nor is the strange story of Joanna Southcott forgotten. The "Eyre Arms" has a chapter to itself, and an excellent chapter, too. The whole subject is literally alive with interest, and Mr. Eyre has done amplest justice to it; he has a pleasantly gossiping, anecdotal style, and is at the same time a careful and thoroughly reliable chronicler. The numerous illustrations from old prints, sketches and photographs, complete the interest and usefulness of his book.

* "St. John's Wood." By Alan Montgomery Eyre. 12s. 6d. net. (Chapman & Hall.)

A POET, A PLAYWRIGHT, AND OTHERS.*

Mr. Mackereith is always worth listening to. He has a fine classical manner, a warm and rich vocabulary, some passion, and a fine sense of colour. Amid a batch of miscellaneous poetry his work stands out. One always feels that here is a poet with an artistic conscience. He has written all through the dark days for poetry when the poet was unwanted, and he brings to "Ioläus" the same high heart and courage, the old fire. One always feels that to him the making of poetry is well worth while. There are some very beautiful descriptive passages in "Ioläus," and the imagination is of a high order.

Mr. Darrell Figgis has taken the tragedy of Queen Draga for his play, finding "a subject made to his hand." The play has rapid movement and its moments of tense dramatic feeling. Though it is not great drama it is good picturesque moving drama, not without its purple patches. One would like to see it staged. Mr. Figgis wisely takes the great craftsmen for his models, and his work rises to that degree of dignity that one is not repelled by the Shakespearean manner. Queen Tara is no Lady Macbeth; but in the school of drama which Mr. Stephen Phillips adorns Mr. Figgis is a worthy worker. If Tara has no passages of great insight, yet there is poetry which increases with the movement of the play. The scene of the murder of the Queen, or rather the scene preceding it, has some very fine poetic moments and passages.

* "Ioläus" By J. W. Mackereith (Longmans).—"Queen Tara" By Darrell Figgis (Dent).—"A Boy's Will" By Robert Frost (Nutt).—"First Poems" By Max Hlowman. (Sidgwick & Jackson).—"Poems" By A. Hugh Fisher (Elkan Mathews).

First meeting of "The Club":
Alma Tadema posing for his silhouette.
From "St. John's Wood," by Alan Montgomery Eyre (Chapman & Hall).

The young poets who begin to spring up now that poetry is once again in favour are very like the host of young ones in the great little Renaissance of the 'eighties and 'nineties. They have all poetical ideas, poetic diction, the manner—if not the matter—of the poet, and there is life in what they have to say. If it will come to anything one knows not. Very often the young poet evolves quickly out of shapelessness. On the other hand, he may have to learn his art patiently. None of these three young poets is without promise. One may even have hopes of them as the poets of to-morrow, although they are not the poets but the disciples of to-day. Mr. Robert Frost is apparently an American, so one would like to be kind to him as a stranger. So far his achievement is no great matter: but he has a way of keeping one expectant, as though something good were sure to come. We shall look for it in another volume. "A Boy's Will" suggests young work. We shall hope to meet Mr. Frost another day.

"First Poems," by Max Plowman, is another volume which wakes the unreasonable hope. There is some magic of a long-lost Spring about it, some radiance from eyes of youth. He does not attain, but he seems always on the edge of attaining. Here, in a poem of Sussex, is a charming fancy, although the whole poem falls short of the magic poetry which has been written about this beloved county.

"Not in the mazes of her hair,
Thick wools that hide the open sky,
Nor where the lonely mountains dare
To lift their thought-wreathed foreheads high,
But where her bosom falls and swells,
To moulded downs and dimpled dells
Does she invite me
And delight me"

Almost beautiful. But "Thought-wreathed foreheads!"—unless, indeed, Mr. Plowman thinks on the men who have preceded him with praises of Sussex. And—are there mountains in Sussex?

Mr. Fisher is the best of the bunch of these three young poets. His work is indeed far more arresting than anything in the other two books. He is in a sense arrived. There is ease and accomplishment in his poetry, and a certain quaintness which is very pleasant. Here is a specimen of his work which has a classical touch.

"Time tames the beast and ripens
The fruit upon the bough,
Time wears the flint and lessens
The sharpness of the plough
Time mitigates men's anger,
They say, and conquers woe,
But I two years am exiled
And still my torments grow
Bulls bow their necks to labour,
And lions lose their ire;
And Indian monsters bend the knee,
And coursers ply for hire.
Big grapes break from their bunches,
Juice runs to purple waste:
And ears of corn grow ruddy
And apples sweet to taste.
Far distant is the city,
Home, wife and friends are far
I hear the Scythian rabble
And watch an unknown star."

There is atmosphere in this simple thing.

KATHARINI TYNAN.

THE ROMANCE OF THE ROTHSCHILDS.*

The history of the Rothschilds is the history of the vast credit system upon which our modern civilization is built up. Before the days of the great Frankfort family the credit system had a purely local and individual significance. It was the action of Maier Amschel Rothschild in sending his five sons to open banks in five great capital cities of Europe which spread the network of the system over a continent. The third son of Maier Amschel, the poor Jew from the Frankfort ghetto who founded the house, was Nathan Rothschild, who captured London and England, while his younger brother James ruled at Paris. The fourth son became the financial prince of Naples and Italy; the eldest controlled the situation throughout Germany from the original office of Frankfort; and the second son, Solomon, lived at Vienna as the Cæsar of the dual monarchy. In the first decade of the nineteenth century the Rothschilds were established in every financial centre of Europe. By their father's dying wishes they discussed every operation in concert. They were the precursors of an era of financial operations which could fully liberate the vast access of potentiality for wealth called the Industrial Revolution.

* "The Romance of the Rothschilds" By Ignatius Balla. 20s. 6d. net. (Eveleigh Nash.)

The power and the system of the Rothschilds were unprecedented. Their contemporaries did not understand their power, and perhaps they themselves were hardly conscious of its extent. More than British arms it was the Rothschilds' money which gave Napoleon his coup de grâce; and, although the credit system of to-day is vaster than the early Rothschilds dreamed of, even men of to-day can hardly understand the power that the Frankfort family possessed. There is no financial power to-day which can compare for unity and disciplined administration with the Rothschilds of three-quarters of a century ago. To-day the great financiers combine. They work by arrangement and agreement to eliminate competition. They form the most gigantic of all modern trusts (and on the smooth working of that trust our modern civilization entirely depends), but yet they are in competition. At the moment at which fear of the consequences of competition yields to a feeling of confidence of victory the weaker member is crushed. The Rothschilds were held together by other ties than those of momentary interest; they were united by the bonds of fraternal and filial affection, and together they wrought a miracle. It will never be seen again. It was because the Rothschild intelligence was so much in advance of the material civilization of their day that they became all-powerful. Their organisation was such that they possessed more information and more speedily than the most secret of secret services. The death-blow to their monopoly in information was the death-blow to their monopoly in financial power. The railways, which they did so much to develop on the Continent, and, above all, the electric telegraph, spelt the end of their power to "corner civilization." The debt that modern civilization owes to the Rothschilds is enormous, obscured though it be by the inevitable hatred of the wealthy monopolist. Their gift to the world was mobility of capital; to their efforts and their system modern States owe it that they were able to abandon the petty and wasteful methods of pre-French Revolution government, and modern commercial enterprise owes it that modern communications are excellent and improving, and that commercial enterprise itself in the elastic form of the joint-stock company is really existent.

In some such manner should the House of Rothschild be judged sub specie æternitatis, in the phrase of Spinoza. The "Romance of the Rothschilds" rather leaves the real romance for the small-talk. The author's advantage is that small-talk concerning great men possesses always an individual fascination. The quixotic generosity of the founder of the house, Maier Amschel, is as pleasant to read about as the callous liberality of Nathan, the greatest Rothschild, is distasteful. It is difficult to feel oneself wholly in sympathy with the man who could say, as he did to his friend Buxton:

"Sometimes, to amuse myself, I give a beggar a guinea. He thinks I have made a mistake, and, for fear I should find it out, off he runs as hard as he can. I advise you to give a beggar a guinea sometimes. It is very amusing."

For all his magnificence of intellect and determination of character, there was something terribly hard in Nathan Rothschild. If he gave, it was like a blow in the face.

Mr. Balla gives us some interesting particulars of the relations between Heinrich Heine and Baron James, the Rothschild of Paris. Heine seems always to have preserved his financial independence, and some of his replies to what he considered the Baron's presumption must have been salutary in their effect.

"Baron James was conducting a large financial transaction, and he gave a very choice dinner in honour of the bankers who were staying in Paris. Heine was not invited to the dinner, but, when one of the guests at table expressed a wish to meet the poet, Rothschild replied that it could easily be managed. He wrote a few lines on a piece of paper, asking Heine to come and take coffee with him. A footman took the note to Heine's house and returned with this reply to the Baron's invitation:—
"Monsieur le Baron, I usually take my coffee where I have had my dinner."

A book of anecdotes can hardly give the measure of the Rothschilds. "The Romance of the Rothschilds" certainly does not. It is, however, all that such a book would claim to be—a compilation of absorbing interest.

J. MIDDLETON MURRAY.

A VALIANT WOMAN.*

Mr. Edmund Maurice has chosen his own method for telling the life of Octavia Hill, and it is, perhaps, useless to complain that the plan adopted, the publication of letters written by Octavia Hill or sent to her, with a slender explanatory narrative linking up the correspondence, does not give us the full and complete biography we naturally desire. In fact, we want to know a great deal more about this gifted and remarkable woman than the letters reveal. We learn practically nothing of her attitude to the many social movements of the last fifty years of the nineteenth century, with the exception of Housing, Open Spaces, Organized Philanthropy, and Women's Suffrage. And yet Miss Hill must have had definite and well-grounded opinions on a number of topics.

However, there it is, and we must take the book as it stands, and with hearty acknowledgment of gratitude to Mr. Maurice for bringing us into the company of Octavia Hill. What a life of high-minded industry it is that is set out in these pages! A long life, too; responsibility accepted and well shouldered in girlhood, and no laying down of the burden till death came calling at the age of seventy-three. If responsibility is the test of courage, Octavia Hill was surely a valiant woman! Her impatience of committees was entirely natural. Her reliance on God and her own right arm was justified. How deeply she was indebted to her mother, and how bravely helped by her sisters is well brought out. And then the friends she had! There is a good deal about F. D. Maurice, Miss Emma Cons, Mr. Cockerell, and Mr. and Mrs. Barnett, and we have glimpses of Kingsley, the Brownings, Miss Davenport Hill, Dr. Furnivall, J. M. Ludlow, Vansittart Neale, Tennyson, and other famous persons. Above all there is John Ruskin looming large in the earlier years of Octavia Hill's public activity. The story of the unhappy separation has been told elsewhere, and is not recounted. Mr. Cockerell's efforts at reconciliation were evidently quite futile, and in Octavia Hill's view not to be encouraged. An evening in December, 1858, when Ruskin paid a visit to the Hills, is described by Emily Hill, and is one of the best things in the book. Ruskin on that occasion said of F. D. Maurice (championed by Octavia), "he could not follow him. He seemed like a man who did not see clearly, and was always stretching out, moving on in the right direction but in a fog." But Ruskin promised to try and understand Maurice. More personally on that memorable occasion:

* "Life of Octavia Hill, as told in Her Letters." Edited by C. Edmund Maurice. 16s. net. (Macmillan.)

"Ruskin said for his part he was never happy except when he was selfish, when he shut himself up, and read only the books he liked, or enjoyed the sunshine and nature." Eighteen years later Ruskin wrote to Octavia Hill: "My question, a very vital one, is, whether it really never enters your mind at all that all measures of amelioration in great cities, such as your sister pleads for, and as you rejoice in having effected, may in reality be only encouragements to the great Evil Doers in their daily accumulating Sin?"

But Ruskin did well in committing his house property to Octavia Hill's charge—there can be no doubt about that.

JOSEPH CLAYTON.

IN LANDS AFAR.*

In these latter days when, practically speaking, the whole world has been explored, when the telegraph wire runs across what but a couple of decades ago were the waste spaces of the map, when it is almost impossible to get out of reach of the law of one of the great civilized nations, the writing of a really good travel book has become infinitely difficult. There is no longer the likelihood of fresh discoveries wherewith to thrill the reader. Literary merit must, of necessity, be the main factor, and the highest form of literary merit in a volume of this class is the power to interest the reader in your own personality.

* "Adventures Beyond the Zambesi" By Mrs. Fred Maturin. 10s. 6d. net. (Nash).—"Reminiscences of a South African Pioneer" By W. C. Scully. 10s. 6d. net. (Unwin).—"Confessions of a Tenderfoot" By Ralph Stock. 10s. 6d. net. (Grant Richards).—"Mozambique" By R. N. Lane. 12s. 6d. net. (Unwin.)

Mrs. Fred Maturin.

Frontispiece portrait from "Adventures beyond the Zambesi." (Evelyn Nash.)

Mr. W. C. Scully.

Reproduced from "M.A.B." by courtesy of Mr. Fisher Unwin to force him to go on with the book, not for the sake of the knowledge he will gain, but because he is anxious to discover how you, yourself, came out of it in the end.

Judged by this standard and I am certain it is the correct one—Mrs. Fred Maturin has written an exceedingly good book. From the geographer's point of view it is almost negligible, from the company promoter's point of view it is quite so, but as a vivid piece of writing, as a revelation of what must be a delightful personality, and as an absolutely faithful picture of life on the veld beyond Railhead, it deserves a wide popularity.

"Adventures beyond the Zambesi" comes as a welcome surprise. Several other women writers have produced expensive volumes on their travels in Rhodesia, as well as novels of Rhodesian life, but it has remained for Mrs. Fred Maturin to produce one which was worth buying—and keeping. The other Rhodesian books by women have been so obviously and blatantly written to order—written to please a Government which gave travelling facilities, and also supplied many official pamphlets as the basis for copy. In Mrs. Fred Maturin's case it is self-evident that she has no axe to grind. No one else has ever described a hunting trip so vividly, so delightfully, so truthfully. As an old resident in Rhodesia in the early days, an old transport-rider, trader, and hunter, I can appreciate it all, but I believe that those who have never set foot in the Land of Unfulfilled Promises will derive just as keen enjoyment from it.

It is the personal note which tells, even more than the accuracy of detail, great though the latter is. The author is a living entity, not merely someone who has set down the record of certain happenings. She enjoyed it, despite the dangers and discomforts, despite the financial anxieties of which, here and there, she gives us a glimpse, and we enjoy it with her; but, perhaps, the best thing is really the simply-told love-story at the back of it all, a story which, apparently, she could not keep out, because it became such an essential part of it all.

A good many people may wish that she had put in a little less concerning the question of female suffrage, arguing rightly that we get more than enough of that subject in the daily papers; but those dull pages are easily skipped. A more serious offence really is that she allows her printers to spell "veld" in the German way, with a final t. This is, as a rule, done only by the veriest amateurs amongst writers on South Africa, and she, as everyone knows, is not an amateur.

If Mrs. Fred Maturin has struck the right note in travel books—and I hold that she has done so—it is impossible to say that any of my other three authors has been wholly successful, although it is only fair to add that Mr. Lyne did not set out to produce a volume of this kind, his work being essentially of the informative type, almost of the technical type.

In a way, Mr. Scully had a far better chance than Mrs. Fred Maturin, because his subject matter is so far more important. The things he has to tell us have, or should have, a distinct historical value. But he has not written them as history—the history of the early days of the diamond and gold-mining industries in South Africa—and as reminiscences they leave one a little cold. The man himself is not in them. Certain things happened to him. Obviously, he had both personal courage and ability, and yet, as you read the book, you never seem actually to see the author, or to care about his fate. He is someone telling you—and telling you well, in excellent English—of things which happened in the sixties, of the making of the history of South Africa; and yet, as you close the book, you still feel that you do not know him. To use a detestable, though convenient, phrase, there is not the "human touch."

The book is good, and deserves to be widely read, but one cannot help hoping that in the continuation which Mr. Scully promises—this is but the first instalment, and might have well been longer—the author will remember that he himself is of far more interest to the reader than are the other folk of whom he tells us.

The "Confessions of a Tenderfoot" has some of the same failings as Mr. Scully's Reminiscences, and it has many of the same good points. It is written in nice, clean, lucid English; it has some thoughtful, even valuable, passages on problems, such as the coolie-labour question in Fiji, and yet, save in the first few pages, the writer does not succeed in making himself an actual personage to us. We know little more about him at the end than we did at the beginning, except that he possessed unlimited grit and resource, that nothing seemed to daunt him, and—that he must have any amount of splendid copy, which we hope he will use by-and-bye.

I do not want to infer that the book is a failure. Far from that. It is an excellently-told narrative of a man's wanderings in Canada, the Pacific, and Australasia. True, it has not the historical value of Mr. Scully's work, because it tells of things as they are to-day, but every page in it is of interest. My only criticism of it is that it, too, lacks the intimate personal touch which makes Mrs. Fred Maturin's story so fascinating.

"Mozambique" is of another order altogether. It is the work of an official, and an expert, writing of the things he has seen and learnt in his official capacity. It is a book for students and possible investors, rather than for the general public. Personally, it interested me, because some ten years ago I explored a large portion of the Mozambique territory for the Government, being the first white man to go through the rubber-producing districts, which the author calls Mandanda, though I knew them as the N'Dandine.

There was certainly a need for a volume dealing with this subject, and, to a certain extent, Mr. Lyne has supplied that need. On the other hand, it is a pity that he did not go more fully into his subject—obviously he knows it thoroughly—give more details, more figures, and produce a real book of reference. Some of his statements, especially those relating to rubber, will come as a surprise to many people. I, for one, was under the impression that, in consequence of an international agreement, the destructive boiled-rubber industry had long since been rendered impossible. Certainly, ten years ago, the Germans would allow no boiled rubber to pass out through any of their ports. I am sure, too, that some of his remarks on the Landolphia rubber creeper will arouse controversy. Still, though it may be lacking in one or two respects, "Mozambique" is quite worthy to be classed with the other three volumes as being worth reading.

STANLEY PORTAL HYATT.

MODERN GRUB STREET.*

In his new book of essays, Mr. A. St. John Adcock takes a refreshingly cheerful view of the general prospects of life on the sunnier side of Grub Street. Most writers on the topic—successful or fairly successful men themselves—always seem to me to discourage the young literary adventurer for some secret purpose. Sometimes I suspect they are trying to prevent the most open of professions from becoming too overcrowded; but on the whole, I take it, they cry down their own way of life with an ironical smile, well knowing that if a man has it in him to write for a living, nothing they say will make him change his mind. Mr. Adcock is more honest and franker. He says:

"If you have a reasonable aptitude for literary pursuits, and are content to accept the pleasure of indulging it in part payment for your labours, you may have to face lean years of hardship, impecuniosity, disappointment, but eventually, so that you are sufficiently energetic and adaptable, you can earn a comfortable and congenial income with your pen."

That is about the truth of the matter. In a very interesting and illuminating bit of autobiography he goes on to tell the story of his own struggles. He started at the bottom rung of the ladder of literature, and for some years everything was against him. Ill luck and ill health beat him down, and he learnt to know Modern Grub Street on its gloomy side better than Gissing did. In Gissing's well-known novel of literary life in London, the native pessimism and idiosyncracies of the author rather obscure the picture of the real misery and squalor of the misadventurers in letters and journalism. Mr. Adcock gives an intimate and striking sketch of some of the sad, strange figures he has met in the slum of the republic of literature, and concludes that "Grub Street as a phase of life is very much what it has been since literature has been a profession." Men of talent, and sometimes of genius, live and die in it as Otway, Savage and Chatterton died. And helpless incompetence and drunken thriftlessness have increased the number of its inhabitants. Johnson and Goldsmith fought their way through it from starvation to fame. Bohemia, as we know, has a sea coast, and many are the wrecks that occur on it. Waifs of all the arts drift there—singers of every sort from the music hall and the grand opera, painters who perhaps exhibited once at the Academy and barely exist on the poor hackwork they occasionally sell to dealers, and flotsam from the theatres is heaped up on the Bohemian shore now that the picture palaces are spreading to the hurt of the stage.

By entering it young, getting out of it quickly, and looking back at it over a cigar, in the days of hard work and comparative comfort, there is an atmosphere of romance to be found in the retrospect. But Mr. Adcock will not take this easy view. His Grub Street is the real thing of to-day—a heart-breaking place. There are both humour and tragedy of a curious sort in the story he tells, in another essay, of one of the small potentates of Modern Grub Street. This man was a sort of literary company promoter—a humble Machiavelli of the lower world of journalism. He had the knack of getting money to start new ventures, and the still rarer art of keeping a crowd of creditors in subjection. He was a master of resource and a monument of selfishness. So at least Mr. Adcock, who worked some years on and off for him, thought. Yet he gave his life to save a girl, unknown to him, when the Stella went down, getting out of a boat and returning to the wreck, when the girl's father appealed to a boatload of passengers to find a seat for his daughter.

There are many fine human touches in Mr. Adcock's essays. For he writes on literature with his eyes on life. Readers of "From a London Garden" know him for a true poet with an original vision and a happy power of expression. Yet in an article on "Poetry and the Public" he confesses that his sympathies are with the large number of people who do not read modern poems. And he will not agree that the workaday millions are not open to influences of the highest poetic sort. "There is finer poetry in life and nature, he argues, than there is in books; and most men and women go direct to the sources of inspiration when they need uplifting above their daily cares. It is a remarkably unusual point of view, and Mr. Adcock develops it with eloquence and impassioned sincerity. In another series of articles he continues his curious, picturesque series of "London Etchings," one of his most charming works in prose. Then, by way of variety, he mingles with his memories, sketches and character studies, some keen and humorous satires on modern society. But through all the delightful variety of "Modern Grub Street" runs the personality of the writer—friendly, original, whimsical and winning, and richly experienced in life.

E. W.

W. E. HENLEY.*

Mr. Cope Cornford knew Henley, and it is the personal touch about it that adds wonderfully to the charm of this admirable little biography. The very first lines capture your interest: "The door opened, and a big man was suddenly framed in the opening. He supported himself with one hand pressed against the woodwork, the other bearing upon an ivory-handled stick. His great head was poised a little backward upon broad shoulders; his upstanding hair and fine-spun beard were of a tawny hue; the eyes of a clear blue, their gaze direct and yet as though dwelling upon far things; the mouth was full lippled, the face large and square of jaw. So entered into the dark little room in College Street, Westminster, where he was editing the National Observer, and into the life of the present writer, one of the greatest forces in English letters of the later Victorian age, William Ernest Henley." From such a beginning one anticipates a more than ordinarily intimate study, and the anticipation is fulfilled. From an interesting and acute consideration of the era into which Henley was born, Mr. Cornford passes to a concise but full enough story of "the abundant and gallant life" of the poet whose best work, he believes, will yet come to rank "with the best in literature." The chapters devoted to Henley's criticism and journalism and to his poetry, though they are charged

* "W. E. Henley." By L. Cope Cornford. 1s net. (Constable.)

W. E. Henley.

From a photograph taken at Worthing, in 1889, by Mr. W. B. Blake, from "William Ernest Henley," by L. Cope Cornford (Constable.)

* "Modern Grub Street and Other Essays." By A. St. John Adcock. 3s. 6d. net. (Herbert & Daniel.)

with the enthusiasm of one who knew and loved the man, are marked by a scholarly and critical discernment. Its vivid drawing of Henley's strong personality and its careful estimate of his work give this little book a real and permanent value. It is much the best essay on Henley that has yet been written.

A HISTORY OF EUROPE.*

He is a bold man who sits down to write a historical text-book on Europe from classical times to the present age, and designedly omits to narrate the story of our own Islands and the British Empire. Mr. Grant has not acted without much deliberation, the upshot of which has convinced him that such a sketch as might be included would be so meagre as not to deserve the space which it would occupy. Hence the schools that adopt Mr. Grant's book (and we anticipate that there will be many) must employ an equally good English text-book.

When Dr. Johnson observed what a paucity of really authentic history there was, and that the only facts we possessed related to the reigns of certain kings and the fighting of certain battles, Boswell spiritedly replied: "Then, sir, you would reduce all history to no better than an almanack, a mere chronological series of remarkable events." The remark was made in the presence of Gibbon, who was then at work upon his history. The revolution that has taken place of late in the writing of historical text-books has fortunately affected Mr. Grant. To his great credit the author has eschewed presenting us with a bewildering number of dates and battles and statesmen, and has confined himself to essentials. It is a good index to the author's treatment of his subject when we find that the book opens with a poem of Sophocles and closes with a sonnet of Wordsworth's, a welcome innovation which Mr. Grant defends in his preface. The schools are beginning to realise that they have not discharged their obligations to history when they have rushed boys through an examination text-book, and hitherto only scholarship boys have been encouraged to tackle European history. We welcome, therefore, the timely appearance of this new book. It is well printed, has ten capital maps, a satisfactory index, and its bibliography alone would entitle it to a place on the bookshelf of every intelligent man. The author has a gift for condensation, as is evidenced in the last chapter, entitled "The Present Age," a period presenting many pitfalls to historians. He surveys Europe to-day and notes the existence of the "national omniscient" State. Contrasting the past and present functions of the State, he comments on the tremendous influence of Germany, and concludes by observing that, although literature and newspapers and religion are as yet outside the sphere of its activities, there are not lacking indications that to these also its control may extend. Why does Mr. Grant include "religion" in this category? Further features of modern Europe are Internationalism and Socialism, and the awakening of the social conscience of Europe. In reviewing the prospect for the continuance of peace the author sanely remarks that:

"Peace breeds peace, as war breeds war, and it may without optimism be anticipated that the practice of arbitration will grow and that, if the European Powers are restrained from actual conflict for some time, they will become more and more unwilling to plunge into war, and more and more ready to adopt a more excellent way . . . The history of man shows us the evolution of peace."

A HUMAN BOY AND ANOTHER †

These two books have for central figure a boy verging on manhood; and in the one the boy is the public's beloved friend, Wee Macgregor, now sixteen years of age, while in the other the youth is the son of Eliza, a delightful London woman invented by Mr. Barry Pain, who has made more than one volume about the lady, her husband, and her household. The sixteen-year-old Macgregor is a very human boy; Eliza's son a baleful abstraction. Macgregor is a sincere attempt to depict a Glasgow halfin; Eliza's son an equally sincere attempt to provide farce of a thoroughly 1913 and knowing order. Both attempts are successful.

* "A History of Europe." By A. J. Grant. 7s. 6d. net (Longmans.)

† "Eliza's Son." By Barry Pain. 1s. net. (Cassell.)—"Courtin' Christina" By J. J. Bell. 1s. net. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Mr. Barry Pain is a skilful and experienced craftsman and humorist; and in "Eliza's Son" he does not seek to portray even a type of boy. Mr. Pain's aim is amusement; and owl-like indeed must be the reader who is not amused by the diary of the spectacled, precocious, and unpleasant youth. His unpleasantness is unquestionable; he is a prig, a snob, and a money-grabber; and the curious thing is that, even with all these characteristics, he supplies material for laughter. He takes a detached stand. He has something akin to contempt for his father, a very indefinite something in the City, and he writes of him:

"Pa does up parcels just a bit too well. He must have had a lot of practice at one time. He blows to any extent about the importance of 'my firm' as he calls it, but he tells me precious little about his early days before he became a partner. . . . Putting these and other things together, I have come to the conclusion that Pa never had any proper education, and was, at one time, in a very lowly position—probably an errand boy."

Nice lad, Eliza's son! Light is shed on himself by himself in this entry:

"I always keep a stock of pens at school, and less careful boys who find themselves without a pen come to me for one. I sell them at a fair profit, and thus, helping others, I help myself."

A fine personality is Eliza herself, of whom we have too little. That she is the old Eliza, however, is suggested. "Pa" presided at a presentation to a clerk. Pa forgot his carefully-prepared speech, but very late at night made an impromptu speech that "lasted for fourteen minutes, which, Pa said, showed the irony of fate. Ma said it showed something or other, anyhow."

Eliza's son is going to Oxford or Cambridge—which ever will pay him most in the shape of a scholarship. It is to be trusted his University career makes as comic a book as "Eliza's Son."

In sharp contrast with the little Cockney marionette is Big Macgregor, "in the pentin' trade," and it is affectionately he is shown forth by his creator. The Robinson family—as kindly, agreeable, and natural as ever—are presented much as they were before; save, of course, for such changes as were inevitable in the passing of the years; but Jimmie is now a schoolboy, and Jimmie is in himself a Wee Macgregor—a frank, animated query, with many "Whit weys?"

As in the book that made the name and fame of Mr. J. J. Bell, so in "Courtin' Christina" we have a real Glasgow atmosphere and sentiment of a working-class home-circle. It is a book precisely to the liking of those who liked "Wee Macgregor"; and it is highly charged with this kind of passage, in which is Mr. Bell's chief strength:

The kitchen door opened. "Whaur are ye gaun, Macgregor?" asked his mother.

"Oot," he replied briefly, and went. Going down the stairs he felt sorry somehow. Sons often feel sorry somehow, but mothers may never know it.

When Lizzie, hiding her hurt, had shut the kitchen door, Mr. Purdie said softly: "That question an' that answer, ma dear, are as auld as human nature."

Macgregor was a precocious youngster. He is precocious in love. We are introduced to three of his girls; but the real affection is for Christina, the bright and very Glasgow shop-assistant, whose masterful ways and pert tongue and good heart are a ready well known to Mr. Bell's public. The courtship runs with a fair degree of smoothness, and Macgregor disregards the advice of feckless, blasé Willie Thomson (another familiar figure), who says:

"An' if I was you, I wud let girls alane. They're nae fun, an' they're awfu' expensive."

"Courtin' Christina" is a worthy little work, likely to cheer the hundreds of thousands who found delight in "Wee Macgregor." In particular will it cheer and solace Scots beyond the seas.

DAVID HODGE.

* STRINDBERG AGAIN. *

The sudden interest in Strindberg that has sprung up in England since his so recent death is uncommonly odd. But, as a matter of fact, it very largely centres in one book, the powerful "Confession of a Fool," and it is not at all likely that the two before us will add much to his reputation. "The Confession of a Fool" was certainly a remarkable document, intimate, pathetic, and written with great artistic power, but it has been followed unfortunately by a host of translations of inferior work. The truth is that Strindberg at his worst is simply an unspeakable bore, of a quite intolerably self-centred and morbid kind. On the other hand, in spite of his having written far too much, he always maintains that clarity and force of language which marks his work as highly distinguished.

The first of these volumes "The Son of a Servant," belongs to his series of autobiographical books and deals, under a thin disguise with Strindberg's own youth. It is not a particularly interesting work, and one cannot help feeling that Strindberg must have been rather an unhealthy and irritating child. He was unhappy certainly, but then he was one of these children that seem born to be unhappy. The book is valuable in its acute analysis of emotions; but in such things it is no deeper than is Tolstoy's "Childhood," and it has not one tithe of its beauty. Now and then there are striking descriptions in it such as this.

"One night his father's voice woke him from sleep. He started up, and found it dark in the room. Through the darkness he heard a deep, trembling voice 'Come to mother's death-bed.' It went through him like a flash of lightning. He froze and shivered while he dressed, the skin of his head felt ice-cold, his eyes were wide-open and streaming with tears, so that the flame of the lamp looked like a red bladder!"

"In Midsummer Days" is a very different sort of work. It is a volume of stories which are either fairy stories or stories with such a marked didactic tendency that they are really fables. In all there are thirteen of them, and the whole volume is quite a short one. They are written, no doubt, for children, and with all the particular kind of simplicity and moral intention which children are supposed to appreciate. They remind one of Hans Andersen, but they have not Hans Andersen's glamour. Yet they are full of delightful touches and their very baldness has a certain charm. Decidedly the author of "Miss Julia" was a versatile man to have produced also "In Midsummer Days."

The best of these tales is, perhaps, "Half a Sheet of Foolscap," a very short but really moving description of a young widower's memories. Here are the last paragraphs of this beautiful little story or fable:

"He could not read what followed, for it grew dark before his eyes; he might have been a drowning man trying to see through salt water. And yet, there it was written, plainly enough, 'undertaker—a large coffin and a small one.' And the word 'dust' was added in parenthesis."

"It was the last word of the whole record. It ended with 'dust!' and that is exactly what happens in life."

"He took the yellow paper, kissed it, folded it carefully, and put it in his pocket."

"In two minutes he had lived again through two years of his life."

"But he was not bowed down as he left the house. On the contrary, he carried his head high, like a happy and proud man, for he knew that the best things life has to bestow had been given to him. And he pitied all those from whom they are withheld . . ."

No, these two books will not and, indeed, should not add to Strindberg's reputation over here.

And now we come to a book about Strindberg by a lady who has lately been achieving fame in another direction. Miss Lind-af-Hageby is herself a Swede and is herself strongly imbued with the spirit of revolt, so she has a double claim to present Strindberg to English readers. She writes, perhaps, with more ardour than critical acumen, but then her book on Strindberg is hardly meant for other than a very personal opinion. Largely through his own autobiographical writings she follows this singular and tortured man through the various phases of his life. One gathers a fair but not too attractive picture of Strindberg from her book. He was one of these men who simply could not be happy for long, although no one ever desired happiness more profoundly. The fact is he was a rebel, and to rebels the present is invariably depressing. This acute misery and dissatisfaction tinges his work in too personal a sense. It may well make him doubly exciting at the moment but it is bound to militate against him in the long run. As soon as posterity ceases to be interested in Strindberg (and he is a man of whom they will soon weary) they will cease to be interested in his work. He has little of that severe artistic aloofness which has the golden quality of agelessness; and, moreover, he dissipated his strength in far too many experiments. He was always seeking fresh fields to conquer, and thus he seldom achieved the highest rank in any one field. His writings seem almost dated with an invisible ink that will grow clearer and clearer as the years pass away and show the just perspective. So Strindberg, with all his passionate intensity and startling ability, has himself made the rope that will hang him. At any rate, that's how it strikes me. Perhaps I am wrong.

* "The Son of a Servant" By August Strindberg. Translated by Claud Field. Introduction by Henry Vacher-Burch. 3s. 6d. net. (Rider.)—"In Midsummer Days." By August Strindberg. Translated by Ellie Schleussner. 5s. net. (Howard Latimer.)—"August Strindberg." By L. Lind-af-Hageby. With 28 Illustrations. 6s. net. (Stanley Paul.)

RICHARD CURLE.

A LYRIC LOVE. *

Once upon a time there was a perfect music-teacher who greatly desired a perfect pupil. In the fulness of time his longing was marvellously gratified, for the ironic gods, who love nothing so much as giving man unhappiness in the form of his desired felicity, bestowed upon the perfect music-teacher a daughter who so responded to his fierce tuition that she could play before she could talk, and read musical scores before she could stumble through a child's primer. The perfect teacher essayed to make her such a pianist as never before had been. She was a daughter, but she was even more in his eyes: she was the embodiment of a System, and as time rolled on, the System so far justified itself that the little girl's reputation grew even more rapidly than her body. Now of systems one of our own poets hath said:

"Our little systems have their day,
They have their day, and cease to be;"

an observation that is singularly just, though, in its present application, a little short of the truth, for it is a tragic fact that, long before a system has ceased to be, a great many of its victims have also ceased to be, some painfully and bitterly, and some joyfully as if they were glad to go away and repose in the earth where systems have no power. Sir Austin Abbotworthy Bearne Feverel, Baronet, had a system and a son. His system had only one fault: it had systematically overlooked woman, and the issue of that omission was tragedy. So in our present case Friedrich Wieck, the perfect music-teacher, had a system and a daughter. It provided for everything except the coming of man; and the arrival of a lover in the shape of another pupil, named Robert Schumann, began what might have been a tragedy, and what, at its best, was a time of bitter suffering for all concerned.

There are none so blind as those who see by system. That Clara, worse than motherless, defrauded of a child's natural joy in life, and drilled into something like a perfect pianola, should grow up to adore the vivacious and tenderly playful young man who shared the house and lessons was something that Wieck had made no allowance for. "I have not enjoyed my youth at all," she wrote to Robert, "you will make up to me for it." The only love Wieck thought necessary in the case was the love a father had a right to exact from his daughter, and, in asserting his claim, he did what ill inspired lovers always do, he made himself entirely hateful. He employed against Schumann any ugly, dirty weapon he could find, with the inevitable result that he injured himself more than his victim. He tried to make the poor girl feel the need of his strong guidance and support by driving her off to undertake a concert tour alone in distant Paris; and so drove her, as any human and unsystematic person could have foreseen, straight out of his life and into her lover's arms.

* "Clara Schumann: An Artist's Life." By Berthold Litzmann. Translated and abridged by Grace F. Hadow, with a Preface by W. H. Hadow. 2 Vols. 24s. net. (Macmillan.)

The union that followed is one of the poems in the history of music. Its general likeness to the story of the Brownings is very remarkable; yet the differences are also noteworthy. Robert Browning and Elizabeth Barrett were both poets; but though Robert Schumann and Clara Wieck were both musicians, one was essentially a creator and the other an interpreter. To put it baldly, one was a rather unpopular composer who needed quiet in the house, and the other was a very famous pianist who needed noise. Indeed, she was now specially anxious to keep up her practice so that her concert earnings might leave the composer-husband unharassed by material cares. That the difficulties were all surmounted is testimony not only to their great love, but also to something else that does not always co-exist with great love, namely, their great goodwill. In one short poem an inspired singer tells us "Love seeketh not itself to please" and "Love seeketh only self to please." It is hard to recognize the truth of both these opposites. Between them lies the narrow and difficult path of happiness in love, and few there be that find it—among artists fewest of all, art being a kind of third self, insistent upon sole service.

There was yet another difference. The two Brownings pursued their separate courses and, as far as the public is concerned, neither owed anything to the other. But the loveliest fact in the union of Robert Schumann and Clara Wieck is the eager devotion with which the artist wife became the prophet and interpreter of her husband's message. When the great blow fell, and Robert passed to something worse than death, it became the mission of this dear, heroic woman to give the world, through herself, all that was good of the man upon whom the darkness of imbecility had descended for ever. So well did she do it, that, to a forgetful generation, the end has almost eclipsed the means. Schumann's greatness as a lyric poet in music is so secure that we have almost come, nowadays, to take him for granted; but we must not forget to whom we owe not only that very familiarity, but often the inspiration and spirit of the music itself.

Such a book as this is worthy of the beautiful story that it tells. It is long, but there is not a word too much, for the biographer has reduced himself to the happy minimum and left the carefully chosen passages from diaries and letters to make their own intimate revelation. The book is highly valuable, too, as a piece of history. In 1819 when Clara was born at Leipzig, in the household of a musician and in one of the greatest centres of music, Beethoven had still eight more years to live and Schubert nine. Mendelssohn was ten, Chopin nine, Liszt eight, and Wagner six. Brahms, Tchaikovsky and the other great moderns were still to come. When she was born the Choral Symphony and the Mass in D were barely sketched; and in the year when she died, Strauss's "Zarathustra" received its first performance. This is a lengthy, but perhaps rather graphic, way of saying that her life covers almost the whole nineteenth century from the end of the great classical period to the dawn of the most uncompromisingly modern music. Her life and work as a great pianist brought her into contact with almost every musician of note, and her views, pure and honest even when they seem to us a little angular and restricted, are invariably suggestive and vivid. To English readers in particular some pages will have a special interest. Whether looked at through the eyes of Clara Schumann or the very different eyes of Richard Wagner, musical England in the mid-nineteenth century hardly presents an attractive appearance. At least we have improved upon Dr. Wyld of the Philharmonic Society and John Ella of the Musical Union. "They call it a rehearsal here," she writes, "if a piece is played through once." She noticed that, at a concert where the Queen was present, everybody paid attention to the sovereign and gave none to the music. She was scornful of the poor stuff that was played, and especially of the taste that could endure Robert's "Geburtstagsmarsch" played upon the organ. Well! our audiences not only endure, but even admire, Chopin's Funeral March (expressly written for an instrument of one colour) decked out with variegated tints by organ or orchestra. Vulgarity of taste can hardly go further than that, so let us be careful how we condemn our forefathers. It is characteristic of the English that they never cease to love an artist who has once broken into their affections. Madame Schumann gratefully acknowledged that. Self-revealed as she is in such a book as this, her audience must grow ever wider. Those who heard her, loved her; and we who can only read of her, love her too.

GEORGE SAMPSON.

FROM BOTH SIDES.*

Nothing is more interesting than to bracket together two books on the same subject written from entirely different points of view. No contrast could possibly be greater than that afforded by "Two Years under the Crescent" and "With the Bulgarian Staff." After reading them one inevitably feels a little uneasy concerning ancient history, compiled in the days when there was, perhaps, but one historian to a century. Was that historian not, in all probability, as prejudiced as his modern successor? Not only is there a strong contrast in the views expressed in these two books, but there is an equally great difference in the personalities of the authors. Mr. Seppings Wright is a brilliant artist and journalist, a man whose task it is to collect the truth—as picturesquely as possible, of course—for the public, a trained observer; Mr. Noel Buxton is a politician, chairman of the Balkan Committee, a specialist on the wrongs of the Balkan peoples and the wickedness of the Sick Man. Mr. Seppings Wright went, first to Tripoli, then to Turkey, to get copy; Mr. Buxton went, with the Bulgarian staff, to obtain confirmation of his own views. In their way both succeeded, but it would be a great mistake to read "With the Bulgarian Staff" and not to read "Two Years under the Crescent."

Candidly I consider the latter to be by far the best book on the war which I have seen so far. Every line in it is interesting, despite the fact that it is distinctly long. The author has, very wisely, not attempted to produce anything in the nature of a history of either the Italian or the Balkan campaigns, but has simply written a clear, straightforward account of his own experiences during those wars.

The history of a modern war will always be written—copiously, severely, dispassionately—by military experts, and practically no one, save other experts, will ever attempt to read it; but the human side of a war—and Mr. Seppings Wright is essentially human—must always be fascinating, despite the inevitable horrors.

Mr. Seppings Wright went out to Tripoli, for the Central News, knowing nothing of the Turk save, of course, the ordinary vague, and more or less fanatical, charges brought against him; yet, at the end of two years he is able to say: "He (the Turk) may be described as brave, unselfish, hospitable, generous, as well as pious, gentle, and charitable; he is, at the same time, a gentleman in every sense of the word. . . . It is with great regret that I have been compelled to record the reverses sustained by a really noble and generously disposed nation."

These words, coming from a man of the author's experience and standing, coupled with the evidence afforded by his own clear and simple narrative, are not to be lightly set aside.

So far as the purely topical side of "Two Years under the Crescent" is concerned, the portions relating to the work of dirigible balloons and airships in warfare is the most interesting portion. The author has himself had some exciting experiences of bomb-dropping, and his views on the subject are distinctly valuable. For the rest, he never strains things, never tries to overdo the agony; but, through the whole of his story you see the long-drawn-out misery of the brave, patient Turks, badly-equipped, badly-led, badly-fed, toiling through the mud of Thrace, or across the sand of the desert, to fight a hopeless battle, and then retreating doggedly, to make a fresh stand, and suffer a fresh defeat.

* "Two Years Under the Crescent." By H. C. Seppings Wright. 10s. 6d. net. (James Nisbet & Co.)—"With the Bulgarian Staff." By Noel Buxton, M.P. 3s. 6d. net. (Smith, Elder & Co.)

Mr. Noel Buxton's book has one outstanding merit—it is undisguisedly partial. To him the Turk is anathema. He can see only one side—the Bulgarian. He writes, all the time, as the chairman of the Balkan Committee, whose existence was justified only by the sins of the Sick Man of Europe. One cannot help admiring his frankness, even though it may not always be possible to accept all his statements. The pity of it is that he did accept all the statements of his hosts, the Bulgarian General Staff. Many of the charges he makes are so grave that they should not have been set down unless he was prepared to vouch for them from his own personal experience.

In view of what Mr. Seppings Wright, and a host of other journalists of world-wide repute, have told us, it is difficult to believe that Mr. Buxton expects us to take the following passage literally:

"On the battlefield, he (the Turk) with personal and national safety depending on his alert attention, spends his time in mutilating a wounded enemy. He wastes cartridges, before the fight, in shooting women and children. Sometimes, when succoured by the enemy's doctor, the wounded Turk turns and kills him."

Is such a sweeping indictment of a defeated nation quite fair, unless a hundred duly authenticated instances can be quoted? The soldiers who defended Plevna and Adrianople, the men who died in the Shipka Pass, were surely not of that type.

The account which Mr. Buxton gives of the Bulgarian hospital arrangements does, however, ring true, though his hosts may not thank him for having given it. The "amateur dressers," of whom he was one, seem to have had very little previous experience. He speaks of "lumps of cotton wool which lay in a dish of 'sublimate' (a transparent fluid of whose exact chemistry we were all ignorant)." In this case a little knowledge would not have been dangerous. After the "sublimate" the raw flesh was "scrubbed as with a scrubbing-brush" and iodine rubbed on, "digging it in with a small stick." One is not surprised to learn that, after seeing surgery of this kind, "I was able to work as brutally as the rest." It is hard to believe that the author is always serious; nor can one think that, as a member of the House of Commons, he really grasps the inner meaning of the slighting references to his own nation which he makes on pages 151 and 164. In many ways the book is not a pleasant one, and Mr. Buxton would do well to revise it carefully in the event of a second edition being required. He has written it too hurriedly, without due reflection.

S.P.H.

THE POSITIVE EVOLUTION OF RELIGION.*

"The Positivists have had their own share of gibes and jests from the outside, since Mortimer Collins wrote his witty lines:

"There was an ape in the days that were earlier;
Centuries passed and his hair became curlier,
Centuries more gave a thumb to his wrist,—
Then he was Man—and a Positivist."

"If you are pious (mild form of insanity)
Bow down and worship the mass of humanity.
Other religions are buried in mists;
We're our own gods, say the Positivists."

Mr. Harrison patiently refutes these sallies of the profane, and endeavours, in this volume of lectures and essays, to remove the popular misconceptions of Positivism as well as to compare it with the various forms of contemporary theism, much to their disadvantage. The title is far too large for the contents. There is a valedictory air about the book. It is dedicated to Mr. Swinny, his successor at Newton Hall, and it really sums up Mr. Harrison's views upon what is understood by religion from the standpoint of Positivism. He candidly admits the slow growth of Positivism. "The numbers of Comte's adherents are few, scattered, and slowly increasing in comparison with many religious movements round us." As a set-off to this, he reflects that the spirit of Comte's tenets is much more widely diffused than the number of professing Positivists would suggest. The book ends in an optimistic key. "As Comte did not discover the religion of Humanity, but only put into organic shape the floating aspirations of his century, so there are millions who confess Humanity in ways, it may be, different from ours, not openly with their lips, but visibly in their lives and passionately in their hearts, and who may be far nearer, it may be, to the real Humanity than those who have seen Comte with their eyes, and who yearly or weekly appeal to Humanity in their services." This is a catholic and generous sentiment, but the preceding pages help to explain why Positivism has failed to satisfy the religious instincts of the modern world. For example, religion is defined as a result rather than a cause. It is, we read, "the state of harmony that results when man's entire life, both as an individual and as a member of society, corresponds with the real conditions—first of human nature, and, secondly, of the world around us." An uninspiring definition! Then Positivism is represented as mainly education. Not many wise are called, and no one else is called; such seems to be the Positivist creed. And further, "Humanity" is never defined; it is assumed. If capital letters were only arguments, how much more simple the world would be for some theorists! Besides, Mr. Harrison's book does not meet the stringent philosophical criticisms passed on Positivism, any more than the objections to it from the general religious side, and his estimates of the theistic and Christian schemes are, to put it quite frankly, retrograde and even superficial. No one who knows the inside of the subject will learn much from these pages. No one who is unacquainted with Positivism will probably be attracted very strongly by this statement of its claims. The standpoint of the book, as regards Biblical criticism, for example, is antiquated, and Mr. Harrison's general comments upon English Christianity are neither better nor worse than what an ordinary pamphleteer might have been expected to produce thirty or forty years ago. There are only two adjectives which can be applied to the volume. It is pathetic and it is disappointing. One might add, "readable," but that would be superfluous. Mr. Harrison is always readable, even when he has least to say.

* "The Positive Evolution of Religion." By Frederic Harrison, D.C.L. 8s. 6d. net. (Heinemann.)

JAMES MOFFATT, D.D., D.LITT.

LATIN AMERICA.*

This account of the states of South America and Central America by a young Peruvian diplomat is of extreme interest. He writes with a mind well-equipped in knowledge of history, of political and economic theories, he is decided in his views, enthusiastic in his hopes and his foretellings. State by state he gives a brief resumé of their story, their origin and growth until there came the great moment of revolution in 1810, when they began to throw off the domination of Spain. During the last hundred years they have been rent by conflicts within themselves, and among each other, problems have been presented whose solution affected their very existence. Through it all they survived, and continued to work towards an understanding of their individual nationalities, and to a perception of their collective ties and the tremendous future that may be in store for a Latin America, conscious of itself and banded together against the aggression, in war or by peaceful methods of commerce and immigration, of Germany, Japan and the United States. M. Garcia-Calderon discusses temperately and gravely the dangers from these countries, but his conclusions are hopeful, provided the Latin States unite in developing their resources and fostering a federal idea.

* "Latin America. Its Rise and Progress." By F. Garcia-Calderon. Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net. (T. Fisher Unwin.)

There are innumerable points of interest lightly touched upon in this volume, but the space into which the immense subject is compressed forbids the author to give much detail. Our scanty knowledge of a mighty continent is usefully refreshed and increased by every page. One does not at all moments realise that the overwhelming majority of the population are either pure Indians or mestizos, the descendants of Indians and whites, while mulattos sprung from whites and negroes, and zambos, the children of Indians and negroes also form a considerable proportion of the population. In Peru and Ecuador the white element is only 6 per cent., and in the whole country "the pure European element does not amount to 10 per cent. of the total population."

The book has an appreciative Preface by M. Poincaré, who has lately been made President of the French Republic. It is an excellent introduction to the study of the South American States, whose vexed and turbulent history is so little known. We remember the sentence that found a place in Balmaceda's political testament written immediately before his suicide. "All the founders of South American independence have died in dungeons, in prison cells, or have been assassinated, or have perished in proscription and exile." M. Garcia-Calderon promises a happier future, though he strangely enough seems to fail to take into account the labour problems which will make themselves deeply felt in South America, and that soon.

OF HONEST REPORT.*

It is a vicious, though not unusual, method of reviewing that picks out all the bad points in a book (or selects a good sample of them), and passes the rest with an easy sentence of commendation. Yet, as one who has had an opportunity of expressing under his own signature his indebtedness to this striking and thought-provoking book by Miss Underhill, I would like to take this opportunity of dealing with its one outstanding misapprehension. There are passages in her interpretation of the hidden passionate life of Christ (notably in her account of the events attending the Crucifixion) where she seems quaintly to boggle at the supernatural, which is the more strange as the virtue of her whole interpretation is nothing if it is not based on the supernatural. But that is an incidental disagreement, such as the encounter of two minds must always provoke. Her chapter on "St. Paul and the Mystic Way," especially the first portion of it, is a wonderful piece of orderly elucidation. It is when she comes to "The Johannine Mystic" that one is set aback. Her interpretation here is just of the sort most inclined to throw the mystical apprehension of a World beyond worlds into the very disrepute it should be ambitious to avoid.

I am not concerned with critical considerations. In the present instance they seem to be based chiefly on the naïve assumption that the writer himself was not an original thinker; and that therefore he must have been indebted to Alexandrian idealism for much of his outlook. Which seems to be a neat instance of the first logical fallacy. Miss Underhill, however, accepts this temporary outpost of German theological criticism (which is abandoning most of the outposts it took so sturdily some twenty years ago); and she is therefore faced with the problem of the events recorded by John that are not to be found in the "Synoptic Record," in the first half of his Gospel, and all the lengthy speeches in the second half. Her solution is without doubt as ingenious as it is sincere. Briefly it is this: that John in states of religious trance saw visions and heard voices, which visions and voices become so real to him that he set them down in a consecutive account, declaring them to be an authentic life of his Master. Faced bravely, the situation comes to this: that John has practised on us a colossal piece of fraud, a piece of fraud hardly conceivable of a man who displays so exquisitely pure a spirit as pervades the whole of his book, but which he makes the worse by declaring in the very head and front of his account that "we speak that we do know, and testify that we have seen." Miss Underhill quotes some instances of those who have seen, in such states of vision, episodes of the life of Christ with extraordinarily intimate and precise detail, as though they had lived in the very air and space of the things they saw—such as the visions experienced by John of the Cross and Julian of Norwich. But Julian related her experiences as personal visions. she did not try to tumble-rig them into actual events as treasured in her memory of them. That is the difference. It is the difference between an honest report and one that is not honest. Because, assuming Miss Underhill's interpretation, John in his waking consciousness must have known the difference between the two things.

* "The Mystic Way." By Evelyn Underhill. 12s. 6d. net. (Dent.)

There are some who accept the truth of John's report; there are some who do not. Both are conceivable attitudes of mind. Miss Underhill, in her reverence for a passing phase of German theology (with its typical Saxon heaviness), both does and does not; with the result that her mysticism, in this one instance, changes its "y" for an "i." To support her interpretation she quotes four sayings put by John into the mouth of Christ as having an obvious reference to events that occurred long after his life on earth: and each of them fails her. They are worth examination—on purely rational, exegetical grounds.

(1) "Thus, 'Other men laboured, and ye are entered into their labours'. true enough of those who followed St. Paul, not of those who preceded him." But why not? Was not Christ always referring to the labours and persecutions of the Hebrew prophets who preceded Him? (2) "'Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink His blood, ye have no life in you'—incredible upon the lips of the human Jesus." And yet it was the human Jesus who established the strange ritual of the Bread and Wine! (3) "'If the world hate you, ye know that it hated Me before it hated you': a direct reference to the first persecutions of the Church." Why not a direct reference to the hatred of the Sanhedrim against this new following, that, with the entrance into Jerusalem, they had all encountered in full? (4) "'I am in My Father, and ye in Me and I in you': the deeply mystical formula of John's own experience and belief." But why should it be any the less odd as a formula of John's experience and belief than of Christ's?

Authentic or not, John's account is at least a logical entity, and deserves to be treated as such. And it is a pity that Miss Underhill has not done so, because the other parts of her book are as subtle in their sympathy as they are striking in their exegesis.

DARRELL FIGGIS.

Novel Notes.

RISING DAWN. By Harold Begbie. 6s. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Simple in design and quiet in style is Mr. Harold Begbie's new novel of English life in the fourteenth century. But the picture gains in clarity and charm by the selection the author has made from all the rich and varied material relating to the most picturesque age in our history. Froissart and Chaucer, Langland and Wycliffe, with Wat Tyler in the background, lived in the days when Andrew Mallet set out from his father's manor house near Pevensey, on a ride to the palace of John of Gaunt in London. With all that Froissart stands for Mr. Begbie has no concern. The Flemish chronicler paints the sunset of feudal chivalry in glowing colours, but he is blind to the hues of the new dawn, which, as in Arctic skies at summer, mingle with the iridescence of a decaying order of things. It was one of the great moments in the life of the English nation—one of the great moments indeed in the life of mankind. For the birth of the spirit of modern liberty was then taking place. It is this birth of liberty that Mr. Begbie clearly, simply, and finely describes through the frank, honest eyes of his young country hero. The Sussex squire starts on his journey with the Froissart view of life, trained by his warlike father for war, he regards the world as a picturesque and exciting tournament, in which he intends to win knight-hood and fortune by strength and skill of hand. He is the gallant and honourable young squire that Chaucer has painted for us in the "Canterbury Tales"—rather as an exemplar, I am afraid, than as a study from daily life. And Chaucer in person intervenes in his career, and helps him to enter the service of John of Gaunt. Attached to the train of the Royal Duke is a little, thin, elderly Oxford man, Doctor Wycliffe. So Andrew's ride to London with news of some political importance, with which his father has entrusted him, leads him into the chief centre of the new forces in English life. For the action of his story, Mr. Begbie has gone to a curious law case mentioned in the "Calendar of Patent Rolls," in which it is recorded that John of Gaunt heard the appeal of John Shakyl in a suit brought by the sister of Robert Hauley. It is a strange, picturesque, dramatic affair, well known to every close student of the troublous period between the death of Edward III. and the temporary disgrace of John of Gaunt. But no historical novelist, whom I know of, has seen its high value, as Mr. Begbie has done. It reveals in a most vivid way the fading ideals of chivalry and the sordid cunning that worked beneath the trappings of honourable warfare. The matter is too intricate for explanation in a review. It is a story with some quick turns and sudden surprises, and Mr. Begbie tells it admirably. His hero plays a small part in it, his position being a very dubious one. He is used as a dull, honest tool by John of Gaunt for a mean, disgraceful purpose. Disillusioned at last, he gives up all hope of worldly success, loses the woman he loves, and becomes one of Doctor Wycliffe's Russet Priests. The gradual awakening of his mind and soul, under the stress of circumstances, is traced in a natural and very moving manner.

THE DANCING CHILD By Brenda Girvin and Monica Cosens 6s (Chapman & Hall)

"The Dancing Child" is a novel with a purpose.

Miss Brenda Girvin,

Joint-Author of "The Dancing Child" (Chapman & Hall).

"If anywhere in these realms of stage romances and realities there be need for the plea of this tale, and if that plea be heard, then let it not pass unheeded," urge the authors in their short foreword. The business end of the story—for it has its playful end as well—is directed against those unscrupulous persons who adopt clever children with the sole idea of exploiting them on the stage and living on their earnings. To this type belongs Ethel Paton, a heartless, mercenary woman, who seeing monetary possibilities in the exquisite dancing of a charming little Irish girl, adopts the child and brings her to London. Soon, under the name of Berry Traill, the ten-year-old dancer wins fame in the principal

Miss Monica Cosens,

Joint-Author of "The Dancing Child" (Chapman & Hall).

part of a children's play at a West End theatre, and the far-seeing "mother" is living a life of ease and luxury, while the child has to work hard, not only on the stage, but also in the schoolroom. Berry is treated with the utmost meanness by her parasitic "mother," who cleverly trades upon the child's belief in Pauden, the King of the Fairies, to induce her to become a willing slave, and to forego most of the pleasures which children love. The authors trace Berry's career through the "leggy" stage when, in spite of the cruel efforts made to check her growth, she persists in adding to her poor little stature, and finally on to the music-halls where, as Sweet Kit, she has her train of fast followers, and is knocked down by her "mother" to the highest bidder. A pleasant love story is intertwined with the main plot of "The Dancing Child," which is coloured throughout with a genuine affection for children and concern for their welfare.

AN INN UPON THE ROAD. By Janet Dodge 6s (Sidgwick & Jackson)

It is certainly an interesting speculation to imagine that Love is merely "An Inn upon the Road" of Life, where woman may rest a night or two and then continue her journey along the highway. This is apparently Miss Dodge's philosophy, and her latest work endeavours to show the possibility of such a dogma in the persons of Natalie Herbert and Conrad Mark. She hastens to assure her readers that woman is the better for Love, but that the mistake she often makes, is in thinking that Love fulfilled is the ultimate end, instead of the threshold, of a new life. And from this point of view the book is well worth studying, but as a novel, it can hardly be deemed a success as the absence of a legitimate plot might weary its readers unless they were interested in the author's premises. The principal characters in this story are types sometimes met with, but seldom appreciated, such as the masculine Helen and Natalie's frivolous mother, who represent some of the influences which contribute to the final separation of Natalie and her lovers, although the climax is precipitated by the girl herself who cannot assimilate the idea of self sacrifice to true Love. The book involves a somewhat new departure in ethics and as such is worth reading.

THE HOUSE OF SPIES. By Warwick Deeping 6s (Cassell)

"Ten yards away Jasper Benham lay flat on his back, one arm flung out, the other twisted as though it were broken. The lantern swayed uncertainly at the gate, and then came down into the road. It showed the white face and the slight figure of a girl, a red cloak flung over her shoulders, her dress open at the throat." This was the first meeting of the hero and the heroine. The novel closes with Nance Durrell wounded but safe in Jasper's arms, while the villain of the piece, a French spy, is shot in a duel on the shore. Mr. Deeping has gone back to the period when Napoleon's threatened invasion set the South of England astir, but the interest of the story lies in the adventures of Jasper and Nance, the latter a girl who was mixed up, thanks to her fanatical father, with the intrigues of a French count on behalf of Napoleon. There is plenty of fighting, or rather of rough play, in the book, and Mr. Warwick Deeping as usual has succeeded in making a series of exciting situations hold the reader's interest to the end. De Rothan is a full-blooded blackguard of the aristocratic type. His exploits strain the probabilities a little, but that is a detail. The story in the main is alive with romance, and it runs briskly from start to finish.

INEFFECTUAL FIRES. By E. M. Smith-Dampier. 6s. (Andrew Melrose)

We have to congratulate Mr. Smith-Dampier on a finely conceived novel. The two central figures are an artist, or rather a would-be artist, who mistakes cleverness for genius, and an elderly countrywoman with a strong maternal instinct. The artist is hampered by a father who has no sympathy with the artistic tastes which his son has inherited from an Italian mother, and the woman has to overcome, by the sheer devotion of her nature to the boy, the Puritan prejudices of her environment. Sabina Blanchflower behaves nobly. She gives up her home to let her protégé have his chance of Italy, and while the sacrifice is in vain, as far as the lad's success goes, she returns a richer woman. There are bits of by-play in the novel, love-making and a description of Sir Joshua Reynolds's household, but the dominating interest of the story lies in the interaction of the two main characters, and Mr. Smith-Dampier has contrived to work this out with admirable skill. The Italian scenes are vivid, in spite of the tragedy which looms over them from the first. But we should like to know how Sabina's Bible, "opened at random for consolation, gave the words to her pointing finger: 'Let Satan stand at his right hand.'" The devil did tempt poor Shaw in his hour of collapse and failure, but in what Bible did Sabina discover this gloomy prophecy?

THE SILENCE OF MEN. By H. F. Prevost Battersby. 6s. (John Lane.)

On the voyage to India John March is laid captive by the fascinations of Lynne Ashburton, whom he marries—on the quiet—after a decent interval to prove the permanency of his love. He is, unfortunately, rather too conscientious an official, and his duties compel him to be away from home very often. So the marriage, of which very few people know, is not a success. Lynne ends it by committing bigamy and leaving India with a very unattractive "husband." Years pass, and March continues to keep silence. He returns to England and falls seriously in love with an innocent girl. Meanwhile, Lynne is not happy as a leader of society, and gives indications that she is anxious to return to March. She threatens him with exposure. And there are other elements in the situation to complicate the tangle. It is solved by the discovery that she had married yet another man before she met March, and that this gentleman died before she married her third "husband." So March is free to go his own way, and everything ends happily. Mr. Prevost Battersby uses every possible art to make this unlikely story attractive and credible, and, while he fails utterly where the second point is concerned, he achieves some considerable success in the first. "The Silence of Men" is not at all a great book, but it is very well written, and the Indian scenes—of which there are too few—are genuinely illuminating.

A BALKAN PRINCE. By Charles G. D. Roberts. 2s. net. (Everett.)

A surprise awaits the admirers of Mr. Charles G. D. Roberts's delightful studies of animal life. The author's latest book is upon totally different lines; it constitutes, we believe, its writer's first regular novel. It is something more than passable and readable; it is quite an excellent story in its way, in spite of the fact that, after a pleasantly intriguing beginning, there is an interpolation of a lengthy and unnecessary railway journey and a great deal of "improving" conversation upon the merits of various aeroplanes, all of which are now out of date. However, once the reader has skipped that, he will find a good deal to interest him. The plot is decidedly strong, and clever use has been made of recent events in the Balkans, involving an original and fairly plausible explanation of the motives underlying the declaration of war on the part of the allied states. The characters also—a Servian Prince, an English army officer, an American adventurer, and a French lady-spy—are pleasant and fairly human. Still, though we are glad of anything Mr. Roberts cares to give us, we must confess that we prefer him in his earlier vein. So many people might have written "A Balkan Prince," so few can write the animal stories.

IFS AND ANS. By H. B. Marriott Watson. 6s. (Mills & Boon.)

Mr. Marriott Watson can tell a good story. In this volume he has told fourteen, and the first four are dominated by the same hero, Richard Derrick, who faces death in several forms, and chiefly by reason of his chivalry towards beautiful Spanish ladies. This is more than the book for an idle hour, for the work is careful and worth attention. In another sense it is par excellence the book for an idle hour, for the stories are arresting, dramatic, vivid and well varied. Just once or twice their author plays Providence in a fashion which is almost too childlike; but even then we are glad that a comfortable tidying up in the final paragraphs leaves no pang to mar a story which has given pleasure.

THE FRINGE OF THE DESERT. By Rachel Swete Macnamara. 6s. (Herbert Jenkins)

We had not thought to chance so soon on an antithesis to "Hella Donna" and Miss Macnamara will not take the reference amiss, for the resemblance and the contrast may be purely unintentional. Mr. Hichens gave us an adventuress removing one husband for the sake of another; Miss Macnamara gives us a fascinating artist committing bigamy through egotism and weakness. But in the case of "Hella Donna" the environment was essential to the story, seeing that nowhere in the fashionable world could slow murder be so safely compassed as in a private dahabeah upon the Nile. Miss Macnamara's hero on the other hand, could have committed bigamy pretty nearly anywhere. Her excuse is that she paints the splendours of Egyptian scenery with a pen that makes us grateful, and though her paragraphs now and then seem to say "Let us be descriptive," they beguile us none the less. Where she gains on Mr. Hichens is that she does not try to rival his sultriness of passion, and she keeps her characters intensely human. She gives us in Mildred Ivors and Hesper Marlowe two delightful women, modern in the best sense, and full of perfect feeling, and their coming together in a tragic climax strains no probabilities.

MINNA. From the Danish of Karl Gjellerup. 6s. (William Heinemann.)

Strindberg and the other great outstanding figures of the Scandinavian invasion of English literature have very little to fear from this excellent translation by C. L. Nielsen of Karl Gjellerup's "Minna." This story of a young Dane's infatuation for a governess is a very simple and artless affair, and it depends less on skill of construction and depth of psychological analysis than it does on its naturalness and obviousness—and on the power of kind-hearted people to feel "Poor things, how they must suffer! How bitter and cruel are the disillusiones that attend a nice young man's love!" As a matter of fact, however, hardened novel readers will be warned off this book by the preface—by the reference to the death of the hero which "I am half happy, half sorry, to say," observes Gjellerup, "took place not many years after he had lost his beloved Minna. Indeed, the fear which she mentioned in her letter to Stephenson that Fenger's chest was not strong, proved to be less unfounded than he himself supposed. It was also thought probable by his doctor that the heart-wound of which these pages tell added fuel to the complaint from which he was already suffering." The experienced in fiction know full well the different types of these emotional but consumptive North-erners, and, as the truth must be told, Karl Gjellerup does not, in "Minna," make us like them any better than we did when we met them years and years ago, in the pages of stories written by young English ladies of quality, and wished them an early and happy decease.

THE OUTLAW. By David Hennessey. 6s. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

The award of the second prize of £400 in Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton's recent novel competition to "The Outlaw" in some respects must have been an action requiring considerable pluck on the part of Miss Harraden, Sir W. Robertson Nicoll, and Mr. Shorter, the adjudicators. For "The Outlaw," is not at all the sort of book that one would expect to win such a prize. It is sensational—parts of it, indeed, come perilously near to melodrama—the style in which it is written is not particularly literary, and a number of its characters are conventional and ineffectual. Yet it is quite a fine book in its way. Defects such as those mentioned are almost inherent in its scheme; and it possesses virtues which tip the scale heavily in its favour. To begin with, it is an excellent story, genuinely interesting and good to read and essentially unusual. Hitherto the bushranger of fiction has been either a totally impossible blend of Robin Hood, D'Artagnan, and Don Quixote, or a sinister scoundrel before whom the woolliest villains of the Wild West pale into insignificance. Salathiel, Mr. Hennessey's Outlaw, is neither. He is, in his way, a creation—certainly an arresting figure. Life has treated him hardly and unfairly, and although his resentment and revenge may not be pretty, they are at least consistent with his character. Salathiel is a human being; one can believe in him. This is the crux of the whole book, for it stands or falls by this one character. In other respects "The Outlaw" is a well-handled, capable piece of work. It is written in a style that at worst is businesslike and at best is remarkably well suited to the subject-matter of the story; it is crowded with incident; and it presents a fresh and vigorous—though one-sided—picture of a period of Australian history which is little known or studied in this country. In fact, "The Outlaw," may not be a great novel, but at least it is a very good one.

THE CURSE OF THE NILE By Douglas Sladen. 6s. (Stanley Paul)

"The Curse of the Nile" is a powerfully dramatic story inspired by the tragedy of Gordon. It presents a striking and realistic picture of life in the Sudan from the siege of Khartoum to the battle of Omdurman—covering a period of more than fourteen years. There is a glittering thread of romance winding its way through the woeful tales of suffering and terror, like a silver stream that at last out-distances the bloodshed and misery and glides on its way peacefully after they are all over. The dreadful scenes in the prison of the Khalifa are true and taken from the actual experience of three men—which fact makes them only the more horrible and unforgettable. The hero of the story is a young English officer, the heroine a beautiful Sicilian girl with wonderful eyes which serve a strange, peculiarly useful purpose when the owner of them is placed in critical and dangerous positions. Both these young people are doomed to endure all manner of peril and hardship, including a long separation, before Fate relents and, lifting them out of harm's way, gives them to each other. Mr. Sladen is obviously at home with his subject, and the story carries with it from beginning to end the atmosphere of place and period which the author has realized so successfully, and which makes the book as real on its sunnier as on its darker side. It is a stirring novel; fact and fiction are very skilfully woven together, and the whole story is one of absorbing interest.

CANDLELIGHT DAYS. By Adeline M. Teskey. 6s. (Cassell.)

Miss Teskey's latest book is a little difficult to classify. It is not a novel, and we suspect that large parts of it are not even fiction. At the same time it is not a book of genuine reminiscence, for the author has obviously allowed her imagination to colour a good many of the scenes she describes. And—if we may say so without offence—Miss Teskey herself is quite wrong in describing it as a story, as she does in her "note" at the beginning. There is no story about it. The boy who is supposed to be the narrator grows up—that is all. We can only describe it—rather clumsily—as a fairly detailed picture of the life of old-time pioneers in Canada—to be more exact, in the State of Ontario. We admit that we have gone into this point at too great length for the purposes of a short notice, but we think it our duty to warn off those readers who ask nothing more from a novel than an exciting plot. They are bound to be disappointed. However, there must be a large number of people to whom Miss Teskey's delicately vivid methods of narration and genial sympathy with a large number of strongly contrasted characters, are bound to appeal. They will find that "Candlelight Days," takes a high place among the most delightful Canadian books that have ever been written.

THE LIFE MASK. By the Author of "He Who Passed." 6s. (Heinemann.)

"He Who Passed," one of the most remarkable of last year's novels, was put forward as an actual biography—a strange life-story that was entirely true. In "The Life Mask" the anonymous author confesses that she has tried a 'prentice hand at fiction, but her fiction is so vividly and powerfully realistic that it reads almost as if it were as true as the true story. Written in the first person, it is the record of a woman, still young, who had been sentenced to imprisonment for life for the murder of her husband. After nearly ten years in prison she was set at liberty, so ill that she was believed to be dying; but an old nurse mothered her and brought her back to health, and so she came to face life shrinkingly again, always in fear of her dreadful secret being discovered. Through the earlier half of the book the reader is aware of this black shadow that is over her, but the secret is as cunningly kept from him as she was keeping it from the world at large. For sufficiently convincing reasons, she has no doubt of her guilt. She meets and loves a man who falls passionately in love with her, but because she loves him she is desperately determined not to marry him and risk bringing any shadow of her dreadful shame over his career. It is a poignantly dramatic situation, she is on the verge of self-destruction, as the only way out of it, since he resolutely refuses to be sent away, when circumstances force her to a confession of the truth, and, following this, comes a revelation of her innocence that is only less surprising than the identity of the real criminal. It is a well imagined, distinctly clever story; the characters are alive and human, and the interest is thoroughly sustained from the opening sentence to the finish.

THE HONEY-STAR. By Tickner Edwardes. 6s. (Hutchinson.)

The hero has two obstacles to encounter. Elisabeth March, his pretty neighbour, is the daughter of a rival bee-keeper, and there had been an old feud between the two families. But love triumphs, and the pair fall in love. The second obstacle to their happiness lies in the jealousy of another woman. Rose Petherway, a rather sensuous creature, sets herself to break her old lover's peace by raking up a scandal in his past life, and this plot occupies the second half of the story. The first is more idyllic. Still, by a rather conventional device, the scandal is exposed and cleared up, so that the idyllic atmosphere pervades the close of the romance. There is a capital description of a horse-fair. Mr. Edwardes has drenched his pages with the slumber on undisturbed. The factions and disputes of religious persons have ever been the Church's most insidious foes, and wordlings have often quoted in derision Tertullian's observation: "See how these Christians love one another." But St. Alban's is something infinitely greater than the cause of a contest where the combatants joined in "pelting each other for the public good." It is a monument of unselfish devotion rendered by most saintly and talented men to the greatest of all causes. "The Church which is to win England for Christ must go into the highways and hedges, into the slums, and the cellars and the reeking garrets of a population which lives twelve in a room, and there proclaim the Acceptable Year of the Lord—the simultaneous deliverance from moral and from physical degradation," writes Mr. Russell, and this has been for fifty years the object, end, and law and purpose of St. Alban's existence.

PEERESSES OF THE STAGE. By Cranstoun Metcalfe. 10s 6d. net. (Melrose)

This is a book about actresses who have married Peers of the Realm, and it is written from a point of view that recalls the history of gentle Jane. "She was good as gold, and when she grew up she was given in marriage to a first-class Earl who kept his carriage." Indeed, writing the life of Maria Foote who became Countess of Harrington, after a somewhat adventurous career, the author says: "On the principle that in this world we get pretty much what we deserve, we accept this marriage to the Earl of Harrington as good evidence that Maria Foote was a sound little woman at heart." The author is determined to set down naught in malice, and this is of course praiseworthy; yet perhaps a trifling hint of malice might have made the book a little more piquant. If we must carp we may object that sugar and spice and all things nice, after all, may be rather cloying, (specially when the author treats of the best of all possible worlds wherein pretty musical comedy actresses attain to a terrestrial paradise of motor-cars, and, we are instructed, "expense is no object." Undoubtedly, humdrum folk like to have glimpses vouchsafed to them of so brilliant an existence; we all hunger for romance, and although there may be very little real romance in these lives, yet there is a colourable imitation of the romantic; and Mr. Metcalfe uses it to excellent purpose in this ably written and entertaining volume. Photographs of many pretty musical comedy actresses embellish the letterpress.

Notes on New Books.

MESSRS. WARD LOCK & CO.

The subject matter of Miss Lindsay Russell's Souls in Pawn (6s), is somewhat scandalous but dramatic in quality. She deals with the ways of life of the Roman Catholic priesthood of Irish race in Australia, and, if she may be believed, chastity and sobriety are not among their ruling virtues. However this may be, Miss Russell has got hold of a sombre, unusual, tragical theme; but shows little power in the handling and development of it. She inclines to use the methods of a serial writer of the mystifying sort, instead of boldly stating at once her main situation, and then working with strength and directness through some great scenes to the grand conclusion. We are afraid that if the book attracts any considerable attention, it will be more by reason of its savage attack upon the character of the Roman Catholic clergy in Australia, than because of its qualities as a piece of literature. The characters are indicated rather than drawn. There is no insight, no intensity of vision into the workings of human nature under strange and terrible conditions. In short, Miss Russell is hardly equal to carrying out so amazingly painful a study of modern life as she has conceived.

MESSRS. EVERETT & CO.

On opening Mrs. Coulson Kernahan's latest novel—The Mystery of Mere Hall (6s.)—one finds oneself immediately in the very depths of a grim mystery. In the spacious grounds surrounding a decayed and isolated old mansion known as Mere Hall, a coffin-shaped box is being buried by lantern light, and two young girls are the unseen witnesses. Suddenly there is the sharp crack of a revolver, and the terrified girls hurry away from the uncanny scene—but the reader's interest is fully awakened by then, and does not abate until the end. The plot, complicated though it is, entangling many lives in its tragic skein, is well constructed and bristling with dramatic incidents. Mrs. Coulson Kernahan has got a good story to tell, and knows how to tell it. Her heroine, a pretty girl of seventeen, fresh from a convent school, lives with her weird grandfather at Mere Hall. The great gloomy house is too oppressive for her rebellious nature and she runs away from its shadows, only to be submerged in other troubles and difficulties. It is a good sensational tale with a strong love interest running through it, and several thrilling "curtains."

MESSRS. RELFE BROTHERS.

At all seasons of the year there are young ears open for a good fairy-tale, and for such there comes Miss K. E. Cogswell's pretty volume, The Three Black Stones, and Other Stories, (2s net). Its themes are fresh and its style lucid, and it is brightened by clever illustrations.

MESSRS. HEATH, CRANTON & OUSELEY.

We confess we are puzzled by The Poetical Compendium, compiled by Mr. D. R. Broadbent (6s net). Mr. Broadbent terms his volume "Three Centuries of the Best English Verse." The period is from 1608 to 1870, and he begins with Milton and ends with Adam Lindsay Gordon; yet he includes no word from Keats, Shelley and Byron. He goes to America for "the best English verse" of Whittier and Lowell; he gives us many poems by Southey and by Kingsley, yet not a single line from the pen of Wordsworth, Tennyson and Browning. Is this a "Compendium" of what Mr. Broadbent likes best, or what?

MR. FRANCIS GRIFFITHS

Lieut.-Col. William Sedgwick has written a second volume on Man and His Future (6s net). His sub-title is "The Anglo-Saxon: His Part and His Place." His book is in one way a survey of the teaching of Darwin and Herbert Spencer, and a declaration of the belief that Science and Religion, hand in hand, can achieve and explain all things; while Science alone is in the end but a cul-de-sac, leaving man with but confusion for his outlook. The book holds thought and incites thought, and is the outcome of strong conviction.

MESSRS. CASSELL & CO., LTD

It is as natural to love a fairy tale as it would be churlish to criticise it. For our own part we are extremely grateful to Olive Christian Mackirdy for her new story, Love's Soldier (6s). It is a long time since we have enjoyed anything as much as Robert Hayes's interview with his publisher. Robert protested against the excessive generosity of the terms offered, and Mr. Standing (quite naturally) figuratively embraced him. But this is only an incidental trifle in this fairy tale. Robert Hayes, banker's clerk, adopted Elizabeth Morris, and from this moment his fortunes never took a wrong turning. With the profits of his book he became a financial power, obtained a seat in the Cabinet, and named his own price to the Premier. When he married Mollie Maclean, the daughter of his old chief, the King was present at the ceremony, and told Mollie to sign her name in the register as Mary Stirling. For Robert Hayes had a well-kept secret: he had been created Duke of Stirling.

MESSRS. HODDER & STOUGHTON.

For any man who is lacking in self-confidence, or a little inclined to be disheartened in the face of misfortune, a reading of Mr. Herbert Kaufman's Do Something! Be Something! (2s net) should prove the best and most effective of all available tonics. We would go further and say it is a book to be placed in the hands of every young man at the outset of his career, for it preaches a gospel of energy, common-sense, and resolute self-confidence with a vigour and fiery optimism that are in themselves heartening and inspiring. "The right type of man will raise a grove of fig-trees in a desert. Failure isn't a disease of locality—it's a personal habit. Anybody can get a steady living out of steady effort. The same clock that ticks off twenty-four hours for one man can't cheat his neighbour." So runs Mr. Kaufman's homely, forcible philosophy. He has no belief in luck. Thousands of capable men, he says, have remained nonentities "simply because they had a fool idea that Fortune keeps a visiting list. She doesn't. She hasn't stirred from home since she first went into business. . . . There are no tramways to her door. No man who ever found the path managed to leave footprints to guide another over exactly the same route. She gives nothing. . . . The price of her goods must be paid for in grit and ability." Every page bristles with shrewd hints and practical counsel, and the sum of it is this: "The world is on the back of every man. Shrink from its weight and your burden grows doubly heavy. Carry it with squared shoulders and a light heart and it rides like a bubble." A wise book and a brave one, whose strong, healthful thoughts blow through a reader's mind like the bracing morning air on a mountain.

Edmund Gosse

FROM A DRAWING BY FRANK DICKSEE, R.A.

WARD, LOCK & Co.'s POPULAR FICTION

Each Volume
Handsomely Bound,
Cloth Gilt,

6s.

LEILA AND HER LOVER

THE WASTREL

THE HARVEST MOON

AVERNO

THE HOUR GLASS MYSTERY

Max Pemberton

Harold Bindloss

Justus M. Forman

Bertram Mitford

Headon Hill

Special attention may be directed to the artistic bindings of these novels. Each has an attractive envelope printed in color and is illustrated by first-class artists.

Max Pemberton.

HARD PRESSED

Fred M. White

THE SECOND CHANCE

Paul Trent

A MYSTERY OF THE THAMES

Florence Warden

THE THIRTEENTH GUEST

Fergus Hume

DUCKS AND DRAKES

Marie C. Leighton

MYSTERIES

Wm. Le Queux

SOULS IN PAWN

Lindsay Russell

EXPIATION (3s. 6d.)

E. Phillips Oppenheim

LORD STRANLEIGH ABROAD

Robert Barr

UNTIL SEVENTY TIMES SEVEN

L. G. Moberly

FROM ALL LIBRARIES & BOOKSELLERS.

READERS OUT OF REACH

of a good local bookseller, or who live abroad, are asked to write direct to London for their books, which will be sent by return of post, at lowest cash prices, on receipt of remittance with order.

German or French Books (if not obtainable in London) are posted to customers direct from Leipzig or Paris by my agents there, thus saving postage.

LONDON AGENT FOR LIBRARIES ABROAD.

ESTABLISHED
1851

Subscription Newspaper and Periodical Agency for British and Foreign Publications.

List of 1600 Subscription Rates free on application.

CATALOGUES SENT POST FREE

1. Reference Book Catalogue of 146 pp. of Standard Literature.
2. Remainder Catalogue of over 1000 Titles of Publishers' Remainders, in good condition as issued, at from 30% to 80% off published prices. (Out of print till September.)
3. List of Pocket Editions and 7d. Novels.
4. Price List of Subscription Rates for British Periodicals abroad, with a selection of the most popular American, French, German, and Spanish periodicals.

ALFRED WILSON

Export and Retail Bookseller

18-19 GRACECHURCH STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Telephone: 7463 Central.

London County & Westminster (Lombard Street).

From Chatto & Windus's List

"A new and distinguished writer." — Daily News.

THE EVERLASTING SEARCH 6s.
By CECIL DUNCAN JONES.

Second Impression.

A YOUNG LADY 6s.
By HORACE W. C. NEWTE.

GEORGE DU MAURIER
The Satirist of the Victorians. 7s. 6d. net.
By T. MARTIN WOOD.

"Mr. Wood in his text hits off the foibles of Victorian Society almost as neatly as did Du Maurier in his pictures. A work which is at once acute and amusing." — The Athenaeum.

CAMBRIDGE FROM WITHIN 7s. 6d. net.
By CHARLES TENNYSON.

With 20 Plates in Colour and Sepia by HARRY MORLEY.

"A charming volume which exhibits much sympathetic insight and perceptive humour." — Saturday Review.

MOZART'S OPERAS
A Critical Study. 12s. 6d. net.
By EDWARD J. DENT.

London

CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

Interesting Books on Varied Subjects.

THE BEAUTY, HISTORY, ROMANCE AND MYSTERY OF THE CANADIAN LAKE REGION.

By WILFRED CAMPBELL, Author of "Lake Lyrics," "The Dread Voyage," "A Beautiful Rebel," etc. With numerous plates in colour and half tone. Price 6/-

There is no more beautiful, enchanting and sublime portion of the American continent than the lake region of Canada. Commencing at the Thousand Islands and extending to the extreme western shores of Lake Superior, is a continuous chain of superb lakes and noble waterways, unequalled anywhere in the world for their beauty of fresh-water coast scenery and as a vast highway for inland navigation. "It has long been one of my most cherished dreams," says the author, "to give to the world in some form an account of this region and these lovely and magnificent lakes, so as to celebrate, and perchance to perpetuate in literature not only their unique beauties, but also to chronicle somewhat of the prehistoric and historic tragedy and comedy, and the human vicissitudes which have been associated with this vicinity from the remotest human antiquity to the present day."

WHERE THE SUGAR MAPLE GROWS.

IDYLLS OF A CANADIAN VILLAGE.

By ADELINE M. TESKEY. Illustrations by J. S. GORDON. Price 6/-

A charming volume of sketches. The author, Adeline M. Teskey, is a resident of Canada and her work will prove a revelation to those persons who claim that Canada has no literature. Miss Teskey has produced in these Idylls of a Canadian village something unique in the way of character studies, equal in all respects to the quaint types of "Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush."

THE MASTER OF LIFE.

A ROMANCE OF THE FIVE NATIONS AND OF PREHISTORIC MONTREAL.

By W. D. LIGHTHALL, F.R.S.C., Author of "The False Chevalier," etc. Price 6/-

This is a story of woods and waters and prehistoric scenes . . . . . The present book is an attempt to picture the strange life of the Red Man's mind, life, and melancholy. It is an aboriginal romance, without a white man in it. The Indian is here represented in the chivalrous and reverent side of his nature. To understand his philosophy it is necessary to remember that he was a mystic; yet he believed one thing firmly, that the whole world of objects was living. Nothing to him was inanimate—he himself was but part of a living world, and so were his dreams. And that world had one exquisite and incomparable quality to him in its state of perfect nature—its beauty.

THE BATTLE OF THE PLAINS.

THE GREATEST EVENT IN CANADIAN HISTORY.

By J. M. HARPER, Author of "The Montgomery Siege," etc. Price 6/-

The Battle of the Plains of Abraham stands out as a memorable event in the history of the world, being not only the most important event in the history of Canada, but an achievement of the highest moment in the military annals of the British Empire as well. And the celebration of its occurrence on the immediate outskirts of the city of Quebec, by the issue of such a volume as this, cannot but be of interest to the King's subjects in every part of the British possessions.

TALES OF THE PORCUPINE TRAILS.

Poems by W. MILTON YORKE. Price 4/-

Mr. Yorke writes with ease, swing, and vigour. There stands out from it all the hardy and hearty ring of the man who knows, the expressiveness of the man who appreciates, the force of the man who is earnest, the fire and freedom of originality, and the enthusiasm of the patriot. . . . . The poems are replete with merit, with character and with genuine interest.

PUBLISHED BY THE MUSSON BOOK COMPANY
LIMITED OF TORONTO AND MANSION HOUSE
CHAMBERS, QUEEN
VICTORIA ST., LONDON, E.C.

GAY'S SHILLING LIBRARY.

Each volume Crown 8vo. Printed on Good Paper, and bound in Superior Cloth, with Attractive Wrapper in Colours. 1s. net each.

I. WHEN CHARLES I. WAS KING.

By J. S. FLETCHER

N.B.—This Novel has been styled the "Iorna Donne" of Yorkshire. Daily News— "Of hairbreadth escapes, of kidnappings, fightings, and stirring adventures, there are no end in the book."

II. CURLY. (A Tale of the Arizona Desert.)

By ROGER POCKOCK

Daily Telegraph—"The book bristles with adventure."

III. THE AFFAIR AT THE INN.

By KATE DOUGLAS WIGGIN

and the Misses MARY and JANE FINDLATER and ALLAN McAULAY. Referee—"The narrative is simple, life-like, unaffected, and from first to last the interest is sustained without strain. The book is a sheer delight."

IV. TIMOTHY'S QUEST.

By KATE DOUGLAS WIGGIN

Punch—"The book is an almost perfect idyll."

V. REBECCA OF SUNNYBROOK FARM.

By KATE DOUGLAS WIGGIN

Daily Telegraph—"Bubbles over with delightful humour and tender pathos."

VI. A FRONTIERSMAN.

By ROGER POCKOCK

The Field—"A stirring book, well written and full of vivid sketches." Scotsman—"Extraordinary life of adventure which excited the envy of 'Buffalo Bill'."

VII. MY LADY OF THE BASS.

By SIDNEY H. BURCHELL

* * A Romance of Old London and the Bass Rock.

Birmingham Post—"It is a cleverly constructed story and the character is drawn with the skill of a master hand."

Glasgow Herald—"It is told in fascinating fashion, and few readers are likely to find other than thorough satisfaction with a story marked by sound workmanship."

VIII. PAVING THE WAY. (A Romance of the Australian Bush.)

By SIMPSON NEWLAND

This volume is based upon exciting scenes and adventures which actually occurred in the pioneer days of Australia.

Morning Post—"Mr. NEWLAND gives an account of Australian life, weaving truth and fiction with considerable ability. Paving the Way is no less to be commended as a romance of wild adventure told with considerable spirit."

IX. SEEING FRANCE WITH UNCLE JOHN.

By ANNE WARNER

Profusely Illustrated by M. W. PIERSON.

Yorkshire Post—"Not since Jerome's story of 'Three Men in a Boat' published some seventeen years ago, do we remember a more amusing tale of travel."

Telegraph—"Described with rare humour. The illustrations are numerous and excellent."

STORIES OF VILLAGE AND TOWN LIFE: Or Word Pictures of Old England.

By MARY RUSSELL MITFORD

Size 6½ in. by 4 in., pp. 280, with Six Illustrations in Colour by F. S. M. P. KNIGHT, each artistically mounted.

Bound in Cloth Gilt gilt top, picture on side, 2s. 6d. net. Velvet calf, 4s. net.

A collection of Short Stories by the Author of 'Our Village.'

SIGNOR CARUSO. The Song of the Evening Stars.

By ANNA MATHIASON

With 14 Caricatures by SIGNOR CARUSO. 3s. 6d. net. Postage 2d.

"Signor Caruso's caricatures of his musical contemporaries are delightful."—Athenaeum. "Sparkling verse and clever caricatures make a most enjoyable book."—Evening Standard.

THE GREEN COCKATOO and Other Plays

By ARTHUR SCHNITZLER

Cr. 8vo, 128 pp., Portrait cloth gilt, 2s. 6d. net.

Three Little Masterpieces.

The Green Cockatoo. The Mate. Paracelus.

"The kind of play for which such adjectives as subtle and brilliant seem especially designed—a first-rate translation and idiomatic in the right place."

Daily Graphic—"Ablely rendered." Scotsman—"Admirably translated into English, and with a very interesting introduction."

—Daily Telegraph.

GERHART HAUPTMANN: His Life and Work.

By KARL HOLL, Ph.D., Lecturer in German in the University of Liverpool

Cr. 8vo, pp. 128, portrait cloth gilt, 2s. 6d. net.

A critical yet popular monograph on the life and work of the great German dramatist.

As the first English handbook on the subject it should supply a long felt want.

"A valuable and instructive essay—a readable and well-studied account of the famous German dramatist."—Scotsman.

LONDON: 12 & 13 Henrietta Street, W.C.

GAY & HANCOCK, Ltd.

EDINBURGH: 34 North Bridge.

WYMAN & SONS LIMITED

Largest Installation of Monotype and Linotype Machines in the Kingdom
Fine Art Miehle and other Presses for best Bookwork

High-class Rotary Machinery for half-tone printing and quadruple Presses producing 16, 20, 24, 28 and 32 pp. papers at 30,000 per hour, folded

Newspaper, Book and General Printers and Lithographers

Binding Plant complete, including the latest machines for Case-making and Casing-in

Books set up by Monotype, submitted entire in proof, printed and bound complete

BOOKSTALL CONTRACTORS ON LONDON & NORTH WESTERN, GREAT WESTERN AND OTHER RAILWAYS

Wholesale Booksellers and Newsagents :: Railway, Press and General Advertising Contractors

LONDON AND READING

The Scarlet Pimpernel Series BARONESS ORCZY

Nine Volumes

The Scarlet Pimpernel
The Tangled Skein
I Will Repay
Beau Brocade
A Son Of The People
By The Gods Beloved
The Emperor's Candlesticks
The Old Man In The Corner
The Nest Of The Sparrowhawk

Issued in Hodder & Stoughton's 1/- net Cloth Library. The uniform Library Edition at 3/6 each is now in preparation. Some of the stories are also issued in Pictorial Paper Covers at 6d. each.

HODDER & STOUGHTON

BELL'S NEW BOOKS

Just published. Demy 8vo. With a Photogravure Frontispiece from an unpublished Portrait of Horace Walpole, and other Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net.

HORACE WALPOLE'S WORLD

A Study of Whig Society under George III.

By ALICE DRAYTON GREENWOOD, Author of "The Hanoverian Queens of England"

"Horace Walpole's World is a charming book. Miss Greenwood, who has already placed us in her debt by her volume on the 'Hanoverian Queens,' has written a record of eighteenth century society in England which is quite fascinating, and which, so far as its principal hero is concerned, goes far to redeem a character much maligned by the strictures of Macaulay."—Mr. W. J. COURTNEY in the Daily Telegraph.

Just published. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

THE JEWS OF TO-DAY

By DR. ARTHUR RUPPIN.

Translated from the German by Marjery Bentwich.

With an Introduction by JOSEPH JACOBS, Litt.D.

Dr Ruppin is well known in Germany and elsewhere, both for his work in sociological statistics and for his Jewish patriotism. This book is a profound and scientific study of the present position of his race, which glows under its array of facts and figures with a subdued passion of indignation against the forces which threaten to undermine the status of the Jews as a race apart.

Demy 8vo. With numerous illustrations and a Map. 10s. 6d. net.

MODERN CHILE

BY W. H. KOLBEI.

"The book is the result of close, sympathetic, and at the same time, discriminating study; it sparkles with finely written descriptive passages, and it is full of solid information, of great value because it is the tested evidence of an expert."—Standard.

London: G. BELL and SONS, Ltd.,
Portugal Street, Kingsway, W.C.

By direction of Sir Wm. BASS, Bt.

Removed from

BYRKLEY LODGE, STAFFORDSHIRE.

THE VALUABLE LIBRARY

of Fine Editions in choice Bindings mostly of the finest Levant Crushed Morocco, comprising Complete Sets of the Works of Modern Writers on History, Art, Sport, and Natural History, Fiction, etc., many with coloured plates. A remarkable copy of

WALPOLE'S LETTERS

augmented to 16 volumes by the addition of over 1,500 rare coloured views, mezzotint portraits, etc., Ackerby's Microcosm of London, Tall copies of Ackerman's Oxford, Cambridge, and Westminster, coloured plates, Egan's Boxiana; Life in London; Life in Ireland; The English Spy; The Syntax Tours; Payne's Arabian Nights, with the extra illustrations and special binding; Lillford's Birds, with rare extra plate; Bree's, Dresser's, Latham's and other fine works on Ornithology; Sowerby's Botany; Henley's Tudor Translations, 40 volumes; Gebhardt's Botticelli; Armstrong's Works on Turner, Reynolds, Gainsborough and Raeburn; Dr. Bode's Rembrandt; Lord Ronald Gower's Lawrence; Hamel Corot; a superb set of

THE SPORTING MAGAZINE:

Fore's Sporting Notes; Bailey's Magazine; The Dictionary of National Biography, 64 volumes; Scott's Life of Napoleon, with added illustrations extending to 19 volumes; Alken's National Sports of Great Britain, 1831; Cruikshank's Omnibus, with original wrappers, 1843, and other rare works, which will be Sold by Auction by Messrs. KNIGHT, FRANK & RUTLEY, at 20, Hanover Square, W., on WEDNESDAY and THURSDAY, JULY 9th and 10th, at one o'clock precisely each day. On view two days prior.

Catalogues may be had of Messrs. Radcliffes and Hood, Solicitors, 20, Craven Street, Charing Cross, S.W., or of the Auctioneers, at their offices, 20, Hanover Square, W., and 100, Princes Street, Edinburgh.

MEMOIRS of the COURT of ENGLAND in 1675.

By MARIE CATHERINE, BARONNE D'AULNOY. Translated from the original French by Mrs. WILLIAM HENRY ARTHUR. Edited by G. D. GILBERT. Numerous Illustrations. 16s. net.

The LIFE of MADAME TALLIEN

From the Last Days of the French Revolution until her death as Princess Chimay in 1835.

By L. GASTINE. Translated by J. L. MAY. Seventeen Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net.

ROBERT FULTON.

Engineer and Artist: His Life and Work. By H. W. DICKINSON, A.M.I.Mech.E. Numerous Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net.

A STAINED GLASS TOUR IN ITALY.

By CHARLES H. SHERRILL. Author of "Stained Glass Tours in England," &c. 7s. 6d. net.

THE INVINCIBLE ALLIANCE.

By FRANCIS GRIERSON. 3s. 6d. net.

PRESSING QUESTIONS.

By A. H. MACKMURDO. 3s. 6d. net.

* * * Three Papers on subjects of peculiar topical interest - "Profit Sharing," "Female Suffrage," "Electoral Reform," &c.

THE PLAY OF TO-DAY.

Studies in Play Structure for the Student and the Theatre-goer. By ELIZABETH R. HUNT. 5s. net.

The BODLEY HEAD NATURAL HISTORY.

In Six Volumes. By E. D. CUMING. 200 Illustrations (hand painted) by J. A. SHEPHERD. Vol. I. now ready. 2s. net.

A SYMPHONY & Other Pieces.

By A. E. J. LEGGE. Author of "Silver Age." 3s. 6d. net.

Brilliant New Novels. 6s. each vol.

APRIL PANHASARD. (Just Out.) MURIEL HINE. Author of "Earth" and "Half in Earnest."

THE DISTANT DRUM. DUDLEY SLURROCK.

UNPATH'D WATERS. (Just Out) FRANK HARRIS.

THE GODS ARE ATHIRST. (2nd Ed.) ANAÏOTÉ FRANCE.

OUTSIDE THE ARK. (3rd Ed.) ADELAÏDE HOLI.

THE SON OF HIS MOTHER. (2nd Ed.) CLARA VIEBIG.

THE SILENCE OF MEN. (3rd Ed.) H. F. PREVOSI BATTERBY.

MY FRIEND'S BOOK. ANATOLE FRANCE.

HENRY KEMPTON. (2nd Ed.) EVELYN BRENTWOOD.

THE GOVERNOR. (3s. 6d. net) KARIN MICHAELIS. AND

STELLA MARIS

BY WILLIAM J. LOCKE.
(7th Ed.)

"Alike by its tenderness and by its irony, by its depth of humour and by its depth of human feeling, this book brings its author yet nearer, in our minds, to the creator of Sylvestre Bonnard, and 'Stella Maris' is by far the most beautiful work he has yet accomplished."—Standard.

JOHN LANE, Vigo Street, London, W.

STANLEY PAUL'S SUMMER BOOKS

POLLY PEACHUM

By CHARLES E. PEARCE. Fully Illustrated. 16/- net.

Author of "The Amazing Duchess," "The Beloved Princess," etc.

DAILY EXPRESS: "One of the most interesting and entertaining books of the present season."
GLOBE: "(Extract from a column and a half Review)"—"A most entertaining book."

THE MOST POPULAR NOVELS IN ENGLAND

Now Ready at all Libraries and Booksellers, 6/- each.

THE HONOUR OF THE CLINTONS Archibald Marshall

THE BRAVE BRIGANDS May Wynne

THE UNWORTHY PACT Dorothea Gerard

DEFIANT DIANA E. Everett-Green

BOUND TO BE (it is) Will Hugo

THE HORRIBLE MAN Frances Forbes-Robertson

(Mrs. Harrod)

THE CURSE OF THE NILE (4th Edition) Douglas Sladen

GABRIEL'S GARDEN Cecil Adair

THE STRENGTH OF THE HILLS (3rd Edition) Halliwell Sutcliffe

COLUMBINE AT THE FAIR Kate Horn

SO IT IS WITH THE DAMSEL Nora Wynne

BRINETA AT BRIGHTON Gabrielle Wodnil

A GREY LIFE (4th Edition) "Rita"

MRS. BRETT M. Hamilton

THE LOST DESTINY G. Villiers-Stuart

MRS. GRAY'S PAST Herbert Flowerdew

LOUIS XI.

By Lt.-Col. C. P. HAGGARD. Illustrated 16s. net.

A TOUR THROUGH SOUTH AMERICA

By A. S. FORREST.

Demy 8vo. Illustrated with 14 Original Drawings. 10s. 6d. net.

STANLEY PAUL AND CO., 31, Essex Street, LONDON.

DIGBY, LONG & Co.'s NEW NOVELS.

IRMA OF CARPATHIA.

By PERCY J. HARTLEY. Author of "The House of Diana," &c.
Crown 8vo. Cloth 6s.

"This romance of the Balkans is a thoroughly spirited and dashing story, admirably conceived, and pleasantly written. The book abounds in pages of daring adventure."
—Eastern Morning News.

A MAID OF METTLE. By "ALLEN," Author of "A Double Blindness," &c. Cloth 6s.
"It has been a sheer delight to read this tale."—Liverpool Courier

THE SKY-LINE. By ETHEL CANNING. Cloth 6s.
"The story is told with great power, and possesses an enthralling interest."—Huddersfield Examiner

London: DIGBY, LONG & Co., 16, Bouverie Street, Fleet Street, E.C.

AUTHORS' AGENCY. The SURREY LITERARY AGENCY place MSS. promptly and obtain the best possible terms, because it is conducted on literary lines and business principles. SPECIAL FACILITIES FOR PLACING NOVELS, Etc. Prospectus free on application to "Strathmore," Westbury Road, New Malden, Surrey. (Kindly note new address.)

GLAISHER'S BOOK CATALOGUES PUBLISHERS' REMAINDERS

In Great Variety and at Greatly Reduced Prices. Supplementary List for June, 1913, Now Ready.

Gratis and Post Free.

WILLIAM GLAISHER, Ltd., 265, High Holborn, London; and at 14, George Street, Croydon, Surrey.

BOOKS (Secondhand). Catalogues post free. Thousands of books in stock, moderately priced. R. ATKINSON, 97, Sunderland Road, Forest Hill, London.

MACMILLAN'S LIST.

MR. BRYCE'S NEW BOOK.

University and Historical Addresses

Delivered during a Residence in the United States as Ambassador of Great Britain. By the Right Hon. JAMES BRYCE, O.M. 8vo. 8s. 6d. net.

Lore of Proserpine. By MAURICE HEWLETT. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

Morning Post—"To lovers of literary art, ten of the eleven chapters must yield perpetual pleasure, so rich and supple is the style, so keen the flashes of thought and humour, so beautifully told the alleged instances of commerce between the author or his witnesses and the creatures of the fairy-world."

Vol. IV. Just Ready.

Lollardy and the Reformation in England. An Historical Survey.

By the late JAMES GAIRDNER, C.B., LL.D., D.Litt. Vol. IV. Edited by WILLIAM HUNT, M.A., D.Litt. 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

Previously published. Vols. I. and II. 21s. net. Vol. III. 10s. 6d. net.

The Seine from Havre to Paris. By SIR EDWARD THORPE, C.B., F.R.S. Illustrated. 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

Fifth Edition, thoroughly revised.

The Scenery of Switzerland and the Causes to which it is due. By the late LORD AVEBURY. Fifth Edition, thoroughly revised, with some New Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 6s.

Psyche's Task. A Discourse Concerning the Influence of Superstition on the Growth of Institutions. Second Edition, Revised and Enlarged. To which is added "The Scope of Social Anthropology." By Prof. J. G. FRAZER, D.C.L. 8vo [Shortly]

The Inside of the Cup. By WINSTON CHURCHILL, Author of "Richard Carvel," etc. Extra crown 8vo. 6s.

Daily Chronicle—"Ordinary criticism, the remark that this is a clever book, an absorbing story, does not seem appropriate to describe Mr. Churchill's latest. The story is too unusual for such trite phrasing, and one calculated to arouse much thought and great argument among those who read it."

A Prisoner in Fairyland. (The book that 'Uncle Paul' wrote.) By ALGERNON BLACKWOOD, Author of "Jimbo," etc. Extra crown 8vo. 6s.

The Westminster Gazette—"A book which every lover of Mr. Blackwood's unique work will hail with enthusiasm and close with satisfaction."

LAWRENCE STERNE.

TRISTRAM SHANDY AND SENTIMENTAL JOURNEY. Two vols. 8vo. 3s. 6d. net each. Roxburgh binding. 5s. net each. [Library of English Classics.]

LAWRENCE STERNE. By H. D. TRAILL. Crown 8vo. Library Edition. 2s. net. Popular Edition. 1s. 6d. Sewed. 1s. Fcap. 8vo. Pocket Edition. 1s. net. [English Men of Letters.]

MACMILLAN & CO., Ltd., LONDON.

Mr. Heinemann's New Books.

THE MEN AROUND THE KAISER. By FREDERIC W. WILE (Correspondent of "Daily Mail" in Berlin). With Portraits. 6s. net.

"A readable and useful volume."—Daily News.

RUE AND ROSES. By ANGELA LANGER. Intro. by W. L. COURTNEY. 5s. net.

"A story that has been felt all through, and the result is that its simple chronicle is deeply and lastingly impressive."—Daily Telegraph.

MADAME ROYALE. A Biography of the Duchesse d'Angouleme. By ERNEST DAUDET. 10s. net. One of the most pathetic figures taking part in the great French Revolutionary Periods.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION.

CAMERA ADVENTURES in the AFRICAN WILDS. Beautifully illustrated with Photographs by the Author, A. R. DUGMORE. 12s. 6d. net.

DAUBER. By JOHN MASEFIELD (Author of "The Everlasting Mercy.") 3s. 6d. net.

"Dauber" is a fine piece of writing, probably as magnificent a picture of the sea as the literature of our country possesses."—Evening Standard.

THE HAND in the DARK and other Poems. By ADA CAMBRIDGE (Author of "The Three Miss Kings.") 5s. net.

"The verses are not without substance, and a lover of poetry will enjoy following their elusive, music-like suggestions of the play of deep feeling."—Scotsman.

DEGENERATION. By MAX NORDAU. 2s. 6d. net.

THE 'MIND THE PAINT' GIRL. A Play in Four Acts by Sir A. W. PINERO. Cloth, 2s. 6d.; Paper, 1s. 6d.

LATEST 6s. FICTION.

JAMES HURD - R. O. PROWSE

THE HEADQUARTER RECRUIT Richard Dehan

THE 61st SECOND Owen Johnson

THE KINGDOM - Harold E. Goad

LU OF THE RANGES Eleanor Mordaunt

VIRGINIA - Ellen Glasgow

GOSLINGS - J. D. Beresford

THE AMBASSADRESS Wm. Wriothelley

GROWING PAINS (2nd Imp.) Ivy Low

THE LOEB CLASSICAL LIBRARY.

Edited by T. E. PAGE, M.A., and W. H. D. ROUSE, Litt.D. A Series of Greek and Latin Texts, with English Translations on the opposite page. Cloth, 5s. net.; Leather, 6s. 6d. net. To be Published Shortly.

Cicero. Vol. II.

Appian. Vol. IV.

Petronius, seneca, Apowlocyntosis.

Please write for Prospectus giving full details of the Series and New Vols. for 1913.

WILLIAM HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford Street, LONDON, W.C.

The Bookman.

"I am a Bookman."—James Russell Lowell.

No. 262. VOL. XLIV.
Subscription rate 11s. per annum post free.

JULY, 1913.

PRICE SIXPENCE
Published Monthly.

CONTENTS.

NEWS NOTES .. .. 145-149

THE BOOKSELLERS' DIARY 149

THE READER-

Laurence Sterne. By PROFESSOR SAINTSBURY .. 151
John Bright By RICHARD WHITTING .. .. 156

PRIZE COMPETITIONS .. 158

"The Best of All Good Little Boys." By WALTER SICHEL 162
Mary Wollstonecraft. By ROGER INGLIS .. .. 164
Mrs. Meynell's Collected Poems. By KATHARINE TYNAN .. .. 167

NEW BOOKS—

The Gods are Athirst. By RICHARD CURLE .. .. 168

William Morris By FRANCIS BICKLEY .. .. 169
Goldwin Smith's Correspondence By A. MACKINTOSH .. 169
Our Village. By W. E. A. AXON .. .. 170
Novelists of Promise and Performance By EDWIN PUGH 172
Rachel Varnhagen .. .. 173
The Romance of Reporting By KILGILLY SNOWDEN .. 173
Frank Harris's Short Stories Here and There in Mexico. By HENRY BARRITT .. 174
The Frustration of Anna. By WILFRED WHITTEN .. 175
Goldsmith. By H. A. HINKSON .. .. 176
The Mulberry Tree. By HAROLD MASSINGHAM .. 176
Jane Austen By W. H. HEIM 177
Croquet and Caricature. By G. S. LAYARD .. .. 178
The Women of To-day and Yesterday. By M. P. WILCOCKS .. .. 178

War and Peace. By J. E. PATTERSON .. .. 179
Tales of the Mermaid Tavern 180
The Roman Road By F. E. GREEN .. .. 181

NOVEL NOTES -

A Prisoner in Fairyland -My Father's Son -V.V.'s Eyes -While the Music Lasts -Mr. Laxworthy's Adventures -The Common Chord -Barry and a Sinner -The Wilderness Lovers -The Strolling Saint -The Petticoat Commando -The Law Bringers .. .. 181-184

THE BOOKMAN'S TABLE

Erebus -The Red Horizon -Prince Charlie's Plot -Kingham -The Garden of Ignorance -Sanctuary .. .. 184-186

NOTES ON NEW BOOKS .. 186

NOTICES.

All communications intended for the Editor must be addressed to the Editor of THE BOOKMAN, ST. PAUL'S HOUSE, WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

A preliminary letter of inquiry should be sent to the Editor before any manuscript is submitted for his consideration.

News Notes.

The contents of the August BOOKMAN will include a special and fully illustrated article on Baroness Orczy. Other important articles will be "The Poetry of Francis Thompson," by Katharine Tynan; "The Young Goethe," by Walter Sichel; "Quack Painting," by G. S. Layard; "Adventures among Birds," by Richard Curle; "Victor Hugo," by George Sampson; "Horace Walpole's World," by F. G. Bettany; "More People's Books," by Arthur Burrell; "An Eighteenth Century Egoist," by Walter Jerrold; "The Last Frontier," by W. C. Scully; "Mexico," by Perceval Gibbon; "The Renaissance and its Makers," by Haldane Macfall; "Borrow's Romantic Ballads," by Thomas Seccombe, etc.

Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton have just published four new novels that were sent in for their recent Thousand Pounds Prize Novel Competition, and that, though they missed the prize, were strongly recommended by the adjudicators for publication. These are: "My Father's Son," by John Harvey; "The Sin of Eve," by May Edginton; "The Wilderness Lovers," by E. R. Punshon; and "A Garden of Spices," by A. Keith Fraser. The several judges through whose hands they passed differed so much as to the order of merit in which these four should be placed that the publishers have resolved to take the opinions of the general reader, and are offering a first prize of Ten Guineas, a second of Five Guineas, a third of Two Guineas, and five Prizes of One Guinea each for the best review which shall deal with all four of the books and place them in what the reader considers is their proper order of merit. The review may take the form of a letter, which must give the competitor's reasons for his preferences, and it may be either typed or in manuscript. The Competition will close on August 1st, and the result will be announced in THE BOOKMAN. Competitors must address their envelopes: Review Competition. Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton, Warwick Square, London, E.C.

Messrs. Nisbet are publishing a new edition of Ballantyne's greatest story for boys, "Coral Island," with a preface by Sir J. M. Barrie, and illustrations in colour by Mr. Septimus E. Scott. "To be born is to be wrecked on an island; and this, no doubt, is why the male child's first instinct is to acquire a knife and secrete pieces of string," says Sir James in his delightfully whimsical foreword, and he goes on to a characteristically droll account of the influence that "Coral Island" had upon himself, and how, in his boyhood, he used to look upon Ballantyne "as the author of the Hundred Best Books, and wondered why that list ever needed to be a subject of controversy." Hapless boys who do not yet know Ballantyne could not do better than make his acquaintance in "Coral Island."

"The Second-Class Passenger" is the title Mr. Perceval Gibbon has given to a new book of short stories that Messrs. Methuen are publishing this month. Mr. Gibbon is at present engaged on a novel of Welsh life, which will not be ready for publication until next year.

Mrs. Florence Barclay's new novel, "The Broken Halo," will be published by Messrs. Putnam in September.

Mr. Joseph Clayton has written a Life of the late Father Stanton, which Messrs. Wells Gardner & Co. are publishing this month.

On the 5th of this month there is to be a great gathering in Norwich in honour of George Borrow. Those taking part in the celebration—and it is open to every good Borrowian who will undertake the journey—will be conducted to Borrow's house, and to various places associated with him in and about Norwich; there will afterwards be a reception by the Lord Mayor of Norwich, at which Mr. Birrell will deliver an address, and the title deeds of the Borrow house, the freehold of which has been purchased by the Lord Mayor, will be presented to the Corporation. A Gipsy Band will play during the reception, and songs and dances will be given under the auspices of the Gipsy and Folk Lore Club, of London. In the evening there is to be a dinner at the Maid's Head Hotel, Norwich, with the Lord Mayor of Norwich in the Chair. For a full programme and all other particulars application should be made to Mr. Frank J. Farrell, Guilderooy, Great Yarmouth. A movement is afoot for turning the house, which the Lord Mayor, Mr. Arthur Michael Samuel is generously presenting to the City, into a Borrow Museum, and a Memorial Fund Committee is appealing for subscriptions to enable them to restore the house to its original condition and to acquire, by purchase or loan, books, manuscripts, letters, portraits, drawings and other objects of Borrowian interest for exhibition.

A very interesting feature of the Borrow celebrations is the matinée to be given at the Little Theatre on July 1st, by Miss Winifride Borrow, a kinswoman of the author of "The Romany Rye." The programme will include a dramatic adaptation from "Lavengro"; Dowson's "Pierrot of the Minute"; and "The Vultures," by Charles Van Lerberghe. Miss Borrow will be supported by a brilliant cast, including Mr. Wilfrid Fletcher, whose playing in "Typhoon" is attracting such wide notice.

"Some Recollections of an Old Landscape Painter," by an anonymous author, will be published by Messrs. Heath, Cranton & Ouseley in September. The anonymous writer is said to be well-known, and it is anticipated that his reminiscences will arouse something of a sensation in society and in artistic circles.

Professor Kastner, of the Manchester University, has edited a new edition of the Poetical Works of Drummond of Hawthornden, which the Manchester University Press is publishing. The book is in two

Photo by H. Walter Barnett
Knightsbridge

Mr. G. M. Trevelyan, whose "Life of John Bright" (Constable) is reviewed on page 150 volumes, and contains twenty-seven facsimile reproductions of original title pages, and seven portraits of Drummond, one of which is now for the first time reproduced.

Madame Betty van der Goes, whose delightful volume of short stories "A Necessity of Life," we reviewed in a recent Number, is the daughter of Sir Frederick Macmillan, the distinguished publisher. It is not often that a book of short stories finds the reviewers so unanimous in their appreciation of it; but, then, it is not often that the reviewers are given a book in which the stories are so fresh in idea and so full of charm as these. Madame Betty van der Goes has been a frequent contributor to the magazines in this country and in America, but this we believe is the first collection she has made of her stories, and its reception should certainly induce her to make a second as soon as may be.

Madame Betty van der Goes.

Author of "A Necessity of Life, and other Stories" (Macmillan).

Miss Evangeline Ryves, whose new book of poems, "The Red Horizon," has just been issued by Mr. Elkin Mathews, numbers in her ancestry that seventeenth-century Sir Thomas Ryves, the famous jurist to whom Fuller refers in his "Worthies" as 'Advocate to the King of Heaven,' and the loyal divine, Bruno Ryves, who wrote and suffered during the Great Rebellion. Another memorable member of her family was the eighteenth-century dramatist, Elizabeth Ryves, whose poignant struggle against the neglect of her generation is related in D'Israeli's "Calamities of Authors." Simultaneously with the publication of Miss

Miss Evangeline Ryves.

Ryves's new book Mr. Elkin Mathews issues a new edition of her earlier volume of verse, "Erebus," and both are reviewed on another page of this Number.

An essayist, a poet, and a painter have united to do something in the way of reviving the old Chapbooks and Broad-sides that were so popular with whose new novel, "V.V.'s Eyes" (Constable), is reviewed on page 182.

Mr. H. S. Harrison,

our forefathers. Their first booklets are: "The Town," an essay by Holbrook Jackson; "Six Essays in the Eighteenth Century," by Richard Honeywood (each essay being no more than an epigrammatic utterance characterising such men as Sterne, Steele, Goldsmith, Fielding, Congreve and Johnson); "The Two Wizards and Other Songs," by Richard Honeywood; and "Eve," by Ralph Hodgson. They have issued also, as Broad-sides, twopence plain and fourpence coloured, a poem by Richard Honeywood, and two by Ralph Hodgson; a drawing of Captain Macheath, and a Parable by Lovat Fraser. It is an interesting experiment that aims at catching something of the old Chap-book and Broad-side traditions, and adding to them such flavour as modernity can give. All the publications are decorated throughout by Lovat Fraser with delightfully quaint woodcuts, and they are sold at the Sign of the Flying Fame in Roland Gardens.

M. Henri Gaudier-Brzeska, a photograph of whose striking bust of Mr. Frank Harris we reproduce on this page, is a young sculptor of remarkable gifts who was born in France twenty-two years ago. Since he was twelve years of age he has led a Bohemian life, roaming about Europe, but nowadays he is settled in London. With the high ambitions he has also the independent spirit of youth, and prefers to work here in a city office in order that he may be free to devote himself to his art undisturbed by commercial considerations.

"The Court Masques of James I.," which Dr. Mary Sullivan has written for Messrs. Putnam, deals with the influence of the Court Masques on the theatres of the time, and incidentally refutes the picturesque old tradition that Shakespeare and his fellow actors were counted among rogues and vagabonds. The volume will be fully illustrated.

An Anthology of "Cambridge Poets: 1900-1913," is to be published in October by Messrs. W. Heffer & Sons. The selections for the volume have been made by Aelfide Tillyard (Mrs. Constance Graham) and Sir A. T. Quiller Couch will contribute an introduction. Cambridge claims to possess a distinct school of Poets, one at least of whom has produced work of high and enduring value. Some thirty of these are to be represented in the volume, and many of them now appear in print for the first time.

A centenary that has been allowed to pass with little recognition is that of the birth of William Edmonstone Aytoun who as part-author of the "Don Gaultier Ballads" delighted folk in the mid-part of the nineteenth century, and as author of "Lays of the Scottish Cavaliers" is sure of lasting fame. It was on June 21st, 1813, that Aytoun was born, the son of a Writer to the Signet and friend of Francis Jeffrey and others of the early Edinburgh Review circle. Though circumstances and the wish of his father drove young Aytoun into the study of the law—so that he himself at length became a Writer to the Signet—from his mother the poet received the heritage of a delight in the old ballad literature of Scotland that no doubt largely influenced the bent of his genius. After starting life in a London lawyer's office—he declared that "though he followed the law he never could overtake it"—Aytoun went to Germany to study its language and literature and returned to Scotland with a translation of the first part of "Faust," only to find that there were four other versions which had just been published or were about to appear. Though he

Photo by Walter Benington,
11, Conduit Street, W.

Mr. Frank Harris.

From bust by Henri Gaudier-Brzeska allowed himself to become tied to the law when his ambition led him to hanker after a literary professorship, Aytoun did not stifle his taste, and the habit of verse-writing in which he had indulged as a boy led him on to notable literary achievement. He became a frequent contributor to Maga, and in 1832 published his first volume of poems. In the same year, too, he first met Theodore Martin, with whose name his own was to be twinned in collaboration.

Mr. J. A. Moroso.

It has been said that if a man wishes a thing strongly enough he may attain to it, and Aytoun might be cited in proof of the contention, for in 1845 he was appointed Professor of Rhetoric and Belles-Lettres in the University of Edinburgh—to the very professorship which years earlier he had named to his father as the goal of his ambition. Not, however, as lawyer or professor is he best remembered. His highest title to fame is perhaps to be found in the slender volume of "Lays of the Scottish Cavaliers," a volume which stamps him as the most notable of the immediate successors of Sir Walter Scott. Such splendid rhetorical poetry as "Edinburgh After Flodden" is likely to last as long as the patriotic feeling to which it gives expression, for it grew out of the writer's inmost emotions. Another side of Aytoun's work was seen in his satire-parody of the "spasmodic school," as he termed it, in "Firmilian," wherein he made happy fun of the work of "Festus" Bailey, Sydney Dobell and Alexander Smith. It was the wit and fun which found expression in "Firmilian" that had earlier drawn Aytoun and Theodore Martin together and led to their joining in the writing of those farcical ballads for the magazines which were later collected under the name of "Bon Gaultier." Not all critics will agree with Henry Morley in saying that "the whimsical imitations in these ballads of the manner of many poets was far in advance of the mere fun of the 'Rejected Addresses,'" while recognising that many of them possess in an eminent degree that combination of a feeling for fun with a sense of criticism which is essential to good parody.

Mr. John A. Moroso, whose first novel, "The Quarry," Messrs. Sampson Low & Co. are publishing, is a well-known American journalist. He has written many stories for the magazines, and has had a strenuous career first as police reporter and, latterly, as a writer of special articles for the New York Press. He has fashioned "The Quarry" largely out of his journalistic experiences, and brings in it, incidentally, a vigorous and dramatic indictment against certain practices of the American police.

The Booksellers' Diary.

LIST OF FORTHCOMING BOOKS.

July 1st to August 1st, 1913.

Mr. J. W. Arrowsmith.

KEITH MORRIS, ELIZABETH—An Englishwoman in the Canadian West. Illustrated with about 20 full page illustrations, and issued in an attractive Coloured Wrapper. A book of personal experiences. 1s net.

Messrs. William Blackwood & Sons.

HAY, IAN—Happy Go-Lucky. 6s.

Messrs. Cassell & Co.

"ANONYMOUS."—What's Wrong With Your Business? 1s net.
 Boy's Book of Engines and Ships. 2s. 6d.
 German Conversation for English Travellers. 6d and 1s net.
 HUTCHINSON, DR. WOODS.—Common Diseases. 6s net.
 OPPENHEIM, E. PHILLIPS.—The Double Four. 1s net.
 ORCZY, BARONESS.—Lady Molly. 6d.
 PEMBERTON, MAX.—Kronstadt. 1s net.
 ROWLANDS, EFFIE ADELAIDE.—The Joy of Life. 6d.
 WITHERS, PEARCES.—Is There a Hell? 1s net.

Messrs. Chatto & Windus.

BENNETT, ARNOLD.—A Great Man. Popular Edition. 6d.
 CROSS, MARGARET B.—A Question of Means. Popular Edition. 6d.
 GIBSON, L. S.—The Freemasons. Popular Edition. 6d.
 NEWTE, H. W. C.—Fanny Meares: The Story of a London Shop-Girl. Cheap Edition. 1s net.
 FERRIN, ALICE.—Idolatry. Popular Edition. 6d.

Messrs. W. B. Clive & Sons.

CHAYLOR, H. L. M.A., and TRULLOV, H. L., B.A.—Preliminary French Course. 1s. 6d.
 HODGKINSON, L. G.—Pictorial Geography. 1s. 6d.
 PARRY, RIV. A. W., M.A., B.Sc. (edited by)—Certificate Hygiene (for the Acting Teacher) (Certificate Examination). 1s. 6d.
 PENN, L. M., M.A.—Casus Gallic War, VI. 1s. 6d.

Mr. A. C. Fifield.

SPENCER, SHERWOOD.—The Flood of Youth. Poet. Second and Enlarged Edition. 1s net.

Messrs. Greening & Co.

GULL, C. RANGER.—Black Honey. 6s.
 WYNNE, MAY.—Honey of Navarre. 6d.

Messrs. Holden & Hardingham.

ADAM, HARGRAVE.—Police Work from Within. 6s.
 BYNG, HON. MRS. JULIAN.—Ann of the Marshland. 6s.
 CROKER, MRS. B. M.—Jungle Lake. 7d.
 HUSLAN, PERCY ALAN.—North Sea Problem. 1s net.
 HOLLIS, GERTRUDE.—Toy's Victory. 6s.
 HUME, FRANK.—The Island of Phantasy. 6d.
 MACKENZIE, COL. J. S.—Wild Flowers and How to Tell them Instantly. net, paper, 1s. 6d net, cloth.
 PRATT, AMBROSE.—The Real South Africa. 10s. 6d net.
 RUSSELL, W. CLARK.—The Golden Hope. 6d.
 STANTON, CORALIE, and HOSKIN, J. H. V.—Love that Kills. 6d.
 STRINDBERG, AUGUST.—Advent. A Play. 1s net.

Messrs. Hurst & Blackett.

FOTHERGILL, JESSIE.—The Tresses of Everhouse. 7d.
 HORNIMAN, ROY.—Jenny. 6s.
 OLIPHANT, MRS.—The Laird of Norlaw. 6d.

Messrs. Hutchinson & Co.

BANCROFT, F.—Thane Brandon. 6s.
 BENSON, ROBERT HUGH—An Average Man. 6s.
 DURING, STELLA M.—Love's Recompense. 6d.
 EVERETT-GREEN, E.—Where There's a Will. 6d.
 JEROME, K.—They and I. 6d.
 MAXWELL, W. H.—In Cotton Wool. 1s. net.
 RAPHAEL, JOHN N.—Up Above. 6s.
 "RIIA."—Calvary. 6d.
 SWAN, ANNIE S.—Burden Bearers. 6d.
 WILLCOCKS, M. P.—The Power Behind. 6s.

Messrs. Lynwood & Co.

BARLOW, HILARE.—The Sentence of the Judge: A Novel. Cheap Edition. 2s. net.
 FROST, W. A.—Bulwer Lytton: An Exposure of the Errors of his Biographers. 1s. net.
 HOLLAND, CLIVE.—A Madonna of the Poor, and Other Stories. 6s.
 HOLLAND, CLIVE.—My Japanese Wife. New and Revised Edition. 1s. net.
 HOLLAND, CLIVE.—The Spell of Iss. New and Revised Edition. 1s. net.
 HOPKINS, R. THURSTON.—Oscar Wilde: A Study. Second Edition. Revised and Enlarged. With Introduction by Sir I. Marchant Williams, M.A. 2s. 6d. net.
 LEITH, MRS. DISNEY.—Champion Sandy: A Story. 1s. net.
 LEITH, MRS. DISNEY.—Lachlan's Widow. A Sequel to "A Black Martinmas." 6s.
 MUGGE, MAXIMILIAN A.—Darts of Dehance. Sonnets and other Poems. 2s. 6d. net.
 OULTON, MISS L.—Exceeding Pleasant, and Other Sketches. With 9 Illustrations. 6s.
 PERRISS, A.—The Shadow on the Purple. Recollections of an Ex Attaché. Cheap Edition. 1s. net.
